PREFACE.

Dr. Naegelsbach's Commentary on Isaiah, the Evangelist among the Hebrew prophets, appeared, as the concluding volume of Dr. Lange's Bibelwerk, in 1877, just twenty years after the publication of its first volume on Matthew (1857). The author says in his preface (dated July 26th, 1877) that the "nonum prematur in annum" was literally fulfilled, since he has been engaged on it nine years.

The English translation was begun several years ago from advanced sheets kindly forwarded by the German publisher. It was undertaken by Dr. Lowrie, then Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., and his colleague and friend, the late Dr. Jacobus. But Dr. Jacobus only lived to make some notes on the first few chapters, which were retained unaltered (with his initials, M. W. J.) from motives of affectionate remembrance. After his death, the Rev. Dr. Moore, formerly of Vienna, now of New Brighton, Pa., was associated with the work, and assumed the translation of chaps. xxi.–xxx., and chaps. lx.–lxvi., inclusive. The other chapters were prepared by Dr. Lowrie, who for the last year and a half has devoted all his time and strength to the laborious work.

The great length of the German commentary (827 pages), and the inexpediency of dividing the English edition in two volumes, made it necessary to condense and to abridge as much as was consistent with justice to the author and his work. For the same reason the original additions are confined to interpretations differing from those of Dr. Naegelsbach, and to additions and substitutions of doctrinal and homiletical matter from English sources for those of German authors and sermonizers. The metrical arrangement of the text is based upon the well-known commentary of Bishop Lowth and the Annotated Paragraph Bible of the London Religious Tract Society. Dr. Naegelsbach gives a prose version printed in the usual style, without reference to the Hebrew parallelism.

One more volume, containing Numbers and Deuteronomy, which has been unavoidably delayed for one portion of it, remains to complete the Anglo-American reproduction of Lange, which was begun in 1864 (seven years after the German).

It is doubtful whether any editor or publisher would have ventured on a commentary of twenty-four large and closely printed volumes, could he have forseen the difficulties and risks connected with it; and yet it has proved successful beyond all expectation. May Lange's Bible-work long continue to be an aid and comfort to pastors and theological students for whose special benefit it was prepared.

THE PROPHET ISAIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. CONTEMPORARY HISTORY.

From the period of their establishment, all the conflicts in which the kingdoms of Israel and Judah were involved with the neighboring nations were, so to speak, merely of a local nature. Only when they came in contact with Assyria and Babylon did they enter into relations with the world-power (Weltmacht). If thereby, on the one hand, the danger became infinitely greater for the theocratic life, the theocracy, on the other, approached so much nearer the fulfilment of its task in the world's history. The relation to Assyria was brought about by the desire of Ahaz king of Judah to obtain protection against Syria and Ephraim. Out of the dependence on Assyria in which Ahaz became thereby involved, his successor Hezekiah sought to free himself by the aid of the southern world-power, Egypt. This, on his part, was an untheocratic procedure. Assyria was not to be hindered in subjugating Judah by human power. Jehovah Himself protected His people and compelled Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, to make a hasty retreat by the fearful desolation which the angel of the LORD wrought in his army (2 Kings xix. 35). But even before Judah was entirely rescued out of the power of Assyria by this miraculous aid, it had initiated another relation to a world-power that was to become incomparably more fatal to it than the relation to Assyria.

The Babylonian king Merodach-Baladan, when Hezekiah recovered from a dangerous illness, had sent an embassy to him to congratulate him and to initiate friendly relations. Hezekiah, flattered by the honor shown him, met the Babylonian ambassador with too little reserve. Thereupon he was obliged to hear from Isaiah's lips the denunciation that all the treasures of his house, that he had displayed with such pride to those ambassadors, would be carried away as booty, and his children as captives to Babylon. In place of Assyria, therefore, now a thing of the past, Isaiah sees Babylon appear on the horizon as the enemy that was to prepare the end of the outward theocracy. The Babylonian captivity stands clear before his prophetic vision, but also the end of it, and therewith the beginning of the great period of salvation that was to reach to the end of the world, albeit with great alternations. Thus, therefore, it is a threefold conflict in which Isaiah sees the theocracy placed: that with Ephraim-Syria, Assyria and Babylon. One develops out of the other. The conflict with Ephraim-Syria was properly but the handle to the fatal complication with Assyria, and the latter in turn generated the relations with Babylon. For Merodach-Baladan, the great Babylonian patriot (see comment at xxxix. 1–8) and firm defender of the freedom of his country against the oppression of the Assyrians, would certainly not have congratulated Hezekiah on his recovery, had he not seen in him an ally against the common enemy, Assyria. Thus we see the Prophet Isaiah appearing at a period when the way was paving for the immediate relations of the theocracy with the great world-powers by which its ruin was threatened. Beyond doubt, this was an historical crisis of the utmost significance, and we see that only a man of the greatest spiritual power could be equal to the occasion. Isaiah was equal to it. When it was reported in Jerusalem that Ephraim had combined with Syria, hearts trembled like the trees of the forest shaken with the wind (vii. 2). But Isaiah declared that Rezin and the son of Remaliah were nothing but two smoking stumps of torches (vii. 4). But Assyria, in which Ahaz confided, was to be feared (vii. 17). However, when Assyria had fulfilled its mission in Israel and Judah, and now in wicked arrogance would possess the city of Jerusalem, and so swallow up Judah as it had done Ephraim, it was said: "I will put my hook in thy nose and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way which thou camest" (xxxvii. 29). And so it came to pass. What human wisdom could see danger for the theocracy in that embassy of Merodach-Baladan? The Prophet detects the danger. He gives warning—he announces that Babylon will have the king of Judah and those that belong to him as captives in the midst of it. But much more than with the portrayal of this judgment he occupies himself with the consolation that will be extended to Israel for this visitation. His gaze is chiefly directed to the deliverance out of this exile, and every thing belonging to a glorious salvation for personal and natural life that lies in perspective, even to the remotest distance, is naked and open before his eyes.

Thus Isaiah is the great Central-Prophet who, stationed at a decisive turning-point, detects with a clear eye all the principal points of the perspective that open out from it, and becomes thereby to his people the prophetic mediator both of exhortation and warning, and also of consolation and instruction as occasion demanded. And by this means he becomes, at the same time, the one on whom all later prophets lean as on their greatest exemplar and highest prophetic authority.

Isaiah's labors fall, according to i. 1, in the time of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. According to vi. 1 he was called to the prophetic office in the year that Uzziah died. It need occasion no surprise, therefore, that, with the exception of that information concerning the call of the Prophet, there appears no further piece of writing from Uzziah's time. But we find none also from Jotham's time. For there happened nothing under Jotham that could have moved Isaiah to prophetic activity. The period of sixteen years under Jotham may have been a period of inward collection and preparation for the Prophet. First under Ahaz his labors proper began. The first occasion was furnished by the Syro-Ephraimitic war, concerning the particulars of which see the commentary on vii. 1 sq. The combination of the military forces of Ephraim-Syria moved Ahaz to call in the aid of the Assyrian king, Tiglath-Pileser. But Isaiah it moved to direct his prophetic gaze on Assyria, and, primarily, in the prophetic cycle, chapters vii.-xii., to announce both the danger impending from Assyria and the final deliverance out of it. Tiglath-Pileser, in fact, complied with the desire of Ahaz for aid. It was welcome to him in the interests of his policy of conquest. He conquered and made subject the kingdom of Syria (2 Kings xvi. 9; comp. on Isa. xvii. 1). He conquered at the same time the north and east of the kingdom of Ephraim, and led the inhabitants away captive (2 Kings xv. 29). From that time onwards Palestine and the countries in its neighborhood remained a principal mark for the conquering expeditions of Assyria. Ahaz brought this down on himself by his policy of unbelief. He himself, indeed, was not yet to reap the fruits of his untheocratic conduct. Although by direct encouragement of foreign modes of religious worship (comp. 2 Kings xvi. 10 sqq.) he had added to his guilt, he still remained in possession of his land and throne to the end of his life (728 B. C.). But his successor, Hezekiah, although a prince devoted to the LORD with his whole heart, was obliged to experience all the distresses that sprang forth like mischievous fruit from the dragon seed of his father. When Hosea, king of Israel, sought to rid himself of the oppressive power of Assyria by an alliance with Egypt, Shalmaneser, Tiglath-Pileser's successor, besieged Samaria for two years. He was prevented by death from completing his undertaking. His successor, Sargon, took the city in the third year of the siege (722 B. C., 2 Kings xvii. 6) and led away the remnant of the ten tribes into captivity. But by that effort of the king of Israel to find protection against Assyria in Egypt, the attention of the Assyrian ruler was drawn to the latter power. From the middle of the eighth century, according to MANETHO, there reigned in Egypt the twenty-fifth Ethiopic dynasty. Three of its kings are mentioned by name: Sabako (Sevech, So) I. and II. and Tirhâka. According to the annals of Sargon (comp. SCHRADER, Die Keilinschriften und das A. T., pp. 258, 318), Sevech (II.), in union with Hanno of Gaza, encountered Sargon at Raphia (twenty-two milliaria south-west of Gaza) in the year 720 B. C. Sargon conquered and subdued Philistia. But the Philistine princes revolted. Therefore a new expedition of Sargon against Philistia, that resulted in the subjection of the insurgents in the year 711. This is the expedition conducted by Tartan (i. e., general in chief) to which Isa. xx. refers. All these conflicts had taken place without the kingdom of Judah becoming involved as a fellow-sufferer. The clouds big with destruction moved thrice along the north, west and south-west borders of Judah before they turned to empty themselves on Judah itself. It is related also, 2 Kings xviii. 7, that Hezekiah revolted from the king of Assyria, i. e., that he sought to relieve himself of the dependence to which Ahaz had submitted. At the same time Hezekiah—and this was the great weakness of which this otherwise admirable prince was guilty—sought protection and help from Egypt against the danger impending from Assyria. On this account he is sharply reproved by Isaiah. Chapters xx., xxviii.–xxxiii. are meant to warn against this untheocratic policy. Judah must trust in the LORD who promised by His prophet not to yield it up to the Assyrian, but that he would free it by a mighty act of deliverance. Sargon was murdered in the year 705. He was succeeded by his son Sennacherib. The third expedition of this king that occurred in the year 700 B. C. passed through Phœnicia to the south of Palestine. The land of Judah was traversed and desolated. Only the city of Jerusalem remained to Hezekiah, in which he was shut up "like a bird in its cage." In order to save at least Jerusalem, Hezekiah paid Sennacherib to retire thirty talents of gold and three hundred talents of silver (2 Kings xviii. 14 sqq.). Sennacherib took the money and then still demanded the surrender of the city. In this great strait Hezekiah cried to the LORD and received through Isaiah a comforting promise. At Eltekeh, a Levitical city in the territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 44; xxi. 23) the armies of Sennacherib and Tirhâka encountered. The victory was undecided. But shortly after 185,000 men perished in the camp of the Assyrian in one night, likely of a pest. This compelled Sennacherib to retreat (comp. 2 Kings xviii. and xix.; Isa. xxxvi. and xxxvii.). Thus Judah was rescued.

This event forms the conclusion of the history of Isaiah as far as known to us. For not long after this miraculous deliverance Hezekiah died. It is doubtful if Isaiah still lived to see the reign of Manasseh. Isaiah i. 1 is against it. For there Hezekiah is named as the latest king under whom Isaiah lived. Isaiah knew that after that overthrow (xxxvii. 36) Assyria was done away, and was no more to be dreaded by the theocracy. His gaze, as early as the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, since that embassy related in Isaiah xxxix., had turned in another direction. He knew that the greatest danger threatened the theocracy, not from Assyria, but from Babylon. At this time, toward the end of his life, before or after the Assyrian overthrow, he must have occupied himself with the relation of his nation to Babylon. But he is not especially interested in the victory of Babylon and the captivity of his people there. This point he leaves to others whom the matter more nearly touched. Only the thoughts of salvation and redemption employ him at the end of his life. In this period must have originated the great book of consolation (xl.–lxvi.), along with the smaller pieces that relate to Babylon (xiii.–xiv. 23; xxi. 1–10; xxxiv., xxxv.).

§ 2. THE PERSON AND PROPHETIC LABORS OF ISAIAH.

The name יְשַׁעְיָהוּ (abbreviated יְשַׁעְיָה, which form, however, is never used in the text of the Old Testament as the name of the Prophet) can mean salus Jovœ or Jova salvat (salvavit). יֵשַׁע combined with יָהּ must properly have sounded יֵשַׁעְיָה or יִשְׁעִיָּה, abbreviated יִשְׁעִי (which actually occurs 1 Chron. ii. 31; iv. 20; v. 24). Still there prevails a certain freedom in the formation of compound proper names. On the other hand, the compounds with יָהּ, whose first part is a verb—and that Kal—are extremely numerous, so that it is natural here to take ישע for a verbal form. But the meaning of יָשַׁע יהוה would be primarily: Jova salvus est. Still it happens not unfrequently that, in compounding names, Kal is taken in the sense of Piel or Hiphil (comp. KOEHLER, Komm. on Zech., p. 3 sq.); so that here too יָשַׁע might be taken in the sense of הוֹשִׁיעַ. There remains still some irregularity, whether we derive ישעיה from יֵשַׁע or יָשַׁע. But the sense remains the same. FUERST (in his Lexicon) takes a substantive יָשָׁע for the root, and translates "Jah is helper;" whereas in his Concordance he translates it "deliverance of God." In JEROME, too, the same difference is found, only that once he renders the name σωτηρία κυρίου, and again salvator Domini. Other men of this name are mentioned 1 Chr. iii. 21; xxv. 3, 15; Ezr. viii. 7, 19; Neh. xi. 7. Concerning the attempt of ABARBANEL to establish a connection between the names of the prophets (and thus Isaiah's also) and prophecy, see KOEHLER, l. c., p. 5, Anm.

We know almost nothing concerning the outward relations of the Prophet. His father is called Amoz (אָמוֹץ). Who this was is wholly unknown. Only ignorance of the language could identify him with the prophet Amos (עָמוֹס); only Rabbinical jugglery could make out of him a brother to the king Amaziah (אֲמַצְיָה). The latter is the source of the saying that Isaiah came of a royal race. We are moreover uninformed about the time of Isaiah's birth and death. The opinion that Isaiah's prophetic labors extended through the whole, or at least the greater part of the reign of Uzziah, is founded on the false exposition of the date given i. 1, and also of the position that the account of the calling of the Prophet occupies in the book (comp. on this GESENIUS in his Commentary, p. 5 sqq.). That the call of the Prophet is first narrated chap. vi. has quite another explanation (comp. our commentary, in loc.). We can only infer from vi. 1 that Isaiah was called to the prophetic office in the year of Uzziah's death, i. e., therefore in the year 759 B. C. How old he was at that time, we know not. If we assume that he could hardly have been younger than Jeremiah, who calls himself a נַעַר when he was called (Jer. i. 6 sq.), and if we further assume that Jeremiah was twenty years old, then Isaiah would have lived from that time 16 + 16 + 29, thus at least sixty-one years, and consequently must have attained an age of at least eighty-one years. Concerning the period and manner of his death we have only rumors. Manasseh, Hezekiah's successor, is said to have caused the Prophet to be sawn asunder. The Prophet having fled to a hollow cedar from the king's wrath, and having been "enfolded" by it, the king let him be sawn in this tree (comp. the passages from the Talmud relating to this in GESENIUS, in loc.). In itself it is not at all improbable that Manasseh inflicted a martyr's death on the faithful prophet of Jehovah. As is well known, he is described to have been the wickedest and cruelest of all the kings of Judah. It is expressly said of him that he shed very much innocent blood (2 Kings xxi. 16). JOSEPHUS (Antiq. X. 3, 1) adds to this that he did not spare the prophets. But opposed to all this is the fact that, chap. i. 1, the reign of Manasseh is not named, which certainly would not have been omitted, especially if the Prophet had been put to death by that king. At the spot where the three valleys, Jehoshaphat, Gihon and Tyropœon, come together, there stands an ancient gnarled trunk (it is, however, the trunk of a mulberry tree) that is called the tree of Isaiah (comp. GRAF VON WARTENSLEBEN, Jerusalem, Gegenwärtiges und Vergangenes, 3, Aufl., Berlin, 1875, p. 83) [DR. ROBINSON'S Researches, etc., Vol. I., p. 232, 336.—TR.] At the same spot the fountain Siloam issues, of which the report says that God sent it to the Prophet to still his thirst when he was near his death (comp. LEYRER in HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XIV. p. 375). We have no hint of Isaiah's ever having lived any where else than in Jerusalem. That he was married appears from vii. 3 (comp. x. 21 sq.), where his son is called Shear-Jashub, and from the account viii. 3 that Isaiah, at God's command, "went unto the prophetess," who bore him a son, whom, also by divine command, he named Maher-shalal-hash-baz. Moreover, viii. 18, Isaiah speaks of the children "that God had given him." From what is related in the passages just cited, we see that the family of the Prophet was quite drawn into the sphere of his prophetic activity. That Isaiah was the instructor of king Hezekiah, as Nathan had formerly been of Solomon (2 Sam. xii. 25), is mere conjecture that PAULUS sets up in the clavis on Isaiah ix. 5. A double notice in Chronicles has occasioned the conjecture that Isaiah was annalist of the kingdom. Thus we read 2 Chron. xxvi. 22 that Isaiah wrote (כָּתַב) the דִּבְרֵי עֻזִּיָּהוּ, the first and the last. And 2 Chron. xxxii. 32 it reads: "Now the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and his goodness, behold, they are written in the vision of Isaiah, the Prophet, the son of Amoz, and in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel" ["(which is received) into the book of the kings," etc. Dr. N.'s translation.—TR.]. According to this, therefore, Isaiah composed historical works on the lives of the two most distinguished kings that were his contemporaries, and one of these works was incorporated, though perhaps only partially, in the great annalistic historical work of the kings of Judah and Israel, from which the Chronicler drew (comp. ZOECKLER, Chronik., p. 16 sq.). When the Chronicler calls the work on Hezekiah חָזוֹן, it is most natural to explain this designation by saying that that historical work was regarded as a part of our prophetic book, which in fact bears the title חזון ישעיהו. And this might happen for the reason that chapters xxxvi.–xxxix. contain historical sections that are common to our book of prophecy and to the canonical book of Kings, as well as to the annals of the kingdom of Judah that were the source of the latter. The book of prophecy might easily be regarded by the Chronicler (who lived later, and could hardly have had before him the writing of Isaiah about Hezekiah) as the source of Isaiah's accounts concerning Hezekiah which he found in his annalistic historical work. But the statements of the Chronicler by no means justify the assumption that Isaiah filled the office of a מַזְכִּיר. In the writings that we have from him the person of the Prophet is kept in the background. They speak of him and of what belongs to him only so far as they have to tell of his direct and personal interference in what occurred (comp. vi. 1 sqq.; vii. 1 sqq.; viii. 1 sqq., 16 sqq.; xx. 1 sqq.; xxii. 15 sqq.; xxviii. 9 sqq.; xxxvii.–xxxix.). The secret foundation of all his prophetic activity was the consciousness that he was an instrument of God, chosen, equipped and called to His service (comp. vi.). This consciousness generated in him the most devoted obedience and the most implicit trust in God. Consequently he had no fear of man and no regard for merely human interests. With the greatest freedom he opposes Ahaz (vii. 1 sqq.). He does the same to the chamberlain Shebna (xxii. 15 sqq.), people of rank, priests and prophets, men and women, in fact the whole people in general (ii.; iii.; v.; xxviii. 7 sqq.). Moreover he does not spare Hezekiah and his noble counsellors, nor the women who seem, under him also, to have attained great influence. He keenly reproves the secret ways that their policy followed in regard to Egypt (xxx.–xxxii.). When Hezekiah was sick, he says to him that he must die with the same boldness (xxxviii. 1), that he afterwards joyfully announces to the believing suppliant his deliverance and the lengthening of his life (xxxviii. 5 sqq.). And upon Hezekiah's having in foolish vanity displayed his treasures to the messengers from Babylon, he tells him plainly that all this shall be carried away in exile to Babylon (xxxix. 5 sqq.).

Though, on the one hand, we see the Prophet dealing thus practically with the emergencies of the present, yet, on the other hand, there exists for him no merely contemporary interest. For him that immeasurable interval does not exist that for common men divides the remote from the immediate future. Both appear to him a continued whole which he commands with his gaze in all its parts. Every thing of like sort, which in its realization in time forms indeed an organic, connected line of development, yet one that is measurelessly extended, he sees before him as one tableau, whose figures, though really belonging to the most different stages of time, appear to him to stand alongside of one another. In one word, the limits of time do not exist for him. Periods of time vanish before his gaze. He contemplates together what is nearest and farthest when they belong together. Thus he comes back from the remotest future into the immediate present with a sudden spring, and vice versa. Thus i. 12 he comprehends Jerusalem's whole future of salvation in one. The great discourse of the second introduction sets two grand images of the remotest future at its head (ii. 1–4; iv. 2–6), in order to contemplate the present in their light. Much more frequently it happens that, immediately after an event of the near future, the Prophet sees the far and farthest future. Thus in chap. xi., immediately after the deliverance out of the hand of Assyria, he sees the form of the Messiah and of His kingdom of peace, and the latter, in fact, unfolded to its extremest consequences in the generation of a new life of nature. In chap. xvi. 5, to Moab, in reward for its reception of the fugitives of Judah (whom, according to the whole context, he contemplates as expelled by a present threatening world-power), he promises participation in the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. In chap. xix., immediately after announcing to Egypt its ruin by means of Assyria, the then representative of the world-power, he announces to it its conversion to Jehovah and its peaceful union with Assyria and Israel. Let these examples suffice. It would lead us too far to enumerate all the cases of this kind that occur in both parts of the book. Though this may not be an exclusive characteristic of Isaiah's, still one may say that it appears especially strong and frequent in him. This agrees with the elevation of the view-point that he takes. For he that stands highest sees the farthest.

On this account especially he takes so high a rank among the prophets. In Jesus the son of Sirach he is called ὁ προφήτης ὁ μέγας (Ecclus. xlviii. 22), who further says of him that he πνεύματι μεγάλῳ εἶδε τὰ ἔσχατα (ibid. ver. 24), and that he ἕως τοῦ αἰῶνος ὑπέδειξε τὰ ἐσόμενα (ibid. ver. 25). EUSEBIUS calls him (dem. ev. II. 4) τὸν μέγαν καὶ θαυμάσιον προφήτην—indeed even προφήτην μέγιστον (ibid. V. 4). THEODORET calls him ὁ θειότατος Ἡσαΐας. ISIDORUS PELUS: ὁ διορατικώτατος (lib. I. ep. 366), and τῶν προφητῶν σαφέστατος (ibid. ep. 366). Closely connected with this is the consideration that Isaiah foresees those facts of the fulfilment of salvation on which rests the specific teaching of Christianity. For it is historical facts, not dogmas, that constitute the pith of Christian teaching. Of course it is not like one standing near that Isaiah sees those facts, but like one standing far off, which is as it should be. For this reason he describes them in peculiarly strange words, that are to himself indistinct, and yet are essentially correct. Without himself having any presentiment of the meaning of his words, he must predict the birth of the Saviour from an unmarried woman (vii. 14). And then he describes this child by expressions that sound blasphemous, if he to whom they are applied is held to be a man (ix. 5). In contrast with this, he sees the servant of God defamed so as to appear no longer human, and then again raised up to superhuman power and glory (liii.). Moreover he sees an entirely new way of appropriating salvation that must indeed appear strange enough to human thoughts (lv.), and, what to pious persons of the Old Testament must have appeared downright offensive, he speaks of a worship of God to which the outward temple and ceremonial service will seem an abomination (lxvi. 1 sqq.).

Such are, if I may so express myself, the formal substructures of Isaiah's prophecy that make it proper to call him, as JEROME is the first to do: "non solum prophetam sed evangelistam et apostolum" (Prolog. in expos. Jes.; comp. the Epist. ad Paulinam, where he says: "non prophetiam mihi videtur texere Esaias sed evangelium"). With reference to this, AUGUSTINE (De civ. Dei. XVIII. 29) says that Isaiah: "de Christo et ecclesia multa plura quam caeteri prophetavit, ita ut a quibusdam evangelista quam propheta potius diceretur." CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA also, in the preface to his commentary, remarks: "ἐν ταὐτῷ ἐστι προφήτης ἅμα καὶ ἀπόστολος."

I never could comprehend how any one could regard it as a postulate and promotive of scientific knowledge to explain the world without the personal God. Cancel Him, and then riddles and miracles fairly begin, and impossibilities are exacted of our faith. If one would require us to believe that some work of art came into being, not by an artist, but by abstract art, wisdom, power, we would declare such an one to be fit for the insane asylum. And yet men would have us believe that there is an abstract thinking and willing! They hold personality to be a limiting, and therefore an impersonal God to be something unlimited, therefore something higher! But as soon as the limits of personality are broken away, one comes into the region of merely subjective representations; and the philosophers had better look to their aristocratic abstractions and see whether they possess the property of real, objective existence. If they lack this, then the philosophers have perhaps wrought for the study, but not for real life. It is both insanity and idolatry to wish to put abstract-ideal philosophy in the place of the concrete, vitalizing Christian religion. Moreover personality is not limitation in the negative sense. It is merely concentration, and thereby the condition of orderly and really effective being. Personality is, however, at the same time, the condition of an entire and full existence, i. e., it is not mere thinking and willing, but also sensibility. In other words: only personality can have a heart and love. To be sure, we touch here on the proper pith of the controversy. Not all men wish to be loved by God, still less to love Him in return. Humanity entire divides into two parts, one of which presses toward God, the other away from God. For the former, nothing is more precious than nearness to God; the latter feel easy only at a distance from Him. And now-a-days those are esteemed as the lords of science and as benefactors to mankind who do their best to "free (us) from the Creator," as DAVID STRAUSS says! But here the criterion is not objective, impartial, scientific interest, but the interest of the heart self-determined in this or that way toward God. For under all circumstances our relation to God is a concern of the heart. One must either love Him or hate Him, be for Him or against Him (Luke xi. 23). Neutral no one can be. Consciously or unconsciously every man must feel himself attracted by God or repelled from Him, according as, in his secret heart, that which is kindred to God or that which is inimical to God has the upper hand. For there is no man in which both are not present. Take the hermeneutics that is founded on the assumption that there is no personal God, and that the world is founded on abstractions, in whose real existence one must believe, much as that contradicts all reason and experience; shall such hermeneutics be more entitled to consideration than that which rests on the fundamental view that there is a personal God, to whom we are related, who loves us and guides our fortune with paternal wisdom? This question can never be objectively decided here below, because for each individual the subjective attitude of his own heart is the criterion. But at least let no one despise those who see in the Scriptures the revelation of a personal God. And above all things, one must not explain the writings of the prophets of the Old Testament on the assumption that they did not bona fide regard themselves as organs of the living, personal God that governs the world. One may say: they fancied themselves inspired. Very well—then let such point out the illusions that entangled them, and expose their enthusiasms. Or one may say: they were impostors. Then let such unmask them. But let no one put upon their words a sense that they themselves did not intend, because they just believed in a living personal God, and were convinced that they stood under the direct influence of His Spirit. Let no one empty their words of sense—let no one deny that they meant to prophesy because one does not himself believe in any prophecy. Let no one (as e. g. KNOBEL does) make out of the prophecy a marvellous masked representation of events that had already taken place. I willingly confess that the representatives of the divine origin of prophecy have been faulty in many respects. It has been often overlooked that not every thing can be prophesied at any time; that therefore each prophecy must have its historical reason and ground, and that the form and contents of the prophecy must be in harmony with these. It has been further overlooked that prophesying is a seeing from a distance. From a distance one may very well observe a city, mountain and the like, in general outlines. But particulars one does not see. For this reason genuine prophecy in general will never meddle with special prediction. Where, however, the latter takes place, either the special trait contemplated is no subordinate individual thing, or it justifies the suspicion that it is false. These and like mistakes have been committed. But this does not hinder me from maintaining the divine origin of prophecy in general, and also from claiming a scientific title for my construction of Isaiah's prophecy.

§ 3. THE LITERARY PERFORMANCE AND THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET.

1. The lofty spirit resident in our Prophet has taken also a corresponding form. We see in him a master of the Hebrew language. He uses it with a power and ease that find their like in no other. He brought it to the summit of its development. Not only has he always the right word at command—he also never uses one word too much or one too few. And with admirable art, yet without affectation, he knows how to modulate the word according to the contents of the thought. All rhetorical forms of art are at his command, and he can employ all the riches of the language. Something royal has been observed in the way that Isaiah uses the language. So that ABARBANEL associates this character of Isaiah's language with the fancied royal descent of the Prophet, saying: "the charm of his discourse and the beauty of his eloquence is like the discourse of the kings and counsellors of the land, who had a much pleasanter and purer way of speaking than the rest of the children of men" (Comm. in proph. post Jes. I.; see GESENIUS on Jes. I. p. 36). And in another fashion the TALMUD, Tractat. Chagiga (Fol. 13 b) expresses the same thought, saying: "Ezekiel resembles the son of the village when he beholds the splendor of the king, but Isaiah resembles the son of the royal residence" (comp. FUERST, D. Kanon des A. T., pp. 17, 21).

2. As regards the book itself, it divides first into two chief parts: chaps. i.–xxxv. and xl.–lxvi. Between these two chief parts are the chapters xxxvi.–xxxix., which, Janus-like, look forwards and backwards, inasmuch as the chapters xxxvi. and xxxvii. conclude the Assyrian period, and chapters xxxviii. and xxxix. prepare the way for the Babylonian period. The first part then ought properly to be reckoned from i.–xxxvii., the second from xxxviii.–lxvi. But it is traditional to reckon xxxvi.–xxxix. together, and that, too, along with the first chief part, because part first, on account of the greater variety of its contents, may easier receive those historical chapters than the second part that has a quite uniform and exclusive character.

3. Taking part first to include i.–xxxix. we follow the traditional way of counting. But properly this first principal part begins with chap. vii. For chapters i.–vi. contain the great threefold introduction relating to the entire book. That is to say, not only is chap. i. introductive, but chapters ii.–v. are the second and chap. vi. the third introduction. Through three gates we enter into the majestic structure of Isaiah's prophecy. For the proof of this see the comment in loc. Part first falls into five subdivisions. The first subdivision comprises chaps. vii.–xii. In this section the Prophet treats of the relations of Israel to Assyria, contrasting the ruinous beginning of this relation with the blessed termination of it. The second subdivision contains the prophecies against foreign nations (xiii.–xxiii.) At the head of these stands a prophecy against Babylon. For first, this begins with a general contemplation of "the day of the Lord," so that, in a measure, it forms the introduction to all announcements of judgment that follow, and, then, the Prophet sees precisely in Babylon the chief enemy of the theocracy that is appointed to make a preliminary end to its outward continuance (xiii. 1—xiv. 23). This is followed by a short prophecy against Assyria, the enemy, of course, most to be dreaded in the Prophet's time (xiv. 24—27). Following this are prophecies relating to other nations threatened by Assyria: Philistia, Moab, Ephraim-Syria, Ethiopia and Egypt (xiv. 28—xx. 6).

Chapters xxi. and xxii. constitute a special little סֵפֶר. They also contain prophecies against heathen nations, viz.: Babylon, Edom, and Arabia. But there is connected with this in an unusual way a prophecy against Jerusalem. The reason is that these four prophecies bear emblematic superscriptions, on which account we have called them libellus emblematicus. The character of the superscription, therefore, which coincides with that of the other three superscriptions, makes the reason why this prophecy against Jerusalem is incorporated with the prophecies against foreign nations. A prophecy against Tyre forms the conclusion of this second subdivision: the siege of this city by Shalmaneser, which took place in the Prophets time, furnished the occasion for it. But the Prophet sees before him the fate of the city down to the remotest future, and in this contemplation of the future is not wanting the factor that the Chaldeans shall be the ones to make an end of the independence of Tyre. Chaps. xxiv.—xxvii. form a kind of finale to the discourses against the nations. They treat of last things, of the end of the world, the world's judgment, resurrection of the dead, and the fulfilment of the salvation promised to the people Israel. We have called these four chapters libellus apocalypticus. The Third Subdivision has for its subject the relation of Israel to Assyria in the days of king Hezekiah (xxviii.—xxxiii.). It contains five discourses in six chapters. Each discourse begins with הוֹי. They stand in chronological order, and are all of them total surveys, in that each, in a special manner, proceeding from the present distress, and with censure of the false means of deliverance, compresses in one the deliverance out of the distress and the salvation of the (Messianic) end-period that are determined and promised of God. The Fourth Subdivision comprises chaps. xxxiv. and xxxv. These two chapters we designate the finale of part first. They contain a concluding glance at the end-period in respect to the two aspects of it, viz.: the divine judgments both in respect to punishment and salvation. The first is described as comprehending not only the earth, but also the constellations of heaven, in which, however, the manner of its operation on earth is exhibited by a special portrayal of the judgment against one of Israel's most bitter enemies, viz.: Edom. That we stand here at an important boundary, viz.: at the close of part first, appears from the invitation, xxiv. 16, to search the "Book of Jehovah," and thereby verify the fulfilment. This Book of Jehovah can be nothing else than just our part first, to which the Prophet here refers back as to a whole now brought to conclusion. Finally xxxv. describes the salvation which shall be imparted to the people of God by the final judgment. But the Prophet for the present makes prominent only one principal point, viz.: the return home out of the lands of exile into the Holy Land to everlasting joy. We see in this, at the same time, a transition to part second, that has for its subject the description of the period of salvation in all its aspects.

The Fifth Subdivision finally comprehends chapters xxxvi.—xxxix. Their contents is historical and essentially the same that we read in 2 Kings xviii. 13—xx. 19. Chapters xxxvi. and xxxvii. relate the deepest distress into which Hezekiah, confined to his capital city, was brought by the Assyrians, and also the unexpected, sudden and complete deliverance out of this distress by the plague that broke out in the camp of the Assyrians. This fact forms the conclusion of all relations of Israel to Assyria, and therefore xxxvi. and xxxvii. stand first, although the events narrated in them belong to a later period. Chapters xxxviii. and xxxix. inform us of the sickness and recovery of Hezekiah in the fourteenth year of his reign, and of the Babylonian embassy that congratulated him on this account. Hereby was afforded occasion to the Prophet to prophesy the Babylonian exile, and in so far xxxviii. and xxxix. are, so to speak, the bridge to chapters xl.—xlvi., and stand immediately before them, although the events of which they inform us precede by about fourteen years the events narrated in chaps. xxxvi. and xxxvii.

4. Surveying again the collection of prophecies in part first, we see that they are well arranged. The older commentators (even LUTHER) have erroneously held them to be without arrangement, and put together without plan. But the dominating principle is an arrangement according to matter rather than chronological arrangement. The first introduction (chap. i.) belongs to the latest pieces. It has much in common with chapters xl.—xlvi. (see below). The second introduction (ii.—v.) is, as a whole, also the product of that period when the Prophet put his book together. Still for this introduction the Prophet made use of earlier pieces, especially of the period of Ahaz (comp. iii. comm.). And thereby, of course, he has given at the same time a picture of that period of his labors which preceded the first conflict with the world-power and the prophecies that related to it. For this reason this introduction bears more of a general ethical character. The third introduction belongs to the fact of the last year of Uzziah therein related. When it was written up is not expressly said. But it is in the nature of the thing that this should happen early rather than late after the event itself.

Of chapters vii.—xii. the first part (vii. 1—ix. 6) belongs to the beginning of the three years which Pekah had in common with Ahaz, thus about 743 B. C. The second part, however (ix. 7—x. 4) belongs in the end of this period, thus about 740, 39 (see introd. to the text in loc.). Of the second part (x. 5—xii. 6) the piece x. 5–34 belongs in the time when Hezekiah was put to the greatest distress by the summons related xxxvi. (see introduction to x. 5–19). Chap. xi., on account of its relationship with xiv. 28–32, originated in the period when Hezekiah had ascended the throne, thus about 728 B. C. The doxology, chap. xii., bears no trace of any particular time; still, as conclusion of this section, it must any way have originated at the time the latter was put together (ibid.) The first prophecy against Babylon (xiii. 1—xiv. 23) presupposes the period in which the Prophet recognized Assyria as a thing of the past, and saw in Babylon the world-power that was called to execute judgment on the theocracy. The prophecy, therefore, falls in the latest stadium of Isaiah's prophetic activity. The short prophecy against Assyria predicts Sennacherib's catastrophe as near at hand. It belongs therefore to the period shortly before the event. The short piece xiv. 28–32 must have originated shortly after Hezekiah took the throne. The prophecy against Moab (xv. and xvi.) must, as to its older part (xv. 1–xvi. 12), belong to the reign of Ahaz. It may have originated after 741 B. C. and before the incursion of the Edomites into Judah mentioned in 2 Chron. xxviii. 17. The time of its publication is indeed relatively determined by the later brief prophecy xvi. 13, 14; but so far it has not been made out what event the Prophet means by the blow threatened against Moab xvi. 14. Any way, however, the Prophet has in mind an act of hostility on the part of Assyria against Moab.

Chapters xvii. and xviii., which are equally directed against Ephraim-Syria and against Assyria, belong to the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, to the same period to which the prophecies vii. 1—ix. 6 owe their origin.

Chapters xix. and xx. relate to Ethiopia-Egypt. They fall in the time of Hezekiah, and indeed they cannot have been written earlier than 708 B. C. (see in Comm. introd. to xvii.–xx.). The brief prophecy against Babylon (xxi. 1–10), which stands here on account of its emblematical superscription, appears to belong to the same period as xiii. 1–14. Still the character of the piece in respect to language and rhetoric are not quite in harmony with it. The two small prophecies against Edom (xxi. 11, 12) and Arabia (xxi. 13–17) fall in the time of Hezekiah, more exactly, in the time before the catastrophe of Sennacherib, when the Assyrians threatened the independence of all the nations that lay between Assyria and Egypt. To this same period also belongs chap. xxii. More exactly, the chapter presupposes, and that in both its parts, the period when the Assyrians threatened Jerusalem directly. The prophecy against Tyre has this in common with the prophecies against the theocracy itself, that it does not designate Assyria, the immediate source of menace, but Babylon as the instrument to whom God has entrusted His judgment, and it must have originated in the time when Shalmaneser besieged Tyre, thus before 722 B. C. (see comm. in loc.). It is hard to determine when the chapters xxiv.—xxvii. originated. Still the Prophet sees the theocracy in conflict with Assyria and Egypt. Babylon stands veiled in the background. This seems to point to the time of Hezekiah, and indeed to the time before Sennacherib's catastrophe (see comm. in loc.). Of the five discourses (xxviii.–xxxiii.) that represent the relation of Israel to Assyria in the time of Hezekiah, the first must have originated already before the beginning of the siege of Samaria, thus about 725 B. C. (ibid.). Chap. xxix. is of much later origin, belonging to about the year 902 B. C.

Chapters xxx.—xxxii., according to their contents, belong to the same period as xxix. They join directly on to this in chronological order. Chap. xxxiii. belongs to the period shortly before the summons that Rabsheka sent to Hezekiah. Chaps. xxxiv. and xxxv. originated in the latest period of the Prophet contemporaneously with the grand connected complexity of prophecy in the chaps. xl.—lxvi. A more exact determination of the time is impossible.

Chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. very probably spring from a memorandum of Isaiah's that had for its subject the great events of the reign of Hezekiah, and to which 2 Chron. xxxii. 26 seems to point. The insertion of these chapters at this point is so suitable—in fact so necessary—that we must even ascribe them to the Prophet himself. But a later hand has made alterations in the dates of the superscriptions, and also perhaps in the mention of names (xxxix. 1), which has become the occasion of great confusion. The events for instance narrated in xxxvi. and xxxvii. took place fourteen years later than those narrated in xxxviii. and xxxix. Any way, the narratives stood in the original source in the correct chronological order, i. e., so that xxxvi. and xxxvii. followed xxxviii. and xxxix. The narratives were transposed to correspond with the aim of the book of prophecy. Now in the original source the introduction of chap. xxxviii. must have read: "And it came to pass in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah." But chap. xxxvi. began with the words: "And it came to pass in the fourteenth year." Thereby was meant the fourteenth year after the events narrated in xxxviii. and xxxix.; therefore the twenty-eighth year of Hezekiah, or the 700 B. C., the year in which actually occurred Sennacherib's catastrophe.* When then those historical sections were adopted into the collection of Isaiah's prophecies, and that in a reversed order, the dates ought properly to have been altered to correspond. This, however, did not take place. Thus xxxvi. began with the words: "And it came to pass in the fourteenth year," but xxxviii. with the words: "And it came to pass in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah." To an uninformed reader this sounded strange. The fourteenth mentioned in the beginning of xxxvi. seemed as if it could be no other than the fourteenth of Hezekiah. And because xxxviii. again bore at its head the fourteenth year of this king, nothing seemed more natural than to let xxxvi. begin with the words: "And it came to pass in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah," and then join on chapters xxxviii. and xxxix. simply with the date "in those days, in that time" (see introd. to xxxvi.-xxxix. below). Whoever made these alterations doubtless lived at a period when the living tradition about the correct order of these events had long been obliterated. Perhaps, too, the erroneous mention of a name xxxix. 1 is the fault of the same man and of the same time. For Merodach-Baladan does not mean "Merodach, son of Baladan," as is there intimated. Merodach-Baladan (= Merodach gave a son) is only one name, and is the name of a man whose father was called Jakin (see comm. in loc.). This erroneous meaning given to the name appears also to point to a later time in which the knowledge of the proper relation was lost.

* I remark here that the historical and chronological objections raised by Wellhausen, v. Gutschmid, Oppert against many results of Schrader's investigations are well known to me. Still the few data that come here into account partly lie quite out of the sphere of those objections, partly, as appears to me, they are quite unaffected by them.

5. Part second consists of chapters xl.—lxvi. These chapters form a separate and well arranged total by themselves. As in other collections of Isaiah's prophecies, so here we notice a fundamental number. For the total consists of three divisions, each containing three times three discourses. It is to be noticed, however, that in the third division only five discourses are to be distinguished, which, however, divide into nine chapters. The subject of these twenty-seven chapters is the time of salvation, and that indeed the whole period beginning with the deliverance from exile and extending to the end of the present world, i. e., to the appearance of a new heaven and a new earth. Although, in accordance with the peculiarity of prophetic seeing, the prophet sees things of the same sort together, no matter what time they belong to, we still distinguish in the total period of salvation three chief stages to which the three chief subdivisions of nine chapters each correspond. In the first Ennead the Prophet sees chiefly and primarily the deliverance out of the Babylonian captivity, and, as the source of it, Cyrus. But this Ennead by no means has this aim merely. The Prophet knows, that along with the redemption out of exile, Israel must be raised to a higher plane of religious moral life: it must be freed from idolatry and led to the sole worship of Jehovah. The outward deliverance without the inward would be only a half work; for it was precisely Israel's spiritual bondage to idols that had been the cause of its bodily servitude. How could the latter be removed without the former? But this redemption out of exile and the chains of a gross idolatry is only the first stage of the period of salvation. Within this we see forming the outlines of a second and higher stage. The glorious Cyrus, who is not called servant of God, but is called מָשִׁיחַ, and the suffering people Israel, that is yet destined to glory, compose, so to speak, the ground forms in which a new stage of salvation is typically represented. These preparatory elements combine in their higher unity in the person of the servant of God who will be a suffering Israel and a conquering Cyrus at the same time. But first appears the first named aspect of his existence, the suffering servant. This forms the central point of the second Ennead. By suffering the servant of God becomes the redeemer of His people, the founder of a new way of appropriating salvation, and of a new condition of salvation that is both intensively and extensively higher. But this servant of God lifts Himself up out of His humility and becomes—this is the contents of the third Ennead—on the one hand, Judge of the world who will destroy all the wicked, on the other, the Creator of a new creature. The fruit of His redeeming work will be a new humanity, a new name, a new worship of God in spirit and in truth, a new heaven and a new earth.

Therefore the Prophet has by no means in mind merely circumstances of the exile. Of course he sees primarily the redemption out of the exile. But he sees behind this also the time in which the personal servant of God, prefigured in the first stage by Cyrus and Israel, will begin his work of salvation by suffering and dying; and behind this second stage he sees a third, in which the servant of God, raised out of His humble state to the dignity of a highest Prophet, Priest and King, shall renew the creature and lead it upwards to the highest degree of life in the spirit.

§ 4. AUTHENTICITY AND INTEGRITY OF THE BOOK.

1. KNOBEL says of the Isaiah collection there is found in it more that is not genuine than in any other prophetic book (p. xxvi). The passages ii. 2-4 and xv.-xvi. 12 are not denied to be genuine indeed, but they are said not to be Isaiah's, he having appropriated them from older prophets. As regards ii. 2-4, this statement is of course correct. For Isaiah has in fact, and for good reason, put a saying of his contemporary and fellow prophet Micah at the head like a light, in order to contemplate in its light the (relative) present of his people. But as regards the prophecy against Moab, xv.–xvi. 12, the Prophet himself, it is true, designates it as a word that the LORD once (מֵאָז, i. e., before) spoke against Moab. But the words xvi. 13 by no means assert that Isaiah cites the words of another. Would he not have indicated this more plainly? Besides the piece is in contents and form quite like Isaiah. (See Comm. in loc.). The following passages are said to be decidedly not genuine: xiii. 1–xiv. 23; xxi. 1-10; xxiv.–xxvii.; xxxiv.–xxxv.; xxxvi. 1–xxxvii. 20; xxxvii. 36–xxxix. 8; xl.–lxvi. Beside these a few other passages are assailed by individual critics. Thus chap. xii. is assailed by EWALD (see on the contrary MEIER, KNOBEL, p. 113). Chap. xix. is partly or entirely so by several expositors (EICHHORN, ROSENMUELLER, KOPPE, DE WETTE, GESENIUS, HITZIG, on the contrary KNOBEL, p. 159); single parts of chaps. xxviii.–xxxiii. by EICHHORN (against which see GESENIUS I. 2, p. 826); chap. xxxiii. by EWALD (against whom see KNOBEL, p. 273). As these critical objections have been proved groundless even by such men as GESENIUS and KNOBEL, we will not enter into them here. I will in the commentary itself give the reasons why I must regard chaps. xiii. 1–xiv. 23; xxi. 1-10; xxiv.–xxvii.; and xxxiv., xxxv., as Isaiah's genuine productions. We have already said in § 3 under 4, what is to be thought of chaps. xxxvi.–xxxix.

2. We must give particular attention to chaps. xl.–lxvi. Since KOPPE and DOEDERLEIN (comp. BERTHOLDT, Einl. p. 1356 sqq.) the majority of commentators have held the opinion that a much later person than Isaiah the son of Amoz wrote these prophecies. The most suppose that this later person lived in Babylon among the exiles. Only EWALD (Propheten des A. B. II. p. 403 sqq.; Gesch. des V. Isr. IV. p. 22 sqq.; 56 sqq., 66, 103, 138) is of the opinion that the "great unnamed," as a descendant of those Jews that with Jeremiah went into Egypt, lived in the latter place. On the other hand SEINECKE (Der Evangelist des A. B. 1870) concludes from chap. xl. 9, that the author must have lived in Jerusalem because otherwise the summons "Jerusalem, get thee up into a high mountain," would have no sense. DUHM (Die Theologie der Propheten, Bonn., 1875, p. 283), infers from chap. xlii. 22 that Deutero-Isaiah at least did not live in Babylon, for it hardly went so hard with the exiles as is there described. As regards the time, although the critics in general maintain that it was written during the exile, still they differ in details very much. BERTHOLDT (Einl., p. 1390) distributes the chapters into four periods: Before and after the invasion, during and after the siege of Babylon. GESENIUS supposes (II. Th. p. 33) that the prophecies originated at the time when the advance of Cyrus against Babylon awaked in the Hebrews the assured hope of a speedy deliverance. Still he thinks that the last chapters were written sooner than the earlier ones, in which is discoursed with so much certainty of the victories of Cyrus. HITZIG also apportions the chapters very exactly among the incidents of the Persian-Babylonian war, only he thinks that chap. xlvii. does not fit into the context chronologically, and that as an independent whole it was incorporated later. BECK (Die Cyrojesajan. Weissagungen, p. 16) thinks that all twenty-seven chapters presuppose the permission of Cyrus to return home. The Prophet only represents what has happened as revealed by Jehovah in advance, in order that "His contemporaries might regard it, not as accident, but as proceeding from the decree of God." According to KNOBEL "the Prophet followed attentively the great events, spoke as these and the circumstances they brought about dictated he should, and wrote up the discourses one after another" (p. 342). And so he maintains that chaps. xl.–xlviii. originated in the time of the first splendid successes of Cyrus; chaps. xlix.–lxii., however, he puts in the time when Cyrus began to carry out his plan of subduing the western nations. Chap. lxii. 1-6 is supposed to refer to the taking of Sardis. The prayer, chap. lxiii. 7–lxiv. 11, and the answer to it, chapter lxv. are supposed to fall in the period after this event. Only in regard to chapter lxvi. KNOBEL is undetermined whether it is to be put before the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, or in the time after it. SEINECKE takes again the view-point of BECK: only he denies that the Prophet prophesied the deliverance by Cyrus. Much rather this is everywhere presupposed. What he does prophesy is the "new salvation," i. e., a period of great happiness, which of course can only be realized in the holy land. The entire prophecy is one whole made at one cast. If one point of time is fixed, then the time of the composition of the whole is clear. Now it appears, especially from chap. xli. 2, 3; xliv. 25; xlv. 4 sq.; lii. 11; xlix. 22, 23, that the edict of Cyrus (Ezra i. 1 sqq.) had already appeared. After this proclamation, before the start of the first train of exiles, therefore in the year 536 was the prophecy written.

Most of the critics regard our chapters as the work of a single author. Only here and there a voice contends for different authors. See AUGUSTI, Exeget. Handbuch, p. 24 sqq., BERTHOLDT, l. c., p. 1375; EICHHORN, Propheten (the list at the close of Vol. III., p. 686). In regard to chap. lii. 13-

liii. 12 sq., see our comm. and SCHENKEL, Stud. u. Krit., 1836, p. 996. Especially EWALD has felt that he must assume a plurality of authors. But who may have been the author or authors no one is able to say. The critics are only united in this, that it was not Isaiah, yet they confess that he must have been a man of great spiritual significance. EWALD has introduced the name "the great unnamed" (comp. Proph. d. A. B. II., p. 403; Gesch. d. V. Isr. IV., p. 56). It is even confessed that the so-called Deutero-Isaiah has a great resemblance to the genuine Isaiah. To the question: Why then have chaps. xl.–lxvi. been ascribed to Isaiah, SEINECKE (p. 36) replies by saying, "that no later Prophet has approached so near the spirit of Isaiah as the author of chap. xl.—lxvi.; in none are found so reproduced his characteristic forms of expression."

3. The reasons urged against Isaiah being the author of part second are the following: 1. Isaiah lived more than an hundred years before the exile. He has also not once prophesied it. But the author of chaps. xl.–lxvi. lived in the exile. Both the oriental relations in general at the time of the exile (he even calls Cyrus by name), and the special relations of the exiles are so exactly known to him, that we must recognize in him an eye-witness and a sharer of those relations. 2. He distinguishes himself from Isaiah as much by different religious and theocratic-political views, as by peculiar style and usus loquendi. 3. Those prophets that lived after Isaiah and before the exile did not know the chaps. xl.–lxvi. 4. According to an old tradition, to which the TALMUD testifies, and to which the German and French Manuscripts conform, the three great Prophets follow in the order, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah. From this is inferred that this arrangement has chronological reasons, and that Isaiah, on account of the second part having been composed at the end of the exile, was placed after Ezekiel.

IN REPLY TO THE FIRST OBJECTION.—a). If it were proved that there is no personal God, or that this personal God, if there be one, at least never in a direct, supernatural way interfered in the course of the history of the world, then, of course, Isaiah could never be the author of chaps. xl.–lxvi. For then there would be no prophecy in a supernatural and miraculous sense. There would then at best be only an intensified power of presentiment or gift of combination. That is the standpoint of those who aim, more or less consciously, to be rid of God as much as possible, to explain the world without God, and without God to live merely under the abstract, unalterable laws of nature. There are, therefore, here two fundamental ways of looking at things that are opposed to each other, and that can never harmonize. All dialectic demonstration is useless here. Of course an interference without motive and arbitrary on God's part, no one will admit who holds the view-point of the moderate theism of the Bible. But according to Scripture, over the present, earthly, temporal order of nature there exists a higher and eternal order. The earthly, temporal order of nature is characterized by the disharmony of spirit and body. The higher order rests on the harmony of these. The lower stage must form the transition to the higher. This is only possible by the latter entering into the former, partly in order to prepare the judgment on the same, partly to lay in it the new germs of life. Miracle and prophecy, as in the organism of the history of salvation they appear authenticated, though they are not the highest, are still the first traces of that super-terrestrial spiritual power that, on the one hand subdues matter, and on the other, time and space, in order to make known the divine decree of love, and gradually to realize it. Now among all the men that divine love employs to this end in the Old Testament, Isaiah occupies the first rank. First he sees Syria and Ephraim coming against the theocracy, and recognizes at once their harmlessness. Assyria rises threatening behind them. But soon the Prophet sees that it too will not harm the theocracy, but must itself come to disgrace by the theocracy. Only the third world-power, (Ephraim-Syria reckoned as the first), that emerges to the view of the Prophet, immediately behind Assyria to i. e., Babylon, he recognizes as the agent called to execute the next great judgment on the outward theocracy. Babylon was Nineveh's rival. They had severe conflicts until first Babylon, and then at length Nineveh fell. Now it is said that Isaiah never predicted Israel's being led into the Babylonian captivity. True enough, this was not his commission. This part of the history of the future belonged to his successors Zephaniah and Jeremiah. Yet Babylon's destination to effect this was not unknown to him. For he expresses it chap. xxxix. 6 sq., briefly indeed, but in plain words. And even if Isaiah were not the author of the original writing from which chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix. were taken, still this does not justify us in doubting that he made the statement of which xxxix. 6 sq. informs us. Without mentioning Babylon, a period of exile is partly presupposed, partly directly announced to the land and nation in chap. i. 27; v. 5 sq.; xiii. 26 sqq.; vi. 11, 12; x. 5 sqq.; xii. 20 sq.; xi. 11; xxx. 12. And does not Micah (iv. 10), the contemporary of Isaiah, prophesy in plain words the transportation to Babylon? No one that I know of has ever attacked the genuineness of those words of Micah. Could not Isaiah see what Micah saw? We see therefore that the Babylonian exile was already in Isaiah's time well known to prophecy as a fact of the future.

But Isaiah's chief commission was to announce the whole great period of salvation, that begins with the deliverance out of exile and reaches to the end of time. For although Isaiah is not silent in regard to the judgments that threaten either Israel or the heathen, still the proclamation of salvation is the proper contents of his discourses. In fact the opening words of xl. 1 especially characterize the second part as "a book of consolation" (ספר נחמות see FUERST, Kan. d. A. T., p. 15). By this he honors his name (יְשַׁעְיָהוּ salus Jovae). The TALMUD expresses the difference between the three great Prophets by saying that the book of Jeremiah is כוליה חורבנא, that of Ezekiel רישיה חורבנא וסופיה נחמתא, that of Isaiah however כוליה נחמתא (comp. FUERST, l. c.). While the other Prophets were called more to illumine single parts of the near or remote future, of greater or less circumference, Isaiah, as the great chief Prophet, stands in the midst and lets the light of his prophetic word fall on the great, wide circumference of the entire future of salvation, which for him begins with the deliverance from the exile. As the broad river to the narrower branches, as a grand edifice to the buildings that front and flank it, so is Isaiah's prophecy related to that of the other prophets. It is, therefore, incorrect to say that Isaiah only lives in the exile, and that his gaze does not extend beyond the horizon of this period of history. Isaiah is just as conscious that he prophesies, i. e., that the exile is a thing of the future for him also (comp. xli. 9; xlviii. 6, 16; lii. 5; lvi. 10–lvii. 21 and the comm. in loc.), as he is conscious that the period of exile does not form the limit of his prophetic gaze. In fact he distinguishes most clearly three stages of that future history that he contemplates. The servant of Jehovah suits neither the time of Cyrus, nor that of the new creature. It suits only in the time between as the mediation of both. For without the servant of Jehovah, Israel when returned could not possibly have risen to the grade of the new creature. One may quite as well insist that the author of chaps. xl.–lxvi. stood under the cross of Christ, and that he read the writings of Paul, consequently that at least chaps. lii.–lv. were written in the time after Christ, as that this author lived in the exile. For he speaks of the sufferings of the servant, of the fruits of them, and of the new way of salvation thereby conditioned not less plainly than he does of the redemption of Israel out of the exile. In fact DUHM (l. c., p. 291) acknowledges that the view of the Deutero-Isaiah approaches very near that of Paul. It is objected that the naming of Cyrus and the description of relations peculiar to the exile (comp. lxiv. 9-11; lxiii. 3 b-5 a; lxv. 11, 12, 25; lxvi. 3 b-6; lxvi. 17) prove that we have before us specific prediction and not prophecy. As such things are impossible, only a contemporary of the exile can be the author of xl.–lxvi. This leads me to the inquiry into the ethical character of genuine prophecy, and then to the other question whether chaps. xl.–lxvi. correspond to that distinction between prophecy and prediction that I have myself asserted.

b. Of course the naming of Cyrus (xliv. 28; xlv. 1) must surprise us in the greatest degree. But let us first notice the connection in which this naming occurs. In the first Ennead (xl.–xlviii.) the Prophet has directed his gaze to a double deliverance of his people: to the bodily one out of the captivity of the exile, and to the spiritual one from the chains of idolatry. He seeks to bring about the latter by convincing his people of the nothingness of idols and of the sole divinity of Jehovah. For this purpose he argues thus: Prophecy and fulfilment belong only to the omniscient and almighty God. It is a test of divinity that idols cannot sustain. I announce to you long before the punishment of the exile has even begun, that Israel shall be delivered from the same by a prince that shall bear the name Cyrus. If this prophecy be not fulfilled, then may you doubt the divinity of Jehovah. But if it be fulfilled, then know that the LORD is God.

Seven times the Prophet presents this syllogism with the greatest emphasis. He would evidently have men regard this, not as mere rhetorical ornament, but as meant in earnest, and make a practical test with it. Now let one suppose the author of our chapters to have been a contemporary of Cyrus, and to have only feigned this prophecy, then it would be but a worthless comedy. This would-be prophet was then an impostor that blasphemously abused the name of God. For if Cyrus was already there, and all that Isaiah prophesies of him had already happened, or at least was at the point of taking place, then that argument wholly lacks foundation. Then Jehovah does not prophesy, but an impostor pretends to prophesy in His name things that in fact were not future but past. The pretended prophecy, then, would be a product, not of the Holy Spirit, of the Spirit of truth, but of the spirit of lying. If any would assume that the pretended prophet still meant only to attain a good object by morally objectionable means, that, therefore, his fraud was a pious fraud, then nothing is gained thereby. A truly pious Israelite could not possibly have been willing to prop his faith in Jehovah by means which Satan, Jehovah's enemy, uses to gain his ends—by lies! But a man who is capable of desecrating God's name by gross lies cannot at the same time be interested to have God's name sanctified. Such a man is an inward contradiction. One is involuntarily reminded here of the words of Christ: "If Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how shall then his kingdom stand?" (Matt. xii. 25 sqq.). And how does this lying procedure agree with the moral character of our prophecy in general? Every one receives the impression, and the modern critics themselves cannot ignore it, that there runs through the entire prophecy a spirit of elevated, moral earnestness. Moral effect in the hearer and reader indeed is meant to be the chief aim of the prophecy. How does Christ agree with Belial? Comp. STIER, Isaiah, nicht Pseudo-Isaiah, p. xlvi. F. A. LÖWE, Weissagung u. Weltgeschichte, Zurich, 1868, p. 13. It is incomprehensible how a man like DUESTERDIECK (D. Pro. Isa., ein Vortr. Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol. XVIII. 3, p. 386 sqq.) can assert that the author of xl.-lxvi. stood in the midst of the mighty crisis brought about by Cyrus (l. c. p. 401), and yet at the same time produced the prophecy that is "not only the holiest of all of our prophetic book, but of the entire Old Testament." Can then the author of a fictitious prophecy of Cyrus, seven times repeated, be at the same time the interpreter of the holiest of all of the divine revelation?

c. But it is objected that still the name Cyrus is quite a special prediction, just as also those other traits of special exile life that confront us in the last three chapters. But the name Cyrus is not a name like any other. According to our Prophet's construction, Cyrus stands at the head of the period of salvation. He represents the great turning point in the history of Israel with which begins the "return" (שׁוּב) of the holy nation. The name of the man that occupied this high and important position is no subordinate, small incident that one cannot see from a distance. On the contrary, this name stands forth so great and illustrious in history, even in profane history, that we must include it among the great outlines which, according to our statement, can alone be the subject of prophecy. But were I even mistaken in this view, still only the name Cyrus would need to be given up. Then we would need to assume that xliv. 28 another word stood in the place of לכורשׁ, and that xlv. 1 the same word was either simply interpolated (which the construction allows), or was substituted for another word. We would need then, of course, to grant also that the words בשׁמך אכנך (xlv. 5), which manifestly presuppose the mention of the name, were inserted by the interpolator. This would leave untouched the chief thing, the prophecy of the redeemer from the east. The reproach of lying would not then concern the real author of the prophecy, but only some uninvited intruder. But although I confess that this point is the most difficult, still I do not believe that there are material reasons to compel the adoption of this construction.

d. As for the traces of authorship in the exile to be found in the last three chapters, viz.: in lxiv. 9-11; lxv. 3 b-5 a; lxv. 11, 12; lxv. 25; lxvi. 3 b-6; lxvi. 17, they are of three sorts. I must first say in general, that the last Ennead (lviii.—lxvi.) does not appear to have received its finishing touches from the hand of the Prophet. Perhaps death arrested him. He seems rather to have left behind only the materials. At least it must seem strange to us that the matter is not, as in both the Enneads that precede, more arranged in nine distinctly marked discourses. [Comp. below the introduction to chaps. lviii.—lvi.—TR.]. This very condition of the original text invited and facilitated the work of an interpolator. Now, as I have said, I find three sorts of such interpolations. In regard to the first sort, I must primarily recall the fact that to the request of the people that the LORD would even remember that all Israelites are His people (lxiii. 7-lxiv. 9) the reply is made: neither all Israelites shall be saved, nor shall all be rejected (lxv.). The Prophet intimates by this, that in the time when the redemption will begin, i. e., at the end of the exile, a division shall be effected. And this division actually took place when Cyrus gave the permission to return. The contrast between the apostates and the faithful Israelites was distinctly marked. The original contents of the last three chapters offered a fitting opportunity for the expression of those sentiments that the latter felt toward the former in consequence of that contrast. Hence we find in these chapters those passages that have so specific a coloring from the exile, which, of course, if they were genuine, must be construed as the most specific prediction. Such are lxv. 3 b-5 a; 11, 12; lxvi. 3 b-6; lxvi. 17. A second sort of interpolation I find in the passage lxiv. 9-11. Here the condition of the Holy Land and of the Holy City are spoken of in a way that shows that the sacred places must already have lain waste when these words were written. A third interpolation of still another sort I find in lxv. 25. Here an earlier saying of the Prophet (comp. xi. 6-9) is abruptly repeated. For particulars see the comm. in loc.

Regarding passages of the first sort: on the one hand they contain such exact details relative to Babylonian idolatry, and on the other, party sentiment finds in them such intense, fresh and lively expression, that some have supposed the Prophet has wholly translated himself here into the exile life, and saw it as plainly as his own actual present time, while others, who deny the possibility of such translation into the future, maintain that the passages in question were composed by one living in the exile. I share neither of these views. It was no affair of prophecy to observe the special traits of the future; it was no affair of Isaiah's to furnish "Scenes of exile life." On the other hand the great mass of xl–lxvi. are so unmistakably genuine prophecy, in fact the crown of all Old Testament prophecy, that we can ascribe them to no other than to the king among the prophets, to Isaiah. If now single passages in the last chapters bear undoubted marks of originating in the exile, then they must be later additions to the original writing of Isaiah. This applies also to passages of the second and third sort. Even Knobel and Diestel, who, for the sake of making the whole out to be not genuine, will admit no interpolations, are still inclined to explain lxv. 25 as "a disconnected addition." And lxvi. 3 b–6 is manifestly an interpolation, interrupting the connection, and occasioned by a misunderstanding of what precedes. But if one interpolation occurs, may there not be several, even though the seam in every case is not equally noticeable? I have distinctly declared lxiv. 9–11; lxv. 3 b–5 a; 11, 12; 25; lxvi. 3 b–6; 17 to be interpolations. I confess however that I hold these to be only the ones most plainly recognizable as such. As remarked above, the Prophet seems to me to have left the last Ennead in a form not completely wrought out. Precisely hereby some later person, was moved to put a finishing touch to it. What is most probable is that the final editor of the work did this. Thus it may be that we possess the last chapters only in a form more or less wrought over. What is the boundary between the work of the Prophet and that of the reviser, is likely never to be made out.*

* No one will follow the Author in admitting interpolations, unless first entangled by the criterion, he sets up (end of § 2) as the mark of genuine prophecy. In a distant view one observes general outlines, but not details. Prophecy is viewing at a distance. Hence prophecy in general will never meddle with special prediction. Where the latter occurs it is only a seeming detail, while in fact, properly understood, it belongs to the grand outline, e.g., the naming of Cyrus—or if not, then it must be suspected as an interpolation. Such is the canon the Author adopts. Is this self-evident? It will not appear so to multitudes. Is it proved by the mere analogy of viewing a city or mountain at a distance? One must not be betrayed by so shallow a fallacy. An exact statement of the nature of prophesying, we see, involves the question: does prophecy meddle with details? This cannot be settled by any aprioral dictum: nor by an analogy drawn from some totally different sphere. It can only be settled by observing the facts: have we or have we not examples of such prediction. If the Author has nothing but his canon to oppose to the passage in question, then we accept the passage as genuine, and must simply reverse his canon. It seems that he has something additional. It is this: chap. lviii.–lxvi., depart from the fundamental number three, and though we have nine chapters, we have only five discourses. Nine discourses are demanded for the sake of consistency. This abnormity opens the door to many things, among others to a reasonable account of the supposed interpolations. The reflecting reader will see that by that door will come in more than the Author himself would welcome. In fact nothing remains certainly the genuine production of Isaiah. For as Dr. Naegelsbach says above. "It will perhaps never be wholly made out where is the boundary between the work of the Prophet and that of the reviser." In such uncertainty, each will draw the line to suit himself.

Only those will be entangled in this quandary that share the Author's fancy for an exact and lucid scheme of the entire book, or rather, who is captivated by his particular scheme. But most students will agree with Dr. J. A. Alexander (Introduction to his Commentary, Vol. I. p. 75, Ed. 1875) who thus remarks on the arrangement of Hävernick who follows Rückert, and to which our Author's bears resemblance: "As an aid to memory, and a basis of convenient distribution, this hypothesis may be adopted without injury, but not as implying that the book consists of three independent parts, or that any one of the proposed divisions can be satisfactorily interpreted apart from the others. The greater pains taken to demonstrate such a structure, the more forced and artificial must the exposition become: and it is best to regard this ingenious idea of Rückert, as an aesthetic decoration rather than an exegetical expedient. After carefully comparing all the methods of division and arrangement which have come to my knowledge, I am clearly of the opinion that in this part of Scripture, more perhaps than in any other, the evil to be shunned is not so much defect as excess; that the book is not only a continued, but a desultory composition; that although there is a sensible progression in the whole from the beginning to the end, it cannot be distinctly traced in every minor part, being often interrupted and obscured by retrocessions and resumptions, which, though governed by a natural association in each case, are not reducible to a system."

To recur to the Author's analogy of a distant view of a city: the parallel between that and prophetic prospect cannot be exact. A man on the street of that distant city, must not necessarily be like a man in the imperial city the Prophet sees far off in the future. Conversation at the gate of that city far off in the vista, must not be like the discourse of men in that city the Prophet sees. In a moral and historical survey, things seemingly minute by common measures, rise into great prominence. Jenny Geddes and her stool in St. Giles Cathedral Church of Edinburg, in 1637, and the masqueraders of the Boston harbor Tea party, are such to us in the distant survey of the past. No one charges the historian with an unphilosophical attention to minute details that takes

REPLY TO THE SECOND OBJECTION. a. It is said that there exists between Isaiah and the author of these chapters "a great diversity of spirit and of views." Let us contemplate these reputed diversities as they are specified in the latest edition of KNOBEL's Commentary as revised by DIESTEL. First, the author is thought to cherish the most transcendent hopes in regard to the return home: xli. 18 sq.; xliii. 19 sq.; xlviii. 21; xlix. 10 sq. These passages, promise all of them to those returning abundance of water, and have more or less direct relation to Exod. xvii. 6 (comp. especially xlviii. 21). No one is justified in saying that the author would have them understood literally with reference to the return-way out of the exile. But if at the same time he had in mind a second return, lying still in the remote future, then we must wait for the future to show us whether the expectations regarding it are superabounding. They are by no means more so than what Isaiah says of the same return xi. 15, where he speaks of the drying up of the Red sea, and of the smiting the Euphrates into seven shallow brooks. To the same transcendent expectations are thought to belong, what the author says of the new heaven and new earth (li. 6; lxv. 17; lxvi. 22; lx. 19 sq.), of the splendor and riches of the new Jerusalem (liv. 12; lx. 1 sqq.; lxvi. 12), of the great age of the Jews that may be looked for (lxv. 20) and of their relation to the heathen (xlix. 22 sq.; lx. 9, 10, 12; lxi. 5 sq.; liii. 11). All this is thought to be foreign to the more natural sense of Isaiah. But do not the germs of all this lie already in the first eleven chapters of the book? We have shown already above, that the principle of the world's renewal is expressed in passages like ii. 2 sqq.; iv. 2 sqq., (see also commentary on the ה׳ צֶמַח iv. 2). Can anything more glorious be said of the Zion of the future than is said ii. 3; xi. 9? Is not the great age spoken of lxv. 20, a consequence of the same new, higher principle of life, of whose operation in the impersonal creature xi. 6 sqq., speaks? Finally, what is said about the relation of Israel to the heathen in the passages named, has after all its root in what the Prophet has already expressed ii. 2 sqq.; ix. 2 sqq. 7; xi. 10 sqq.—KNOBEL urges further, that calling Judah and Jerusalem a sanctuary (xlviii. 2; lii. 1; lxiii. 18; lxiv. 9 (10) attests the later period. It is true that the expression עִיר הַקֹּדֶשׁ, beside xlviii. 2; lii. 1, occurs only Dan. ix. 24; Neh. xi. 1, 18. Yet the expression is so natural and has so little that is specific in it, that one can only treat its unfrequent occurrence in the literature as accidental. It is strange that it occurs so seldom in general, thus the weight of the fact is lessened, when it is noticed that it appears in Isaiah for the first in part second. If he did not invent the expression, still he is the first from whom we have a writing that contains the expression. As regards lxiii. 18; lxiv. 9 (10) see above d.—It is urged that the importance attached to the observance of the Sabbath points to a later period (lvi. 2 sqq.; lviii. 13). If now it must be admitted that neither in the historical nor in the prophetic books of the older period, is found frequent mention of the Sabbath, still the institution was known and recognized by them as ancient and holy (see Amos viii. 6; 2 Kings iv. 23, comp. SCHULTZ, Alttestl. Theol. I. p. 216). But like the most of the commandments of the law, it was badly observed by idolatrous Israel. In lvi. and lviii. Isaiah presents in prospect, a time in which the new way of salvation spoken of in liv. and lv., will bring forth its glorious fruits. Shall we wonder then if the Prophet among these fruits makes especially prominent the sanctifying of the Sabbath, since in fact this was the most patent sign of the universal reign of the worship of Jehovah and of the overthrow of idolatry? Representations of God, as one that troubles Himself very little about the earth, as they appear in xl. 27; xlvii. 10; xlix. 14; lvii. 15, are said to occur only in note of such things. In his prospect they are prominences and belong to the grand outline. It is this that affords the proper analogy for prophetic surveys of the future. And this shows that the distinction made in the Author's canon between prophecy and prediction, and grand outline and details is illusory, and results from pressing an analogy between things unlike. We may agree that prophecy will deal only in general outline. But whatever the Prophet sees and depicts, belongs to this outline and is a prominence in his prospect, however insignificant and unobservable it may be to other ways of seeing. And such are the things represented in those texts, which the Author would surrender as interpolations. This leaves prediction and prophecy absolutely synonymous in that respect wherein the Author attempts a distinction.

It may be added that the Author's chief reason for admitting the notion of interpolations, may be turned against his scheme of the contents of the book of Isaiah. If the departure from the rule of three, i. e., from the nine discourses, be such palpable proof that chapters lviii.-lxvi., were left incomplete by the Prophet, this defect would have been as evident to the final editor as to modern commentators, and must have appeared equally important. If such an editor dared to tamper with the text at all in the way of giving it polish and completeness, his first care would be to carry out this rule of three, and furnish the arrangement into nine discourses, according to the Prophet's (supposed) original intent. But there is no evidence that such an arrangement was required for completeness and finish, and thus the Author's reason for thinking Isaiah left his composition unfinished is imaginary.—TR.]

the later books of the Old Testament. But, not to mention other passages like Ps. ix. 19; x. 1; xiii. 2, is not this representation found xxix. 15 sq., which is admitted to be Isaiah's? What, moreover, is to be said, when Knobel explains the controverting of idols with reasons, and the apology for Jahve as the sole God (xl. 12 sqq.; xli. 21 sqq.; xliii. 9 sqq.; xliv. 6 sqq.; xlv. 11 sqq.; xlvi. 1 sqq.; xlviii. 3 sqq.), and the proof of Jahve's divinity from prophecy and fulfilment (xli. 21 sqq.; xliii. 9 sqq.; xliv. 7 sq.; xlv. 19, 21; xlvi. 10; xlviii. 3 sqq.), the servant of Jahve (lii. 13 sqq.), and the representation of a representative endurance of punishment (liii. 4 sqq.; lvii. 1) to be "favorite subjects" of the author's that do not appear in Isaiah? We shall show below, that the dialectics with which the Prophet enters the lists against idols and for Jehovah, and which are found already in the germ ii. 20; xxx. 22; xxxi. 7, by no means pertain to a mere pet theme that involuntarily comes uppermost, but that, in the passages named, it quite accords with the practical tendency to wholly deliver from the bonds of idolatry the nation that at the end of the exile would be ripe for this. The servant of Jehovah is just as little a mere pet theme. This notion in all circumstances stands sui generis. If Isaiah is not the author of chapters xl.–lxvi., then the עבד י״ is peculiar to this author, for no where else does it appear. But just in the recognized genuine passages of Isaiah are to be found the germs also of this conception. Such is the צֶמַח iv. 2; very especially however the חֹטֶר מִגֵּזַע יִשָׁי xi. 1, to which passage manifest reference is had liii. 2. To this may be added, that the word גֶּזַע, beside xi. 1, occurs only xl. 24 and Job xiv. 8. A representative endurance of punishment lies at the foundation of the entire sacrificial worship (comp. liii. 7), and that the idea was taken up into the national consciousness, and further developed is proved by expressions like that of Micah, Isaiah's contemporary, who, vi. 7, speaks of the giving of the first born son as an atoning sacrifice. Must, therefore, this idea have been foreign to Isaiah? Must it point to the period of the exile? And must Isaiah necessarily speak of it before he proceeded to make his prophetic sketch of the עבד י״? Finally it is urged as a discrepancy that our author looks for a theocracy without a king, whereas Isaiah will not do without a king (ix. 5 (6); xi. 1; xxxii. 1; xxxiii. 17). It is true indeed that in our chapters the promised redeemer is never called king. Manifestly the author avoids the word, but he has the substance. For royal works and royal honors are in richest measure attributed to this Redeemer. It is said of Him that He will set up justice and law on earth (xlii. 4; li. 4), and will judge the people (li. 5; lxiii. 1–6). He will also be light and salvation to the heathen, (xlix. 6), all kings of the heathen will pay Him homage as the prince and commander of the nations (lv. 4 sqq.; xlix. 7; lx. 2 sq., 10 sqq.; lii. 15; liii. 12. Comp. lxi. 2–5 and the commentary). One must wonder that He, who will be over all kings, does not Himself receive the royal title. But just in this seems to lie also the solution of the riddle. The title מלך appeared to the Prophet too inferior, too liable to misconstruction. One might have supposed the redeemer would be only a king of the same genus as the others, only, perhaps, a higher species of this genus. But the Prophet knows that this נָגִיד, as he calls Him lv. 4, will be toto genere different from all other kings. He will even be, on the one hand, as the despised servant, (seemingly) low beneath them, and on the other, by reason of the extent, power and glory of His kingdom, immeasurably high above them. So that one may say: the title מלך appeared to the Prophet to suit neither the lowliness nor the highness of the servant.

b. As regards style and the use of words, it is indeed acknowledged that our author has in these respects great resemblance to Isaiah. Knobel says: "The author writes, indeed, like Isaiah, very enthusiastically, fervently and lively, but much more flowingly and smoothly, also more broadly and more diffuse." Fuerst (Gesch. d. bibl. Lit. II. p. 643) says of the Unnamed, that He "occupies the highest position among the later prophets as a classic." This saying is properly a contradiction; for classic writing is found only in the period of the splendor of a language, not among the epigonoi. Fuerst involuntarily gives us to understand that the chapters xl.—lxvi. belong still to the classic productions of Hebrew literature. Umbreit also (in Herz., R. Encycl. VI. p. 518) says: "If the son of Amoz were really the author also of the later books, then, not only in respect to form, but also in the perfection of the prophetic spirit . . . he attained the highest pinnacle." And on the next page he calls the author of chapters xl.–lxvi. "Isaiah risen again in a new body of the spirit." Therefore we find here again the admission, that chapters xl.–lvi., in respect to the "form" or "body," belong to the grandest productions of the Hebrew spirit. And this writing, to which men cannot refuse the reputation of a classic even as to form, must still have originated, not in the classic period, but in a period when Hebrew was just at the point of disappearing as a living tongue? The Psalms of the exile, Haggai, Zechariah, Ezra, Daniel, Chronicles would be the books which, in point of time, would stand nearest our chapters. Yet what a difference between those and these in respect to the character of the language in general. Contrasted with this great difference, the relatively few singularities that are urged in favor of the exile origin of our chapters cannot be regarded. If we consider how many-sided the spirit of Isaiah is, and how he knows how to fit the form to the contents, we cannot wonder if he uses up the entire store of words at his command, and therefore at times draws from popular speech, from kindred dialects and even from foreign languages, and here and there allows himself to diverge from the normal modes of expression with a rhetorical art, whose fineness we are not always in condition to appreciate. Doubtless, too, many an expression that occurs only in later writers is to be referred to Isaiah as its source. To this is to be added that Isaiah no doubt wrote our chapters in the latest period of his life, that therefore a period of forty or more years, perhaps, separate his latest and earliest literary productions, and that the, in many respects, new contents naturally conditioned a corresponding new form. EWALD says of the genuine Isaiah: "As the subject requires, he has easily at command every sort of speech and every change of representation, and that establishes his greatness, and also in general is one of his most prominent advantages." (Proph. d. A. B. I. p. 173, comp. HENGSTENBERG, Christol. II. p. 213). And yet, regardless of this recognized peculiarity of Isaiah, and spite of the existing relationship in respect to form so recognized, men will deny that chapters xl.–lxvi., are Isaiah's! I would add still further, that much that is urged as proof of difference is to be put to the account of the few interpolations that I think I must assume (see the commentary). Thus I might be held excused from entering upon the consideration of the several points that are urged in regard to style and language. Yet I will investigate a few of these points by way of example, in order to show how little reliable the critical results are. Thus KNOBEL urges that the author frequently doubles words for the sake of emphasis, i. e., applies the rhetorical figure of anadiplosis or epanalepsis. He quotes in proof xl. 1; xli. 27; xliii. 11, 25; xlviii. 11, 15; li. 9, 12, 17; lii. 1, 11; lvii. 6, 14, 19; lxii. 10; lxv. 1. But this form of speech occurs not seldom in the passages recognized as genuine: viii. 9; xviii. 2, 7; xxi. 11; xxviii. 10, 13; xxix. 1. If we add to this that it appears also in the assailed passages of part first (xv. 1; xxi. 9; xxiv. 16; xxv. 1; xxvi. 3, 5, 15; xxvii. 5; xxxviii. 11, 17, 19), we can only say that it is, after all, a peculiarity of our Prophet that answers to the liveliness of his spirit.

In these chapters are found "a great many expressions that occur only in them, or at least only in the later books beside, and that for the most part need to be explained from the Aramaic," says KNOBEL (p. 335). As regards the many ἅπαξ λεγόμενα, they furnish no proof in themselves. For even in the unassailed passages such are found in great number. Their use is to be explained by this, that the Prophet completely commanded the entire vocabulary of his language, and hence, for the more fitting expression of some turns of thought, drew from some province of language not otherwise known to us. If many such expressions occur only once in Isaiah, and are found beside only in later writers, it ought first to be proved that the latter did not borrow from Isaiah. Regarding the statement that these expressions must for the most part be explained from the Aramaic, it must be remembered that in very many instances the etymology is doubtful. Beside, it is quite possible that the root of the words in question received in the Aramaic branch of the language a stronger, in the Hebrew a weaker development. But, as has been said, Isaiah used less frequent words, and forms of language and discourse, as he needed them. The commentary offers the proof of all this. The word סְגָנִים (xli. 25), which KNOBEL says is Persian, is now most conclusively proved to be Assyrian (comp. SCHRADER, Die Keilinschriften u. d. A. T. p. 254, 32; 270, 15; 279, 6). For the rest we refer to the List prepared by me with great pains, and to be found at the close of the volume. It offers a convenient survey of the vocabulary of chapters xl.–lxvi. It may be seen there what words and word forms (and to some extent, turns of expression) occur in both parts, and what in only part second, and what are absolute or relative ἅπαξ λεγόμενα. This collection contains all the words that occur, excepting such words as can properly mark no characteristic difference. By this means I have put a considerable weight into the scale of criticism. But, on the one hand, this exacts the scientific rule of debate, which forbids arguing ex dubiis. On the other hand this disadvantage is more than balanced by the advantage that the result, which, as it seems to me, favors the authenticity of chapters xl.–lvi., may be recognized as all the more assured. It is true that from this arrangement of the survey it also becomes plain that several of the controverted passages of part first, expressly xxxiv.–xxxv., are very nearly related to the chapters xl.–lxvi., belonging, as they doubtless do, to the same period of the Prophet's life. I would add that the collection in so far gives an unsatisfactory representation, that, though it shows where each word occurs in Isaiah, it does not show where it is to be found beside; therefore, especially, it does not appear in it whether a word belongs to the older or more recent period of the language. Space did not allow me to embrace this feature in the collection: yet the commentary makes up as much as possible what is wanting. The sum of the matter is: it will appear from the comparison that chapters xl.–lxvi., do indeed differ considerably in language from the passages of Isaiah that are recognized as genuine; but that still that there is so much that is common to both, that these differences afford no satisfactory reasons for denying Isaiah's authorship of the chapters in question. I may be charged with inconsistency because, in reference to the genuineness of Lamentations, I attached such considerable weight to singularities of language as proving that Lamentations had not Jeremiah for their author, whereas I do otherwise in reference to Isa. xl.–lxvi. But, apart from the fact that the differences in language in the case of Isa. xl.—lxvi., seem to me less than those observed in the case of Lamentations, I am of the opinion that Isa. xl.–lvi., as a whole must be acknowledged to be as decidedly like Isaiah in character, as the Lamentations taken as a whole are unlike Jeremiah. When I make the above admission of general difference between the first and second parts of Isaiah, I must still emphasize here, that the first chapter of our book, i. e., the first introduction, forms a remarkable exception. For this chapter has plain traces of relationship to chapters xl.–lxvi. Now no one doubts the genuineness of chap. i. But if that is acknowledged, then, presupposing that relationship, one must decide in favor of the genuineness of xl.–lxvi. That such a relationship actually exists may be seen from the following comparison, in which are enumerated those expressions that occur only in chap. i. and xl.–lxvi. (or in the contemporaneous chapters of part first, that are likewise pronounced not genuine).

Of course this list offers primarily only dry words and figures. But whoever examines closely will see that very characteristic traits are represented by them. Thus it is certainly not an accident that the expressions אֵילִים and גַּנּוֹת, found in the reproofs addressed to the idolatrous nation still in exile, occur again only in chap. i. The שָׁבִים are mentioned i. 27 only in the same connection as in lix. 20, i. e., in connection with the idea of the restoration of law and justice. What meaning the עֹזֵב י׳ has in xl.—lxvi. will appear below. Can it be an accident that this conception occurs only i. 4, 28 and lxv. 11? Just as little as the use of פֶּשַׁע noted in the foregoing list. The notion רִאשֹׁנָה plays a great part in these chapters.' How does it happen that it is only mentioned beside in i. 26? Nothing is said in the whole book of שבת and חדש except at the beginning and end, as noted above. The same is the case with כי פי י׳ דבר, with בת ציון, with בִּקֵּשׁ, חטא, טוב, נִלְאָה, רב, ריב and all the modes of expression cited above. It is incontestible that the Prophet in chap. i. accords in many ways precisely with the sphere of thoughts in which he had moved in chaps. xl.—lxvi. And that agrees admirably with the view, in which we have followed Drechsler and others, that chap. i. was exactly the last piece written. For in that case it is quite natural that in this piece numerous agreements should appear with the final parts of the work just completed. And how very exactly the words i. 7-9 correspond to the situation of the land under Hezekiah, when the king of the land was isolated and shut up in his capital "like a bird in its cage?" How admirably, too, it suits the grand, threefold entrance, that the author had before him in its chief substance the whole of his great work!

Reply to Objection Three.—Jer. xxvi. is cited as proof that the prophets who prophesied after Isaiah and before the exile did not know the chaps. xl.—lxvi. It is said that Jeremiah, having incurred the peril of his life by announcing the destruction of Jerusalem and of the holy places, would certainly in self-protection have appealed to these chapters had he been acquainted with them. This is a very weak objection. For, in the first place, what we read Jer. xxvi. 4-6 is only the quintessence of what he had to announce at that time. Yet even in this quintessence it is intimated that Jeremiah appealed to existing prophecies. For it is said there: "If ye will not hearken to me, to walk in my law, which I have set before you, to hearken to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you,—then will I make this house like Shiloh," etc. Who can maintain that Jeremiah, if he mentioned the prophets that the Lord sent, did not cite also some expression of theirs? The summary statement Jer. xxvi. 5 certainly does not exclude this. But if he did so, was he obliged to quote precisely Isa. xl.—lxvi.? These chapters do not even discourse about the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple, but of their restoration. The sole passage that speaks of the destroyed sanctuaries is lxiv. 10, 11. But precisely this passage Jeremiah could not quote, seeing that (according to our view) it did not at that time exist. Any way this arguing a silentio proves too much, and therefore proves nothing. For since there cannot be found in Jeremiah xxvi. quotations from any other older prophecies that directly predict this destruction, one must conclude with the same justice that all reputed older prophecies of the sort were not in existence in Jeremiah's time. Take e. g., Isa. v. 5 sqq.; vi. 11; Hos. v. 14; Amos ii. 4 sq.; vi. 1 sqq.—Here criticism uses Jeremiah's silence to draw from it an argument against the genuineness of Isa. xl.—lxvi. In other places, where Jeremiah and his fellow-prophets after the time of Isaiah actually quote Isa. xl., lxvi., criticism will have that it is no quotation from our chapters, but a quotation on the part of the author of chapters xl.—lxvi. of the passages in question. The passages principally concerned here are the following:—

This list is by no means complete. It contains only a selection. We shall mention below a much larger number of parallel passages and examine them. Comp. also KUEPER, Jer. librorum ss. interpr. atque vindex, 1837, p. 132 sqq. But it will suffice to prove in a few passages the priority of our chapters, and to establish it generally as an existing fact. Such striking passages are found above all in Nahum who, as to time, comes next after Isaiah. It is now definitely known from the Assyrian monuments that Asurbanapal, the son and successor of Asarhaddon, destroyed the Egyptian Thebes (No—Amon) in his second great military expedition (see SCHRADER, D. Keilinschriften u. d. A. T. p. 287 sqq.). Nothing is known of any other destruction of Thebes. Thebes declined gradually after the residence of the Pharaohs had been transferred to the Delta. According to the monuments, that expedition of Asurbanapal occurred in the period immediately after the death of Tirhâka (664 B. C.). The destruction of Thebes, therefore, happened about the year 663. But Nahum, in whose mind this event was fresh, must have written soon after, say about the year 660 (as SCHRADER conjectures, l. c.). If this was so, then it appears indubitable that chapters xl.–lxvi. had already been written. For certainly no candid man can controvert that Nahum ii. 1, is a diluted conglomeration from Isa. lii. 7, 1 and li. 23. Notice especially the construction לֹא יוֹסִיף עוֹד יָבֹא־בָךְ Isa. lii. 1 compared with לֹא יוֹסִיף עוֹד לַעֲבָר־בָּךְ in Nahum. In the latter not only is the Infin. לעבר the normal and easier construction compared with the harsher construction with the verb. fin. (which is common in Isaiah; see i. 19; vi. 13; xxix. 4; xlv. 21; xlvii. 1, 5; lii. 1; lxiv. 4, but never occurs in Nahum), but עֲבֹר is evidently borrowed from Isa. li. 23, yet is connected not with עָלַיִךְ, which would be most natural, but with the בָּךְ that is found in Isaiah. See moreover the commentary. It can be just as little controverted that Nah. iii. 7 and 10 find their pattern and source in Isa. li. 19, 20. For the proof see the commentary. Zeph. ii. 15 announces itself as a citation by the words זאת העיר. עליז is specifically one of Isaiah's expressions, and as for אַפְסִי עוֹד, in no book does אֶפֶס occur so often as in Isaiah (see the comment). The words רגע הים ויהמו גליו יהוה צבאות שכו Isaiah li. 15 are found in Jer. xxxi. 35 where they are quoted in proof of the unchangableness of the order of nature given by God. But the words are applicable in this sense only when used of the ebb and flow of the tide. The words, in themselves considered, only signify that God is able by His omnipotence to stir up the sea into mighty heaving waves. This happens chiefly by storms. For the regular rising of the tide is not necessarily attended with mighty heaving waves. The reference to the ebb and flow of the tide is put into the words. Thus the words Isa. li. 15 stand in their original sense, and hence manifestly in their original place (see the comm., in loc., and also on Jer. xxxi. 35). The words הַשְׁקֵט לֹא יוּכָל Isa. lvii. 20, spoken of the stirred up sea, are applied in Jer. xlix. 23 to the population of a city set in commotion by bad news. Here, too, one may see that Jeremiah has only transferred the words, and applied them in quite a special sense that does not quite agree with their original sound. For in Isa. the wicked are compared to the never-resting sea that ceaselessly casts up foam and dirt. There the expression השקט לא יוכל is quite in place. But may one say that the populace of a city is continually in a commotion such as bad news occasions? Therefore Jeremiah characterizes a transitory condition with words that properly and originally can only describe a continuing state. Let us notice also that we find in Zechariah (vii. 7) a very express testimony that our chapters, which he uses in many ways, were composed by one of the "old prophets" at a time "when Jerusalem was inhabited and prosperous, and the cities thereof round about her, when men inhabited the south and the plain." See for particulars the comment on Isa. lviii. 6 sqq.

Reply to Objection Fourth.—It is alleged that in the Talmud Isaiah follows Ezekiel, because at that time already part second, written at the close of the exile, had been bound to part first, and both parts indeed were currently received as Isaiah's; yet an obscure hint of Isaiah not being the author was given by putting the book of two parts after Ezekiel (see Fuerst, D. Kanon des A. T., p. 16). Eichhorn was the first to use this, and since then it has been continually repeated (see Gesenius, I. 1, p. 22; Hitzig, p. 475; Knobel, edited by Diestel, p. XXVIII., etc.). According to Eichhorn, the book of Isaiah is an anthology of prophecies, all the authors of which are unknown, excepting only Isaiah. The book of the twelve minor prophets also he would make out to be an anthology, but of prophets all of whom are known. Now because the latter anthology contained several names (Zech., Hag., Mal.) that were more recent than the most recent in the Isaiah anthology, this last named was placed before the other, between it and Ezekiel. Eichhorn says this in Part III., § 528 of his Introduction (and that even in the first edition of 1783). But in Part I., § 7 he does not seem to have known that the order "Jer., Ezek., Isa." occurs already in the Talmud. He ascribes it to the more recent manuscripts, by which doubtless must be meant the German and Gallican; for the Spanish MSS., like the Masorets, put Isaiah before. But if now Eichhorn regards this placing Isaiah after as a change which the Jews made "on account of certain and unknown causes, often on account of wonderful caprice," may not the same be said of those old Jews that fancied the order found in the Talmud? Even Vitringa (p. 21, ed. Basil) calls attention to the fact that, according to the Talmud, Jeremiah wrote the Books of Kings (Baba Batra, 15 a; Fuerst, Kanon des A. T., p. 14). And, in fact, Jer. lii. is nearly identical with 2 Kings xxiv. 18—xxv. 30. Therefore, because Jeremiah was regarded as the writer of the last book of the prophetae priores, his prophetical book was made the first of the prophetae posteriores. Then Isaiah must be put either between Jer. and Ezek., or after Ezekiel. The latter was resolved on under the influence of the fashion of gauging the principal contents of these books then current. Reproving was thought to be Jeremiah's characteristic (כֻּלֵּהּ חוּרְבָּנָא, totus in vastatione), Ezekiel's to be half reproving, half consolatory (רֵישֵׁהּ חוּרְבָּנָא סוֹפֵהּ נֶחָמְתָּא), Isaiah's to be altogether consolatory (כֻּלֵּהּ נֶחָמְתָּא). Thus was obtained a very fitting gradation. Isaiah, of course, is not wholly consolatory. But he may be considered so in the same degree that Jeremiah is considered to be wholly reproving. Putting Jeremiah and Ezekiel together may also have been occasioned by the fact that they were contemporaries, both prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans and the exile, both were witnesses of the judgment, the end of which Isaiah announced as the beginning of the glorious period of salvation. After all this it may well be regarded as a bold assertion, that the position assigned to the Prophet by talmudic tradition is to be taken as a proof of the exile authorship of part second. Besides we can refer to a witness that is older than the Talmud, and easily holds the balance against the latter. That is Jesus Sirach, who in his catalogus virorum illustrium (Ecclus. xliv.–l.) enumerates the great prophets in their order: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel (Ecclus. xlviii. 17—xlix. 9). He puts the twelve minor prophets as following these (xlix. 10). Of Isaiah in particular he says (xlviii. 22–25): "Ezekias was strong in the ways of David his father, as Esay the Prophet, who was great and faithful in his vision, (ἐν ὁράσει αὐτοῦ), had commanded him. In his time the sun went backward, and he lengthened the king's life. He saw by an excellent spirit what should come to pass at the last (τὰ ἔσχατα), and, he comforted them that mourned in Zion. He showed what should come to pass forever, and secret things or ever they came." By these words the son of Sirach plainly characterizes the different parts of Isaiah's book. The mention of the ὅρασις points to the title חָזוֹן (i. 1) and perhaps to chap. vi. also. Any way, the expression ὅρασις presupposes part first. The mention of the sun turning backwards and the prolongation of Hezekiah's life, shows that the historical section (xxxvi.–xxxix.) belonged to the book. The prominent mention of the prophetic distant vision, and of the comforting manifestly characterizes chapters xl.–lxvi. It is plainly seen, therefore, that these chapters were regarded at that time already as belonging to the book of Isaiah, and as his work. In these words of the son of Sirach, we do not observe in the slightest degree the existence of a tradition that chapters xl.–lxvi. were not Isaiah's, which, as is alleged, has left its trace in the talmudic arrangement that assigns an after position to Isaiah.

§ 5. LITERATURE.

The literature relating to Isaiah is extraordinarily abundant. We will confine ourselves to the mention of the most considerable works, referring the reader to GESENIUS and ROSENMULLER, especially as regards the older literature up to the middle of the last century.

Of patristic commentaries, the most important are that of THEODORET (in the edition of SIRMOND, prepared by SCHULZE, 1777 Tom. II.), and that of JEROME (ed. VALLARSII, Tom. IV.). Besides these there are the ὑπομνήματα of EUSEBIUS of Caesarea (ed. MONTFAUCON, Paris, 1706 2 Tomi fol.); a commentary which (probably wrongly) is ascribed to BASILIUS the great (Opp. BASILII M., ed. GARNIER, Tom. I.); the commentary of CYRILL of Alexandria (Opp. ed. AUBERT, Tom. II.); the ἑρμηνεία of CHRYSOSTOM on chapters i.–viii. (Tom. VI., ed MONTFAUCON); the Syrian commentary of EPHREM SYRUS (Opp. ed. ASSEMANI and PETR. BENED. Rom., 1740, Tom. II.). PROCOPIUS of Gaza, who lived in the 6th century in Constantinople, begins the list of the writers of Catenas among the Greeks (Procopii variorum in Es. proph. commentariorum epitome, gr. et lat. JOH. CURTERIO, interpete, Paris, 1580, Fol.).

There exist rabbinical commentaries of RASCHI, ABEN ESRA, DAVID KIMCHI, ABARBANEL.

As works of Catholic expositors are especially to be mentioned, the comments of the abbot JOACHIM, † 1202 (ed. Cologne, 1577). NIKOLAUS DE LYRA (in the Postillae perpetuae). THOMAS AQUINAS (Lyons, 1531). FRANZ VATABLE or VATABLÉ (in the editions of the VULGATE, published by ROBT. STEPHENS, 1545, 1547, 1557). FRANZ FORERIUS, (Portuguese, Dominican, 1553). Comp. the literary account in REINKE'S Messian, Weiss., 1859, I., p. 26 sqq.

From the Reformation period are to be mentioned, the exposition of LUTHER (In Es. proph. scholia, ex. D. M. LUTHERI, praelectionibus collecta, Viteb., 1534). CALVIN (Commentarii, Genev., 1562, and often). ZWINGLI (Complanationes, Turic., 1529 and often). OECOLAMPADIUS (Hypomnemata, Basil, 1525 and often). BRENZ (Comment. Francof. 1550). MUSCULUS (Comment. Basil, 1557 and often).

From the 17th and 18th centuries. The commentaries of the Jesuit CASP. SANCTIUS (SANCHEZ, Antw., 1621). CORN. A LAPIDE (Paris, 1621).

On the side of the Reformed [J. COCCEJUS: born 1603, died 1669. Prof. at Leyden. His Commentaries and other works were printed at Amsterdam, 1701. 10 vols. Fol.]. HUGO GROTIUS, Annotationes in V. T., Paris, 1644. Above all the admirable commentary of CAMPEGIUS VITRINGA, Prof. in Franeker, died 1722. This commentary is distinguished as much by astounding learning, penetration and sober sense as by elegance in style and practical warmth. It appeared first in Leuwarden, 1714 and 1720 in 2 vols. Fol. Often printed since (Basil, 1732) and pirated (Herborn, 1713, Tuebingen, 1732). BUSCHING has produced an abbreviated, German edition (Halle, 1749 and 1751), with a preface by MOSHEIM. JOH. RAMBACH, Prof. in Giessen, has also, in his exposition of the Proph. Isaiah (Züllichau, 1741). "drawn out in quite a brief form the pith of the work of CAMP. VITRINGA." Here belongs also ROBT. LOWTH, Bishop of London, "Isaiah, a new translation," etc., London, 1778. [American reprint from the tenth Eng. Ed., Boston, 1834]. This commentary appeared in German with additions and remarks by JOH. BENZ. KOPPE, Prof. in Goettingen, Leipzig, 1779. Against LOWTH's critical experiment appeared "Vindiciae textus hebr. Esajae adv. LOWTHI criticam," by DAV. KOCHER, Prof. in Bern, 1786 (concerning the latter, see STUDER Zur Textkritik des Jesaja in d. Jahrbb. f. prot. Theol. von HASE u. a., 1877, IV., p. 706 sqq.).

[JOHN GILL, a Baptist minister in London: "An exposition of the Old and New Testament, London, 1743–63, 9 parts Fol.; designed for doctrinal and practical improvement, yet distinguished from other works of the class by its erudition in a single province, viz., talmudic and rabbinical literature"].

On the Lutheran side we may mention the expositions of SEB. SCHMIDT, Prof., in Strassburg (Hamburg, 1702), JOH. DAV. MICHAELIS, "German translation of the Old Testament, with remarks for the unlearned, Part VIII., Isaiah, Goettingen, 1779." MOLDENHAUER, pastor in Hamburg (1780). HEZEL, Prof., in Giessen and Dorpat (Lemgo, 1784, fifth part of HEZEL'S Bibelwerk). HENZLER, Prof., in Kiel (Hamburg, (1788).

The transition to the 19th century is formed by E. F. K. ROSENMULLER, Scholia in V. T., the third part of which containing Isaiah, appeared in Leipzig, 1791–93, 1810–20, 1829–34. The critical tendency which began already in the 18th century with KOPPE, EICHHORN (Introduction to the Old Testament, I. ed., 1783; [to be found in English], JOH. CHR. DOEDERLEIN (Esaias, etc. Latine vertit notasque subjecit, Altorf, 1775 and often), G. EBERH. GOTTL. PAULUS (Philologische Clavis ueber das A. T., 1793), G. L. BAUER (Scholia in V. T., vols. VIII. and IX., 1794, 1795), J. CHR. W. AUGUSTI (Exeget. Handb. d. A. T. v. HÖPFNER, 5 and 6 Stück, 1799), &c., was continued in the 19th Century by GESENIUS (D. Proph. Jes. neu uebersetzt, 1820. Philolog. kritischer u. hist. Comm., 1821), HITZIG (D. Proph. Jes. uebers. u. ausg., 1833), MAURER (Comm. gramm. crit. in V. T., Vol. I., 1835), HENDEWERK (Des Proph. Jes. Weiss. chronolog. geordnet, uebersetzt u. erkl., 1838 and 1843), EWALD (die Proph. d. A. B. I. Ausg., 1840), BECK (die cyro-jesajan. Weiss. oder die Kapp. XL.–LXVI., etc., 1844), ERNST MEIER (D. Proph. Jes. ekl., 1850—contains only chapters i.–xxiii.—and Die Proph. BB. d. A. T., uebers. u. erkl., 1863), KNOBEL (D. Proph. Jes. erkl. I. Ausg., 1843; 4, herausg. von DIESTEL, 1872). In some respects the practical commentary of UMBREIT (I Ausg., 1841, II. Aufl., 1846) belongs here.

From the positive standpoint Isaiah has been expounded by DRECHSLER (D. Proph. Jes. uebersetzt u. erkl. Kapp. i.–xii., 1845; II. Th. 1. Hälfte Kapp. xiii.–xxvii., 1849; 2. Haelfte, xxviii.–xxxix., published from DRECHSLER'S remains by DELITZSCH and HAHN, 1854; III. Theil, Kapp., xl.–lxvi., prepared by HAHN with a preface by DELITZSCH), then by DELITZSCH (Bibl. Kommentar ueber d. Proph. Jes. II. Ausg., 1869) [published in English by CLARK of Edinburg]. The chapters xl.–lxvi., have been expounded alone, from the positive position by STIER (Jesajas nicht Pseudo = Jesajas, 1850), in the sense of the modern criticism by SEINECKE (Der Evangelist des A. T., 1870).

The Messianic prophecies have been expounded on the part of Protestants by HENGSTENBERG, in his Christology of the Old Testament (I. Ausg. 1829–35, I. Bd. 2 Haelfte; II., Ausg., 1854–56; II., Bd.). [Published in English by CLARK, of Edinburg]. On the part of the Roman Catholics, by LOR. REINKE, Prof., in Munster. The same author published separate treatises on chapters lii. 13–liii. 12, in 1836, chapter ii. 2–4 in 1838, chapters vii. 14–16 in 1848; but the other passages in the book "Die messian Weiss. bei den grossen u. kleinen Propheten," Giessen, 1859–62, 5 vols. (vols. I. and II., contain Isaiah). Apart from the Romish lack of freedom, it is a very learned work, prepared with great thoroughness and care. Other commentaries by catholic theologians will be found enumerated by REINKE, l. c. I. p. 39 sq., 43 sq. As recently published I will add: ROHLING, D. Proph. Jes. uebers. u. erkl., 1872 (4. Abth. I. Bd. von "Die heil. Schriften des A. T., nach Katholischen Prinzipien uebers. u. erkl. von einem Verein befreundeter Fachgenossen). In regard to that theologia prophetica which endeavors to prove that all the loci of dogmatics are contained in the declarations of the prophets, and which is to be distinguished from the theologia prophetica that gives information of all that relates to the prophets and to prophecy (see BUDDEUS Isagoge in theol. universam, Lipsiæ 1727, p. 1738 b sqq.), comp. my remarks in the Introduction to Jeremiah.

Finally I would mention a peculiar poetical treatment of a selection from the prophecies of Isaiah that has appeared under the title: "Les visions d'Esaie et la nouvelle terre par Eliakim, Rotterdam et Leipsic 1854." The author is a Catholic, but he regards Roman Catholicism as an apostacy from the évangile primitif, which he proves from the prophecies of Isaiah, by attempting to show that the doctrines of the Trinity, of the divinity of Christ, and of justification by faith, are contrary to this gospel. He teaches a sort of transmigration of souls and return to God through successive purification.

THE PROPHET ISAIAH.

I. THE THREEFOLD INTRODUCTION.

Chapters I.—VI.

The extent and the grand contents of Isaiah's prophecies justify the artistic, complex form of the introduction. It is not merely one gate; there are three gates that we must pass through in order to reach the majestic principal edifice of Isaiah's prophecy. That the entire first six chapters constitute the introduction of the whole book, yet so that this introduction itself again appears as threefold, (chap. i., chaps. i.—iv., chap. vi.) becomes plain both from the contents and from the form of these chapters. That chap. i. is introduction requires no proof. Both the contents, which comprehend in grand outlines the entire past, present and future, and also the title, with its formal reference, guarantee that. Chaps. ii.—v., however, whose connection we shall show hereafter, have essentially the same contents and the same title. The same contents; for these chapters comprehend in general the present and future. Caspari has completely demonstrated how in chaps. i., ii.—iv., v. threatening and promise have still quite a general character in distinction from the later prophecies. Compare in regard to chap. i., Beitr., p. 227 sqq., in regard to chaps. ii.—iv., p. 283 sqq., in regard to chap. v., p. 325 sq., 334.—Drechsler, too, says (I. p. 225): "A certain character of generality attaches to all these chapters (i.—v.). Comp. Delitzsch, p. 114 sq.—Hengstenberg, Christol. I. p. 484.—Hendewerk, I. p. 64.

As regards the form: it is of the greatest significance that chap. ii. bears essentially the same title at its head as chap i. And this title does not recur again. This repetition of the title of chap. i. at the head of chap. ii., has occasioned commentators great trouble. But they were hampered by the strange assumption that only chap. i. could be introduction. As soon as we give up this assumption, we at once recognize the meaning of the title of chap. ii. Thereby it is outwardly and right away shown to the reader, that all which this title concerns bears the same character as chap. i., i. e., that it is also Introduction.

Jeremiah also has a double introduction; a fact that escaped my notice when preparing my commentary on that prophet. For Jer. ii. is also introduction, because that chapter, like an overture, represents in advance all the principal thoughts of Jeremiah's prophecy (even the warning against the expedition into Egypt, vers. 16, 18, 36, 37).

That chap. vi. also bears the character of an introduction cannot be doubted, and is acknowledged by all expositors. It contains indeed the call of Isaiah to the prophetic office. But why does not this history stand at the beginning, like the story of the call of Jeremiah and Ezekiel? This question, too, has given the commentators great trouble. Many have resorted to the following explanation (comp. Caspari, p. 332): they say chap. vi. contains the account of a second calling, after Isaiah has been once already called, but had forfeited the office on account of his silence about the notorious arbitrary deed of Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 16 sqq.). Others assume that chap. vi. contains only the call to a special mission, and to a higher degree of prophecy. But these are only expedients to which expositors were driven because they were controlled by the assumption that only the first chapter can be introduction. All these and other artful devices are unnecessary as soon as one knows that chap. vi. is introduction indeed, yet the third introduction.

But why does not this stand at the beginning? We will hereafter in the exposition show that Isaiah, unlike Moses, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, did not decline the divine commission, but rather, to the Lord's question: "Whom shall I send," vi. 8, at once boldly replied: "Here am I, send me." That Isaiah, therefore, not only accepts the call, but offers himself, is something so extraordinary that one may easily imagine why he would not put this narrative at the head of his book. He had rather prepare the reader for it: he would give beforehand proofs of his prophetic qualification, in order thereby to explain and justify that bold speech. It does not stand outside by the gate, offering itself at once to every profane eye, but one must first pass through two other portals, by which the mind is prepared and translated into that sentiment which is necessary in order to understand and appreciate that exalted vision, and the part that Isaiah plays in it. Jeremiah and Ezekiel were not sensible of the necessity of preparing in this way for the representation of their calling, because they behaved in respect to the divine calling in quite a normal way, i. e., declining it. The one, Jeremiah, declined in express terms Jer. i. 6; the other, at least by silence, let himself be so understood, Ezek. ii. 8.

But why does Isaiah let two doctrinary introductions, if I may so call them, precede the historical one, whereas Jeremiah follows his historical introduction by only one doctrinary one, Jer. ii? I believe this has a double reason. First: threatening and promise form the chief contents of Isaiah's prophecy, as of all prophecy. In every single prophetic address one or the other ever preponderates. Either threatening forms the warp and promise the woof, or the reverse. So Isaiah would even prelude with two addresses, of which the first has an undertone of threatening with which it begins and ends, while the element of promise is represented only by intermediate chords,—the second, however, has promise for undertone, for this is represented by the two fundamental prophetic lights (ii. 2–4, and iv. 2–6) in the second introduction. Second: It seems to me also that the three portals are demanded by the architectonic symmetry. On the assumption that these introductions have Isaiah himself for their author, which so far as I know has never been disputed, we have therein a strong presumption in favor of the composition of the whole book by Isaiah (therefore also the second part, xl.—lxvi.). For a small building one entry is sufficient. A great, comprehensive, complex building, however, that pretends to artistic completeness, may very well require various graded approaches that the introduction to the chief building may stand in right proportion. Thus the book of Jeremiah has a twofold introduction, but the book of Isaiah, which is still grander, and more comprehensive, and altogether more artistic even down to minutiæ, has a threefold entrance.

A. THE FIRST INTRODUCTION.

Chapter I.

As regards the time of the composition of this section, it seems to me all depends on the question: was Isaiah prompted to utter this prophecy by a definite historical transaction that demands his prophetic guidance? No such transaction appears. Expositors on the contrary recognize the chapter to be of a general character. Comp. the complete proof in Drechsler I. p. 93 sq. If, therefore, the address was not composed for a definite historical event, according to which it must be understood; if it is rather meant to be only an introduction to the whole book, then the time of its origin is in itself a matter of indifference. But it is probable that Isaiah wrote the address at the time he began to put his book together, or when he had completed it. This does not exclude the possibility that some important events are reflected in the address. And such is really the case. The verses 7–9 and especially ver. 8, are so specific in their contents that one must say: the prophet describes here his personal experience, and in fact a present one (comp. the exposition).

Now, during Isaiah's life time. Jerusalem was only twice hard pressed by enemies in its immediate neighborhood: once in the war with Syria and Ephraim (2 Kings xvi. 5); the other time by Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii., xix.). If, then, chap. i. was written as a preface, it is by far the most probable that it was written in Hezekiah's time, than in that of Ahaz. For Isaiah undertook the collection of his book certainly not in the midst of his ministry, but at the close of it. Moreover what is said in 2 Kings xviii. 13, and xix. 32, fits admirably the description of chap. i. 7, 8. For in the first-named place it is said Sennacherib took all the fenced cities of Judah, which quite corresponds to עָרֵיכֶם שְׂרֻפוֹת אֵשׁ i. 7. In the second-named place, however, we read: "The king of Assyria shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shield, nor cast a bank against it." This corresponds to the specific situation in which, according to chap. i. 7, Jerusalem must have been. We say, therefore, chap. i. was written at the time of Sennacherib's invasion. We know this from vers. 7 and 8, but do not assert that chap. i. was written for that time, but regard the historical trait that points us to this time only as a proof of the charge that the prophet raises against the Israel of all times. The prophet adduces this proof from the present, because the conduct of the people during and after the invasion of Sennacherib could be regarded as a characteristic symptom of a stiffneckedness that was not to be subdued by any blows. Moreover the vain ceremonial service spoken of in ver. 10 sqq. would suit the times of Hezekiah. But I lay no stress on that, since there is nothing specific about it. If the prophet warns against such ceremonial service, and exhorts to sincere repentance; if, further, to the purified Israel he holds up the prospect of a glorious future, while, to those persevering in their apostacy from Jehovah, he displays a frightful one, it is not that he speaks of a specific occasion; but that, like the whole book, has regard to all times: even primitive time may be reflected in the language.

Concerning the difference between this first and the second introduction see above the general remarks on the threefold introduction. The analysis of the chapter is as follows:

1. The Title, i. 1.
2. The mournful present, i. 2-9.
3. The means to securing a better future, i. 10-20.
4. Comprehensive review of the past, present and future, i. 21-31.

1. THE TITLE.

Chap. I. 1.

1 The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. חזה אשר חזה. חזה is the proper word for prophetic seeing in the double sense named below; whence חֹזֶה is used synonymously with נָבִיא, רֹאֶה (1 Sam. ix. 9; 2 Kings xvii. 13). Thence also the expressions הַדָּבָר אֲשֶׁר חָזָה Isa. ii. 1; דִּבְרֵי אֲשֶׁר חָזָה Amos i. 1; דְּבַר י׳ אֲשֶׁר חָזָה Mic. i. 1; מַשָּׂא אֲשֶׁר חָזָה, Isa. xiii. 1; Hab. i. 1. These are the only places where חָזָה occurs as part of a superscription.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

We must consider this title in reference to three things, viz., in its relation to chap. i. and to chap. ii., where a title essentially like this recurs, and to the entire collection. That the superscription belongs to the entire collection, is evident at once from the words, "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah." That the title is comprehensive enough to apply to the entire book is clear when we consider that חָזוֹן "the vision" has a collective meaning, (comp. Hos. xii. 10; Ezek. vii. 26; Lam. ii. 9, etc.), and that Judah and Jerusalem represent the centre of the prophetic view, around which also the prophecies that relate to Ephraim and the world potentates are grouped as radii servi. In this connection CASPARI says very appropriately: "Jerusalem, Judah, Israel, are, from Isa. vii. on, the centre of prophecy in such a way that they form three concentric circles, of which Jerusalem is the smallest, Jerusalem and Judah the wider, while Jerusalem, Judah and Israel is the widest. To these three the heathen world joins on as a fourth circle." (Beitr. z. Einleit. in d. B. Jes., p. 231 sq.). Therefore both חָזוֹן and "concerning Judah and Jerusalem" make a denominatio a potiori. The first, because prophetic sight, in the double sense of more or less bodily vision, (comp. chap. vi.) and of pure spiritual knowing, gave origin to the nucleus of the book, so that about this nucleus doctrine, warning, comfort and history should find their place. The latter because, as has already been remarked, Judah and Jerusalem must be regarded as those to whom the prophet speaks first of all, and for whose sake he speaks of others.

But it has seemed strange, especially to VITRINGA, that in chap. ii. 1 a superscription of almost the same sound recurs; and he would infer from it that originally in this title the date (בִּימֵי וגו "in the days of") was wanting, and the remaining words were only a title to the first chapter. Against this the following is to be remembered: 1) The two superscriptions are not quite alike. In this one we have חָזוֹן; in chap. ii. 1 הַדָּבָר.—חָזוֹן is plainly a word of weightier import. It is better fitted, therefore, for the beginning of the book, and in a certain measure for its title; wherefore we see (2 Chron. xxxii. 32), that the book even at that time was known under that title. 2) That a superscription almost alike occurs twice, has its reason in the fact that chap. ii. 1 is the title of the second introduction. For the book of Isaiah has a threefold portal, as said above; and that the superscription "vision or word that Isaiah saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem" occurs only i. 1, and ii. 2, and not again afterwards, is precisely proof, that with chap. ii. we enter the second portal which comprehends chapters ii.—v.

Finally, as regards the relation of this superscription to chap. i., we may fittingly say that the entire ver. 1, date included, is the title of chap. i. For chap. i. is just the whole prophecy of Isaiah in nuce, as he delivered it under the four kings; an assertion whose correctness can only appear indeed as the result of exposition.

At the beginning of prophetic books as here we find חָזוֹן Obad. 1, Nah. i. 1.—Isaiah the son of Amoz. For the meaning of the name and the lineage of the prophet see the Introduction.—Concerning Judah and Jerusalem. Jerusalem, as the holy city and centre of the theocracy is made equal to the entire region of Judah, and distinguished from it, which also happens elsewhere; Jer. xi 2; xvii. 20, etc.; 2 Kings xviii. 22, etc.; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3, 5, etc.; and in a reversed order, Jer. xxxvi. 31; 2 Kings xxiv. 20; Ezra ii. 1. We have already remarked that the naming of Judah and Jerusalem presents no incongruity between the superscription and the whole book. It is worthy of special remark, that only in chap. ii. 1 beside this does the expression form part of the title, and that it occurs in chap. ii.—v. relatively with most frequency. For it is found beside chap. ii. 1, also iii. 1, 8; v. 3. Beside this only in xxii. 21; xxxvi. 7; xliv. 26. Comp. remarks at ii. 1.—In the days of, etc. That Isaiah lived and labored under these four kings cannot be doubted. Comp. the Introduction. The time designated is identical with that given Hos. i. 1, and with that in Mic. i. 1, only that in the latter the name of Uzziah is wanting. Even the asyndeton and the form יְחִזְקִיָּהוּ instead of חִזְקִיָּהוּ (about which comp. Drechsler in loc.) are to be found in both the places named.

2. THE MOURNFUL PRESENT.

Chapter I. 2-9.

2 Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth:
For the Lord [a]hath spoken,
I have nourished and brought up children,
And they have rebelled against me.
3 The ox knoweth his owner,
And the ass his master's crib:
But Israel doth not know,
My people doth not consider.
4 Ah sinful nation, a people [1]laden with iniquity,
A seed of evil-doers, children that are corrupters:
They have forsaken the Lord,
They have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger,
They are [2]gone away backward.
5 Why should ye be stricken any more?
Ye will [3]revolt more and more:
[b]The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint.
6 From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it;
But wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores:
[c]They have not been closed, neither bound up,
Neither mollified with [4]ointment.
7 Your country is desolate,
Your cities are burned with fire:
Your land, strangers devour it in your presence,
And it is desolate, [5]as [d]overthrown by strangers.
8 And the daughter of Zion is left as a [e]cottage in a vineyard,
As [f]a lodge in a garden of cucumbers,
As a besieged city.
9 Except the Lord of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant,
We should have been as Sodom,
And we should have been like unto Gomorrah.

[1] Heb. of heaviness.
[2] Heb. alienated, or, separated.
[3] Heb. increase revolt.
[4] Or, oil.
[5] Heb. as the overthrow of strangers.

[b] Every head, every heart.
[c] Not pressed out.
[e] a booth.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2. The formula כִּי יְ׳ דִּבֵּר, is found Joel iii. 8; Obad. 18; Mic. iv. 4; Jer. xiii. 15. Beside these, in Isaiah partly in the simple form as here (xxii. 25; xxv. 8), partly somewhat extended (xxi. 17; xxiv. 3). The more extended form כִּי פִּי יְ׳ דִּבֵּר is found in Isaiah only, i. 20, and xl. 5; lviii. 14.——גִּדֵּל is often used by Isaiah especially, for bringing up children, xxiii. 4; xlix. 21; li. 18; comp. xliv. 14; Hos. ix. 12.——It is to be seen from the exposition that we take רוֹמַמְתִּי in an emphatic sense. Although elsewhere (xxiii. 4; Ezek. xxxi. 4) it means the same as גִּדֵּל, yet our construction (which is found in Luther, Knobel, et al.) is justified here because רוֹמַם does not stand in a parallel phrase to גִּדֵּל, but follows with epexegetical emphasis. For if רוֹמַמְתִּי is taken as meaning just the same as גִּדַּלְתִּי, it would be empty repetition. Besides, Vitringa refers appropriately to Deut. xxxii. 6. [Ezek. xxxi. 4. The same words occur: Children I have made great and set on high.—M. W. J.]

Ver. 3. קֹנֵהוּ properly "the buyer," (comp. xxiv. 2) then, "the owner, the possessor," (Lev. xxv. 50; Zech. xi. 5). אֵבוּס is found only in Job xxxix. 9; Prov. xiv. 4, beside this place. From these places it is not evident whether "stall" or "crib" is the correct meaning. As little decisive is the root meaning "fatten" (1 Kings v. 3, (Eng. Bib. iv. 23), Prov. xv. 17). Still in the later Hebrew, which uses the word for the platter of the laborer (see Buxtorf Lex., p. 16. Gesenius and Delitzsch in loc.) the meaning "crib" seems to prevail. The earliest versions, moreover, all give this rendering. The context demands that the object of יָדַע and הִתְבּוֹנָן be supplied from what precedes. For would one take the words absolutely (Rosenmueller, Fuerst) then the two members of the comparison do not harmonize. Just what ox and ass do notice, Israel does not notice. הִתְבּוֹנֵן is used as verb. trans. by Isaiah, also xliii. 18; lii. 15. As substantially parallel we may compare (Jer. viii. 7.)

Ver. 4. הוֹי (frequent in Isaiah, also in the 2d part; xlv. 9, 10; lv. 1; he uses it twenty-one times, whereas in the rest of the prophets it occurs twenty-eight times; for it is only found in the prophetic books, with the exception of 1 Kings xiii. 30) is distinguished from אוֹי in that the latter is more substantive, the former more adverb. Hence it is that אוֹי, with few exceptions (Num. xxiv. 23; Ezek. xxiv. 6, 9) has לְ after it, whereas הוֹי is followed by לְ only Ezek. xiii. 18, and by עַל, Ezek. xiii. 3; Jer. l. 27, and by אֶל, Jer. xlviii. 1; everywhere else (e. g. 1 Kings xiii. 30; Isa. v. 8, 11, etc.) it is used without a connecting proposition. הוֹי therefore has more the character of a prepositive exclamation, though in regard to the meaning no essential difference is noticeable. It is taken for granted that an intentional paronomasia influenced the selection of the word גּוֹי. On the other hand it is clear that a synonym of עַם was meant, as after this זֶרַע and בָּנִים correspond to one another.——כֶּבֶד עָוֺן is "guilt-encumbered." Regarding the meaning, comp. Gen. xiii. 2; Exod. iv. 10; Ezek. iii. 5, 6; regarding the form (the construct-form, כֶּבֶד along with כָּבֵד, like עֲרַל along with עָרֵל, only here).——A בֵּן מַשְׁחִית is not one who destroys another, but one that acts ruinously (direct causative Hiphil, 2 Chr. xxvii. 2). The expression is partly stronger, partly more general than the kindred ones: בָּנִים בָּנִים כֶּחָשִׁים לֹא אָבוּ שְׁמוֹעַ סוֹרְרִים xxx. 1; xxx. 9. בָּנִים שׁוֹבָבִים Jer. iii. 14, 22; iv. 22. Comp. בָּנִים לֹא יְשַׁקֵּרוּ Isa. lxiii. 8. We see that this form of expression is especially current with Isaiah, for, excepting the phrase just quoted from Jeremiah, it is to be found in no other prophet.

Ver. 5. סָרָה, ver. 5, declinatio, defectus only in Deut. xiii. 6; xix. 16; Jer. xxviii. 16; xxix. 32 and Isa. xiv. 6; xxxi. 6; lix. 13.——It is true that כֹּל without the article sometimes has the meaning of "whole" (ix. 11; Ezek. xxix. 7; xxxvi. 5; 2 Kings xxiii. 3; see Delitzsch in loc.; Ewald § 290, c). But a comparison of these passages shows that the expressions in question are partly proverbial, (see Drechsler in loc.) partly do not admit of the meaning "all" in any wise. In the present case both meanings are in themselves possible. If, then, the prophet would convey the meaning "whole," he must use the article. לָחֳלִי must, any way, be regarded as dependent on הָיָה understood. But it is doubtful whether that is to be taken in the sense of "belongs, is fallen to," or as meaning "is become." The latter is the more probable, because הָיָה לָחֳלִי bears analogy to expressions like הָיָה לָמַס, לָבַז. It is a strong expression, stronger than חָלָה. חֳלִי is then to be taken as abstractum pro concreto. Apart from this concrete meaning of the word, we may compare the construction of הָיָה with לְ with passages like 1 Sam. iv. 9 (וִהְיוּ לַאֲנָשִׁים) and xviii. 17 (הֱיֵה־לִּי לְבֶן־חַיִל).——וְכָל־לֵבָב דַּוָּי. דַּוָּי is found also Jer. viii. 18, and Lam. i. 22. לֵב דַּוָּי does not occur again in Isaiah.

Ver. 6. The expression מִכַּף־רֶגֶל וְעַד־רֹאשׁ is found only here. Every where else it reads וְעַד קָדְקֹד, (Deut. xxviii. 35; 2 Sam. xiv. 25; Job ii. 7).—אֵין בּוֹ. We would expect בָּכֶם, as in ver. 5. But such changes in person and number occur frequently in Hebrew, comp. xvii. 13; Ps. v. 10.—מְתֹם integrum, sanum, is found beside only Jud. xx. 48; Ps. xxxviii. 4, 8.—פֶּצַע (from פָּצַע fidit) is fissura, a wound that comes from tear or scratch; found in Isaiah only here. חַבּוּרָה (joined to פֶּצַע, also Prov. xx. 30) is "the extravasated stripe or swelling," (see Delitzsch in loc.); only here in Isaiah. מַכָּה טְרִיָּה (טָרִי from טָרָה — טָלָה recens fuit, found beside only in Jud. xv. 15) is the raw wound of a cut. זֹרוּ with accented penult cannot be derived from זָרָה dispersit: nor can it be the same as זֹרוּ in Ps. lviii. 4. It is either an intensive form analogous to בֹּשׁוּ, אֹרוּ, 1 Sam. xiv. 29; טֹבוּ, Num. xxiv. 5; Song of S. iv. 10; or an archaic passive form from זוּר (comp. רֻמּוּ, Job xxiv. 24). The latter seems to me likely for הַזּוּרֶה, Isa. lix. 5, "the squeezed, crushed" (egg), תְּזוּרֶהָ (the foot shall crush it, Job xxxix. 15) וַיָּזַר (he squeezed out the fleece, Jud.

vi. 38), as well as the substantive מָזוֹר compressio, compressum, vulnus, (Jer. xxx. 13; Hos. v. 13) prove that there is a root זוּר with the meaning "press together" (comp. צָרַר), to which then our זֹרוּ would serve as a passive, like רֹמּוּ to רוּם; comp. Gesenius Thesaur., p. 412.——חֻבָּשׁ in Isaiah beside this iii. 7; xxx. 26; lxi. 1.——The first two verbs are in the plural, which shows that the substantives are to be understood collectively: the third verb is fem. singular. No grammatical necessity appears for this. It seems as if the prophet wanted to vary the form of expression and the fem. sing. with its quality of taking a neuter construction offered the handle for it. Pual רֻכְּכָה only found here; Kal of it is found Isa. vii. 4.

Ver. 7. שְׁמָמָה occurs in Isa. also vi. 11; xvii. 9; lxii. 4; lxiv. 9. The expression שְׂרֻפוֹת אֵשׁ (Ps. lxxx. 17) is only found here.——The following וּשְׁמָמָה does not belong as a second predicate to אַדְמַתְכֶם, for then הִיא ought not to be absent. But it is itself subject, to which הָיְתָה must be supplied. The last, then, has the words כְּמַהְפֵּכַת זָרִים as attribute. These last-named words are explained quite variously. But as it is established that the first word is used only in reference to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the meaning of it cannot be doubtful. From the original passage, Deut. xxix. 22 (23) we find the words cited in Amos iv. 11, and in Isa. xiii. 19 and Jer. l. 40 exactly alike. In Jer. xlix. 18 we find them as in Deut.

Ver. 8. ונותרה בת־צ׳. The ו here is not conversive but simple conjunctive, as the whole context proves, which is only a representation of things present.——סֻכָּה from סָכַךְ, "to weave together," the lair of the lion as well as the foliage of the feast of tabernacles, Lev. xxiii. 34 sqq., or the booth of the watchman, Job xxvii. 18; found again Isa. iv. 6.——מְלוּנָה synonym of מָלוֹן locus pernoctandi, night lodging x. 29, is used xxiv. 20, for the watchman's sleeping rug, that swings to and fro, having been hung up and spread out.——מִקְשָׁה, from קִשֻּׁא cucumis, "field of cucumbers," found also only Jer. x. 5.

Ver. 9. The expression הוֹתִיר שָׂרִיד as to its meaning, is borrowed from the usus loquendi of the Pentateuch and Joshua. Only there it always reads, הִשְׁאִיר שָׂרִיד, Num. xxi. 35; Deut. ii. 34; iii. 3; Josh. viii. 22; x. 28 sq.—Jer. xliv. 7 reversed הוֹתִיר שְׁאֵרִית.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The prophet first introduces Jehovah Himself speaking, (vers. 2, 3). He calls heaven and earth to witness in order to enhance His lament over the people Israel. For His beneficence the Lord had only a harvest of disobedience, (ver. 2). The ox and ass are attached to their lord. Israel is not, (ver. 3). Therefore the prophet pronounces a war against the people that had forsaken the best and the greatest Lord, the Holy One of Israel, (ver. 4). Had the Lord been wanting in discipline? No. He had chastised the people so much, that for the future He hopes for nothing more from that. Israel is (inwardly, morally) incurably sick, vers. (5, 6). While outwardly (from the chastisement) it is reduced to a minimum, (vers. 7, 8). Thus far, (directly and indirectly) the address of Jehovah. In the last verse, (9), the prophet himself confirms the fact, that still a little remnant exists on which to build the hope of a better future.

2. Hear heaven—do not consider it, vers. 2, 3. When the Lord of the world speaks, the world must hear in silence. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 1; Ps. l. 1, 4; Mic. i. 2; vi. 1, 2. But here, as elsewhere, (Deut. iv. 26; xxx. 19; xxxi. 28; Ps. l. 4) the world is not invoked as simply an audience, but as a witness, before whom the Lord would make good His claim of right. For it concerns a matter of universal interest. The world must react with Jehovah against Israel's infraction of law, that the מוֹסְדֵי אָרֶץ, foundations of the earth, Ps. lxxxii. 5, may not totter. At the same time one must assent to the remark of Delitzsch: "heaven and earth were present and participants when Jehovah gave His people the law (comp. Deut. iv. 36, and the places cited above) —so then must they hear and witness what Jehovah, their Creator and Israel's God, has to say and complain of," [after seven centuries.—M. W. J.]

As Isaiah begins his book of prophecy with almost the words of Deut. xxxii. 1, he indicates that he had that prophetic song before his eyes, which, with Delitzsch, may be called, "the compendious outline and the common key to all prophecy." He does not indeed quote verbatim, for the predicates הַאֲזִין and שָׁמַע are transposed (comp., too, chap. xxviii. 23; xxxii. 9). But the thought is the same. The same is true in regard to the causal phrase, כִּי י׳ דִּבֵּר. In Deut. it reads: הַאֲזִינוּ הַשָּׁמַיִם וַאֲדַבֵּרָה וְתִשְׁמַע הָאָרֶץ אִמְרֵי פִי. What Isaiah assigns as the reason, is in Deut. designated as object and effect. The difference is substantially a formal one. Jehovah is indeed Father of all men and all creatures. He is even called (Num. xvi. 22; xxvii. 16) "God of the spirits of all flesh;" and Ps. cxlv. 15 sq.—comp. civ. 27 sqq.—we read that the eyes of all wait on the Lord, and that He fills everything that lives with satisfaction (comp. Rom. iii. 29; ix. 24 sqq.; x. 12 sqq.). But among the many children that He has, there is one race that He has not only brought up to maturity, but has elevated to high honor. The Lord did not suffer all peoples to attain the grown-up state; or rather, not all sons of the original Father, became the fathers of nations. But to Abraham precisely this was granted as the first promise: "I will make of thee a great nation," Gen. xii. 2; and, "Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt, unto the great river, the river Euphrates," Gen. xv. 18. And this promise was fulfilled. Abraham's seed became a great and numerous people. But this people also were the recipients of high honor. For it is the holy nation, Deut. vii. 6, to whom the Lord drew near and revealed Himself in an especial manner, Deut. iv. 6 sqq.; xxxii. sq.; Ps. cxlvii. 19 sq. It is therefore the peculiar people (עַם סְגֻלָּה, Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2) through whom the blessing of Jehovah shall come on all nations (Gen. xii. 2 sq.; xxii. 18; Jer. iv. 2). And in consequence of all this, it is called "high above all nations," Deut. xxvi. 19; xxviii. 1; comp. 2 Sam. vii. 23. The time of David and Solomon, and Uzziah's and Jotham's time, the echo of the former, are to be regarded as forerunner and type of these promises. And they have rebelled against me.—According to well-known Hebrew usage, what in substance stands related as opposite is designated as equivalent in form. פֶּשַׁע is a current word in Isa. i. 28; xliii. 27; xlvi. 8; lix. 13, etc. Expositors inquire whether only idolatry is meant, or also every kind of transgression. But we can't see why every thing should not be meant that could be called opposition to the Lord; or rather, why every transgression should not be regarded as idolatry. [They have broken away from me.—M. W. J.] The ox knoweth his owner.—An ox knoweth his owner, any ox. The words explain the rebelling, ver. 2, by a rhetorical contrast that sets this in clearer light. The unthinking brutes, even those of lowest degree, as the ox and ass, still know their masters that feed them, and the crib out of which they eat, and acquire a certain attachment for master and crib, so that they do not voluntarily forsake them.

3. Ah, sinful nation—besieged city.—Vers. 4–8. Jehovah's benefactions have not sufficed to awaken in Israel the feeling of grateful attachment. On the contrary this nation forsakes its God, rejects Him, and sinks back into the darkness of heathendom, out of which He had rescued them. The three verbs in ver. 4 b express the positive consequences of the negative "doth not know," ver. 3; and vers. 3 and 4 together contain the more particular signification of "rebelled against me," ver. 2. Thus a climax occurs in vers. 2–4. The outward construction of the language also corresponds to this. Vers. 2 and 3 consist of four members, and vers. 4 of seven, of which the first begins with an impressive assurance. But in the first four members of ver. 4 the reason is given why Israel became untrue to its God. The reason is a subjective one. Israel itself is good for nothing—it is a bad tree with bad fruit. The meaning heathen nation need not be pressed, and so much the less, seeing the singular is often used for Israel without any secondary idea of reproach (Exod. xix. 6; Jos. iii. 17, etc.), and also parallel with עַם. We have translated it "Woe world" in order to re-echo the consonance of the original as nearly as possible. It has been justly remarked besides that Israel is called here גּוֹי חֹטֵא, "sinful nation," in contrast with גּוֹי קָדוֹשׁ, "holy nation," which it ought to be according to Exod. xix. 6; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2, 21; and עַם כֶּבֶד עָוֹן in contrast with עַם נְשֻׂא עָוֹן, which it is called xxxiii. 24. Israel is called moreover "a seed of evil doers," though it ought to be "a holy seed" (vi. 13; Ezra ix. 2). Many expositors (e. g., Drechsler) scruple to render these words as in the Genitive relation, because then the ancestors themselves would be called reprobates. They therefore take מרעים as in apposition with זרע. But, apart from the fact that then it must rather read זֶרַע מֵרֵעַ, as in lvii. 3, זֶרַע מְנָאֵף, that scruple is entirely groundless. For זֶרַע מְרֵעִים is not only a posterity from reprobates, but also a posterity that consists of reprobates, as lxv. 23, זֶרַע בְּרוּכֵי יי, means, not the descendants of blessed ones, but those themselves blessed, and like the expressions, בְּנֵי נָבָל, בְּנֵי בְלִיַּעַל, בְּנֵי הַנְּבִיאִים, בְּנֵי צֹאן, etc., do not mean the sons of fools, of worthless fellows, of prophets, of sheep, but sons that are themselves fools, worthless, prophets, sheep. But as the idea זֶרַע points to the essential identity in fruit and seed, and to the former being conditioned by the latter, so one must think, not of the original ancestors of the nation, but rather of the generation immediately preceding, chiefly, however, of an ideal ancestry, a notion that even underlies the expression γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν, "generation of vipers," Matt. iii. 7. זרע מרעים is therefore a genitive relation, in which the ideas of causality and of the attribute are combined. The expression is found again xiv. 20.—Finally, the Israelites are called בָּנִים מַשְׁחִיתִים, "children that are corrupters," although, according to ver. 2, they are children whom the Lord has brought up and made high; for, although any one may be called בֶּן מַשְׁחִית, who as a man (not as a son) is מַשְׁחִית, all reference must not be denied to ver. 2, and all the places that express Israel's filial relation to Jehovah, e. g. Deut. xiv. 1.

In three phrases, now, the bad fruits are declared that the bad tree has borne. They have (negative) forsaken Jehovah, they have (positive) rejected with scorn (v. 24; lii. 5; lx. 14), the Holy One of Israel (an expression peculiarly Isaiah's, that occurs fourteen times in the first part, and fifteen times in the second, and in other parts of the Old Testament only six times), and they have turned themselves backwards. This turning backwards can only mean the turning to idols. For the Lord had turned Israel from idols to Himself, comp. Josh. xxiv. 2, 14. If the nation then turned their backs to Him, it was precisely that they might return to their idols. This is confirmed by Ezek. xiv. 5, the only place beside the present in which the expression occurs.

Vers. 5 and 6 seem to respond to an objection. For after the description in vers. 3, 4, of the nation's deep depravity, the prophet proceeds to portray the impending chastisement of it, ver. 7. But before he does so, he removes an objection that might be raised from the stand-point of forbearing love, viz. had sufficient discipline been exercised on Israel? if not, might not the renewed application of it ward off the judgment? The inquiry is negatived. For the uselessness of the smiting has long been proved by the ever-repeated backsliding of the nation. It is seen that we render the beginning of ver. 5: "To what purpose shall one smite you still more?" For there are three expositions of these words. The first is: "On what part of the body shall one still smite you?" (thus Jerome, Saada, GESENIUS, ROSENMUELLER, UMBREIT, KNOBEL and others [J. A. ALEXANDER, BARNES].

This rests chiefly on what follows, where the body is described as beaten all over. However, four things are to be objected to this view: a) it could not then read עַל־מֶה, but אֵי זֶה תֻכּוּ עוֹד, or the like. For מֶה is purely the general, abstract "what?" never the partitive, distinguishing one part from another: "which?" Job xxxviii. 6 cannot be appealed to. For the meaning of that place is not: On which foundations do the pillars of the earth rest?" But: do they rest at all on anything? b) Were the rendering: "where shall we smite?" correct, then the intermediate phrase, תּוֹסִיפוּ סָרָה, were out of place. For then one would right off look for the answer: "nowhere, for all is beaten to pieces." The insertion of those words in this form plainly indicate that they themselves contain the answer to the inquiry, עַל־מֶה וגו׳, and that what follows is only to be viewed as the nearer explanation of this reply. It would be very different if the words were in apposition with the subject of תֻכּוּ. c) It is remarked by LUZZATTO (see in DELITZSCH) that the fact that the body was beaten all over would not hinder its being smitten more. d) The phrase, ver. 6 b, לֹא זֹרוּ etc., "they have not been closed," shows that not the being wounded itself was the matter of chief moment, but the being wounded without application of curatives. The latter, however, as little hinders the smiting as the binding up and healing would provoke it. If עַל־מֶה = "where?" then the whole phrase, ver. 6 b, would be superfluous.—A second exposition (DELITZSCH) takes עַל־מֶה = לָמָּה, and תֻכּוּ = ye want to be smitten. Then the remote thought would be: "That were an insane delight in self-destruction." But the "that were" must not be adopted as the underlying thought, but: "that is indeed delight in self-destruction." For: "that were" would involve the thought that this delight is not presupposed, consequently there can be no question about a wanting to be smitten. But if we supply "that is," etc., that would impute too much to the simple Imperfect. The idea of wanting it must then be more strongly indicated, say by חָפֵץ, or the like.—According to the third rendering, which seems to me the correct one. עַל־מֶה means "to what purpose?" Comp. Num. xxii. 32; Ps. x. 13; Jer. xvi. 10. The imperfect Passive is then simply a briefer expression for the Active: why should I, or should one smite you more? with which at least a suffix were needed. תּוֹסִיפוּ סָרָה need not then be taken as a dependent adverbial phrase; as if, "in that ye add revolt," which involves a certain grammatical harshness, that might be easily avoided by a participial construction. But תוֹ׳ סָרָה is principal phrase and reply to the inquiry: to what purpose shall one smite you more?

However, the following words give the reason for the saying. That is: Israel adds revolt to revolt, because it is thoroughly sick, and does not even use curatives for its sickness. We therefore construe the words כָּל־רֹאשׁ to בַּשָּׁמֶן not as describing a condition resulting from the previous smiting, much as this seems to answer the inquiry, עַל־מֶה וגו, but as a figurative expression for the moral habit of the nation. כָּל־לֵבָב, כָּל־רֹאשׁ, especially seem to favor this view. This does not mean "the whole head, the whole heart," but "every head, every heart." If it read כָּל־הָרֹאשׁ וגו׳, the meaning might easily enough be that head and heart were already so sore and sick that no spot remained for a blow. But every head, every heart only expresses that no head, no heart remained intact.

The context closely considered forbids our understanding by head and heart "all that exercise indispensable functions in spiritual and temporal offices" (DRECHSLER). For by ver. 6 it plainly appears that not only the heads, but all individuals of the nation, are described as seriously sick. Head and heart are rather the central and dominant organs in the life of every single person, whereas ver. 6 speaks also of the structure of the outward manifestation of the life. From a comparison of לבב דוי with ver. 6, it seems to me that by חֳלִי not an outward wounding of the head is meant, but an internal disorder (comp. 2 Kings iv. 19).—From the sole of the foot, etc. Ver. 6. As has been remarked, these words describe the moral condition as to its outward manifestation, as ver. 5 b described its inward form. We must not press too far the figurative language of the prophet in regard to this inward and outward disorder, and especially the wounds of ver. 6 must not be regarded as presenting something additional.

The three substantives פֶּצַע, חַבּוּרָה and מַכָּה ט׳ are followed by three corresponding verbs, and one is tempted to construe them as if those occupying the same relative position belonged to each other. But such strict parallelism cannot be carried out. It is rather to be said that each of the three sorts of wounds referred to requires all the three means of healing. Each wound must be pressed together, and treated with healing stuffs. The former process is two-fold: first it is done by the hand in order to cleanse the wound from blood and matter, and then by the bandage, that prevents further bleeding and promotes the growing together of the several parts. Thirdly, mollifying, healing oil (see Luke x. 34; HERZOG'S R. Encyc. X., p. 548) must be superadded as organic means of cure.

The words of ver. 6 b moreover contain another proof for the assertion that from כָּל־רֹאשׁ, "every head," on, only the moral habit of the nation is described. For is not the want of all bodily therapeutics a figure for the want of the spiritual; i. e. repentance? Not only is Israel inwardly sick, but also in its outward life it presents the picture of a torn and distracted existence without one trace of discipline or effort at improvement. If the chief thought of vers. 5, 6, were that Israel cannot be smitten any more because it is beaten all to pieces, then, as already remarked, the phrase לא־זרו וגו׳, "not closed up," would be quite without meaning. For may a bandaged-up person be sooner smitten than one not bound up? But this phrase becomes very significant if we regard the words: "every head," etc., as portraying the moral condition of things. For it is most important in regard to a man's moral state whether the proper curatives for the moral disorder are used or not.

Your land, etc. The outward state of the nation answers to the moral state. The nation had already begun to reap the fruits of their revolt. The country is desolate; only the metropolis still remains intact, yet isolated in the midst of a land that has been made a desert. Therefore it may be said that the train of thought that began with ver. 5 ends with ver. 8. The Lord declares, ver. 5, that for the present He will smite Israel no more. For there is no use. This is because Israel is still sick inside and out, spite of having suffered chastisement almost to annihilation. It seems to me therefore that vers. 7 and 8 stand in contrastive relation to the two preceding, although this contrast is indicated by no particle. Israel is morally sick, the country is turned into a desert. Had things taken a normal course, then the country had been desolated, but Israel would have been in health. Then Israel had received instruction, Prov. viii. 10; xix. 20. But now that the country is waste, and Israel still sick, one sees that whipping is of no use. Comp. Jer. ii. 30; v. 3; Isa. ix. 13; xlii. 25. Thus I construe vers. 7 and 8, not as a mere change from figurative language (vers. 5 and 6) to literal, because, as was shown, both ver. 5 b and 6 b contain thoughts that do not answer to purely outward circumstances. Moreover, according to our explanation, it is clear that ver. 7 sqq. does not speak of future, but of present affairs. These verses do not contain threats of judgment, but a portrait of judgment already accomplished. If it were otherwise, then surely the threatenings of judgment would not stop outside of the gates of the metropolis, which yet was crater and fountain of all the revolt. This is not opposed by Jer. iv. 27; v. 10, 18: "Yet will I not make a full end," which some adduce against our view. For threats of judgment only for the country, but that spare the capital, are not to be found in any prophet.—The words: "your land waste," etc., are quoted from Lev. xxvi. 33, where it is said: "Your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste."

Your ground before, etc. Here, too, imprecations from the Law are in the mind of the prophet, and particularly Deut. xxviii. 33: "The fruit of thy land, and all thy labors, shall a nation which thou knowest not, eat up." Comp., too, ver. 51; Lev. xxi. 16, 32. From Deut. xxviii. 33, 51, it is seen what is meant by זָר. It is one that Israel does not know, and whose language is not understood. That the word "stranger" includes also the idea of "enemy," is manifest from the parallel passages in Lev. xxvi. 16, 32, where for זָרִים we have אֹיְבִים. זָר occurs Isa. xvii. 10; xxv. 2, 5; xxviii. 21; xxix. 5; xliii. 12; lxi. 5. The participle אֹכְלִים confirms our view that the prophet speaks of present and still continuing circumstances. The metonymy (the enemies eat the land) is as in xxxvi. 16; Gen. iii. 17, etc.—לְנֶגְדְּכֶם, according to the accents and the sense, relates to what follows. Before your eyes, without your being able to hinder them, the enemies devour your land.

In our passage it is evident the prophet would compare the destruction of the land of which he speaks to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. He calls the Jewish country a second destroyed Sodom, only with the difference that that was a destruction of God, this of strangers. The question whether we have here a genitive of the subject or of the object thus settles itself. It is the genitive of the subject. For then God was the destroyer; here it is the strangers. If זָרִים, "strangers," be taken as object, it will not suit the context. For immediately before the strangers were named as destroyers. How shall they suddenly be named the destroyed?—From the connection it appears that the "daughter of Zion" means Jerusalem. Zion is originally the mountain, then the castle, then the quarter built about it (2 Sam. v. 6-9; 1 Kings viii. 1); then in an extended sense the city without the inhabitants (Lam. ii. 8) or the inhabitants without the city (Mic. iv. 10), or as both together, as in our passage.

Jerusalem with its inhabitants lying isolated in the midst of a desolated country is now compared to: a) a booth in a vineyard; b) to a hanging mat [hammock] in a cucumber-field, which like the booth of the vineyard-keeper, is a lonely and scanty dwelling-place for men; c) to a besieged city. But why is Jerusalem only compared to a beleagured city? After all that vers. 7, 8 say of it, is it not such itself? First of all we must investigate the meaning of נְצוּרָה. The verb נָצַר means primarily observare, which can be said of commandments, Ps. lxxviii. 7, and of covenants, Deut. xxxiii. 9, as well as of the overseeing of a protector or keeper, Isa. xxvii. 3; 2 Kings xvii. 9, and of the attention of a besieger, Jer. iv. 16; comp. 2 Sam. xi. 16; Jer. v. 6. An עִיר נְצוּרָה is therefore either a watched or a beleaguered city. But the first does not suit the connection. The latter is equally unsuitable if Jerusalem at the time of writing was actually besieged. But ver. 7 speaks only of the desolating of the country. That Jerusalem itself was besieged or blockaded is not said directly. At the moment of saying this, therefore, the position of Jerusalem seems to have been that the enemy enclosed the city, not yet in its immediate neighborhood, but still so as to restrict all intercourse with it, so that it lay there isolated like a blockaded town No one ventured out or in, for the enemy was near, though his forces were not seen encamped around the walls of the city. The other renderings: "as a rescued city" (GESENIUS, in loc.; MAURER, etc.), "as a devastated city" (RABBINS, VULG., LUTHER), "as a watch-tower" (HITZIG, TINGSTAD, GESENIUS in his Thesaurus, p. 908), etc., which are to be found in ROSENMUELLER, either conflict with the requirements of the language or the context.

4. Had not—we were like, ver. 9. We must regard it, not as accidental, but as an evidence of the artistic design of this address, that in vers. 2, 3, Jehovah Himself speaks, in vers. 4–8 the prophet in the name of Jehovah, and in ver. 9 the prophet in his own and the people's name. It is therefore a climax descendens. The first word belongs to Jehovah the Lord. After that Jehovah's prophet speaks in His name to the people. Last of all the prophet, who is in a sense the mediator of the people, speaks in their name to Jehovah. In this scheme is prefigured in a certain degree the direction of all prophetic discourse. For it is either Jehovah speaking, directly or indirectly, or it is a speaking to Jehovah. But ver. 9 is joined by a double band to what precedes: by הוֹתִיר, "had left," and by the comparison to Sodom and Gomorrah. As to the former, it is recognized that something remains in Israel, ונותרה, ver. 8, and that this remnant is owing to the grace of Jehovah. But so the clear consciousness is expressed, that but for the grace of God, the resemblance to Sodom and Gomorrah, which in ver. 7 was only slightly intimated, would have been a notorious one. This is, on the one hand, an humble confession, for this comparison is not honorable for Israel; but on the other hand there is the opposite thought that underlies the hypothetic reflection: "he has, however, left something remaining; therefore we are still not like Sodom and Gomorrah;" and that forms a comforting germ of hope for the future.

The expression יהוה צבאות, Jehovah Sabaoth, is not to be found in the Pentateuch, nor in Josh., Jud., Ezek., Joel, Obad., Jonah. In Exod. xii. 41 כָּל־צִבְאוֹת י׳ is said of the Israelites. If one may regard the completest form as the original one, then we must designate Hosea as the originator of the expression. For in Hos. xii. 6 we find וַיהוה אֱלֹהֵי הַצְּבָאוֹת יְהוָה זִכְרוֹ; similarly Amos iii. 13; vi. 14; ix. 5. Here it is seen that צְבָאוֹת is still construed as appellative. They are not the צִבְאוֹת י׳, Ex. xii. 41, but כָּל־צְבָא הַשָּׁמַיִם, Isa. xxxiv. 4, whose relation to the stars may be debated. Comp. Delitzsch, The Divine Name Jahve Zebaot, in der Zeitschrift f. d. ges. luth. Theologie u. Kirche 1874, Heft 2, p. 217.—But "Hosts" becomes gradually a proper name. It is so beyond doubt in God of Hosts, Ps. lix. 6; lxxx. 5, 8, 15, 20; lxxxiv. 9, and Lord of Hosts, Isa. x. 16. Probably it is to be so rendered in "Jehovah of Hosts," which is very frequent in the first and second parts of Isaiah. Also Jer., Zech., Mal., use it very often.—כִּמְעַט is not added to the verb here adverbially with the meaning "almost," but united to it substantively, and as in 2 Chron. xii. 7, is object (as apposition with the object). In Prov. x. 20; Ps. cv. 12, it is similarly a predicate. In respect to its sense, it is a dimished מְעַט, i. e. not paulum, but quasi paulum. I do not think with Delitzsch that referring to Ps. lxxxi. 14 sq.; Job xxxii. 22, it may be construed with what follows. For with the supposition that is expressed in the first clause of the verse, they had been, not almost, but altogether a Sodom and Gomorrah. Moreover, it is affecting to observe how the man penetrates through the prophet. He began as the mouth of God, that does not distinguish himself from God; he proceeds as servant of God, that clearly distinguishes himself from God; he concludes as citizen of Jerusalem, that comprehends himself with the men against whom he directs his words of threatening.

[Ver. 7. כמהפכת ז׳, like the overthrow of strangers, J. A. Alexander, "i. e. as foreign foes are wont to waste a country in which they have no interest, and for which they have no pity." Barnes, similarly.

Ver. 9. "The idea of a desolation almost total is expressed in other words, and with an intimation that the narrow escape was owing to God's favor for the remnant according to the election of grace, who still existed in the Jewish Church. That the verse has reference to quality, as well as quantity, is evident from Rom. ix. 29, where Paul makes use of it, not as an illustration, but as an argument to show that mere connection with the Church could not save men from the wrath of God. The citation would have been irrelevant if this phrase denoted merely a small number of survivors, and not a minority of true believers in the midst of the prevailing unbelief." J. A. Alexander].

3. THE MEANS FOR OBTAINING A BETTER FUTURE.

CHAPTER I. 10–20.

10 Hear the word of the LORD, ye rulers of Sodom;
Give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorrah.
11 To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the LORD:
I am full of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts;
And I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of [1]he goats.
12 When ye come [2]to appear before me,
Who hath [a]required this at your hand, [b]to tread my courts?
13 Bring no more [c]vain oblations;
Incense is an abomination unto me;
The new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with;[d]
It is [3]iniquity, even the solemn meeting.
14 Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth:
They are a trouble unto me;
I am weary to bear them.[e]
15 And when ye spread forth your hands,
I will hide[f] mine eyes from you:
Yea, when ye [4]make many prayers, I will not hear:
Your hands are full of [5]blood.
16 Wash you, make you clean;
Put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes:
17 Cease to do evil; learn to do well;
Seek judgment, [6]relieve the oppressed,
Judge the fatherless, plead for the widow.
18 Come now, and let us reason together, saith the LORD:
Though your sins be as scarlet,[g] they shall be as white as snow;
Though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.
19 If ye be willing and obedient,
Ye shall eat the good of the land:
20 But if ye refuse and rebel,
Ye shall be devoured with the sword:
For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10. קָצִין is found in Isa. also; iii. 6, 7; xxii. 3.

Ver. 12. In regard to the construction כִּי תָבֹאוּ לֵרָאוֹת פָּנַי it is to be noticed especially that we have here an old, solemn form of expression. It is found first, Ex. xxiii. 17, where it is said: יֵרָאֶה כָּל־זְכוּרְךָ אֶל־פְּנֵי הָאָדֹן —"All thy males shall appear before the Lord;" also Ps. lxxxiv. 8. This is the customary, and besides very frequent construction of the Niphal נִרְאָה, Gen. xii. 7; xxxv. 1; Ex. iii. 16, etc. But then the form נִרְאָה אֶת־פְּנֵי ה׳ is found in five places: Ex. xxxiv. 23 sq.; Deut. xvi. 16; xxxi. 11; 1 Sam. i. 22. Here the question arises, whether אֶת is nota accusativi, or preposition with the meaning "cum, coram;" or finally, whether the accusative, as in חֶרֶב תְּאֻכְּלוּ: "Ye shall be devoured by the sword," ver. 20, is to be taken in an instrumental sense, as if it ought to be rendered: "was seen of God's face" (so EWALD, Gram. § 279, c). This last rendering commends itself the least. For in חרב תאכלו, the חרב is conceived of as adverbial. It is as one would say in Latin: gladiatim devorabimini, "Ye shall be sword-fashion devoured." It is essential to this construction that the substantive so used be without suffix, or a genitive following. In לִרְאוֹת פָּנָי or נֵרָאָה אֶת־פְּנֵי י׳, however, this adverbial use is not admissible. It is to be objected against the first rendering that אֵת always marks distinctly the definite object, and never is used after the question "where?" On the other hand it is admitted that אֶת־פְּנֵי means coram facie, e. g. Gen. xxvii. 30: יָצֹא יָצָא יַעֲקֹב מֵאֵת פְּנֵי יִצְחָק. Comp. 2 Kings xvi. 14: Gen. xix. 13. "The cry of them is waxen great, אֶת־פְּנֵי י׳ before the face of the Lord." Comp. 1 Sam. xxii. 4; Gen. xxxiii. 18. According to that we must translate the expression in question: "appear before the presence of Jehovah." It may be remarked, in passing, that Deut. xvi. 16, לֹא יֵרָאֶה אֶת־פְּנֵי י׳ רֵיקָם, is to be translated; "the face of the Jehovah is not seen empty," i. e. without the presentation of a gift: where the passive, according to well-known usus loquendi, is construed as active. This latter form of expression is, as to sense, like those found Ex. xxiii. 15; xxxiv. 20, —Lastly, in two places, viz. Ps. xlii. 3 and in our text נֵרָאָה with פְּנֵי י׳ is found without אֶת. In both places בּוֹא stands before the Niphal of רָאָה. Here, without doubt, פְּנֵי י׳ is the accusativus localis. In itself, this accusative can depend on בּוֹא as well as on the Niphal נֵרָאָה. However, the original sense of the formula favors decidedly the last supposition. Thus the expression, as found in our text and in xlii. 3, is to be taken as a modification of the older formula, and as having the same meaning. פְּנֵי therefore is here accusativus localis in the same sense as אֶת־פְּנֵי י׳ in the places cited above.—בִּקֵּשׁ מִיַּד, Gen. xxxi. 39; xliii. 9; 1 Sam. xx. 16.—(רְמֹס ח is in restrictive apposition with זֹאת. Isaiah uses רָמַס pretty often: xvi. 4; xxvi. 6; xxviii. 3; xli. 25; lxiii. 3. Moreover, the substantive מִרְמָס is used by him relatively oftener: v. 5; vii. 25; x. 6; xxviii. 18.

Ver. 13. It is debated whether the following קְטֹרֶת, incense, is to be taken as stat. absol. as distinct from מִנְחָה, or as stat. construct., and as designating that which the מִנְחַת־שָׁוְא is to Jehovah ("it is abominable incense to me"). Grammatically both renderings are admissible. It is not decisive for the latter rendering that the Masorets have pointed קְטֹרֶת with the conjunctive Darga. It seems to me important to our inquiry, that with the exception of Ps. lxvi. 15 (which confessedly dates after the exile), neither burnt-offerings nor meat-offerings are ever called קְטֹרֶת, although הִקְטִיר is the solemn word employed for the consumption of both. Rather it is always said, that the sacrifice shall be רֵיחַ נִיחֹחַ, "a sweet savor" to the Lord. I believe, therefore, that the prophet must have written רֵיחַ תּוֹעֵבָה had he wished to express what the defenders of the second rendering take the words to mean.—The combination of חֹדֶשׁ and שַׁבָּת, beside the text, is to be found also 2 Kings iv. 23; Hos. ii. 13.—The expression קְרֹא מִקְרָא is only found here. Everywhere else we read: מִקְרָא קֹדֶשׁ, "a holy convocation," Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 3 sqq.; Num. xxviii. 18 sq.; xxix. 1 sqq. As regards the meaning of the phrase, it is not indictio sancti, i. e. the publication of a feast, but convocatio, the assembling of the nation to the feast. For only on the principal feast-days was the nation obliged to appear in the sanctuary, (comp. the citations immediately above, and Oehler in Herzog's R. Encycl. IV., p. 385). The three substantives stand before as casus absoluti, and represent a premise, to which לֹא אוּכַל וגו׳ forms the conclusion: as for new moon, Sabbath, solemn assembly, I can't bear them, etc. The word עֲצָרָה is found beside only in 2 Kings x. 20 and Joel i. 14. In the Pentateuch only the form עֲצֶרֶת (stat. absol. and constr.) is used: Lev. xxiii. 36; Num. xxix. 35; Deut. xvi. 8. It is absolutely parallel with מִקְרָא קֹדֶשׁ "holy convocation;" comp. 2 Chron. vii. 5; Neh. viii. 18; Amos v. 21. The fundamental idea of עָצַר is cogere, conciere, continere, to draw together, to keep together. The noun, therefore, denotes coactio, concio. The fundamental idea of אָוֶן (אוּן, spirare) is halitus, breath. It is thus synonym with הֶבֶל.

Ver. 14. Of the verb שָׂנֵא only the Kal (comp. Ps. xi 5) partcps. occur in our book after this: ix. 15; lxi. 8; lxvi. 5. טֹרַח, burden (from טָרַח, fatigari, Job xxxvii. 11) is found also Deut. i. 12. Niphal נִלְאָה again in Isa xvi. 12; xlvii. 13. The infinitive נְשֹׂא is only found in Isa. again xviii. 3; comp. beside Gen. iv. 13; Ps. lxxxix. 10.

Ver. 15. The spreading out of the hands for prayer (comp. Hohlemann, Bibelstudien I., The Scriptural Form of Worship, p. 137, Æneid. I. 93, duplices tendens ad sidera palmas) is designated here by פֵּרַשׂ in the Piel, and so occurs also Jer. iv. 31; Lam. i. 17; Ps. cxliii. 6. Usually Kal is used: Ex. ix. 29, 33; 1 Kings viii. 22, etc.—Only the Hithpael of עָלַם occurs beside in our book, lviii. 7.—The meaning of אֵינֶנִּי שֹׁ׳ is "not continually hearing," in distinction from לֹא אֶשְׁמַע, Jer. vii. 16; xi. 14; xiv. 12.—Comp. this passage, vers. 11-15, with the similar one, Amos v. 21 sqq.

Ver. 16. On account of the accent, הִזַּכּוּ can only be Hithpael from זָכָה, not Niphal of זָכַךְ; comp. Gesen., Thesaur., p. 413. The word is not used again by Isaiah; and this Hithpael occurs nowhere else.—The expression רֹעַ מַעַלְלֵיכֶם (which occurs first Deut. xxviii. 20, and afterward especially frequent in Jer. iv. 4; xxi. 12; xxiii. 2; xxvi. 3; xliv. 22), calls to mind the Latin usus loquendi, that makes a conception prominent by designating it by means of the abstract idea hovering, so to speak, over the single, concrete manifestation of it: agricolæ non dolent, præterita verni temporis s u a v i t a t e æstatem auctumnumque venisse (comp. Naegelsbach, Stilistik, § 74).

Ver. 17. לִמְדוּ הֵיטֵב (inf. nominascens like הָרֵעַ, ver. 16, because standing in the accusative).—As nouns of the form קָטוֹל, all have an active meaning (comp. בָּחוֹן—בָּחַן, גָּדוֹל, אָדוֹם, גָּבֹהַּ, etc.) so חָמוֹץ, which occurs only here, must have the same sense as חוֹמֵץ, Ps. lxxi. 4, i. e.—violentus, violent (comp. חָמָס). The Piel אִשֵּׁר means then, just as iii. 12; ix. 15; Prov. xxiii. 19, "make direct, make go right, conduct aright." The verbs שָׁפַט and רִיב, as so often elsewhere (ver. 23; Ps. x. 18; lxxxii. 3; Jer. v. 28, etc.), signify not merely a formal judging, but also rendering material justice, that is, so rendering judgment that what is just shall actually be done. רִיב, moreover, here stands for the more usual דִּין. For רִיב is not properly "judge," but "strive," and first attains the meaning of "helping one to justice" in the connection רִיב רִיב פ׳ "to manage some one's quarrel." It is therefore with a derivative sense that רִיב is used when it means "judging," which it does, sometimes in malam partem, as Deut. xxxiii. 3; Job x. 2, again in bonam partem, as here and li. 22; and in either sense it is joined to the accusative.

Ver. 18. The Niphal נוֹכַח that occurs here, is found elsewhere only in the participle; Gen. xx. 16; 2 Sam. xv. 3; Prov. xxiv. 26; Job xxiii. 7. The meaning is "disceptare, διαλέγεσθαι," argue. The word is evidently used in a friendly sense. Regarding the Hiphil in הִלְבִּין (comp. Ps. li. 9 (6), the word does not again occur in Isa.) and הֶאְדִּים (ἅπαξ λεγ.) and their direct causative meaning (producing whiteness, redness, i. e., becoming white, red).

Ver. 19. The fundamental meaning of אָבָה, (which it is worthy of note always has לֹא before it except here and Job xxxix. 9, where it stands in a negative question), is "ready, to be willing." (Ps. lxxxi. 12; 1 Ki. xx. 8). Accordingly the construction with vav and perfectum consecutivum is explained; when ye are willing, so that ye hearken (comp. the otherwise usual construction with just the infinitive or לְ; chap. xxviii. 12; xxx. 9; Ezek. iii. 7; xx. 8; Lev. xxvi. 21). The construction מָאֵן ver. 20 is evidently copied from this.—The expression טוּב הָאָרֶץ, good of the land, is first found Gen. xlv. 18, 20, where it stands parallel with חֵלֶב־הָאָרֶץ fat of the land, (comp. Deut. vi. 11; 2 Kings viii. 9; Ezr. ix. 12).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This section refers to the future, as vers. 2–9 did to the past and present. For the theme is how to escape out of the misery of the present and attain a better future. The people had hitherto employed false means; outward ceremonies that were an abomination to the Lord, (vers. 10–15). Instead of these the people must bring the genuine fruits of repentance, (vers. 16, 17). Then conference may be held with the people; then will God's grace be greater than all guilt, (v. 18). This is the right road. If the people will go that road they shall find salvation; if they will not, they shall find destruction, (vers. 19, 20). It is seen that a simple and clear order of thought occurs in this section. Vers. 18–20 must not be severed and joined to what follows. For they contain exactly the indispensable conclusion, viz.: the promise of grace in case of obedience, on the other hand denunciation of wrath in case of disobedience.

2. Hear—Gomorrah, ver. 10.—As regards the verbs, "hear,—hearken," this beginning is like that of the preceding section, ver. 2. But the subjects are different: there heaven and earth, here the Sodom-judges and the Gomorrah-nation. The dividing into judges and nation is occasioned partly by the double idea Sodom and Gomorrah, by which this section is connected with the foregoing one, partly by the contents of the positive demand, ver. 17. For, as regards its general contents, this is directed against the entire nation, but especially also against the princes and judges of the nation. Expositors correctly call attention to the fact that after ver. 9, the prophet supposes a reply on the part of the people to this effect; how have they deserved so hard a fate, seeing they had been so zealously diligent, to observe all the ceremonies of the worship of Jehovah. To this it is replied, that they are not unjustly become like Sodom and Gomorrah because for a long time they were inwardly like them. What Sodom-judges and a Gomorrah-nation may be, can be learned from Ezek. xvi. 48 sqq. "As I live, saith the LORD God, Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters. Behold this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was in her, and in her daughters, neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy. And they were haughty, and committed abomination before me; therefore I took them away as I saw good." Comp. Gen. xiii. 13; xviii. 20. Therefore, rude, violent selfishness, joined with sensual abomination was the sin of Sodom, and is the sin of Judah. Consequently, and in reference to our passage, the earthly Jerusalem is called in Rev. xi. 8 πνευματικῶς Σόδομα και Αἴγυπτος. The prophet does not understand by תוֹרַת אֱלֹהֵינוּ, "the law of our God," a simple parallel with דְּבַר י׳, "the word," etc., institutio, or תּוֹכֵחָה (chastisement) in general, but the Mosaic "Law, especially, corresponding to the context, which treats of the difference between a true and a false observance of the law. Thus the second member marks an advance in reference to the first, and תּוֹרָה is to be construed synedochically. "Docebo vos," &c., says VITRINGA, "I will teach you what is the sum of the law of Moses; not this, assuredly, which ye hypocritically exhibit, but to worship God with a pure heart, and manifest zeal for justice, equity, honor and every virtue."

3. To what purpose—full of blood, v. 11–15.—VITRINGA calls attention to a gradation in these verses. Bloody sacrifices, attendance at the temple, unbloody sacrifices, feasts, prayers, make the series of religious formalities which approach step by step to a truly spiritual worship. And yet they may all of them not satisfy the Lord as Israel observed them: for the nation, notwithstanding, does not rise above the level of mere outward ceremonial service. The זְבָחִים are a comprehensive expression for bloody sacrifices, as is often the case in writers of later date than the Pentateuch, see 1 Sam. ii. 29; iii. 14. Isa. xix. 21; HERZOG R. Encycl. X. p. 621, 637. This appears from the prominence of the word in ver. 11, and from its being made parallel with מִנְחָה ver. 13. That the discourse of Jehovah must not be regarded as the first and only one of the sort spoken in this matter, but as a member of a continuous chain of words of the same purport, is indicated by the Imperfect.

Without exactly intending completeness, or an especially significant order of the classes of beasts and sacrifices, the prophet still enumerates the chief sorts of those sacrifices that were taken from צֹאן and בָּקָר (flocks and herds). The עֹלוֹת as the principal sacrifice is named first: (it is קֹדֶשׁ קָדָשִׁים comp. ŒHLER in HERZOG's R. Encycl. X. p. 634). That only עֹלוֹת אֵילִים are named, is accidental. For burnt-offerings were not presented only of rams, see Lev. i. nor were offerings of rams especially holy. In all enumerations of the sacrificial beasts rams are in the second place, after bullocks. Exod. xxix.; Lev. viii.; Num. vii. 15 sqq.; xxix. 2 sq., etc. In as much as, with the exception of the whole burnt-offering, only the fat and the blood were offered, (comp. ŒHLER HERZOG's R. Encycl. X. p. 632), Lev. iii. 16 sq.; vii. 23 sqq.; Ezek. xliv. 15, it is natural that these should have especial prominence in this place. By מְרִיאִים we are not to understand a particular species of beast, as many have thought. The word is only found elsewhere in 2 Sam. vi. 13; 1 Kings i. 9, 19, 25; Isa. xi. 6; Ezek. xxxix. 18; Amos v. 22. The meaning is not made out with certainty. But in this place it seems to mean fed beasts in general. If the fat were all that was offered of the solid matter of the beast, then must a beast be the better suited for an offering according as it had more fat. Thence the being fat is named as a desirable quality in the sacrificial animal, Ps. xx.; Gen. iv. 4. A further proof that the prophet does not intend an exact classification is seen in the fact that he speaks only of the blood of bullocks, of sheep, (כֶּבֶשׂ the male sheep Lev. xiv. 10) and of he-goats (עַתּוּד the younger, שָׂעִיר the older he-goat), although neither the blood of only these beasts, nor yet of these beasts was only the blood offered.

Ver. 12. When ye come to appear, etc.—A grade higher than the rude bloody sacrifice, this personal appearance at the place of worship stands on the platform of spirituality. It also is an homage that is paid to the divinity. But it does not suffice. Hence it may be said of the mere bodily presence, that the Lord has not demanded that.

Who hath required.—Jehovah does not require the mere bodily presence, so far as this is nothing but an useless wearing out of the courts by the feet of those that stand in them.

The unbloody sacrifices and the solemn assembles represent again a different and still higher grade of worship. No more lying meat-offerings shall they bring, (Comp. v. 18; xxx. 28) i. e., such, in which the disposition of the one sacrificing does not correspond to the outward rite. I do not believe that the text has to do only with the performances of the λαός, "laity," as DELITZSCH supposes. For the prophet rejects the entire outward ceremonial service, which, in fact, the priests solemnized only in place of the nation which ideally was itself a priestly nation, Exod. xix. 6. Moreover, there would be an omission in the enumeration of the parts of worship if that very important and most holy incense offering were left out (Exod. xxx., especially ver. 36). The Lord says, therefore, that incense, otherwise so like the fragrant blossom of the sacrificial worship, was itself an abomination, when offered in the false way as hitherto.

The new moon and Sabbath.—The observance of the holy days and seasons appointed by the Lord Himself was an essential part of the obedience demanded from the nation, comp. Exod. xxiii. 10–17; Lev. xxiii.; Num. xxviii.; xxix.; Deut. xvi. Yet even such performance is of no account in God's sight, but, on the contrary, offensive and vexatious when it does not proceed from that disposition He would have. The new moons, "were so to speak the first born among the days of the month," and the fixing of the other feast days that occurred in the month depended on them ("From the moon is the sign of feasts," Ecclus. xliii. 7; comp. SAALSCHUETZ, Mos. R., p. 402 sqq.). Concerning their celebrations, see Num. x. 10; xxviii. 11–16; 1 Sam. xx. 5, 18 sq. By שַׁבָּת is to be understood the weekly Sabbath, as appears from the fact that, in what follows, the feasts and therefore the feast Sabbaths are especially mentioned; see HERZOG's R. Encycl. IV. p. 385. אוּכַל is used here in the pregnant sense of "surmounting, enduring, being able to hold out," like we too could say; "nicht vermag ich Frevel und Festversammlung." "I can't (stand) outrage and solemn assembly," i. e., the combination of the two, both at once surpasses my ability. In a similar sense יָכֹל is used Hos. viii. 5; Ps. ci. 5 sq.; xiii. 5; Prov. xxx. 21. God cannot put up with this combination of concentration and decentralization, of centripetal and centrifugal forces. He opposes to them a non possumus. In the following verse the prophet repeats the same thought with still stronger expressions. For he names again the new moons. But what in ver. 13 he designates by the words, "Sabbath, calling assembly and solemn meeting," he comprehends here in the one conception מוֹעֵד (מוֹעֲדִים "the most general word for the holy seasons that occurred by established order." ŒHLER in HERZOG's R. Encycl. IV. p. 383, comp. Lev. xxiii. 2). What he says to them ver. 13, in one word לֹא־אוּכַל, "I can't bear," he now expresses by three verbs. He explains his non possumus in that he says he hates those ceremonies, that they are a burden to him and a subject of loathing.

But prayer, too, although it is the fragrant blossom of the soul's life (comp. Rev. v. 8; viii. 3 sq.), and therefore stands high above the previously named elements of worship in regard to immateriality and spirituality, is not acceptable to the Lord in the mouth of this people. For it also is only empty lip and hand service. Jehovah shuts His eyes at the caricature of prayer; comp. 1 Sam. xii. 8; Prov. xxviii. 27; and also much praying does not help the matter, for Jehovah does not go on hearing constantly.

Your hands are full of blood."—In this short phrase, which is added emphatically without connecting particle, the reason is given why Jehovah cannot endure all the ceremonial observances of the nation. They are offered by hands stained with blood. It is thus a revolting lie, xxix. 13.

4. Wash ye—plead for the widow, vers. 16-17.—Heart cleansing, turning away from evil, proper fruits of repentance,—such is the divine service that the Lord requires. There are nine demands made on the people; four negative, ver. 16, and five positive, ver. 17. The first two of the four negative expressions are figurative. רָחַץ is indeed often used of bodily washing (and in a medial sense as here: Ex. ii. 5; Lev. xiv. 8; xv. 5 sqq. etc.). זָכָה is used only of moral purity, but, according to its fundamental idea, must be regarded as a figurative expression. In what follows the prophet says the same thing without figure of speech: they must let the Lord see no more wicked works, i. e., they must cease to sin.

The five positive demands proceed from the general to the particular. For in advance stands the quite general "learn to do well." Then follows the exhortation to "seek judgment," (the phrase is found again only xvi. 5). The Old Test. צְדָקָה, "righteousness," consists essentially in conformity to מִשְׁפָּט, "judgment." Whoever, under all circumstances, does what is right, even when he has the power to leave it undone, is a צַדִּיק, "righteous one." When the powerful, then, spite of his power, suffers the poor, the wretched, the widow and the orphan to enjoy their rights, then this justice appears subjectively as gentleness and goodness, objectively as salvation. Hence צַדִּיק has so often the secondary meaning of "kindness, mercy" (comp. Ps. xxxvii. 21; Prov. xii. 10; xxi. 26) and צֶדֶק or צדקה that of "salvation" (Ps. xxiv. 5; cxxxii. 9, 16; Isa. xli. 10; xlv. 8, etc.). The Old Test. צדקה contrasts, therefore, on the one hand with grace, that gives more than can justly be demanded, on the other hand, with oppressive unrighteousness, (comp. מְרַצֵּחַ, חָמוֹץ, עָרִיץ and others) that gives less. Comp. my comment. on Jer. vii. 5.—Whoever exercises strict justice will quite as much restrain the oppressor from doing injustice, as aid those seeking their rights to the enjoyment of them. The prophet expresses the former by the words אַשְּׁרוּ חָמוֹץ, "righten [marg. Eng. vers.] the oppressor."

5. Come now—hath spoken it, vers. 18-20. As in ver. 15 the phrase "your hands are filled with blood" is loosely strung on without connecting particle, so also the complex thought of vers. 18, 19, as to its sense, refers back to ver. 15 b. For the prophet evidently would say: your hands are indeed full of blood, but if ye truly become converted, all debts shall be forgiven, etc. Verse 18 therefore contains the necessary consequences of the premises laid down in what precedes. The discourse gains in brevity and vivacity by its members being strung together without conjunctions.—"Come, now," etc., comp. ii. 3, 5. The prophet would say: when ye shall have truly repented, then come, and then we shall easily come to an understanding. GESENIUS and others would have the sense to be, not that Jehovah is represented as forgiving, but that the taking away of the blood-red guilt consists in an extirpation of the sinner. They support this view by reminding that נִשְׁפַּט and דִּבֶּר מִשְׁפָּטִים אֶת always designate God as the punitive Judge; comp. lxvi. 16; Joel iv. (iii.) 2; Jer. xxv. 31; Ezek. xx. 35, etc. But it is precisely for this reason that Isaiah does not employ the usual expression for "litigate," but a word that does not elsewhere occur, in order to indicate that he has in mind a litigation altogether different from the usual sort. Besides, it contradicts not only the sense and the connection of our passage, but the spirit of the Holy Scriptures generally, for one to assume that pardon may not follow the fulfilling of the conditions proposed in ver. 16, or that this pardon may consist in the extirpation of the outrageous offenders and the "cleansing and clearing away" thus effected. No! just those, whose hands are full of blood, may, if they cleanse themselves, be pure and white; comp. xliii. 24 sq.; xliv. 22; Ps. xxxii. and li.—שָׁנִי and תּוֹלַעַת are one and the same color, viz., bright red, crimson. Here, evidently, it means the color of blood. In many places, as Exod. xxviii. 5, 6; xxxvi. 8, etc.; Jer. iv. 30, we find תּוֹלַעַת שָׁנִי or הַשָּׁנִי; Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 49, 51, 52; Num. xix. 6 שְׁנִי תוֹלַעַת, Lam. iv. 5 only תּוֹלָע. The last word means "worm," (comp. Exod. xvi. 20, and תּוֹלֵעָה Isa. xiv. 11; lxvi. 24; Job xxv. 6). What the תּוֹלַעַת שָׁנִי is we are well informed. It is the female cochineal (coccus ilicis, LINNE) which lays its eggs on the twigs of the holm oak, and, expiring upon them, covers them with its body. The egg nests so formed were pulverized and the color prepared therefrom. It is less certain why the color is named שָׁנִי. Comp. LEYRER, Art. crimson in HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XXI., p. 606. The plural שָׁנִים is found only here and Prov. xxxi. 21. It seems to me in both places to mean more probably "scarlet stuffs." That sin is here called red, has its reason in the evident reference to the bloody hands, ver. 15 b. But that the righteous estate is compared to white color, happens according to the natural and universal symbolism of colors; comp. Ps. xxxvii. 6; Mal. iii. 20 (iv. 2); 1 Jno. i. 5, 7; Rev. i. 14; iii. 4; xix. 14, etc.

If ye be willing, ver. 19. The exhortation vers. 16, 17 is followed ver. 18 by a similar promise, i. e., by one that similarly confines itself to the inward, spiritual domain. To this is now joined a twofold word of a) promise also of outward felicity, ver. 19; b) of threatening of bodily destruction, ver. 20. The conclusion "ye shall be devoured of the sword," ver. 20, corresponds to "ye shall eat the good of the land," not only as to sense, but also, as near as may be, as to sound. On the formula "for the mouth," etc., comp., at ver. 2.

[Ver. 13. "The last clause, meaning of course, I cannot bear them together, is a key to the preceding verses. It was not religious observance itself, but its combination with iniquity, that God abhorred." J. A. ALEXANDER.

Oblations, מִנְחַת. "This word properly denoted a gift of any kind, (Gen. xxxii. 13), then especially a present or offering to the Deity. Gen. iv. 3, 4, 5.—The proper translation would have been meal or flour-offering, rather than meat-offering, since the word meat with us now denotes animal food only. Lev. ii. 1; vi. 14; ix. 17." BARNES.

Ver. 16. Wash.—"It is used here in close connection with the previous verse, where the prophet says that their hands were filled with blood. He now admonishes them to wash away that blood, with the implied understanding, that, then their prayers would be heard." BARNES.

From before mine eyes. "As God is omniscient, to put them away from before His eyes is to put them away altogether." BARNES.

Ver. 18. "God has been addressing magistrates particularly, and commanding them to seek judgment, etc., all of which are terms taken from the law. He here continues the language, and addresses them as accustomed to the proceedings of courts, and proposes to submit the" (their) "case as if on trial." BARNES.

Scarlet.—"There is another idea here. This was a fast or fixed color. Neither dew, rain, nor washing, nor long usage would remove it. Hence it is used to represent the fixedness and permanency of sins in the heart. No human means will wash them out. No effort of man, no external rites, no tears, no sacrifice, no prayers are of themselves sufficient to take them away. An almighty power is needful to remove them." BARNES.

Like the wool.—Instead of the wool becoming like the crimson, the crimson shall become like the wool. Regarding the sequence of vers. 16, 17, and ver. 18; comp. Matt. v. 22–24.—TR.

Ver. 19. Ye shall eat.—"Instead of seeing them devoured by strangers, as in ver. 7." J. A. ALEXANDER].

4. COMPREHENSIVE SURVEY OF THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

CHAPTER I. 21–31.

21 How is the faithful city become an harlot!
It was full of judgment;
Righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers.
22 Thy silver is become dross,
Thy wine mixed with water:
23 Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves:
Every one loveth gifts, and [a]followeth after rewards:
They judge not the fatherless,
Neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them.
24 Therefore saith the LORD,
The LORD of hosts, the Mighty One of Israel,
Ah, I will [b]ease me of mine adversaries,
And avenge me of mine enemies:
25 And I will turn my hand upon thee,
And[1] [c]purely purge away thy dross,
And take away all thy [d]tin:
26 And I will restore thy judges as at the first,
And thy counsellors as at the beginning:
Afterward thou shalt be called,
The city of righteousness, the faithful city.
27 Zion shall be redeemed with judgment,
And [2]her converts with righteousness.

[1] Heb. according to pureness.
[2] Or, they that return of her.
[a] chases.
[b] refresh myself on, and avenge me on.
[c] will melt out thy dross with lye.
[d] lead.

28 [e]And the [3]destruction of the trangressors and of the sinners shall be together,
And they that forsake the LORD shall be consumed.
29 For they shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired,
And ye shall be confounded for the gardens that ye have chosen.
30 For ye shall be as an oak whose leaf fadeth,
And as a garden that hath no water.
31 And the strong shall be as tow,
[4]And [f]the maker of it as a spark,
And they shall both burn together,
And none shall quench them.

[3] Heb. breaking.
[e] But.
[4] Or, And his work.
[f] his work a spark.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 21. Concerning the distinction between צֶדֶק, צְדָקָה, and מִשְׁפָּט comp. DRECHSLER in loc. I will only remark that the grammatical form צֶדֶק requires as its primitive, fundamental meaning "the being righteous, integrity," therefore the idea of the verb צָדַק in its abstract generality (comp. אַבְנֵי צֶדֶק, מֹאזְנֵי צֶדֶק), whereas צְדָקָה, although also abstract, signifies integrity as the moral quality of a person, and as the prerequisite of right doing. Comp. also EWALD, § 143 a; 150 b.—מִשְׁפָּט on the other hand, involves the idea of right per se, and in every respect of its concrete realization. It is thus at once normal right, and also rightful claim, legal proceeding, verdict, and judgment. It is natural that in application the three conceptions should blend with one another.—לִין, related by root to לַיִל is properly pernoctare, then "to stay, to dwell" generally: comp. Ps. xxv. 13; Prov. xv. 31; Job xix. 4.—The verb רצח does not again occur in Isaiah; its participle Piel only 2 Kings vi. 32.—Regarding the construction of ver. 21, מְלֵאֲתִי מ׳ is not in a manner in apposition with נֶאֱמָנָה, as one might be tempted to think, out of liking for the easier grammatical connection, for the sense is decidedly against it.

Ver. 22. סִיגִים because of the derivation from סוּג more correct than סִגִים, comp. Ezek. xxii. 18 sq.; Ps. cxix. 119; Prov. xxv. 4; xxvi. 23; only in Isaiah again, ver. 25. סֹבֶא, only found again Hos. iv. 18, comp. Isa. lvi. 12, that with which one carouses, intoxicates himself, in French, ce qui soule. מָהוּל ἅπ. λεγ., is kindred to מוּל circumcised, cut, comp. jugulare Falernum, Martial ep. i. 18; castrare vinum, Plin. Hist. Nat.

Ver. 23. שָׂרַיִךְ and סוֹרְרִים (comp. xxx. 1; lxv. 2; Jer. vi. 28; Hos. ix. 15) is a play on words and indicates the relation of those men to God (1. Table), as the following (חַבְרֵי ג׳) does their relation to men (2. Table, comp. Prov. xxix. 24).—The singular כֻּלּוֹ embraces the שָׂרִים as unity, as rank. שַׁלְמֹנִים is ἅπ. λεγ. שֹׁחַד is in Isa. v. 23; xxxiii. 15; xlv. 13.

Ver. 24. On הוֹי comp. ver. 4. The Niphal נִחַם is used here in the sense "to breathe again refreshed," i. e., "refresh oneself," as lvii. 6; Jer. xxxi. 15; Ezek. xxxi. 16, etc. This meaning, however, changes to the kindred one of נָקַם to revenge, Niphal, to revenge oneself. For revenge is a refreshment. Therefore also is נִחַם joined here with מִן, which construction is the usual one for נִקַּם, ultionem capere, Judg. xvi. 28; 1 Sam. xiv. 24; Jer. xv. 15; xlvi. 10, etc.

Ver. 25. Whereas הֵשִׁיב יָד means either "to draw back the hand," Gen. xxxviii. 29; Josh. viii. 26; 1 Sam. xiv. 27; 1 Kings xiii. 4; Isa. xiv. 27; or "to return the hand to a place," Exod. iv. 7, or "to bring the hand repeatedly somewhere" Jer. vi. 9, הֵשִׁיב יָד עַל in most places of its occurrence (Ezek. xxxviii. 12: Amos i. 8; Zech. xiii. 7; Ps. lxxxi. 15; comp. 2 Sam. viii. 3) — to turn one's hand in a figurative sense, i. e., to turn in an hostile way against any one. בְּדִיל stannum or plumbum nigrum, only used this once in Isa. בֹּרִית — בֹּר vegetable alkali, only here in Isa., comp. Job ix. 30. As the alkali does not effect the smelting process, but only promotes it, כַּבֹּר must not be construed as nominative, but as an accusative that supplies the preposition that is wanting after כְּ (alkali fashion, comp. on חֶרֶב vers. 20 and 12), comp. GESENIUS, § 118, 3 Anm; the plural בְּדִילִים, lead pieces, is the only form of the word, which occurs only here; comp. Ezek. xxii. 18, 20; xxvii. 12.—Kindred passages, whose authors may have had our text in mind, are Jer. vi. 29 sq.; Zech. xiii. 7 sqq.

Ver. 26. The beginning with וְאָשִׁיבָה has almost the appearance of a rhyme in relation to the same word, ver. 25. Evidently the prophet intends to emphasize the difference of sense by the similar sound of the words. The construction is an adverbial prolepsis. For whereas otherwise, in prolepsis that, which is the effect of the transaction, is adjoined to the object in the form of adjective, the adjoining occurs here in adverbial form; (comp. Jer. xxxiii. 7, 11; and 1 Kings xiii. 6).

Ver. 28. As regards the sense, it does not matter whether we take שֶׁבֶר (properly fractura xv. 5; xxx. 26) as predicate, as HITZIG does, or, like most others, as the object of an exclamatory phrase. As in this chapter several such nominatives occur absolutely, and representing a phrase (vers. 7, 13), the latter may be more correct.

Ver. 29. The singular of אֵלִים occurs only once Gen. xiv. 6 in the proper name אֵיל פָּארָן. As singular אֵלָה (ver. 30) is always used elsewhere. The meaning "Terebinth," which, parallel with meanings "strength," and "ram" (comp. the Latin robur), develops out of the fundamental meaning torquere, is now admitted by all expositors, whereas many of the older ones, following the LXX, and VULGATE, took the word in the sense of "Idols." Isa. mentions the אֵלִים as objects of idolatrous worship, also lvii, 5, whereas, lxi. 3, he opposes to these idolatrous ones the אֵילֵי צֶדֶק, trees (Terebinths) of righteousness. with plainly a pregnant meaning.—The word גַּנּוֹת only Isa., uses of the groves of idols, lxv. 3; lxvi. 17; comp. also HERZOG's R. Encycl. V. p. 474, Art. Haine." The abrupt change of person in animated address cannot be thought strange. As חָמַד (xliv. 9;) and בָּחַר (lxvi. 3 sq.; Josh. xxiv. 15, 22, etc.), are often used of religious deciding, so, still more frequently בּוֹשׁ (xx. 5; Jer. ii. 36; xlviii. 13, etc.), and חָפֵר (xxiv. 23; Mic. iii. 7, etc.), are used for the confounding results of the assurance reposed in idols.

Ver. 30. עָלֶה may be construed as the accusative of closer definition (a terebinth falling away in regard to its leaves), because נֹבֶלֶת as feminine connects more easily with אֵלָה than with the masculine עָלֶה. Yet to me it seems more probable that נבלת is to be joined to עָלֶה, not as adjective, however, but as substantive. For, as we see from xxviii. 1, 4; xxxiv. 4, the participle Kal of נָבֵל becomes a noun both in the masculine and in the feminine. In that case it would be rendered; a terebinth, foliage that falls, (are) its leaves. עָלֶה is to be taken collectively—foliage. Comp. Jer. xvii. 8; Ps. i. 3; Ezek. xlvii. 12. As the plural occurs only in the later Hebrew, (Neh. viii. 15), the reading עָלֶיהָ is to be rejected.

Ver. 31. The word חָסֹן occurs beside here only in Amos ii. 9. According to this passage, and Ps. lxxxix. 9 (where the form חָסִין occurs) and according to the noun חֹסֶן (xxxiii. 6; Jeremiah xx. 5, etc.), whence the Niphal יֵחָסֵן (xxiii. 18), the meaning can only be opulentus, opibus validus. The punctuation פֹּעֲלוֹ does not conflict with our explanation; see Exeg. and Crit. For, apart from the fact that it is not without analogy, the use of חָסֹן for idols would be quite unusual, and the idea that the idolater plunges his idols in ruin would not only be strange, but also wholly without motive in the context.——The formula ואין מכבה occurs in Isa., only here; elsewhere Amos v. 6; Jer. iv. 4; xxi. 12.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The prophet first looks back into the past. What were the people formerly? They were a people in whom faithfulness and righteousness flourished. But then he asks: what are they now? A ruined nation, in which unrighteousness and violence hold the sceptre. (vers. 21–23). The Lord will subject this people to a severe process of purifying, (vers. 24, 25): whose consequences will be a future, two-fold in form; a) the good elements will attain their original supremacy, Jerusalem will again become a city of justice, and by justice become partaker of salvation (vers. 26, 27); b) but the bad elements, the apostates that have forsaken Jehovah and served idols, shall by their own works be pitiably destroyed (vers. 28–31).

2. How is the faithful city—widow come unto them.—Vers. 21–23. DELITZSCH justly remarks that ver. 21 calls to mind the tone of the קִינָה, the Elegy. And I have myself, in the comment on Lam. i. 1, pointed to the dependence of that passage on this. The tone of lament, the אֵיכָה (occurring four times in Lam.), the archaic form מְלֵאֲתִי made this passage appear to the author of Lam. a suitable prototype and point of departure.—By reason of many expressions in the Pentateuch, that designate idolatry as whoredom (Exod. xxxiv. 15 sq.; Lev. xvii. 7; xx. 5 sqq.; Num. xv. 39; Deut. xxxi. 16). Isa., here calls Jerusalem זוֹנָה on account of its apostacy from Jehovah by grosser and more refined idolatry. Comp. Hos. i. 2; ii. 6 sqq.; iv. 10 sqq.; Jer. ii. 23 sqq.; iii. 1 sqq.; Ezek. xvi. 15 sqq., etc.). It was become such, however, only in process of time. For originally, so to speak, in its paradisaical or golden age it was נֶאֱמָנָה faithful. It may be asked; does the prophet by this golden age mean the time of wandering in the wilderness, as Hos. xi. 1; Jer. ii. 2, or the period of David and Solomon? But as the prophet speaks here of the city (קִרְיָה) by which he can only mean Jerusalem, so one can only think immediately of the beginning period of the kingdom. The prophet seems to have especially in mind the early days of Solomon. For this, without doubt, was in respect to the administration of justice the golden age of Israel. For in answer to Solomon's prayer for "an understanding heart, to judge the people and to discern between good and bad," the Lord had given him "a wise and understanding heart, so that there was none like him before him, neither after him should any be like him." 1 Kings iii. 9, 12. And by the celebrated judgment Solomon rendered (ibid ver. 16 sq.), the people "saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment (ibid. ver. 28). And, moreover, as "Solomon loved Jehovah" (ibid ver. 3), he was permitted also to build the Lord "an house," and thereby to join the Lord and the people together by an important outward tie. Hence could Jerusalem, in reference to that time, be justly named a "fixed city" (comp. מָקוֹם נֶאֱמָן xxii. 23, 25; בַּיִת נ׳ 1 Sam. ii. 35; xxv. 28), that "was full of justice," and in which righteousness had, not a transitory, but a permanent abode. It is therefore doubtful whether, in addition to this elevated point represented by Solomon, we may regard the reign of Jehoshaphat, with its reformation of justice, 2 Chr. xix. 5 sq., that came an hundred years later, as referred to in this place. For that effort can only be looked on as a momentary check of the downward course that the nation began with Rehoboan. It may be asked with more justice; did not Isaiah have in mind here also an earlier age than that of Solomon?

If only the city, and not the nation, is in question here, that age could only be Melchisedec's. This occurred to VITRINGA, but with a "non ausim" he left the matter in suspenso. I believe that the reference to Melchisedec's time is not to be rejected, and shall give the reason for this at ver. 26. The phrase צדק ילין בה, "righteousness lodged in it," is only another turn and at the same time the establishing of the sentiment "full of judgment." For if Jerusalem is full of the concrete manifestation of a truly right-living, then this comes only from the fact that the idea of right has, so to speak, taken up its permanent abode in Jerusalem. The words "full of judgment," therefore, belong to what follows, and stand absolutely, at the beginning (comp. ver. 13), the one full of right,—righteousness dwelt in her; but now murderers. The antithesis is, of course, not quite complete. Either מלאה must be wanting or else a corresponding adversative be found. It must either say: as regards justice, righteousness formerly dwelt in it, but now murderers,—or; full of justice, righteousness dwelt in it; devoid of justice, murderers swarm in it. But the prophet, evidently influenced by an effort at brevity, expresses in the second member of the adversative phrase only that thought that corresponds to the thought of the first member, and easily joins on to it. That one may not translate, "it was full of justice" arises from the absence of the pronomen separatum. For only in cases where this may be supplied of itself may it be dispensed with.

Thy silver is become.—With these words the prophet passes from the region of the inward and general to that of the concrete outward appearance. The silver of Jerusalem has become dross, the noble wine mixed with water. The noble metal, the noble wine can only mean the noble men. And it appears from ver. 23, which explains the figurative language, that the prophet has the princes of the people in mind. "Dicitur argentum," etc. "The silver is said to be turned into dross, and the pure wine to be mixed with water, when judges and senators turn from purity and grave manners, from integrity, sincerity and candor, and prostitute their own dignity." VITRINGA.

As dross is related to silver, the emblem of moral purity (comp. LEYRER in HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XV. p. 111, 114) so the diluting with water to the strong wine.—On the matter of the ver. comp. Jer. vi. 28; Ezek. xxii. 18 sqq.

Thy princes, etc.—By these words the prophet himself shows, as he often does, the meaning of his figurative language. On the change of number comp. Ps. v. 10. "It is not שָׁלוֹם, that they chase after, but שַׁלְמֹנִים, not peace, but pacifying their greed." DELITZSCH. Comp. ver. 23 b with ver. 17 b, and the comment there.

3. Therefore—all thy tin.—Vers. 24, 25. From the contemplation of the past and present the prophet now turns to consider the future. The transition to it shall be made by a grand act of judgment and purifying. The prophet introduces his discourse with solemn language, especially by employing in detail all the titles of the Lord. He uses the solemn נְאֻם, which is found in Isa. much more seldom than in Jer., and Ezek. Also הָאָדוֹן occurs in Isa. relatively, not often; comp. ver. 9, on "of hosts;" אֲבִיר יִשׂ׳ "the mighty one, of Israel," is found first Exod. xlix. 24, where however it reads אֲ׳ יַעֲקֹב. The latter form appears in all the rest of the places where it is used, xlix. 26; lx. 16; Ps. cxxxii. 2, 5.—"Ah! I will ease," etc. The Lord announces His intervention in terms that make known His determination to obtain satisfaction.

I will turn, etc.—In the passages cited (see Text. & Gram.) the hand of the subject is not said to have been previously on the object named, and as little is such the case here. The translation of UMBREIT, therefore, "let come afresh" is not admissible. And for the same reason we must not, with VITRINGA, who appeals to xi. 11, refer, השׁיב יד to the sanans et benefica manus, the healing and beneficent hand of God. The totality of the nation shall be subjected to a purifying process which the prophet compares to the process by which silver ore is freed from the mixture of ignoble metal, and rendered solid silver (כֶּסֶף צָרוּף or מְזֻקָּק Ps. xii. 7). The separation of the lead ore is promoted by applying alkali, comp. WINER R. W. B., word, Metals.

4. And I will restore—with righteousness.—Vers. 26, 27. With these words the prophet indicates the positive good that shall arise from this purifying process; such judges and counsellors as shall resemble those of the early age (ver. 21) and by whose agency Jerusalem shall become a righteous and faithful city. It is seen that the prophet ascribes a decisive effect to the influence of the chiefs of the state. He must very well have known, by what he observed in his times, how great must have been this influence for evil. This place reminds us much of Jer. xxiii. 3-6; xxxiii. 15, 16. For as Isa. in this place, so there Jer., promises the restoration of a good administration that shall exercise righteousness, and procure a name that shall be significant of that righteousness. Here as there, that name shall be an ideal one (not a name actually employed, comp. my comment on Jer. xxiii. 6). The glorious end shall correspond to the glorious beginning, (comp. "faithful city," "righteousness lodged in it," ver. 21). It is, moreover, to me very probable that by the original and first times Isa. understands, not only Solomon's time, but also Melchizedec's. For עִיר צֶדֶק and מַלְכִּי־צֶדֶק (city of righteousness and king of righteousness) comp. Heb. vii. 2, look quite too much alike. Also the name Adoni-zedec, Josh. x.; (comp. Adoni-bezek, Jud. i. 5; 1 Sam. xi. 8), proves that not only one king of Salem had a name composed of Zedec. It can only be objected that Melchizedec does not belong to the beginning of the Israel Jerusalem. Yet he does belong to the beginning of the Jerusalem of the history of grace. This city had not become the capital city of Israel, had it not before that been the city of Melchizedec; and all the glory and significance of the Israel Jerusalem is only a transitional fact, that would restore that ancient glory of Melchizedec. (comp. my Art. Melchizedec in HERZOG'S R. Encycl. IX. p. 300 sq.). We are so much the more justified in this reasoning as the ideal fact of the future that the prophet has in view is, without doubt, identical with the Messianic future (comp. xi. 3–5; Ps. lxxii. 1 sq.); the Messiah, however Ps. cx. 4 (comp. Heb. v. 6, 10; vi. 20; vii. 1 sqq.), is expressly designated as the antitype of Melchizedec.

Ver. 27, is difficult. The question is; by whose righteousness is Zion redeemed? To this three answers are given. Some say by the righteousness of the Israelites. Thus the Rabbins especially, "Because in it there shall be those who exercise justice, it is redeemed from its iniquities." RASCHI. But that conflicts with vers. 24, 25; for according to these declarations the Lord Himself vindicates the cleansing and deliverance of Israel as His own judging and sifting operation. Others regard the judgment and righteousness in question as God's. Against this idea there is, in itself, naturally nothing to object, in as much as there are plenty of passages in which saving effect is ascribed to the righteousness of God. DELITZSCH, who adopts this view, cites especially iv. 4; v. 16; xxviii. 17. But then ver. 27 would, in substance, say only in other words what is already contained in vers. 24, 25. It is to be considered moreover,—and therein is seen the third answer to our inquiry—that in many passages, to which this is nearest kindred in its description of Messianic salvation, the righteousness of the administration of justice forms an essential element of that glorious time. Thus ix. 6 it is said, the Messiah shall order and support the kingdom of David with judgment and righteousness. Thus xi. 3–5 it is said of the rod out of Jesse, that he shall judge the poor with righteousness, and that righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. And xvi. 5 we read that upon the throne and in the tabernacle of David one shall sit, "judging and seeking judgment, and hastening righteousness." But in Jeremiah's celebrated prophecies, xxiii. 5 sq. and xxxiii. 15, it is emphatically said that the Lord will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and that this one shall restore judgment and righteousness in the land, and shall procure to him the name Jehovah our righteousness. And, to prevent our thinking that this righteous government is to be only the prerogative of the Messiah, it is said Isa. xxxii. 1, expressly of the "princes" too, "they shall rule, in judgment." Our passage, also, which does not at all mention the person of the Messiah, speaks of judges and counsellors in the plural, which may remain undetermined whether the abstract pluralis generalis, is meant or an actual pluralis multitudinis. In the former case the plural would include the Messiah, and this is in the end, the more probable; in the latter case the righteous judges and counsellors would be distinguished from the Messiah, who is only presented in idea. In any case, by our construction, ver. 27 is a corollary of ver. 26. The righteous judges named in ver. 26, shall fulfil as the task set before them just that which is mentioned ver. 27; by righteous rule they shall procure deliverance from the evils under which Zion and the שָׁבִים (those returning, Eng. vers. "converts") had to suffer hitherto on account of the unrighteousness of their rulers.

This שָׁבִים, by reference to the שָׁבֵי פֶשַׁע (those turning from transgression) lix. 20 has been translated "converts;" [so Eng. ver.]. But to me it seems more likely that Isa., whose manifold use of שׁוּב is a prelude to Jeremiah's use of the word, uses the word here in the double sense of the spiritual and bodily return, that it so often has in Jer. (comp. my comment on Jer. xxxi. 22). To be sure Isa., does not, in what precedes, speak expressly of the Exile. But this notion is impliedly contained in ver. 25. For, of course the exile belonged essentially to that mighty smelting and purifying process to which the people must be subjected. Let a comparison be made of the passages that give a survey of the Messianic salvation, and it will be seen that precisely the return to the holy land, which of course cannot be conceived of without the spiritual reform, forms a principal element (see my comment Jer. iii. 18). If therefore our text is related to later passages like the germ to the developed plant, then we are right in regarding the latter as a commentary on it, and accordingly in taking the שָׁבֶיהָ in the double sense of a spiritual and bodily return (Ezr. vi. 21; Neh. viii. 17).

5. And the destruction—none shall quench them.—Vers. 28–31. The reverse side of the smelting process, the fate of the "dross" is presented to us here. It is difficult to say what difference there is between פֹּשְׁעִים, (transgressors) and חַטָּאִים (sinners). At all events the former is the more particular, (see ver. 2), the latter the more general word. Both words signify inimical conduct, the former more toward the person of Jehovah, the latter more to the idea of the good. At the same time חַטָּא as Piel form, contains an intensive force in comparison with חוֹטֵא ver. 4.—The עֹזְבֵי י״, "they that forsake," are related to "the transgressors," as negative to positive. Whoever does evil conducts himself, in some fashion, aggressively against the Lord. But whoever deserts from the Lord is an idolater. In this sense the expression עָזַב אֶת־י״ is often used; so ver. 4; still more plainly lxv. 11, the sole place in Isa., beside this where the participle occurs in connection with י״; comp. Hos. iv. 10; Jer. ii. 13; xvi. 11; xvii. 13 (in which place Jer., had our text before him); xxii. 9; 1 Kings ix. 9, etc.

For ye shall be ashamed, etc.—The general declaration that "the transgressors," etc., shall be destroyed, is more particularly established by two connected sentences, each of which begins with "for," and the second is subordinated to the first. Those that forsake the Lord would not be destroyed if they found the expected help from those to whom they deserted. But they are destroyed because they do not find in idols this help; consequently are brought to shame in the hopes they entertained in this direction. I understand, therefore, "the oaks" and "gardens" to be synecdochical for the idols that were worshipped in them. It is past comprehension how DRECHSLER can say that "nothing whatever in the text itself or in the context suggests the explanation of idolatry." He could only say so because he has utterly disregarded the specific meaning of עֹזְבֵי יְ "they that forsake."

For ye shall be as an oak, etc.—This explains how the becoming ashamed ver. 29 shall be realized. The "for" of ver. 30, is therefore not co-ordinate with the "for" of ver. 29, but subordinate to it. Thus the prophet retains his figure of speach. Those that clung with their hearts to treacherous trees and gardens, and forsook the living waters, (Jer. ii. 13; xvii. 13), shall themselves become withered trees and dried-up gardens. The Terebinth is not evergreen, as is commonly asserted (comp. ARNOLD in HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XI. p. 26). Therefore not the normal falling of the leaves is meant, but their abnormal wilting.

And the strong shall be, etc.—Ver. 31. But the idols are not only powerless, they are positively ruinous. For this sin against the first commandment includes in itself all the elements of spiritual as well as bodily ruin. The prophet would say that the idolater, even if he be no poor, powerless man, resembling the withered tree, or the garden devoid of water, if, on the contrary, he is rich, and mighty, and like the tree abounding in sap, or a well watered garden, nevertheless, by the ruinous influences of idolatry he shall be destroyed. He compares such an idolater to the tow (Jud. xvi. 9); his work, however, i. e., the idols to a spark (נִיצוֹץ ἀπ-λεγ.)

[Ver. 21. The faithful city ("including the ideas of a city and a state, urbs et civitas, the body politic, the church of which Jerusalem was the centre and metropolis.") "The particle at the beginning of the verse is properly interrogative, but like the English how is used also to express surprise, 'How has she become?' i. e., how could she possibly become? How strange that she should become!" J. A. ALEXANDER.

Ver. 23. They judge not—doth not come unto them.—"They are not simply unjust judges, they are no judges at all, they will not act as such, except when they can profit by it." J. A. ALEXANDER.

Ver. 24. "I will ease me.—This refers to what is said in ver. 14, where God is represented as burdened with their crimes."—"It means that He had been pained and grieved by their crimes; His patience had been put to its utmost trial; and now He would seek relief from this by inflicting due punishment on them. Comp. Ezek. v. 13; Deut. xxviii. 63," BARNES.

Ver. 27. "This verse means that the very same events by which the divine justice was to manifest itself in the destruction of the wicked, should be the occasion and the means of deliverance to Zion, or the true people of God," J. A. ALEXANDER.

"With judgment.—In a righteous, just manner. That is, God shall evince His justice in doing it; His justice to a people to whom so many promises had been made, and His justice in delivering them from long and grievous oppression. All this would be attended with the displays of judgment, in effecting their deliverance." "With righteousness.—This refers to the character of those who shall return. They would be a reformed, righteous people," BARNES].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 1. Concerning Judah and Jerusalem.—JEROME here pronounces decidedly against Chiliasm, in that he says: Scio quosdam Judaeam, etc. "I am aware that some explain Judah and Jerusalem of celestial things, and Isaiah under the person of the Lord Jesus, that He foretells the captivity of that province in our land, and the after return and ascending the sacred mount, in the last days. Which things we make no account of, holding them to be wholly contrary to the faith of Christians."

Whether JEROME understands by these fidei Christianorum contraria, which the universa despises, Chiliasm generally, or only the giving this passage a chiliastic significance may be doubted. For, on Jer. xix. 10, he says in regard to the Jewish expectation of a restitution of Israel to the earthly Canaan; Quæ licet non sequamur," etc. "Which we may not follow, nor yet can we condemn it; for many churchmen and martyrs have said that. And each is strong in his opinion and the whole may be reserved to the judgment of the Lord." We see from this he inclined more to reject Chiliasm.

2. On ver. 1. In the days of, etc.—Sciamus quoque, Ezechiam, etc. We know, moreover, that Hezekiah began to reign in Jerusalem in the twelfth year of Romulus, who erected a city of his own name in Italy, so that it is very apparent how very much more ancient our history is than that of other nations. JEROME, comp. his Epist. ad Damasum, where it is said: Regnavit Ozias annis 52, etc. "Uzziah reigned 52 years, in the time Amulias ruled among the Latins, and Agamester 12th among the Athenians. After whose death Isaiah the prophet saw this vision, i. e., in that year that Romulus, founder of the Roman empire, was born."

3. On ver. 2. THEODORET remarks that heaven and earth were qualified witnesses to the ingratitude of Israel because the people "received through them the most manifold benefits. For heaven extended to them from above the food of manna. For he commanded, says Ps. lxxviii. 23, 24, the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven, and rained down manna upon them to eat, and he gave them bread from heaven. But the earth brought them in the desert the needed water, and in Palestine it afforded them a superabundance of all sorts of fruits." That heaven and earth, however, can actually bear their testimony he proves by reference to the display at the death of the Lord; "for when the Jews had nailed the Saviour to the cross, the earth quaked mindful of the testimony; but heaven, unable to convey this sensation owing to its position overhead, displayed the sun in his course, robbed of his beams and brought in darkness as testimony against the impious deed."

4. On ver. 3. "There God tells them to go to the beasts' school and uncover their heads before the oxen and asses as their teachers, who though the stupidest and slowest beasts, still submit to their lords and drivers, and are therefore presented to us by God that we may learn from their example, how we should have reverence before our God. Is not that the greatest shame that, according to divine declaration, an ox and ass are, I will not say contrasted with us, but preferred to us because they do their duty toward their lord? Shall we not observe our duty toward God? This is expressly the wisdom and piety of men, that they are more stupid than an ox and ass, although in their own eyes they fancy they are wiser than all men. For what sort of wisdom can be left when one does not know God?" HEIM and HOFFMANN, "The great prophets according to Luther."

5. On ver. 4. "A sinful people is one that altogether sticks in sin (Jno. ix. 34), that makes of sin a real trade, and its best amusement;—of the people that is loaded with iniquity, the impostures and trespasses are so great and so many, that they load their conscience therewith as with a burden (Ps. xxxviii. 5); the evil seed (Jno. viii. 39) has not the disposition of Abraham, but is of Cain's and the serpent's kind." STARKE. In peccato originali, etc. "In original sin are two evils: evil itself and punishment (AUGUSTIN, De civ. Dei. xxii. 24). Parts of sin itself are imperfection and concupiscence (AUGUSTIN), as GERSON says: "impotent toward good, potent toward evil." FOERSTER.

6. On vers. 5–9. "God has two ways by which to bring His ill-advised and disobedient children to obedience; goodness and severity (Rom. xi. 22).—That many men become only worse and more hardened by the divine judgments comes about, not from God, but from their own guilt (Jer. ii. 30; Rom. ii. 5). The desolation of whole cities and lands is the result of sin, hence there is no better means against it than true repentance (Jer. ii. 19; xviii. 7, 8).—God is gracious even in the midst of wrath (Ps. cxxxviii. 7), and does not utterly consume (Lam. iii. 22). The true Church must not be judged by outward appearance, for often things look very bad within it (1 Kings xix. 14).—God is never nearer His own than in cross and misfortune (xliii. 2; Ps. xci. 15)."—STARKE.

7. On vers. 10–15. "We learn here plainly, that God did not command them to offer sacrifices because of pleasure He had in such things, but because He knew their weakness. For as they had grown up in Egypt, and had learned there to offer sacrifices to idols, they wished to retain this custom. Now in order to divert them from this error, God put up with the sacrifices and musical instruments (sic!) in that He overlooked their weakness, and directed their childish disposition. But here, after a long course of years, He forbids the entire legal observance."—THEODORET.—— "Hostiæ et," etc. "Sacrifices and the immolation of victims are not principally sought by God, but lest they may be made to idols, and that from carnal victims we may, as by type and image pass over to the spiritual sacrifice."—JEROME.

8. On ver. 10. JEROME observes: "Aiunt Hebræi," etc. "The Jews say that Isaiah was slain on two accounts: because he had called them princes of Sodom and people of Gomorrah, and because the Lord having said to Moses, 'thou canst not see my face,' he had dared to say, 'I saw the Lord sitting' (vi. 1)."

9. Vers. 10-15. "What Isaiah says here is just as if one in Christendom were to say: What is the multitude of your assemblies to me? I don't want your Lord's suppers. My soul loathes your feast days; and if you assemble for public prayer, I will turn my eyes from you. If one were to preach so among us, would he not be regarded as senseless and a blasphemer because he condemned what Christ Himself instituted? But the prophet condemns that which was the principal matter of the law, and commanded by God Himself, viz., sacrifices; not as if sacrifices in themselves were evil, but because the spirit in which those people sacrificed was impious. For they cast away reliance on the divine compassion, and believed they were just by the sacrifice, by the performance of the bare work. But sacrifices were not instituted by God that the Jews should become righteous through them, but that they might be signs through which the pious testified that they believed the promises concerning Christ, and expected Christ as their Redeemer."—HEIM and HOFFMANN. The Great Prophets, according to Luther.

10. Vers. 16–20. "A generali reformatione," etc. "He begins with a general reformation, lest, having finished with one part, they might think it opposed a veil to God. And such in general must be the treatment of men alienated from God. Not one or other of the vices of a morbid body is to be dealt with, but, if one cares to have a true and entire recovery, they are to be called to renovation, and the contagion thoroughly purged, that they may begin to please God, who before were hateful and nauseous. And by the metaphor of washing there is no doubt but that they are exhorted to cleanse away inward filth; a little later indeed he adds the fruits of works."—CALVIN.

11. Ver. 18. "My art is wonderful. For, whereas the dyers dye rose-red, and yellow and violet and purple, I change the red into snow white." — THEODORET. "Opera crucris," etc. "Works of blood and gore are exchanged for a garment of the Lord, which is made of the fleece of the Lamb whom they follow in the Revelation (iii. 5; vi. 11), who shine with the whiteness of virginity."—JEROME.

12. Vers. 21–23. "From the condition of Jerusalem at that day, one may see how Satan often exercises his lordship in the Church of God, as if all bands were dissolved. For if anywhere, then the church was at that time in Jerusalem. And yet Isaiah calls it a den of murderers and a cave of robbers. If Satan could so rage in it, we must not wonder if the same thing happens in our day. But we must take pains that we be not seduced by so bad an example."—HEIM and HOFFMANN.

13. Ver. 23. "It is great consolation for pious widows and orphans that God knows when rulers and judges will pay no heed to their want (Ps. lxviii. 6).—STARKE.

14. Vers. 24, 25. "God proceeds very unwillingly to punishment (Gen. vi. 3).—Not only those are the enemies of God that defiantly reject His word, but those also who hypocritically glory in it.—Although one may not carnally rejoice at the misfortune of his enemies, yet it is allowable to praise the righteousness of God in it (Ps. lviii. 11).—If God wishes to avenge Himself on His enemies, every thing is ready for the exercise of His will (Ecclus. xxxix. 5 sq.).—It is a blessing when God by persecution purifies His church from dross (Matth. iii. 12).—What is tin and what silver can be easily found out by fire. So by the fire of affliction is soon made plain who has been a hypocrite and who a true Christian."—STARKE.

15. Ver. 26. Regarding the fulfilment of this prophecy, many, e. g., MUSCULUS, have found in it the promise of a return of the days of the Judges, i. e., the days of a Jephtha, Gideon, Samuel, etc. Others understand the language of the restitution of the kingdom. Others again refer the language to the return out of the Babylonish captivity under Zerubabbel, Joshua, Ezra and Nehemiah. Still others see the Apostles in the promised judges. But all these explanations are evidently too narrow and one-sided. The fulfilment has its degrees. And if Zerubbabel, Ezra and Nehemiah are justly regarded as the representatives of the first feeble beginnings of the great restitution of Israel; if, further, the Apostles are justly regarded as the founders of the new Zion on a higher plain, still by all this the prophecy is not at all fulfilled. It will only then be fulfilled when the Lord comes "into His kingdom" (Luke xxiii. 42).

16. Ver. 27. The happiness of a people is not secured by sword and spear, nor by horse and chariot, nor even by industry, flourishing commerce or any sort of outward institution. Only justice and righteousness in Christ's sense can give true peace and true well-being.

17. Vers. 27-31. "Precisely from that quarter shall ruin come upon the godless, where they looked for salvation. For their images and idols are the tinder for God's wrath by which an unquenchable conflagration shall be kindled."—HEIM and HOFFMANN.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. Vers. 2-9. The judicial process of the Lord is no secret one, but public. Yea, He gives it the greatest publicity that can be imagined. He invites heaven and earth, and all creatures that are in it, to attend the great trial He has with His people.—He is a true Father. He has let it cost Him a great deal to bring up His children. He has raised them from small beginnings to a high degree of honor and dignity.—For that they ought to be grateful to Him.—How God wrestles for human souls: 1. He nourishes and trains them with true paternal love. 2. They reward His love with ingratitude and apostasy. 3. He chastises them as they deserve. 4. They become little in order renewedly to grow up to true greatness.

4. Vers. 27-31. "Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people." Prov. xiv. 34. Therefore every policy that is contrary to the commands of God, can only have God for opponent.—Now wherever the chastisements of God are disregarded, there will His judgment also go forth until He exterminates those that oppose Him. "Then it goes on to the judgment of being hardened, and sin itself must become the man's scourge, so that he is as the tow and his work as the spark, that it may consume himself." (THOLUCK, Hours of Christian Devotion, p. 131).——False and true progress. 1. False progress is in fact a retrograde, for a) it consists in turning back from God's command (mostly under guidance of over-shepherds); b) it necessarily occasions outward ruin. 2. True progress is a) apparently a going backwards, in that it first of all rests on a return to the eternal foundations of salvation; b) in fact, however, is a genuine movement forward; a) to a deeper comprehension of the truth; b) to an inalienable possession of true salvation.

From M. HENRY on the whole chapter.

[Ver. 4. "Children that are corrupters." If those that are called God's children, that are looked upon as belonging to His family, be wicked and vile, their example is of the most malignant influence.

Vers. 11-15. When sinners are under the judgments of God they will more easily be brought to fly to their devotions, than to forsake their sins and reform their lives.

"Your sacrifices." They are your sacrifices and none of mine; I am full of them, even surfeited with them.

Dissembled piety is double iniquity. Hypocrisy in religion is of all things most abominable to the God of heaven.

Vers. 16-20. Let them not say that God picks quarrels with them; no, He proposes a method of reconciliation.

"Cease to do evil; learn to do well." 1. We must be doing; not cease to do evil and then stand idle. 2. We must be doing good, the good which the Lord requires, and which will turn to good account. 3. We must do it well, in a right manner, and for a right end; and 4. We must learn to do well: we must take pains to get the knowledge of our duty, etc.

"Let us reason." 1. Religion has reason on its side: there is all the reason in the world that we should do as God would have us do. 2. The God of heaven condescends to reason the case with those who contradict Him, and find fault with His proceedings, for He will be justified when He speaks. Ps. li. 4. The case needs only to be stated (as here it is, very fairly), and it will determine itself.

Vers. 21-23. Corruptio optimi est pessima. That which originally was the best, when corrupted becomes the worst, Luke xi. 26; Eccl. iii. 16; Jer. xxiii. 15-17. This is illustrated 1, By similitudes, ver. 22. 2, By some instances, ver. 23.

Vers. 24-26. Two ways in which God will ease Himself of this grievance: 1. By reforming His church and restoring good judges in the room of those corrupt ones. 2. By cutting off those that hate to be reformed, that they may not remain either as snares or as scandals to the faithful city.

Ver. 30. Justly do those wear no leaves that bear no fruit: as the fig tree that Christ cursed.

Ver. 10. "There could have been no more severe or cutting reproof of their wickedness than to address them as resembling the people whom God overthrew for their enormous crimes."—BARNES.

Ver. 11. "Hypocrites abound in outward religious observances just in proportion to their neglect of the spiritual requirements of God's word. Comp. Matt. xxiii. 23.—BARNES.

Ver. 31. "The principle in this passage teaches us the following things. (1). That the wicked, however mighty, shall be destroyed. (2). That their works shall be the cause of their ruin—a cause necessarily leading to it. (3). That the works of the wicked—all that they do and all on which they depend—shall be destroyed. (4). That this destruction shall be final. Nothing shall stay the flame. No tears of penitence, no power of men or devils shall put out the fires which the works of the wicked shall enkindle."—BARNES.

THE SECOND PORTAL.

CHAPTERS II.—V.

Chapters ii.—v. contain the second introduction, the second portal, so to speak, of the majestic cathedral of the prophecies of Isaiah. This portal is the greatest as regards the extent of it. It is meant to afford us a more exact insight into the contents, the power and the reach of Isaiah's prophecies. The first introduction proceeds from the mournful condition of the present, speaks of the means of securing a better future, and closes with a grand survey of past, present and future, from which it appears that, for the believing part of the people, the end shall correspond to the beginning as its much more glorious antitype, whereas, for the unbelieving part, there is only the prospect of a wretched and total destruction. In that chapter, therefore, threatening constitutes the key-note, the promise appears, as it were an interlude. But that chap. i. gives only brief outlines. Particularly the future is indicated only by a few, albeit significant words, vers. 26, 27.

The second introduction looks entirely away from the past. It treats only of future and present. It does this, however, in such a way that the Prophet, as it were, with arms reaching out far before him, holds, one after another, two lights out into the remotest future, that make it appear as a time of the greatest glory. These two prophetic lamps, however, must serve at the same time to show in so much the more glaring light the distress and also the nothingness of that present time that precedes that period of glory. Involuntarily the eye turns backwards from it to the circumstances of the present, and these appear all the more gloomy because the eye has beheld before such bright light in the future. But just the inward nothingness and emptiness of the bad present is, in some sense, the first step to the revelation of the divine glory. For the bad bears, indeed, the judgment in itself. But this ideal judgment must become real, and then is the moment come wherein the majesty of the only true God, hitherto hidden and ignored, bursts forth in its full splendor

We must remark in advance that this second introduction is built upon the fundamental number two. It divides into two principal parts. At the head of each of these parts stands a prophetic announcement of glorious contents relating to final events of history, the first of which portrays more the future, outward glory, the second more the inward glory of Israel, that which lies at the base of the first, and is identical with holiness. These two announcements extend far into the future to the very end of history.

Each of these lamps is followed by a look at the present, taking this expression in a relative sense, so that by it everything is understood that precedes the future events lighted up by the two lamps. Each of these two looks at the present divides again into two parts that differ from one another in their structure. The first look resolves itself into a general (ii. 5–11) and a particular part (ii. 12—iv. 1); the last again falls into two subdivisions, of which the first portrays the judgment in the extra-human sphere, the second that in the human sphere. The judgment in the extra-human sphere, then again, subdivides into two halves, of which the first embraces all that is beneath mankind (ii. 12–17), the second all that is above mankind, i. e, idols (ii. 18–21). The judgment of things belonging to the human sphere also subdivides into two halves, the first of which (ii. 22—iii. 15) has men for its subject, the second (iii. 16—iv. 1) the women. The second lamp (iv. 2–6) has an attendant section (v.) that again is composed of two members. The first is a parable (v. 1–7) which, though as to form it departs surprisingly from iv. 2–6, still in sense joins closely on to it. For as iv. 2–6 treats of the glorious rod, and the glorious fruit of the future, v. 1 sqq. treats of the mournful fruits of the present. The second part specifies more particularly the bad fruits of the present and their consequences in a sixfold woe, which again subdivides into two chief parts. The first two woes, namely, evidently refer back to the first principal part of the whole discourse (ii. 2—iv. 1) and contain relatively to it an appropriate conclusion; whereas the last four woes refer more to the second principal part of the discourse (iv., v.) and contain the definitive chief conclusion of the discourse.

In regard to the date of the composition of this discourse, I must first of all warn against the petty and superficial way of viewing this thing, that ignores the grand, comprehensive glance of prophecy, and restricts to a special point of time what concerns the whole and the general. Thus I challenge the right of exegesis altogether to draw conclusions regarding the date of composition from single exhortations, warnings, threatenings or promises, if those are not quite decidedly of a specific nature. If, for example, the Prophet speaks against idolatry, the injustice and oppressions of the great intemperance and licen-tiousness, one is not justified in concluding therefrom that he spoke these words under a godless prince, an Ahaz or Manasseh. He could have spoken them under an Uzziah or Hezekiah, for the prophet may have had in his mind the entire present, i. e., the whole time preceding the redemption that terminates history. If, on the other hand, the Prophet speaks of boy and woman government (iii. 4, 12) that is not necessarily something general. That is not a standing and abiding characteristic of rebellious Israel, but an abnormity, that even in the times of deepest degradation does not always happen. Where such a reference is made, one may reasonably infer that the Prophet has in mind quite special and actual circumstances of his own time. It may therefore be assumed with a degree of probability (for certainty is not to be thought of) that chap. iii. was composed under Ahaz. But I shall show hereafter that this chapter betrays the marks of another sort of origin in the form of its transitions and combinations: i. e., it gives evidence of being an older piece, already prepared, that is only put in here as in a suitable place.

Now if we consider that our passage (ii.—v.) as second portal belongs to the introduction to the entire book, then we must say, the obvious date of its origin is that time when the Prophet compiled his book into a whole. He could then very well make use of older discourses already on hand for introduction, but on the whole, as introduction, as overture, as preface the passage presupposes the whole book. The comprehensive character of our passage, which surveys the entire present and the future into the remotest distance, has long been recognized, and with that it has been admitted that it has essentially and generally the same extension as the whole book, thus it possesses the qualities that belong to an introductory preface. With this correspond the chronological indications that appear in ii. 2–4, as related to Mich. iii. 12; comp. Jer. xxvi. 18.

From Jer. xxvi. 18 we receive the impression that Micah spoke the words iii. 12 (that are closely connected with iv. 1 sqq.), under Hezekiah. How could they previously be known to Isaiah? Therefore if ii. 2–4 presupposes the time of Hezekiah, then this agrees with our assumption that the chapters ii.—v. only then originated as a whole, when the prophet compiled his whole book.

The structure of our passage is made clear by the following scheme.

ISRAEL OF THE PRESENT TIME IN THE LIGHT OF ITS FINAL GLORY.

A. The Superscription, ii. 1.

B. The first prophetic lamp, which in the light of the divine eminence that shall finally appear makes known the things falsely eminent of the present time, ii. 1—iv. 1.
  1. The first prophetic lamp itself, ii. 2–4.
  2. The falsely eminent things and their abasement in general, ii. 5–11.
    a. The judgment against the things falsely eminent in the sub-human and superhuman sphere, ii. 12–21.
    b. The judgment against the falsely eminent things in the human sphere, ii. 22—iv. 1.
      α. The judgment against godless men, ii. 22—iii. 15.
      β. The judgment against godless women, iii. 16—iv. 1.

C. The second prophetic lamp which, in the light of the glorious divine fruit of the last time, makes known the bad fruits of the present, iv. 2—v. 30.
  1. The second prophetic lamp itself, and the glorious divine fruit displayed by it, iv. 2–6.
  2. The bad fruits of the present in the light of the glorious divine fruit of the final period, v. 1–30.
    a. The bad fruits of the present shown in the parable of the vineyard, v. 1–7.
    b. The bad fruits of the present and their consequences more nearly described in a sixfold woe, at the same time, double conclusion of the whole discourse, v. 8–30.

ISRAEL OF THE PRESENT TIME IN THE LIGHT OF ITS FINAL GLORY.

A.—The Superscription.

Chapter II. 1.

1 The word that Isaiah the son of Amoz saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

The formula "the word which saw," is found only here. It does not occur again either in Isaiah or in any other prophet. The form of expression הַדָּבָר אֲשֶׁר, beside this place, is only found in Jeremiah, where, however, it is regularly followed by הָיָה אֶל וגו׳.—Concerning חָזָה in this connection comp. i. 1.

The expression "concerning Judah and Jerusalem" connects i. 1 with ii. 1, because it occurs in no other superscription. The likeness that exists between i. 1 and ii. 1 in reference to the first half, is completed by this similarity of sound in the second half, where we would not omit to point out a second time that the difference between ii. 1 and i. 1 in expression quite correspon is to the difference of the position of either chapter. Now as the expression "concerning Judah and Jerusalem," ii. 1, helps connect with i. 1, so it does in like fashion with the following chapters ii.—v. For, as was remarked i. 1, it is a fact not to be overlooked that the expression "Judah and Jerusalem" occurs relatively the oftenest in these chapters. It occurs iii. 1, 8, and v. 3, whereas in all the rest of the book of Isaiah, it occurs only three times, viz., xxii. 21; xxxvi. 7; xliv. 26.

B.—The first prophetic lamp, which in the light of the divine eminence that shall finally appear, makes known the things falsely eminent of the present time.

Chapter II. 2—IV. 1.

1. THE FIRST PROPHETIC LAMP.

Chapter II. 2-4.

2 And it shall come to pass in the last days,
That the mountain of the Lord's house
Shall be established in the top of the mountains,
And shall be exalted above the hills;
And all [a]nations shall flow unto it.
3 And many [b]people shall go and say,
Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord,
To the house of the God of Jacob;
And he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths:
For out of Zion shall go forth the law,
And the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.
4 And he shall judge among the nations,
And shall [c]rebuke many people:
And they shall beat their swords into plowshares,
And their spears into [2]pruning hooks:
Nation shall not lift up sword against nation,
Neither shall they learn war any more.

[1] Or, prepared. [2] Or, scythes.

[a] peoples. [b] nations. [c] award sentence.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

It is now admitted by almost all expositors that this passage is borrowed from Micah. It is old orthodox opinion that the passage may be original as well with Isaiah as with Micah. This view occurs in Abarbanel, with the additional notion that the passage is indeed older in Isaiah, but taken from Isaiah, not by Micah himself, but that it was brought to him in the way of inspiration from the older prophet. (Micha visionem suam enarravit illis verbis, quæ tunc ex Jesaia ori ipsius erant indita). That the passage is original with Isaiah and borrowed from him by Micah is maintained by Calmet, Beckhaus (Integr. d. proph. Schr. d. Alten Bundes, 1798), Umbreit. Some recent expositors (Koppe, Rosenmueller, Hitzig, Maurer, Ewald), are of the opinion that our passage is the expression of a third person, from whom Isa. and Micah have drawn in common. Hitzig and Ewald even indicate Joel as the third person, and Joel iv. 10 as the source of our text. If there were an expression of essentially the same import in any older prophet, this hypothesis might have some ground. But such a passage is not to be found. Joel iv. 10 contains in fact precisely the opposite. For there Israel is summoned to forge its mattocks into swords, and its pruning hooks into spears, for a war of destruction against the heathen. In as much as a third place from which both may have drawn, is actually non-existent, this hypothesis is in itself superfluous and null. The question can only be, which of the two contemporaries has drawn from the other? And there everything favors the view that Micah is original. In the first place the form of the text in both points that way. For the text of Isaiah, although in the main sounding the same, has still some modifications that characterize it as a free citation, drawn, not from the manuscript original, but from memory. "All nations shall flow unto it," ii. 2, certainly comes from the harder, "people shall flow unto it," Micah iv. 1, and not the reverse. And if ii. 4 is compared with Micah iv. 3, the unusual עֲצֻמִים, strong, and the still more unusual עַד־רָחוֹק, afar off, certainly do not make the impression of being additions. Rather the language of Isaiah, "And he shall judge among the nations, and rebuke many people," appears as an abbreviation that reproduces only what is essential. In the second place the passage in Micah stands in the closest connection with what precedes. For with the threatening prophecy that for the sake of Judah's sins "Zion shall be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forests," Micah iii. 12, the promise is connected by way of contrast, that this desolation of the divine mount shall be superseded by a wonderful glory (comp. CASPARI, Micah der Morasthite s. 444 sqq.). It is most intimately connected with this that וְהָיָה, Micah iv. 1, has a motive in what goes before, whereas, Isa. ii. 2 it has no motive, and is without example in so abrupt a position (comp. DELITZSCH). In the third place the passage in Isaiah appears, in reference to what follows, as a motto, or a torso, prefixed theme-like, whereas in Micah it forms a well-rounded whole with two following verses. HENGSTENBERG is wrong when he refers the words Mic. iv. 4 to the Israelites. The heathen, too, according to vers. 2 and 3 are Israelites, and thereby partakers of the promise given to Israel (Lev. xxvi. 6). For (such is evidently the meaning of ver. 5), while Israel holds to its God forever as the rightful one, the heathen shall hold to their gods, only for a season, viz., until the revolution announced, ver. 1, takes place. The imperfect יֵלְכוּ, ver 5*a*, is therefore not future, but signifies continuance in the present. At present the prophet would say, all people walk after their gods, but they will not do this forever as Israel. For, vers. 1-3, he had expressly announced that all heathen shall flow to the mountain of Jehovah. As, therefore, ver. 4 completed the all-comprehensive portrait of peace in the old theocratic sense, according to passages like Lev. xxvi. 5; 1 Kings iv. 25, ver. 5 assigns the reason for the glorious promise made in vers. 1-4. Israel has already now the true way, therefore it needs only to persevere on its way. But the heathen, that are now in the false way, will one time forsake this false way and turn to the right way. The same construction proceeds, and the vers. 1-5 appear completely as one work from one mould. In the fourth place, the characteristics of the language in several respects bear the decided impress of Micah. The expression "in the last days," occurs in Isaiah as in Micah, only in this one place. The expression הַר בֵּית י׳ is an evident connection with הַר הַבַּיִת Mic. iii. 12, a designation that occurs only here, therefore is peculiar to Micah. 2 Chr. xxxiii. 15 הַר בֵּית י׳ occurs again for a special reason, and possibly with reference to our passage. נָכוֹן only here in both Isaiah and Micah: likewise בְּראשׁ הה׳. נִשָּׂא in Micah only here: in Isaiah three times beside, evidently occasioned by our text in ii. 2: see vers. 12, 13, 14: beside these vi. 1; lii. 13; lvii. 7, 15.——נָהַר with the meaning confluere only here in Isaiah and Micah.——The expression גּוֹיִם רַבִּים does not occur in Isaiah except ii. 2; on the other hand in Micah twice; here and iv. 11, (comp. the remark on עַמִּים רַבִּים at ver. 3). Later prophets, following Micah's example, make use of it, especially Ezek. (iii. 6; xxvii. 33; xxxii. 3, 9, 10, etc.). הַר יְהוָֹה only here in Micah; and also in Isaiah only once beside, xxx. 29.——אֱלֹהֵי יַעֲקֹב in Isaiah and Micah only here. Isa. always says אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, once מֶלֶךְ יַעֲקֹב (xli. 21); twice אֲבִיר יַעֲקֹב (xlix. 26; lx. 16). יוֹרֵנוּ מִדְּרָכָיו in both prophets only here (comp. Mic. iii. 11; Isa. xxviii. 9, 26). Likewise נֵלְכָה בְּא׳.——The pairing of Zion and Jerusalem occurs in Micah in iii., iv., relatively often; iii 10, 12; iv. 2, 8. But in Isaiah, too, it occurs often; iv. 3, 4; x. 12, 32; xxiv. 23; xxx. 19; xxxi. 9; xxxiii. 20; xxxvii. 22, 32; xli. 27; lii. 1, 2; lxii. 1; lxiv. 9.——עַמִּים רַבִּים occurs in Isaiah in only one other place, xvii. 12, whereas it occurs in Micah four times: iv. 3, 13; v. 6, 27.——The use of רַבִּים and עֲצוּמִים together does not occur again in Micah; on the other hand once in Isa. liii. 12. The singular גּוֹי עָצוּם once in Isa. lx. 22. The words עַד־רָחוֹק are wanting in Isaiah. In fact they occur only here. כִּתַּת in Micah again i. 7; in Isa. xxiv. 12; xxx. 14. Plural of חֶרֶב in Isaiah only xxi. 15.——אִתִּים only here and Joel iv. 10. חֲנִית nowhere in Isaiah.——מַזְמֵרוֹת in Isaiah again xviii. 5. The other words have no specific importance. The following expressions, therefore are decidedly peculiar to Micah: 1) הַר בֵּית י׳; 2) גּוֹיִם רַבִּים; 3) עַמִּים רַבִּים; 4) אֱלֹהֵי יַעֲקֹב; for Isa. constantly says, אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, and יַעֲקֹב is generally a favorite expression of Micah, which he uses eleven times (comp. CASP. Mic. d. Mor. ss. 412, 444). Only once in Micah and Isaiah, and that in our passage, do the expressions occur; נָהַר ,בְּראשׁ הֶהָרִים ,נָכוֹן ,בְּאַחֲרִית הַיָּמִים, confluere, נֵלְכָה בְּאֹרְחֹתָיו ,יוֹרֵנוּ מִדְּרָכָיו. At most נִשָּׂא and the use of רַבִּים and עֲצוּמִים remind us of Isaiah's style. But it is to be considered that owing to the difference in the size of the books, a single occurrence in Micah has relatively much more weight in settling the usus loquendi.

Ver. 2. This beginning of the discourse with וְהָיָה is unexampled. As is well known, several books begin with וַיְהִי, (Josh., Judges, 1 Sam., 2 Sam., Ezek., Jonah, Neh.). But nowhere except here does וְהָיָה stand at the beginning of a discourse without a point of support given in what precedes. We recognize in that, as shown above, a proof that Isaiah took the words, vers. 2-4, from Mic. iv. 1-4 as the basis of his discourse. Unmoved, fixed. Such is the meaning of נָכוֹן, comp. בַּיִת נָכוֹן ,כִּסֵּא נָכוֹן, 2 Sam. vii. 16, 26; 1 Kings ii. 45; Ps. xciii. 2. נָהַר is probably denom. from נָהָר, and does not occur again in Isaiah in the sense of "flowing." For וְנָהַרְתְּ lx. 5, comes from another root, kindred to נוּר, comp. Ps. xxxiv. 6. The word occurs in Jer. xxxi. 12; li. 44, with the meaning of "flowing, streaming," but also only in regard to nations.

Ver. 4. שָׁפַט with בֵּין is found again in Isa. only v. 3. הוֹכִיחַ is a juridical term as well as שָׁפַט. The fundamental meaning is "εὐθύνω," "make right, straight," and corresponds to our "richten und schlichten." Comp. xi. 3, 4. In the latter place we find the construction with לְ (direct causative Hiphil). Comp. Job xvi. 21; ix. 33; Gen. xxxi. 37. אִתִּים, which, as already remarked, excepting here occurs only Mic. iv. 3 and Joel iv. 10, is, doubtless, radically related to אֵת, אֵתִים, which occurs 1 Sam. xiii. 20, 21. The first the LXX translate in all cases by ἄροτρα, the VULGATE by aratra (in Joel) or vomeres (in Isa. and Mich.); the latter the LXX translates σκεῦος, VULGATE, ligo. It is uncertain whether the distinction between אִתִּים and אֵתִים is only to be referred to the Masoretic pointing, or to a real etymological difference. In the latter case it is not agreed whether the roots of the words in question are עוּט—אוּת, from which עֵט, style, "engrave, draw," thence אֵת, אוֹת, not. acc., or אָנָה, from which on the one hand, is אֳנִי, ship—σκεῦος on the other hand אֵת, אֲנָת, or still another root.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. At the end of days shall the mountain of the house of Jehovah be higher than all mountains, and all peoples shall flow to it, (ver. 2). They shall encourage themselves to walk thither in order to be instructed in the law of Jehovah. For the law going forth from Zion shall be acknowledged as the right lamp of truth (ver. 3). Then shall all strife among nations be decided by the application of this law, and therefore, so to speak, by the Lord Himself, so that there shall be no more war, but rather weapons of war, and warlike exercises, shall cease.

2. And it shall come to pass . . . from Jerusalem.—Vers. 2, 3. אַחֲרִית הַיָּמִים, last days, which Isaiah never uses, is a relative conception, but always of eschatological significance, whence the LXX correctly translate it by "ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις," or by "ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν," or by "ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν." It is therefore not = in the time following, but = in the last time. Yet it is to be remarked herewith, that, as OEHLER says: "Also the nearer future is set in the light of the last development of the divine kingdom." Comp. the admirable exposition of this by OEHLER, HERZOG's R. Encycl. XVII. S. 653.—In this last time now shall the mountain of the house of Jehovah (comp. Mic. iii. 12) for all time stand unmoved on the top of the mountains, and be exalted above all hills. The mountains are the protuberances of the earth, in which, so to speak, is embodied its effort upwards, its longing after heaven. Hence the mountains also appear especially adapted as places for the revelation of divinity, and as places of worship for men adoring the divinity. (What is great generally, in contrast with little human works, is conceived of as divine work, compare הַרְרֵי־אֵל Ps. xxxvi. 7; lxviii. 16, אַרְזֵי־אֵל Ps. lxxx. 11, עִיר גְּדֹלָה לֵאלֹהִים Jonah iii. 3). But there are mountains of God in a narrower sense; thus Horeb is called Mount of God, Exod. iii. 1; xviii. 5; and Sinai, Num. x. 33. But above all the mountain of the temple, to which per synecdochen the name of Zion is given, is called the "Mount of God," the "holy mountain of God," Ps. ii. 6; iii. 5; xxiv. 3, etc.; Jer. xxxi. 23; Joel ii. 1; iii. 17, etc. But the idols compete with the Holy God for possession of the mountains. For the high places of the mountains are also consecrated by preference to their worship, so that Israel is often reproached with practising fornication with the idols on every high mountain, 1 Ki. xiv. 23; 2 Ki. xvii. 10; Isa. lvii. 7; lxv. 7; Jer. ii. 20; iii. 6; xvii. 2; l. 6; Ezek. vi. 2, 3; Hos. iv. 13. But the Scripture recognizes still another rivalry between the mountains. Ps. lxviii. 16 speaks of the basalt mountains of Bashan with their many pinnacles that look down superciliously upon the lowly and inconsiderable Mount Zion. All these rivalries shall come to an end. It is debated, how does the prophet conceive of the exalting of Mount Zion over the others? Many have supposed he conceives of Mount Zion as piled up over the others, (aliis montibus veluti superimpositum, VITR.), or thus, that "the high places run together toward it, which thus towers over them, seem to bear it on their heads" (HOFMANN, Weiss. u. Erf. II. p. 101). But, comparing other passages, it seems to me probable that Isaiah would say: there will be in general no mountain on earth except Mount Zion alone. All will have become plain; only the mount of God shall be still a mountain. One God, one mountain. If, for example, we consider the words below, vers. 12–17 the prophet says there that divine judgment shall go forth upon all that is high in the world, and all human loftiness shall be humbled, that "the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day." Just so, too, we read xl. 4, "Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight and the rough places plain." When hills and vallies disappear, the land becomes even. To be sure, it seems as if xl. treats only of a level road for the approaching king. But this level road is prepared for the Lord precisely and only thereby, that in all the land, all high places shall disappear upon which idols could be worshipped. Zechariah expresses still more clearly the thought that the sole dominion of the Lord is conditioned on the restoration of a complete plain in the land. He says, xiv. 9, 10. "And the LORD shall be king over all the land; in that day shall be one LORD, and His name one. All the land shall turn to lowness from Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem; But this itself shall be lifted up, and shall abide in its place," etc. It may be objected to this explanation that ii. 2, the presence of mountains and hills is in fact presupposed, because it says, "at the top of the mountains," and "higher than the hills." But must the prophets in the places cited above, have thought of the restoration of a plain in a mathematical sense? Certainly not. The notion of a plain is relative. There shall, indeed, remain therefore, mountains and hills, but in comparison with the mountain of the Lord, they shall no more deserve these names; they shall appear as plains.

From this results that בראשׁ is not = upon the head (this must be expressed by עַל־ראשׁ, comp. Exod. xxxiv. 2. 1 Sam. xxvi. 13; Isa. xxx. 17) but = at the top or head (comp. Am. vi. 7; Deut. xx. 9; 1 Sam. ix. 22; 1 Kings xxi. 9, 12). This latter however, cannot mean that the mountain of the Lord shall have the other mountains behind it, but under itself. Without doubt "the mountain of the house of the Lord," and the הַר מְרוֹם יִשְׂרָאֵל and הַר גֹּבַהּ of Ezekiel are identical, (Ezek. xvii. 22 sq.; xx. 40, xxxiv. 14; xl. 2).

This high mountain shall be exactly the opposite of that "tower whose top may reach unto heaven" Gen. xi. 4, which, being a self-willed structure by the hands of insolent men, separated mankind. For our divine mountain, a work of God, reunites mankind again. They all see it in its glory that is radiant over all things, and recognize it not only as the source of their salvation, but also as the centre of their unity. Therefore they flow from all sides to it. These "Many people," i. e., countless nations, which are essentially the same as the "all nations" mentioned before, shall mutually encourage one another "to go up," (the solemn word for religious journies, comp. CASPARI, Micha, p. 140), for which a fourfold object is named: the mountain of Jehovah; on the mountain the house of the God of Jacob; in the house the instruction out of the ways of God (the ways of God are conceived of as the source of the instruction, comp. xlvii. 13; Ps. xciv. 12); and, in consequence of this instruction, the walking in the paths of God. Only the words from "Come ye" to "his paths" contain the language of the nations. The following phrase "for out of Zion," gives the reason that shall determine the nations to such discourse and conduct. תּוֹרָה, law, is neither the (Sinaitic) law, for it must then read הַתּוֹרָה, nor the law of the king ruling in Zion. For what goes forth from Zion is just what the nations seek. They do not seek a political chief, however, but one that will teach them the truth. תּוֹרָה is therefore to be taken in the sense of the preceding יוֹרֵנוּ, he will teach us. It is therefore primarily doctrine, instruction in general, but which immediately is limited as דְּבַר י׳ word of the Jehovah. But shall the nations turn toward Zion only because "law" goes forth from thence? Did not then, even in the Prophet's time and before that, law go out from Zion; and did the nations let themselves be determined by that to migrate to Zion? We shall then need to construe "law" and "word of the Lord" in a pregnant sense: that which deserves the name of divine doctrine in the highest and completest sense, therefore the absolute doctrine, which alone truly satisfies and therefore also irresistibly draws all men. This doctrine, i. e., the gospel of Jesus Christ is, true enough, gone forth out of Jerusalem, and may be called the Zionitic Tora, in contrast with the Sinaitic. (Comp. DELITZSCH in loc.). Therefore that "preaching repentance and remission of sins in the name of Christ to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," Luke xxiv. 47, is the beginning of the fulfilment of our prophecy. Comp. Zech. viii. 20 sqq.

3. And he shall judge—learn war any more.—Ver. 4. The consequences of this divine instruction, sought and received by the nations, shall be, that the nations shall order their affairs and compose their judicial processes according to the mind of him that has taught them. So shall God appear as that one who judges between the nations and awards a (judicial) sentence. The Spirit of God that lives in His word is a Spirit of love and of peace. The God of peace sanctifies, therefore, the nations through and through (1 Thess. v. 23) so that they no more confront one another in the sense and spirit of the brute power of this world, but in the mind and spirit of the Kingdom of God. They are altogether children of God, brothers, and are become one great family. War ceases; the implements of war become superfluous; they shall be forged over into the instruments of peace. The exercises at arms, by which men in peace prepare for war, fall of themselves away. The meaning "plowshare" evidently corresponds best to the context, in which the contrast between agriculture and war is the fundamental idea; at the same time it may be remarked that a scythe, mattock, or hoe, does not need to be forged over again to serve for arms, Joel 3:10.—The מַזְמֵרָה (xviii. 5) is the vine-dresser's knife. A lance head may easily be made out of it. It is remarkable, that excepting this place, Isaiah, who speaks so much of war, uses, none of the words that in Hebrew mean "spear, lance."

As regards the fulfilling of our prophecy, the Prophet himself says that it shall follow in the last time. If it now began a long time ago; if especially the appearance of the Lord in the flesh, and the founding of His kingdom and the preaching of the gospel among all nations be an element of that fulfilment, yet it is by no means a closed up transaction. What it shall yet bring about we know not. If many, especially Jewish expositors have taken the words too coarsely, and outwardly, so, on the other hand, we must guard against a one-sided spiritualizing. Certainly the prophets do not think of heaven. Plows and pruning hooks have as little to do with heaven, as swords and spears. And what has the high place of Mount Zion to do in heaven? Therefore our passage speaks for the view that one time, and that, too, here on this earth, the Lord shall appropriate the kingdom, (lx. 21; Matt. v. 5), suppress the world kingdoms and bring about a condition of peace and glory. That then what is outward shall conform to what is inward, is certain, even though we must confess our ignorance in regard to the ways and means of the realization in particulars.

[Regarding the question of ii. 2-4 being original to Isa. or Micah, J. A. ALEXANDER says: "The verbal variations may be best explained, however, by supposing that they both adopted a traditional prediction current among the people in their day, or, that both received the words directly from the Holy Spirit. So long as we have reason to regard both places as authentic and inspired, it matters little what is the literary history of either."

BARNES says: "But there is no improbability in supposing that Isa., may have availed himself of language, used by Micah in describing the same event."

At ver. 2. "Instead of saying, in modern phraseology, that the church, as a society, shall become conspicuous and attract all nations, he represents the mountain upon which the temple stood as being raised and fixed above the other mountains, so as to be visible in all directions."—J. A. A.

Ver. 4. "VOLNEY states that the Syrian plow is often nothing but the branch of a tree, cut below a bifurcation, and used without wheels. The plowshare is a piece of iron, broad but not large, which tips the end of the shaft. So much does it resemble the short sword used by the ancient warriors, that it may with very little trouble, be converted into that deadly weapon; and when the work of destruction is over, reduced again to its former shape."—BARNES.]

2. THE FALSE EMINENT THINGS AND THEIR ABASEMENT IN GENERAL.

Chapter II. 5–11.

5 O house of Jacob, come ye,
And let us walk in the light of the Lord.
6 Therefore thou hast [a]forsaken thy people the house of Jacob,
Because they be replenished [1]from the East,
And are soothsayers like the Philistines,
And they [2b]please themselves in the children of strangers.
7 Their land also is full of silver and gold,
Neither is there any end of their treasures;
Their land is also full of horses,
Neither is there any end of their chariots:
8 Their land also is full of idols;
They worship the work of their own hands,
That which their own fingers have made;
9 And [c]the mean man boweth down,
And [d] the great man humbleth himself:
[e]Therefore forgive them not.
10 Enter into the rock, and hide thee in the dust,
For fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty.
11 The lofty looks of man shall be humbled,
And the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down,
And the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day.

[1] Or, more than the East.
[2] Or, abound with the children, etc.
[a] repudiated.
[b] make covenant with foreign born.
[c] a man is bowed down,
[d] everybody humbled.
[e] And thou wilt not forgive them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 5. לכו and ונלכה, Come, and we will walk. are taken from ver. 3, and באור ה׳ not only reminds of ויורנו, ver. 3, but one is almost tempted to believe that באור ה׳ ver. 3 is an echo of בארחתיו, which, ver. 3, follows ונלכה. And if the words are compared that in Mich. follow the borrowed verses iv. 1-3; ("For all people will walk every one in the name of his God, and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God forever and ever," ver. 5) it will be seen that these words, too, floated before Isaiah's mind. Grammatically there is nothing to object to the view of the comment below. For נלכה באור may just as well mean eamus in lucem, as in luce, let us walk into the light, as in the light. And if the words of vers. 2 and 3 that sound alike are not taken in quite the same meaning, I would ask: are they then identical? And if they were identical, must then the לכת בארחות ה׳ (that must, according to ver. 3, occur in the last time) be the same with לכת באור ה׳ that the Prophet imposes as a duty on the Israel of the present?

Ver. 6. נטש stands very commonly in the sense of repudiate: Judg. vi. 13; 1 Sam. xii. 22; 1 Kings viii. 57; Ps. xxvii. 9; xciv. 14; Jer. vii. 29; Ezek. xxix. 5; xxxii. 4. But especially the notion of נטש appears significantly as contents of the "burden of Jehovah," and probably with reference to our passage; Jer. xxiii. 33; comp. xii. 7 and 2 Kings xxi. 14. In many of these places עזב stands parallel with נטש. From that, and from the impossibility of taking עם — עם דרך, way, fashion of the people, nationality, the inaccuracy appears of the explanation given by Saadia, Targ., J. D. Michaelis and others: "thou hast abandoned thy nationality." מלאו מקדם, according to the comment below, is particularly to be maintained as the correct reading. Thus both the conjecture of Brenz and Böttcher (Exeg. Krit. Æhrenlese, p. 29) מקסם (comp. Ezek. xii. 24; xiii. 7), and that of Gesenius (in his Thesau. s. v. קדם, p. 1193, though in his commentary he declares for the text). מקסם (comp. Jer. xiv. 14; Ezek. xiii. 6, 23) are needless. Also the signification of old translations (ὡς τὸ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, LXX., ut olim, VULG., ut antea, PESCHIT., sicut ab initio, Targ., Jon.) is incorrect, because the insertion of the particle of comparison and the leaving out of account the ו before עֹנְנִים are arbitrary. DRECHSLER has justly called attention to the fact that מָלֵא with מִן never means the same as מָלֵא with the accusative. For the first does not so much name the matter with which one is filled as the source, the fund, the provision out of which the matter is drawn. Thus e. g. Exod. xvi. 32, מְלֹא הָעֹמֶר מִמֶּנּוּ is not: imple mensuram eo, but ex eo, i. e., fill the omer with the proper quantity taken from the whole mass. Comp. Lev. ix. 17; Jer. li. 34; Ezek. xxxii. 6; Ps. cxxvii. 5. It is different Eccl. i. 8. עֹנְנִים (Lev. xix. 26; Isa. lvii. 3; Jer. xxvii. 9; 2 Kings xxi. 6; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6) or מְעוֹנְנִים (Deut. xviii. 10, 14; Mic. v. 11) according to the context of the passages cited, are places of magicians or diviners. For the word stands parallel with כִּשֵּׁף sometimes, and sometimes with נִחֵשׁ, as, then, in substance both are nearly related. But the fundamental meaning is doubtful. FLEISCHER in a note in DELITZSCH in loc. controverts the fundamental meaning maintained by FUERST, "tecta, arcana faciens," and also the derivation from עַיִן (oculo maligno fascinans), and would derive it either from עָנָן, cloud (weathermaker), or from the Arabic root anna (coercere, stop by magic).—As regards the construction, DRECHSLER has remarked that the absence of הֵם must occasion no surprise. The verb יַשְׂפִּיקוּ in this sentence causes no little trouble. שָׂפַק occurs in only three places in the Old Testament: Job xxvii. 23; 1 Kings xx. 10 and here. Beside that there is also the noun שֶׂפֶק (סֶפֶק) Job xx. 22; xxxvi. 18.—Job xxvii. 23 we read the words יִשְׂפֹּק עָלֵימוֹ כַפֵּימוֹ. Here evidently שָׂפַק — סָפַק which often occurs for clapping the hands together, or for slapping on the thigh: Num. xxiv. 10; Lam. ii. 15; Jer. xxxi. 19; Ezek. xxi. 17. But 1 Kings xx. 10, the king Ben-Hadad of Syria says: "The gods do so unto me and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice (יִשְׂפֹּק) for handfuls for all the people that follow me." And with this agrees also the Aramaic סְפַק redundare, and the הִשְׂפִּיק "superfluere, satis esse" of the late Hebrew.—Also in regard to the substantive שֶׂפֶק the same division of meaning occurs. For while Job xx. 22 the context requires the meaning "abundantia," opinions vary a great deal in regard to Job xxxvi. 18. Still to me the weight of reason seems on the side of the meaning "explosio," (disapproval, insult by hand clapping, comp. Job xxxiv. 26, 27). And the explanations of our passage divide into two classes, in that the one bring out the fundamental idea of striking, the other that of superabundance, but each variously modified. The Hiphil occurs only here. It is to be construed in a direct causative sense (complosionem facere).

Ver. 7. קֵצֶה always with וְאֵין only here and Neh. ii. 10; iii. 3, 9.

Ver. 8. אֱלִילִים from אַל with intentional like sound to אֵל, אֱלֹהִים, comp. Zech. xi. 17; Jer. xiv. 14; Isa. ii. 18, 20; x. 10 sq.; xix. 1, 3; xxxi. 7. The singular suffix in ידיו and אצבעתיו is to be noticed in grammatical respects. Expositors correctly construe the suffixes as distributive. Comp. v. 23 concerning the ideal number.

Ver. 9. At first sight the explanation (adopted, e. g., by LUTHER), commends itself, that takes the verbs שחה and שפל as descriptive of the voluntary homage that the Israelites rendered to the great things depicted verse 7 sq. It appears to belong to the completeness of the mournful picture that the Prophet draws here of the condition of Israel, that also that recognition should be mentioned which those great things named, vers. 7, 8, received at their hands. Moreover the similarity of construction seems to point to a continuation of that strain of complaint against Israel already begun. Indeed the second half of ver. 9 "and forgive them not," seems to form the fitting transition to the announcement of judgment, whereas these words, if the announcement of judpment begins with 9 a already, seem to be an ὕστερον πρότερον. That שחח and שפל in what follows (vers. 11, 12, 17) and especially v. 15, are used for involuntary humiliation would be no objection, in as much as a contrast might be intended. Nevertheless I decide in favor of the meaning approved by all recent expositors, viz., involuntary bowing. What determines me is, first, that already ver. 8 b speaks of the voluntary bowing to idols. Had the prophet meant to emphasize, not simply this, but also the bowing before the idols of riches and power, he would surely have joined both in a different fashion than happens if ver. 9 a is referred to ver. 7. And then Isaiah must have said: וְאַתָּה אַל ת׳, but thou forgive them not. That the antithesis is not marked in ver. 9 b, is proof that none exists. But then in this case ver. 9 a itself must contain a threatening of judgment. It is no objection to this that it is expressed in narrative form with the vav. consecutivum; comp. DRECHSLER in loc. Ver. 9 b is then not antithesis but explanatory continuation. אַל must then be taken in the weaker signification of לֹא. Comp. 2 Kings vi. 27.—אָדָם and אִישׁ (comp. v. 15; xxxi. 8; Ps. xlix. 3; Prov. viii. 4) form only a rhetorical, not a logical antithesis. It is not — mean and great, but — all and every. The idea of "man" is only for the sake of parallelism expressed by two synonymous words. Comp. ver. 11. After תִּשָּׂא must עָוֹן be supplied, comp. Gen. xviii. 24, 26; Hos. i. 6, coll. Isa. xxxiii. 24.

Ver. 10. פחד י׳ genitive of the object, comp. 1 Sam. xi. 7; 2 Chr. xiv. 13; xvii. 10 and below vers. 19 and 21. הדר גאון only here.

Ver. 11. גבהות only here and ver. 17. רוּם in Isaiah only here and ver. 17, and x. 12. The singular שָׁפֵל is explained in that גבהות is the main idea. Comp. v. 15. שָׁפֵל, a common word with Isaiah (vers. 9, 11, 12, 17; v. 15; xl. 4, etc.) is verb, not adjective, for the latter is שָׁפָל. The same ramark obtains in reference to אָדָם and אנשים that was made ver. 9 concerning אדם and איש.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet's glance has penetrated into the farthest future. There he gazes on the glory of Jehovah and his people. In the words of his fellow prophet Micah, to whom he thereby extends the hand of recognition and joins himself, he portrays how highly exalted then the Lord and His people shall be. That is the true eminence to which Israel is destined, and after which it ought to strive. But what a chasm between that which Israel shall be and what it actually is!

The Prophet calls on the people to set themselves in the light of that word of promise, that promise of glory (ver. 5). What a sad picture of the present reveals itself! The people in that glorious picture of the future, so one with its God that it does not at all appear in an independent guise, appears in the present forsaken of God, for it has yielded itself entirely to the influences of the world from the East and West, and all sides (ver. 6). In consequence of this, much that is high and great has, indeed, towered up in the midst of them. But this highness consists only of gold and silver, wagons and horses, and dead idols made by men (vers. 7-8). For that, in the day of judgment, they shall be bowed down so much the lower and obtain no pardon (ver. 9). For in that day they must creep into clefts in the rocks and holes in the ground, before the terrible appearance of Jehovah (ver. 10), and then shall every false, earthly eminence be cast down, that Jehovah alone may appear as the high one (v. 11).

2. O house of Jacob—light of the Lord.—Ver. 5. "House of Jacob," so the Prophet addresses the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem (ver. 1), in that he connects what he says in this address, and in the second half of the verse with the prophetic address uttered in what precedes, in which (ver. 3) the temple was named "the house of the God of Jacob." The expression "house of Jacob" for Israel is besides frequent in Isa. viii. 17; x. 20; xiv. 1; xxix. 22; xlvi. 3; xlviii. 1; lviii. 1.—As the Prophet at once expresses what he has to say to the house of Jacob in words that are taken from the prophecy that precedes, he intimates what use he intends to make of these words.

Expositors understand, אור י׳ partly of the favor and grace of the Lord (for which otherwise often אור־פְּנֵי י׳ Ps. lxxxix. 16; iv. 7; xxxvi. 10), partly of the instruction through the law of the Lord (lux Jehovæ lex Dei, VITR.). But neither the one nor the other meaning seems to me to suit the context. For in what follows there is neither a promise of divine grace, nor exhortation to holy walk. I am therefore of the opinion, that the prophet by "light of Jehovah," understands that light which Jehovah Himself extends to the people by the prophetic word that just precedes. In the light of that word ought Israel to set its present history. The Prophet shows, in what follows, how infinitely distant the present Israel is from the ideal that, vers. 2-4, he has shown, and which shall be the destiny of this degenerate Israel in "the last time." Now if Israel will apply the measure of that future to its present, it may escape the judgment of the last time. On this account the Prophet summons his people to set themselves in the "light of Jehovah."

3. Therefore thou hast—strangers, ver. 6. The words "thou hast repelled thy people" seem to me to indicate the fundamental thought of the whole address to the end of Chap. v. From vers. 2-4, where Jehovah is named the God of Jacob, and Zion the place where God's word shines so gloriously that all nations assemble to this shining, it is seen that Israel in this last time shall live in most intimate harmony with its God. That it is not so now he proceeds to describe. For God has repudiated His people. Jehovah, however, has not arbitrarily repudiated His people. He could do no otherwise. For the nation had forsaken Him, had abandoned itself to the spirit of the world. They accorded admittance to every influence that pressed on them from East and West. Such is the sense of the following words. "From the east," means primarily, indeed, those parts of Arabia bordering on Palestine (Judg. vi. 3, 33; vii. 12; viii. 10), but here, in contrast with Philistines, it signifies the lands generally that lie east of Palestine. That destructive influences, especially of a religious kind, proceeded from these lands to Israel, appears from the instance of Baal-Peor (Num. xxv. 3; Deut. iv. 3), and of Chemosh (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13) of the Moabites, and Milcom of the Ammonites (1 Kings xi. 5, 7) the altar in Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 10), and the star worship of Manasseh (2 Kings xxi. 5; Jer. vii. 18; xliv. 17 sqq.; Ezek. viii. 16). But DRECHSLER, in loc, has proved that not only religious influences, but also social culture of every sort penetrated Israel from the East (comp. on iii. 18 sqq.; 1 Kings v. 10; x. 1-15; xi. 1 sq. If, then, we translate "for they are full from the East," we would thereby indicate the Prophet's meaning to be that Israel has drawn from the Orient that of which it is full, in the sense of intellectual nourishment. But the West, too, exercised its destructive influences. The Philistines are named as representatives of it, and especially they are indicated as Israel's examples and teachers in witchcraft. It is true that we have no express historical evidence that the Philistines were especially given to witchcraft. Yet 1 Sam. vi. 2 mentions their "diviners," and 2 Kings i. 2, refers to the sanctuary of Baalzebub at Ekron, as a celebrated oracle.

And in the children, etc. Excepting TARG. JONATHAN (et in legibus populorum ambulant) all the ancient versions find in our passage a accusation of sexual transgression. The LXX, PESCHIT, and Ar. understand the words to refer to intercourse of Jewish men or women with the heathen, and the generation of theocratic illegitimate posterity. JEROME, however, understands the "et pueris alienis adhæserunt" of Pederasty, as he expressly says in his commentary. The translation of SYMMACHUS, too, which JEROME quotes, "et cum filiis alienis applauserunt," is to be understood in the same sense. For JEROME remarks expressly: "Symmachus quodam circuitu et honesto sermone plaudentium eandem cum pueris turpitudinem demonstravit." GESENIUS in his Commentary p. 18 has overlooked this. It is seen that LXX. (τέκνα πολλὰ ἀλλόφυλα ἐγενήθη αὐτοῖς), PESCHIT. (plurimos exterorum filios educarunt), Arab. (nati sunt eis filii exteri permulti) have found the notion of "fulness, superfluity" in יַשְׂפִּיקוּ. But JEROME and the Hebrew scholars that after him translate ἐσφηνώθησαν (wedging oneself in, in an obscene sense) proceed evidently from the fundamental meaning "striking." The later expositors divide into these two classes. Still the majority decide in favor of the meaning, "striking into, i. e., the hand, as sign of making a covenant," and refer to the construction פָּגַע בְּ (Gen. xxxii. 2; Josh. xvi. 7; xvii. 10, etc.), to illustrate the construction with בְּ here. Still better is it to compare the construction with בְּ of the verbs, בָּחַר, אָחַז, הֶחֱזִיק, דָּבַק, נָגַע. ילדי נ׳ are the children of strangers (Psalm xviii. 45, sq.; Isaiah lx. 10, etc.), with only the difference that in ילדי נ׳ the idea of a profane birth is more prominent. The expression is to be understood as generally comprehensive of the eastern and western nations named immediately before, word יֶלֶד itself, it occurs not seldom in Isa. ix. 5; viii. 18; xi. 7; xxix. 23; lvii. 4, 5.

4. Their land—have made.—Vers. 7, 8. Neither the having abundance of children of strangers (Ew.), nor the contenting oneself with such (DRECHSLER) explains to us why the land of Jacob was full of silver and gold, of horses and wagons. But it is very easily explained if Israel had treaties and a lively commerce with foreign nations. But this was contrary to the law and the covenant of Jehovah. For according to that Israel should be a separate people from all other nations: "And ye shall be holy unto Me; for I the LORD am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be Mine." Lev. xx. 26. Commerce with the world, of course, brought the Israelites material gain, in gold and silver, horses and wagons, so that, in fact, there was a superfluity of these in the land. But by this growth in riches and power the divine prohibition (Deut. xvii. 17,) was transgressed. It is plain enough now how necessary this prohibition was. For with the treasures of this world the idols of this world are drawn in. This prohibition would guard against that, for the subtile idolatry of riches and power would serve as a bridge to coarser idolatry, because it turns the heart away from the true God, and thereby opens a free ingress to the false gods. Thus is Israel, in consequence of that being full, of which ver. 6 speaks, also outwardly become full of that which passes for great and glorious in the world. But, regarded in the light of Jehovah, this is a false eminence. On the subject matter comp. Mich. v. 9 sqq.

5. Enter into—in that day.—Vers. 10 and 11. These words stand in an artistic double relation. First, they relate to what precedes (ver. 9) as specification. Second, to what follows (as far as iii. 26) as a summary of the contents. For the brief words of ver. 9 express only in quite a general way the human abasement, and indicate the sole majesty of Jehovah only by ascribing to Him the royal right of pardon. These words are now in both these particulars more nearly determined in vers. 10 and 11. With dramatic animation the prophet summons men, in view of the terror that Jehovah prepares, and before the majestic appearance of His glory, to creep into the clefts of the rocks, and rock chasms (comp. ver. 19 and ver. 21), and in the depths of the dust i. e., holes or caves in the earth, (comp. ver. 19). The terror, therefore, shall be like that which spreads before an overpowering invasion of an enemy (Judg. vi. 2; 1 Sam. xiii. 6). Then shall the lofty eye be cast down and,—which is the reason for the former—all human highness shall be humiliated. Jehovah alone shall be high in that day, just as all mountains shall have disappeared before the mountain of Jehovah (ver. 2). It will immediately appear that the matter of both these verses shall be more exactly detailed in what follows.

[Ver. 5. "From this distant prospect of the calling of the gentiles, the Prophet now reverts to his own times and countrymen, and calls upon them not to be behind the nations in the use of their distinguishing advantages. If the heathen were one day to be enlightened, surely they who were already in possession of the light ought to make use of it." "In the light of Jehovah; (in the path of truth and duty upon which the light of revelation shines). The light is mentioned as a common designation of the Scriptures and of Christ Himself." (Prov. vi. 23; Ps. cxix. 105; Isa. li. 4; Acts xxvi. 23; 2 Cor. iv. 4). J. A. A.

Ver. 6 c. And with the children of strangers they abound.—The last verb does not mean they please themselves, but they abound.—Children of strangers.—Means strangers themselves,—foreigners considered as descendents of a strange stock and therefore alien from the commonwealth, of Israel."—J. A. A. [See comment on i. 4 בָּנִים מַשְׁחִיתִים.—TR.]

Ver. 7. "The common interpretation makes this verse descriptive of domestic wealth and luxury. But these would hardly have been placed between the superstitions and the idols, with which Judah had been flooded from abroad. Besides, this interpretation fails to account for gold and silver being here combined with horses and chariots.—But on the supposition that the verse has reference to undue dependence upon foreign powers, the money and the armies of the latter would be naturally named together.—The form of expression, too, suggests the idea of a recent acquisition, as the strict sense of the verb is, not it is full, nor even it is filled, but it was, or has been filled."—J. A. A.

Ver. 9. "They who bowed themselves to idols should be bowed down by the mighty hand of God, instead of being raised up from their wilful self-abasement by the pardon of their sins. The relative futures denote, not only succession in time, but the relation of cause and effect."—J. A. A.

Ver. 10. And hide thee in the dust. "May there not be reference here to the mode prevailing in the East of avoiding the Monsoon, or poisonous heated wind that passes over the desert? Travelers there, in order to be safe, are obliged to throw themselves down, and to place their mouths close to the earth until it has passed."—BARNES.]

CHAPTER II. 12–21.

12 [a]For the day of the LORD of hosts shall be Upon every one that is proud and lofty,
And upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low:
13 And upon all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up,
And upon all the oaks of Bashan,
14 And upon all the high mountains,
And upon all the hills that are lifted up,
15 And upon every high tower,
And upon every fenced wall,
16 And upon all the ships of Tarshish,
And upon all [1b]pleasant pictures.
17 And the loftiness of man shall be bowed down,
And the haughtiness of men shall be made low:
And the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day.
18 And the idols [2]he shall utterly abolish.
19 And they shall go into the holes of the rocks,
And into the caves of [3]the earth,
For fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty,
When he arises to shake terribly the earth.
20 In that day a man shall cast [4]his idols of silver, and his idols of gold,
[5]Which they made each one for himself to worship,
To the moles and to the bats;
21 To go into the clefts of the rocks,
And into the [c]tops of the ragged rocks,
For fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty,
When he ariseth to shake terribly the earth.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 12. נֵאָה in Isaiah only here. רָם is often found: vers. 13, 14; vi. 1; x. 33; lvii. 15. On נִשָּׂא comp. above ver. 2.—וְשָׁפֵל is to be construed as future, since כִּי יוֹם לַה׳ must be regarded as a determination of time that points to the future.

Ver. 16. שְׂכִיּוֹת is ἅπ. λεγ. It comes from שָׂכָה certainly, which, although unused itself, is kindred to שָׁעָה, to behold, is only now identified in the substantive מַשְׂכִּית. According to this etymology שְׂכִיָּה must mean θέαμα, show piece, thus every work of art that is fitted to gratify the beholder's eye.

Ver. 18. I do not deny that אֱלִילִים is taken as ideal singular, and may accordingly be joined to the predicate in the singular. But then כָּלִיל must be taken as adverb. Yet wherever this word occurs (only this once in Isa.; comp. Lev. vi. 15 sq.; Deut. xiii. 17; xxxiii. 10; Judg. xx. 40; 1 Sam. vii. 9; Ezek. xvi. 14, etc.) it is adjective or substantive: entire or entirety. I agree therefore with MAURER, who takes וְהָאֱלִילִים as casus absolutus put before, and כָּלִיל as subject: et idola (quod attinet, eorum) universitas peribit.—The fundamental meaning of חָלַף seems to me to be "to change." Out of that develops the apparently opposite meanings "revirescere" (Ps. xc. 6; Job xiv. 7; Isa. ix. 9; xl. 31; xli. 1) and "transire, praeterire, perire" (Isa. viii. 8; xxi. 1; Ps. cii. 27). The last is proper here.

Ver. 19. מְעָרָה (in Isaiah again xxxii. 14) is the natural rock caves, מְחִלָּה (ἅπ. λεγ., comp. חַלּוֹן, חָלִיל) is the cave hewn out by art. Notice the paronomasia in לַעֲרֹץ הָאָרֶץ.

Ver. 20. The Prophet might have written here and xxx. 22; xxxi. 7, אֱלִילֵי כַסְפּוֹ, his idols of silver. But he has chosen the common construction, which rests on this, that nomen rectum and nomen regens are construed as one notion, and thus in some measure as one word. — If לוֹ after עָשׂוּ is taken in a reflexive sense, the enallage numeri would certainly be very strong. Therefore most expositors justly regard the artificers as subject of עָשׂוּ.——The words לחפר פרות, as they stand, can only present an infinitive with the prefix, and object following, for there is no noun חֲפֹר. But an infinitive does not suit here, and besides there is no noun פֵּרָה. Therefore the rendering "hole of the mice," for which expositors have gone to the Arabic, is only an arbitrary one. Evidently the Masoretes, according to the analogy of פְּקַח־קוֹחַ, lxi. 1, and יְפֵה־פִיָּה Jer. xlvi. 20 would separate what was to he united. We must then read לחפרפרות as one word. But how it is to be pointed is doubtful. According to the analogy of יְרַקְרַקּוֹת, עֲקַלְקַלּוֹת, חֲלַקְלַקּוֹת, אֲדַמְדַּמּוֹת, we might point it לַחֲפַרְפָּרוֹת from a singular חֲפַרְפָּרָה. The meaning of this word can only be digger. But what sort of burrowing animal is meant, is doubtful. JEROME translated it talpa, mole. GESENIUS and KNOBEL object to that, that the mole does not live in houses: DRECHSLER that the Hebrew has another word for mole, i. e., חֹלֶד. But regarding the former, as DELITZSCH remarks, the mole does, true enough, burrow under buildings, and in regard to the latter consideration of DRECHSLER, חֹלֶד also occurs only once (Lev. xi. 29), and two words for one thing are not unusual in any language. Yet the foundation for a positive opinion is wanting.——עֲטַלֵּף is the bat (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. With this section the Prophet begins his explication and specification of what he has previously vers. 9–11 said in general. That last time, vers. 2–4, which the Prophet described above in its glorious aspect for Israel, coincides with the time when the Lord shall sit in judgment on everything humanly high, that is hostile to Him. And even all impersonal things, thus creatures beneath man, on which, in proud arrogance, men put their trust, shall the Lord make small and reduce to nothing; the cedars of Lebanon, the oaks of Bashan, the high mountains and hills, the towers and walls, the ships of Tarshish, and all other pomp of human desire (vers. 12–16). All this shall be abased that the Lord alone may be high (ver. 17). But the same shall happen to the beings above men, viz.; to the idols (ver. 18). That is the idolaters shall hide themselves in terror before the manifestation of that Jehovah whom they have despised (ver. 19); they shall themselves cast their idols to the unclean beasts, in order, mindful only of their own preservation, to be able to creep into the hollows and crevices of the rocks. (21).

2. For the day—brought low.—Ver. 12. The Prophet had used for the first time ver. 11 the expression "in that day" that afterwards occurs often (comp. v. 17, 20; iii. 7, 18; iv. 1, 2; v. 30). He points thereby to the time which he had before designated as "the last days." Of course he does not mean that this last time shall comprehend only one day in the ordinary sense. The day that Isa., means is a prophetic day, for whose duration we must find a different measure than our human one. With the Lord one day is as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day. (2 Pet. iii. 8; Ps. xc. 4). But the chief concern is whether there is really such a day of the Lord. This the Prophet asserts most distinctly. For precisely because there is such a day (כִּי for, ver. 12) Isaiah could ver. 17 refer to it. But this day is a day for Jehovah Sabaoth (comp. i. 9), or more correctly: Jehovah has such in preparation, so to speak, in sure keeping, so that, as soon as it pleases Him, He can produce it for His purpose (comp. xxii. 5; xxxiv. 8, and especially lxiii. 4; Jer. xlvi. 10; Ezek. xxx. 3). This day is a day of judgment, as already even the older prophets portray it: Joel i. 15; ii. 1, 2, 11; iii. 4; iv. 14; Amos v. 18, 20. Obad. 15. Indeed the notion of judgment is so closely identified with "the day of Jehovah" that Isaiah in our text construes יוֹם a day directly as a word signifying "court of justice," for he lets עַל depend on it. Once more in ver. 12, the notion of high and proud is generally expressed before (ver. 13) it is individualized.

3. And upon all—in that day.—Vers. 13–17. The judgment of God must fall on all products of nature (vers. 13, 14), and upon human art (vers. 15, 16). It may be asked, how then have the products of nature, the trees and mountains become blameworthy? KNOBEL, to be sure, understands by the cedars houses made of cedar (comp. 2 Sam. vii. 2, 7) and by oaks of Bashan houses of oak wood (Ezek. xxvii. 6) such as Uzziah and Jotham constructed partly for fortifying the land, partly for pleasure, and by mountains and hills "the fastnesses that Jotham built in the mountains of Judah (2 Chr. xxvii. 4)." But, though one might understand the cedars to mean houses of cedar, (for which, however, must not be cited ix. 9; Nah. ii. 4, but Jer. xxii. 23 comp. Isa. lx. 13) still the mountains and hills can never mean "fortified places." 2 Pet. iii. 10, seems to me to afford the best commentary on our passage. As sure as מַלְאַךְ י׳, angel of the LORD of the Old Testament, is identical with the ἄγγελος κυρίου of the New Testament so is also the יוֹם י׳, day of the Lord identical with the ἡμέρα κυρίου (1 Cor. i. 8; 1 Thess. v. 2, etc.). Now of this day of the Lord it is said, in the above passage in Peter, that in it, "the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." If now this last great day has its preliminaries, too, like, on the contrary, the revelation of glory ver. 2 sqq., has, then we are justified in regarding all degrees of God's world-judging activity as parts of "the day of the Lord." If then the prophet here names only the high mountains and the highest trees growing on them as representatives of nature, he evidently does so because it is his idea, according to the whole context, to make prominent that which is high in an earthly sense, especially what is wont to serve men as means of gratifying their lust of power and pomp. But the mountains and the trees on them could not be destroyed without the earth itself were destroyed. Therefore the high mountains and trees are only named as representatives of the entire terrestrial nature, of the γῆ as it is called by Peter, as also afterwards the towers, ships of Tarshish, etc., are only representative of the ἔργα, the human works, thus the productions of art. The oaks of Bashan, beside this place, are mentioned Ezek. xxvii. 6; Zech. xi. 2. A parallel is drawn between Lebanon and Bashan also xxxiii. 9; Jer. xxii. 20; Nah. i. 4.—High towers and strong walls were built by others as well as by Uzziah and Jotham; comp. 2 Chr. xiv. 7; xxxii. 5, etc. —Tarshish is mentioned by Isaiah again: xxiii. 1, 6, 10; lx. 9; lxvi. 19. It is now generally acknowledged that the locality lay in south Spain beyond the Pillars of Hercules. It is the Ταρτησσὸς Tartessus of the Greeks; not a city, likely, but the country that lay at the mouth of the Bætis (Guadalquiver): comp. HERZOG, R. Encycl. XV. p. 684. Ships of Tarshish are thus large ships fitted for distant and dangerous voyages (Jon. i. 3; iv. 2; 1 Kings x. 22; xxii. 49; Ps. xlviii. 8). All this must be destroyed and so must the arrogance of men be humbled, that Jehovah alone may be high in that day. So the prophet repeats, with some modification, the words of ver. 11, to prove that the specifications just given are only meant as the amplification of that general thought expressed in ver. 9. For these verses 12–16, refer as much back to vers. 9 as do ver. 18 sqq., (especially vers. 18, 21,) to ver. 10 a.

4. And the idols—the earth.—Vers. 17-21. The judgment against the sub-human creatures is followed by that against the superhuman, the idols. As verses 13–16 refer back to ver. 7, so ver. 18 sqq., does to ver. 8.

But the judgment against the idols is most notably accomplished when the worshippers of idols, now visited by the despised, true God, in all His terrible reality, see themselves the nothingness of their idols and cast them away in contempt. Jehovah appears in the awful pomp of His majesty. If the gods were anything, then they would now appear and shield their followers. But just because they are אֱלִילִים, nothings; they cannot do it. We see from this that the "enter into the rock and hide thee in the dust" ver. 10, refers especially to the bringing to shame these illusory superhuman highnesses. In Rev. vi. 12 sqq., when at ver. 15 our passage is alluded to, the shaking of the earth appears as the effect of a great earthquake. Regarding the usus loquendi comp. viii. 12, 13; xxix. 23; xlvii. 12.

Therefore men shall cast their idols away to the gnawing beasts of the night, in their unclean holes, not that their flight may be easier, but because the idols belong there. May there not be an allusion in the words to the demon origin of the idols (1 Cor. x. 20 sq.)? In the description of "A little excursion into the Land of Moab," contained in the Magazine Sueddeutche Reichspost, 1872, No. 257 sqq., we read in No. 257 the following, in reference to the discovery of a large image of Astarte. "The Bedouins dig in the numerous artificial and natural caves for saltpetre for making gunpowder. In this way they find these objects that in their time were buried or just thrown there, which, in the judgment of those that understand such matters, belonged all of them once in some way to heathen worship, and on which the prophecy of Isa. ii. 20 has been so literally fulfilled."—Thus they cast their idols away, they entertain themselves no more with the care and worship of them, all trust in them is also gone. They only hasten to save themselves by flight into the caverns (נְקָרָה see Exod. xxxiii. 22 from נָקַר, to bore,) and crevices of the rocks (comp. lvii. 5). We are, moreover, reminded of the words in Luke xxiii. 30. "Then shall they begin to say to the mountains fall on us; and to the hills, cover us." For what wish can be left to those that have fled to the rocks, when the rocks themselves begin to shake, except to be covered as soon as possible from the tumbling mountains.

22 Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils:
For wherein is he to be accounted of?

1 For, behold, the LORD, the LORD of hosts,
Doth take away from Jerusalem and from Judah
[a]The stay and the staff,
[b]The whole stay of bread, and the whole stay of water,
2 The mighty man, and the man of war,
The judge, and the prophet, and the [c]prudent, and the [d]ancient,
3 The captain of fifty, and [1e]the honorable man,
And the counsellor, and the cunning artificer, and the [2]eloquent orator.
4 And I will give children to be their princes,
[f]And babes shall rule over them.
5 And the people [h]shall be oppressed,
Every one by another, and every one by his neighbour:
The child shall behave himself proudly against the ancient,

I will not be a [4]healer;
For in my house is neither bread nor clothing:

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 22. The verb חָדַל occurs several times in Isa. i. 16; xxiv. 8, coll. liii. 3. The construction with the dative of the person addressed (Dat. ethicus) has here the meaning that this ceasing is in the interest of the person addressed himself.——חָדַל with מִן: Exod. xiv. 15; xxiii. 5; Job vii. 16; Prov. xxiii. 4; 1 Sam. ix. 5; 2 Chr. xxxv. 21.

CHAP. III. Ver. 1. מַשְׁעֵן וּמַשְׁעֵנָה: logically considered there can be no difference between these two words, which moreover occur only here. But the Prophet designs by the words only a rhetorical effect. With sententious brevity he sketches thus the contents of the chapter whose first half treats of the male supports, whose second half of the female.—Examples are not few of concrete nouns which, placed along side of one another, designate the totality by the masculine and feminine endings: xi. 12; xliii. 6; Jer. xlviii. 19; Nah. ii. 13; Zech. ix. 17. It is doubtful about נְמִבְזָה וְנָמֵס, 1 Samuel xv. 9. But abstract nouns are very few that at the same time differentiate the idea as to gender by the gender endings. The most likely case of comparison is הַצֶּאֱצָאִים וְהַצְּפִעוֹת, the male and female branches (xxii. 24). It is doubtful about נְהִי נִהְיָה Mich. ii. 4 (comp. CASPARI, Micah, p. 117). מִשְׁעָן found elsewhere only 2 Sam. xxii. 19 (Ps. xviii. 19). The feminine form occurs more frequently מִשְׁעֶנֶת: Num. xxi. 19; Ps. xxiii. 4; Isa. xxxvi. 6, etc.

Ver. 4. תַּעֲלוּלִים occurs only here and lxvi. 4. The form is like תַּחֲנוּנִים, תַּעֲנוּגִים, etc. The plural can signify the abstract, and this abstract may possibly stand pro concreto; the plural may also have a simple concrete meaning. All these constructions are grammatically possible and have found their defenders. As regards the meaning of the word, the questions arise, whether the word contains the notion of "child" (comp. עוֹלֵל, מְעוֹלֵל) or the notion, "inflict, bring upon, mishandle," (comp. הִתְעַלֵּל, Judg. xix. 25; 1 Sam. xxxi. 4, etc., עֲלִילָה, עֲלִילִיָּה, מַעֲלָל, תַּעֲלוּל, lxvi. 4), or both notions, and whether it is to be taken as subject or as acc. adverbialis to designate the manner and means. That the notion "child" lies in the word appears very conclusively from the preceding נְעָרִים and from מְעוֹלֵל, ver. 12. But it is not at all necessary to exclude the notion vexatio which is decidedly demanded, lxvi. 4. One may easily unite both by translating as DELITZSCH does, "childish appetites," or "childish tricks, childish follies." But the personifying of this idea, or construing it as abstr. pro concreto (puerilia = pueri, GESENIUS) though grammatically possible, is still hard. I agree therefore with HITZIG, who translates by "with tyranny, arbitrariness." Comp. מֵישָׁרִים, נוֹרָאוֹת, פְּלָאִים, etc.

Ver. 5. (Faustrecht.) Such is the sense of נִגַּשׂ. The word is used of the violent oppression of the Egyptian taskmakers (Exod. iii. 7; v. 6 sqq.), of the creditor (Deut. xv. 2, 3), of a superior military force of an enemy (1 Sam. xiii. 6), also of overpowering fatigue (1 Sam. xiv. 24) or of an unsparingly strict judicial process (Isa. liii. 7). In our passage the Niphal, as one may see from following אִישׁ בְּאִישׁ וגו, appears intended in a reciprocal sense. Moreover Isaiah uses the word often: ver. 12; ix. 3; xiv. 2; lviii. 3; lx. 17. רָהַב tumultuari, insolenter tractare: comp. xxx. 7; li. 9.——נִקְלֶה contemtus, vilis; comp. xvi. 14; 1 Sam. xviii. 23.

Ver. 6. כִּי is rendered by many expositors "when": VITRINGA, HITZIG, EWALD, DRECHSLER, DELITZSCH. They therefore take the phrase as protasis to ver. 7. The consideration that vers. 6 and 7 evidently portray, not the reason, but rather the consequence of ver. 4, determines me also to adopt this view. By כִּי, then, a possibility is signified that may often ensue. מַכְשֵׁלָה occurs again only in the plural, Zeph. i. 3, where it means offendiculum, σκάνδαλον. Besides it is synonym of מִכְשׁוֹל. The present situation therefore is manifestly designated as a scandalous one, as a subject of offence.

Ver. 7. חֹבֵשׁ part. occurs only here. Other forms of the verb occur in Isaiah in the sense of binding and healing wounds: i. 6; xxx. 26; lxi. 1. He repels the allegation that he still has clothing and bread, and declines therefore the honor of becoming judge of his people. קָצִין is principally a poetic word. It occurs only twelve times in the Old Testament; three of these in historical books: Josh. x. 24; Judg. xi. 6, 11. Isaiah uses it four times, viz., here, i. 10; xx. 8.

Ver. 8. כָּשַׁל, stumble, totter, fall, Isaiah uses often: v. 27; viii. 15; xxviii. 13; xl. 30; lix. 10, 14, etc.——מַעֲלָל Isaiah uses only i. 16 and iii. 8, 10.——אֶל in an inimical sense, as ii. 4; Gen. iv. 8, etc.——The form לַמְרוֹת is syncopated from לְהַמְרוֹת (EWALD, § 244 b). Comp. i. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 17. מָרָה and Hiph. הִמְרָה occur very often with אֶת־פִּי ה׳: Num. xx. 24; xxvii. 14; Deut. i. 26, 43, etc. Once the Hiph. occurs with the following אֶת רוּחוֹ Ps. cvi. 33, with following דְּבַר ה׳ Ps. cv. 28 אִמְרֵי אֵל Ps. cvii. 11; once with מִשְׁפָּטַי Ezek. v. 6. And so here, too, with following עֵנֵי ה׳. In Isaiah the construction with the accusative does not again occur: מָרָה alone with the meaning "rebellem, contumacem esse," occurs again i. 20; l. 5; lxiii. 10.

Ver. 9. הַכָּרַת, which only occurs here, can, in union with פָּנִים, have no other meaning than the adverbial form of speech הִכִּיר פָּנִים (Deut. i. 17; xvi. 19; Prov. xxiv. 23; xxviii. 21), which means "dignoscere facies, distinguish the countenances, i. e., make a partial distinction" (comp. נָשָׂא פָּנִים). The notion of partiality indeed does not suit here, although not a few Jewish and Christian expositors understand the words in this sense. The context constrains us rather to go back to the simple fundamental meaning of close observance, particular notice, which is the preliminary of partial distinction. We are the more justified in this as הִכִּיר elsewhere too (lxi. 9; lxiii. 16; Gen. xxxi. 32, etc.) is used in a sense that proceeds from this fundamental meaning. הַכָּרַת פ׳ is therefore the magisterial, so to speak, the juristic, exact observance and investigation of countenances. עָנְתָה, which is likewise a legal term, also favors this view. For it is used as much of the judge that takes cognizance (Exod. xxiii. 2) as of the witness that deposes to the interrogation of the judge: Deut. xix. 16; 2 Sam. i. 16: "thy mouth hath testified (עָנָה) against thee." גָּמַל occurs in Isaiah again only lxiii. 7. The form of sentence in ver. 10 a is owing to the well known attraction, common also in Greek, by means of which the subject of the dependent phrase becomes the object of the principal verb. There is no need, therefore, of taking אִמְרוּ in the sense of prædicare. But it is simply "say, speak out loud, be not silent, that the righteous is well off." There is, thus, no need of referring to passages as Ps. xl. 11; cxlv. 6, 11. That טוֹב may mean not only bonus, but also bene habens, well off, is shown beyond contradiction by passages like Am. vi. 2; Jer. xliv. 17; Ps. cxii. 5.

Ver. 11. According to our remarks at i. 4 concerning אוֹי, it is agreeable to usus loquendi to connect it with לְרָשָׁע. Besides in the best editions they are so bound (comp. Delitzsch in loc.). Therefore רָע is to be taken in the same way as טוֹב ver. 10. To be sure, there is no passage we can cite in which רָע means infelix, as we can for טוֹב meaning felix. For Ps. cvi. 32, and Gen. xlvii. 9 רַע is both times not used of personal subjects. And there are no other places to cite. One must therefore say, that the prophet in respect of the meaning of רָע has in ver. 11 a imitated the corresponding part of ver. 10.—גְּמוּל is performance, product, desert. Comp. Judg. ix. 16; Prov. xii. 14. The word is found in Isaiah again xxxv. 4; lix. 18; lxvi. 6. What the hands of the wicked have themselves produced shall be joined to, put on them.

Ver. 12. The singular מְעוֹלֵל has general significance and hence represents an ideal plural. Comp. רֹעֵה צֹאן עֲבָדֶיךָ Gen. xlvii. 3. As regards the form of the word, which occurs here only, מְעוֹלֵל is the root form for עוֹלֵל (1 Sam. xv. 3; Isa. xiii. 16, etc.) or עוֹלָל (Jer. vi. 11; ix. 20).

Ver. 13. נִצָּב (in Isaiah only again xxi. 8) expresses the opposite of movement. נִצָּב and עָמַד along side of each other occur 1 Sam. xix. 20.—רִיב and דִּין though not seldom interchanged (comp. i. 17), still stand here side by side. But comp. Jer. xv. 10; Heb. i. 3.—The expression בּוֹא בְמִשְׁפָּט "enter into judgment" occurs only here in Isaiah. Comp. beside Job ix. 32; xiv. 3; xxii. 4; Ps. cxliii. 2; Eccl. xi. 9; xii. 14.

Ver. 14. The Piel בִּעֵר occurs in this sense in Isaiah only again v. 5; comp. Exod. xxii. 4. It is depascere, grazing of cattle. Elsewhere it is used of fire (vi. 13; xl. 16; xliv. 15; l. 11). גְּזֵלָה only here in Isaiah, גָּזֵל lxi. 8.

Ver. 15. דִּכָּא to stamp, trample (xix. 10; liii. 5, 10) is intensified by פְּנֵי עֲ׳ תִּטְחָנוּ. טָחַן is to grind, pound fine, xlvii. 2.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Chap. iii. connects quite easily and simply with chap. ii. so far as it continues the idea of the judgment, and to this effect, that it is now extended to the sphere of human existence. Chap. ii. 22 makes the appropriate transition. For therein the Prophet warns against trusting in men, who are only weak transitory creatures. Chap. iii., also, with this fundamental idea, subdivides into two parts, of which the first (1–15) treats of the men, the second (16-iv. 1) of the women. And yet we at once receive the impression that in chap. iii. he is treading ground dominated by other sentiments. For while chap. ii. discourses quite evidently of the judgment that in the last time, the great day of Jehovah, shall be passed on sub-human and superhuman creatures, chap. iii. seems only to speak of acts of judgment that do not bring the continuation of human kind into question. Moreover, in as much as an ordered government is essential to the very existence of such continuance, the removal of those in power enumerated in vers. 2, 3 does not appear to be a punishment of these themselves for their loftiness, but of the people. Those authorities appear as a benefit that is withdrawn from the sinful nation, and in their stead they are abandoned to the miseries of anarchy, or of a boy and woman government. If now the removal of these pillars, the great and mighty (vers. 2, 3), is because they on their part share the blame, still that is not the principal thought. But the chief matter is that from the nation, which (ver. 8) had "provoked the eyes of the glory" of the Lord, shall be taken away the indispensable support of its customary and natural rulers. In connection with chap. ii. one expects a specifying of the contents, that as the sub-human and superhuman magnates must be humbled so, too, must the human magnates be. But this thought comes up only at vers. 13-15. Hence vers. 1-21 make on me the impression of a discourse that originally did not belong in this connection, but which was inserted here because it still in some measure suits the context. It is possible that originally these words were directed against the bad government of Ahaz, who came to the throne as a young man of 20 years (2 Kings xvi. 2), although, taken strictly, they portray conditions that really never occurred either under Ahaz or in any other stadium of Jewish history.

Because iii. 1., presupposes the destruction of human magnates, that were for themselves and others an object of unjustifiable confidence (ii. 22), the discourse as regards its matter fits the context (comp. ii. 11). But it fits in also in chronological respects, so far as all acts of divine judgment constitute a unity; consequently all visitations that precede the last judgment belong essentially to it as precursors. But that the Prophet notwithstanding makes a distinction appears from vers. 13-15.

The order of thought in our passage, then, is as follows: After the Prophet had signified by ii. 22, that now he would proceed to the judgment against every high thing among men, he classifies in advance iii. 1 the contents of what he has to say, in that he announces that Judah and Jerusalem shall be deprived of every support, male and female. The male supports he then enumerates vers. 2, 3. If these are removed, of course only children and women remain as supports of the commonwealth. The misery of boy rule, that gradually degenerates into anarchy, is portrayed vers. 4-7 in vigorous lines. This misery is the symptom of prevalent ruin in Judah and Jerusalem, and the consequence of those crimes committed against the Lord (ver. 8), that are public and not at all denied. These, therefore, are the self-meriting cause of that misery (ver. 9); for as the righteous reap salvation as fruit of their works (ver. 10), so the wicked destruction (ver. 11). Thus it comes that children and women rule over the nation and that these bad guides lead it into destruction (ver. 12). But this self-merited temporal misfortune is only the prelude of that still higher judgment that Jehovah shall conduct in proper person which, according to chap. ii., shall take place at the end of days, and by which the Lord shall finally rescue the pith of the people, but will drag their destroyers to a merited accountability.

2. Cease ye—accounted of?—ii. 22. As, in what precedes, the trust in things falsely eminent, in money, in power, in idolatry, was demonstrated as vanity, so the same occurs here in regard to men. "Cease from men," says the Prophet. How shall man be an object of trust, how shall he be a support, seeing the principle of his life is the air that he breathes in and out of his nostrils, thus the fugitive quickly disappearing breath? Thence man himself is called so often הֶבֶל breath; Ps. xxxix. 6, 7, 12; lxii. 10, etc., comp. Gen. iv. 2.—The expression "whose breath is in his nostrils" calls to mind Gen. ii. 7; vii. 22; Job xxvii. 3.—"For wherein is he to be accounted of?" Man as such, i. e., as bearer of the divine image in earthly form (אָדָם) is of course of great value before God. Comp. Ps. viii. 5 sqq.; Job vii. 17. In these passages the inquiry "what is man" reminds one very much of the inquiry of our Prophet. But as helper, saviour, defender, support, man counts for little, yea less than nothing, according to Ps. lxii. 10. For as one knows at once from iii. 1 sqq., human props may in a twinkling all of them be taken away. The preposition בְּ stands here as elsewhere (comp. vii. 2) as sign of the price that is regarded as the means for purchasing the wares or work.

3. For behold—eloquent orator.—Ch. iii. 1-3. The solemn accumulation of the names of God that occurs here, occurs in like manner i. 24; x. 16, 33; xix. 4. The subject addressed appears here also the chief city and the chief tribe of the people of Israel. But while, i. and ii., it is always said "Judah and Jerusalem," here (ver. 8) it is said "Jerusalem and Judah." This is not without meaning, and we are perhaps justified in finding therein a support for the conjecture expressed above, that our passage did not originate at the same time with what precedes and what follows it, but is inserted here. The following words: "the whole stay of bread and the whole stay of water" appear to interrupt the connection. For when, vers. 2, 3, the different categories of kinds of human callings are enumerated, and ver. 16 sqq., the proud, aristocratic, decked out ladies are portrayed, is that not the specification of the ideas משען and משענה, stay and staff? And what have bread and water to do here, seeing everything impersonal has already been noticed above ii. 13-16? It is conceivable that a reader, who did not understand the relation of the two words to what follows, had made a gloss of them in this sense, and that this gloss then had crept into the text. Such is the conjecture of HITZIG, KNOBEL, MEIER, and—though afterwards retracted—of GESENIUS and UMBREIT. The expression "stay" might call to mind the expression "comfort your hearts with a morsel of bread" (Gen. xviii. 5; Judg. xix. 5, 8; Ps. civ. 15) and the expression "staff of bread" (Lev. xxvi. 26; Ezek. iv. 16; 5, 16). That just bread and water are named as corresponding to משען and משענה might have its reason in this, that they recognized in bread the female principle and in water the male. But it is always doubtful to assume an interpolation only on internal grounds. EWALD and DRECHSLER understand the words in a figurative sense. The stay of bread and of water signify the supports that are necessary as bread and water. But KNOBEL justly remarks that this were an unheard of trope. May not all those be called "staffs of bread and water" that provide the state with bread and water, i. e., with all that pertains to daily bread? Call to mind the explanation of the fourth petition in LUTHER's catechism, wherein "pious and faithful rulers" and "good government" are reckoned as daily bread too. Staff of bread, etc., would be therefore, not the bread and water themselves as supports for preserving life (Genitive of the subject), but the supports on which bread and water, i. e., the necessities and nourishment of life depend (genitive of the object).

In the following enumeration, as DRECHSLER remarks, the instructors and military profession are especially represented. Even the entire apparatus of state machinery of that day is mentioned. But as all that are named are designated as those that the Lord takes away, it is seen that they are all regarded as false supports. They may even be that per se in so far as they ought not to exist at all among the people of God; as e. g., the קֹסֵם, diviner and the נְבוֹן לָחַשׁ, expert enchanter, (Deut. xviii. 10-14). לַחַשׁ is the murmuratio (magia murmurata Apul.), the muttered repetition of the magic formulas (xxvi. 16); נבון occurs again v. 21; xxix. 14.

Even the נָבִיא may, according to the context and the kindred passage ix. 14, be only prophets that prophesy falsely in the name of Jehovah. The use of the rest of the callings named is indeed legally justified, but nevertheless they are subject to abuse. One may indeed cast a doubt on the legality of the נְשׂוּא פָנִים (comp. ix. 14) the amicus regis, the preferred favorite, but not on that of the others. Especially the men of war appear to be indispensable, whence each of the verses 2 and 3 begins with the naming of such. גִּבּוֹר seems to mean 'the warrior proved by deeds; אִישׁ מִלְחָמָה the man of war in general; שַׂר־חֲמִשִּׁים the rank of captain; while the שׁוֹפֵט = state officer and זָקֵן = officer of the congregation. Ahithophel and Hushai (2 Sam. xvii.) are practical illustrations of יוֹעֵץ, counsellor. The חֲכַם חֲרָשִׁים is the engineer, master of the preparation of warlike weapons and military machines (comp. on Jer. xxiv. 1).

4. And I will give — a ruler of the people.—Vers. 4-7. When a state trusts to an arm of flesh, and puts its trust solely in its princes and men of might, in its diplomats and generals, in a word, in the strength of its men, and the Lord takes away these strong ones as false supports, then, of course, a condition must ensue in which weak hands manage the rudder of state. No earthly state has continuously maintained a position strong and flourishing. One need only call to mind the world-monarchies. That gradual weakening of the world-power indicated in Daniel's image of the monarchies (Dan. ii.), takes place also within each individual kingdom. Call to mind the vigorous Assyrian rulers, a Tiglath Pileser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and the inglorious end of the last of their successors, whatever may have been his name: think of Nebuchadnezzar, and Belshazzar, of Cyrus and Darius Codomannus, of Augustus and Romulus Augustulus, etc. In Judah, too, it was not different. Zedekiah was a weakling that perpetually wavered between a fear of Jehovah's prophet and of his own powerful subjects. It may, therefore, be said that not some quite definite historical fact is prophesied here, but a condition of punishment is threatened such as always and everywhere must ensue where the strength of a national life is exhausted, and the end approaches (comp. Eccl. x. 16).

When weak hands hold the reins of government a condition of lawlessness ensues, and of defencelessness for the weak. The strong then do as they wish. They exercise club law. A further consequence of that anarchical condition is that those of lower rank no longer submit to the higher ranks, but, in wicked abuse of their physical strength, lift themselves above them. The misery of that anarchical condition, however, stands out in strongest relief when at last no one will tolerate any government. Although the inhabitants would gladly make a ruler of any one that rises in any degree above the universal wretchedness (say any one that has still a good coat), yet every one on whom they would put this honor will resist it with all his might. "Under thy hand," comp. Gen. xli. 35; 2 Kings viii. 20. With loud voice will the chosen man emphatically protest. This is indicated by the expression יִשָּׂא to which קוֹל must be supplied (xlii. 2, 11). "I will not be surgeon," he says, by which he calls the state life sick. [" The sick man," as modern designation for the Turkish Empire.—Tr.].

[On ver. 4. "I will give children." "Some apply this, in a strict sense, to the weak and wicked reign of Ahaz, others in a wider sense to the series of weak kings after Isaiah. But there is no need of restricting it to kings at all. The most probable opinion is that incompetent rulers are called boys or children not in respect to age but character.—J. A. A. Similarly Barnes.

On ver. 6. "The government shall go a begging. It is taken for granted that there is no way of redressing all these grievances, and bringing things into order again, but by good magistrates, who shall be invested with power by common consent, and shall exert that power for the good of the community. And it is probable that this was in many places the true origin of government; men found it necessary to unite in a subjection to one who was thought fit for such a trust,—being aware that they must be ruled or ruined."—M. Henry.

On ver. 7. "The last clause does not simply mean do not make me, but you must not or you shall not make me a ruler."—J. A. A.

"The meaning is, that the state of affairs was so ruinous and calamitous that he would not attempt to restore them—as if in the body, disease should have so far progressed that he would not undertake to restore the person, and have him die under his hands, so as to expose himself to the reproach of being an unsuccessful and unskilful physician."—Barnes.

On ver. 9. "The sense is not that their looks betray them, but that they make no effort at concealment, as appears from the reference to Sodom. The expression of the same idea first in a positive and then in a negative form is not uncommon in Scripture, and is a natural if not an English idiom. Madame D. Arblay, in her memoirs of Dr. Burney, speaks of Omiah, the Tahitian, brought home by Capt. Cook, as uttering first affirmatively, etc., then negatively all the little sentences that he attempted to utter."—J. A. A.

On ver. 10. "The righteous are encouraged by the assurance that the judgments of God shall not be indiscriminate.—The object of address seems to be not the prophets or ministers of God, but the people at large or men indefinitely."—J. A. A.

"Whatever becomes of the unrighteous nation, let the righteous man know that he shall not be lost in the crowd of sinners: the Judge of all the earth will not slay the righteous with the wicked (Gen. xviii. 25); no, assure him, in God's name, that it shall be well with him. The property of the trouble shall be altered to him, and he shall be hidden in the day of the Lord's anger. —M. Henry.]

5. For Jerusalem—thy paths.—Ver. 8-12. Such a condition of anarchy is only a symptom of the outward and inward decay. It is never blameless, but always blameworthy misfortune. As the second hemistich of ver. 8, evidently describes the inward decay, the first must consequently be referred to the outward. But hemistich 2 is strung on with כִּי with a chain-like effect. The anarchy is the symptom of the outward decay; but the outward decay is the consequence of that which is inward. With DRECHSLER I translate by "insult the eyes of his glory." It is evident, that the Prophet would indicate a direct antithesis between the glory of Jehovah, and the bad tongues and works, as also an antithesis between "the eyes of the loftiness of man" ii. 11; v. 15 and "the eyes of the glory of Jehovah." The eyes of God who is God of light (lx. 19; Mich. vii. 8; 1 Jno. i. 5) are insulted just by this, that they must see the works of darkness. It seems to me, on this account, clear that the divine majesty is designated as glorious chiefly in respect to its purity and holiness; therefore ethically. That, moreover, the eyes of the glory of God, are not something different from the eyes of God Himself is just as clear as that the eyes of the glory must themselves be glorious. They are here the organ of the manifestation of His glory (comp. Rev. ii. 18), as in other places it speaks of the arm of His salvation (xl. 10), of His holiness, (lii. 10) of His strength (lxii. 8). Besides the expression is only found here, as may be said also of the defective writing of it.

The Prophet had (ver. 8) assigned the badness of the words and work as the cause of the fall. But is this accusation well founded? Yes, it is. A double and unexceptionable witness testifies to its truth: 1.) the cognitio vultuum, knowledge of countenances. Thus we might translate: "appearance testifies against thee." (See Text. and Gr.)

2.) Their own declaration, though not made with this intention. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." The godless cannot lock up that of which his heart is full. The mouth, as it were, foams over involuntarily with it. The Sodomites, too, (comp. i. 9, 10) spoke out insolently the shameful purpose they had in mind (Gen. xix. 3). So the Israelites made no concealment of the evil they had in mind. Therefore their ruin is merited (comp. Gen. l. 15, 17) and just. The sentence: "woe to them, for they have hurt themselves" which, ver. 9 b, is especially applied to Israel, is established in what follows, by stating in its double aspect the fundamental and universal truth that underlies it, that a man must reap what he sows. First, the righteous is pronounced blessed because he shall eat the (good) fruits of his (good) works. As that universal truth of the causal connection between works and the fate of men is not expressed, but assumed, so that aspect of it that relates to the righteous is not expressed in doctrinal form, but, vigorous and life like, in the form of a summons to declare the righteous blessed.

The happiness of the righteous will consist in this, that he shall enjoy the fruit of his works (Prov. i. 31). To the wicked, on the other hand, a woe is proclaimed. The happiness of the pious is announced to every one; the vengence that shall overtake the wicked is announced to himself alone.

Ver. 12. Is a resumé. In these words the whole course of thought from vers. 1–11., is comprehended again. The two halves of ver. 12 begin with עַמִּי "My people" put before absolutely, which shows how much the Lord loves His people, and how much the state of things portrayed makes Him sorry for His people. The word נֹגְשִׂים, oppressors, is used of those whom the people, for want of better, in consequence of that oppression mentioned in ver. 5, had been obliged to make chiefs. By this is intimated that these supports of necessity shall themselves be no proper chiefs that merit the name, but only rude oppressors. Comp. ix. 3; xiv. 2; lx. 17. They are so, not in spite of, but just because of their being children, boys.

מְאַשֵּׁר qui rectâ ducit, comp. i. 17. The word is meant ironically, for how else could the מאשר be a מַתְעֶה? Our passage as already remarked stands in evident connection with ix. 15. There too the leaders are called misleaders; there, too, the word בלע is used of those who mislead, for they are called מְבֻלָּעִים. We see by this that the Prophet has not in mind the same persons in the second half of the verse that he has in the first. He speaks in the second clause of the false prophets, as in ix. 14 sq. Like flies in honey, this vermin is ever found where there are bad rulers. For they need false prophets to cover over their doings. These false prophets, however, devour the path of the people. DELITZSCH (like JEROME, THEODORET, LUTHER before him) understands by "the way of their paths" the right way, the way of the law. "The prophets, that ought to preach it, say mum, mum, and retain it swallowed. It has gone into oblivion by false prophetic, erroneous preaching." But it seems to me as if then it must not read דרך ארחתיך, the way of thy paths. For this is just the way that Israel actually treads, the direction that its life path actually tends. It must then read way of Jehovah (דֶּרֶךְ י׳ as Ps. xviii. 22, or ד׳ אֱמוּנָה, or ד׳ מִצְוֹתֶי, as Ps. cxix. 30, 32, or ארַח מִשְׁפָּט as Isa. xl. 14 or ד׳ שָׁלוֹם as lix. 8, or such like. I therefore agree with the explanation of those that take בלע in a metaphorical sense like that where this word is elsewhere used of the destruction of a city (2 Sam. xx. 19, 20) or of a wall (Lam. ii. 8). The expression only occurs in this place in relation to a way, but it must mean nothing else than to direct the path of one's life down into the depths of destruction in which the devourers themselves are. Comp. Job vi. 18.

6. The Lord standeth up—the Lord of Hosts.—Vers. 13-15. At first sight one might think these three verses bring the further explication of one matter of moment in vers. 1-12, viz., the more particular laying down of the judgment against the chiefs of the nation which was only indicated in ver. 1, by מֵסִיר "taking away" and in ver. 12 by the reproach uttered against them.

But we see from the solemnity of ver. 13, especially from the antithesis between עַמִּים and עַמִּי (עַמּוֹ vers. 14, 15), "the people and His people" that we are introduced into quite another moment of time. For evidently vers. 13-15 depict again the judgment of the world. "The world's judgment presents itself anew before his soul," says DELITZSCH. "The people" ver. 13, recalls distinctly "the nations" and "many people" of ii. 2-4. However, it is not the judging of the nations generally that is portrayed, but only the judging of the people of God as a part of this universal judgment. Moreover, not of the nation in its totality, but of the destroyers of this totality, the princes and elders (ver. 14 a). These appear, therefore, as the chief agents of that inward and outward decay that has invaded the nation. If, according to ii. 3, all nations are to stream to the mountain of the Lord, because the law shall go forth out of Zion, then, evidently, Jerusalem itself must previously be cleansed and filled with the word of God. This cleansing, according to ix. 13 sqq., begins with this, that the Lord will cast off from Israel head and tail. The elders are the head, the false prophets are the tail. Here too, though a briefer, still a comprehensible, hint is given that indicates the sort of purifying that Israel itself must undergo in order to become what, according to ii. 3, it ought to become. This hint makes on me the impression that iii. 1-12 does, viz., that a word spoken on some other occasion has been applied to this purpose. Comp., the comment on ver. 16 sqq. Unmoved and unmovable (comp. Gen. xxxvii. 7) i. e., as one whom no one can crowd from this place, the Lord conducts the judgment; and that standing, not sitting, therefore ready and prepared for instant execution of the judgment, He exercises the magisterial function, Ps. lxxxii. 1, which so far resembles our passage that it also describes the judgment upon the magistrates of the people, represents too, the Lord as a judge in standing posture. Elsewhere He is represented as sitting in judgment: Ps. ix. 5; xxix. 10; Joel iv. 12, etc.

The discourse of the Lord begins with the second clause of ver. 14, with ואתם, "but ye," thus with a conclusion to which the premise must be supplied. It is the same construction as Ps. ii. 6. The premise to be supplied must be to this effect: "I have made you commanders that ye might administer justice. But ye," etc. The princes have regarded the nation as their domain which they might use up as they pleased. They have, therefore, themselves become the cattle from which they ought to have protected the vineyard. The he-goat had become gardener (DELITZSCH). Comp. i. 23; Mich. iii. 1-3. The image of the devoured vineyard is at once explained; robbery, plunder wrested from the poor is found in their houses. To the "but you" of ver. 14 corresponds an equally emphatic "what mean ye" that begins ver. 15. The flow of words is so fast that even the כִּי for, that otherwise would follow the question (comp. xxii. 1, 16) is wanting (comp. Jon. i. 6, where, however, the construction is somewhat different). To grind to pieces the face of a man appears to me to be the expression for beating to pieces the face (1 Kings xxii. 24; Mich. iv. 14) in the intensest degree. The expression is exactly the opposite of permulcere faciem חלה פ׳ Ps. xlv. 13; Prov. xix. 6. The high significance of the declaration is, in conclusion, evidenced by the reference of it to "the Lord Jehovah Sabaoth," concerning which see the comment at i. 9, 24.

[On ver. 13. "Nations here as often elsewhere means the tribes of Israel. See Gen. xlix. 10; Deut. xxxii. 8; xxxiii. 3, 19; 1 Kings xxii. 28; Mich. i. 2."—J. A. A.

On ver. 15. "Grind the faces of the poor. The simplest and most natural interpretation is that which applies it to the act of grinding the face upon the ground by trampling on the body, thus giving the noun and verb their proper meaning and making the parallelism more exact."—J. A. A.]

B.—The judgment upon the godless women.

CHAP. III. 16—IV. 1.

16 Moreover the LORD saith,
Because the daughters of Zion are haughty,
And walk with stretched forth necks
And [1]wanton eyes,
Walking and [2]mincing as they go,
And making a tinkling with their feet:
17 Therefore the LORD will smite with a scab
The crown of the head of the daughters of Zion,
And the LORD will [3]discover their secret parts.
18 In that day the LORD will take away
The bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet,
And their [4]cauls, and their round tires like the moon,
19 The [5]chains, and the bracelets, and the [6]mufflers,

20 The bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands,
And the [7]tablets, and the earrings,
21 The rings, and nose jewels,
22 The changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles,
And the wimples, and the crisping pins,
23 The glasses, and the fine linen,
And the hoods, and the veils.
24 And it shall come to pass, that instead of sweet smell, there shall be stink;
And instead of a girdle, a rent;
And instead of well set hair, baldness;
And instead of a stomacher, a girding of sackcloth;
And burning, instead of beauty.
25 Thy men shall fall by the sword,
And thy [8]mighty in the war.
26 And her gates shall lament and mourn;
And she being[9] [10]desolate shall sit upon the ground.

CHAP. IV. 1 And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying,
We will eat our own bread,
And wear our own apparel:
Only [11]let us be called by thy name,
[12]To take away our reproach.

[1] Heb. deceiving with their eyes.

[3] Heb. make naked.
[4] Or, networks.
[5] Or, sweet balls.
[6] Or, spangled ornaments.
[7] Heb. houses of the soul.
[8] Heb. might.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This section, too, has for its subject an event that cannot possibly coincide with the last judgment to which ii., refers. For that great day, the last of all, will not have to do with a mere sinking down from the heights of luxury and pride to the plane of poverty; it will not treat of the exchange of a girdle for a rope, of a mantle for a sack, nor of a defeat in war, nor of mournful sitting on the ruins of the city; there will be nothing said of wives wanting nothing beside the prop of a man. For in that day all will be over; the old world generally shall be out and out destroyed in order to make room for a new. Thus this section, too, makes the impression of being some declaration, meant originally to serve some special object, but inserted here in order to complete the grand picture of the future in this particular aspect. The Prophet had occasion once, and this may likely have been in the days of Uzziah or Jotham, to declare himself against the irruption of pomp of dress and luxury. This declaration, or at least a part of it, he pieces in here to his comprehensive prophecy of judgment. And he may do this. For whenever this denunciation against the arrogance of woman may have been fulfilled, such fulfilment always constitutes a part of the great whole of judgment which is to be completed with the judgment of the last day. The Prophet assumes in the prophecy that stands at the head (ii. 2-4), that Israel itself, too, must be subjected to a judgment. For only by a great process of refining can the mountain of Jehovah rise to the height which, according to ii. 2, it must attain, and only when Zion itself is full of the Spirit of God can it become the embodied ideal for all nations. How this refining is to take place in every respect and at different times is described in what follows up to iv. 1. In this description the Prophet makes use also of older utterances, which were perhaps too short to appear independently, and that might more suitably be joined in just here than elsewhere. Thus there was a section of this sort that referred to the men, iii. 1 sqq.; so now, too, we have one that has the women for a theme. The connecting formula, "and Jehovah said," favors the view that this is a joined on piece. It would be quite superfluous if the discourse proceeded from one mould. Comp. on this the comment on ver. 16. The order of thought is as follows: The luxurious pride of the women, too, shall be humbled (ver. 16, 17). In the day that this shall happen all their splendid garments shall be taken from them (vers. 18–23) and replaced by wretched ones to correspond (ver. 24). Their husbands, too, they shall lose in a brief space (ver. 25), lamenting and desolated, they shall sit in the gates (ver. 26); yea, their want shall be so great that seven women shall attach themselves to one man, without demanding support from him, only thereby to escape the misfortune of being unmarried (iv. 1).

[On ver. 16 sqq. "The Prophet here resumes the thread which had been dropped or broken at the close of ver. 12, and recurs to the undue predominance of female influence, but particularly to the prevalent excess of female luxury, not only as sinful in itself but as a chief cause of the violence and social disorder previously mentioned, and therefore to be punished by disease, widowhood, and shameful exposure. These two verses (16, 17), like the sixth and seventh, form one continued sentence. And Jehovah said (in addition to what goes before, as if beginning a new section of the prophecy), because the daughters of Zion (the women of Jerusalem, with special reference to those connected with the leading men," etc.)—J. A. A.

On ver. 18. "As in other cases where a variety of detached particulars are enumerated simply by their names it is now very difficult to identify some of them. This is the less to be regretted, as the main design of the enumeration was to show the prevalent extravagance in dress, an effect not wholly dependent on an exact interpretation of the several items. The interest of the passage in its details is not exegetical but archæological."—J. A. A.

On ver. 26. "The gates of Zion are said to mourn, by a rhetorical substitution of the place of action for the agent, or because a place filled with cries seems itself to utter them. She is described, not as lying, but as sitting on the ground. So on one of Vespasian's coins, a woman is represented in a sitting posture, leaning against a palm-tree, with the legend Judæa Capta."—J. A. A.]

2. Moreover the Lord—secret parts.—Vers. 16, 17. The formula "and the LORD saith" occurs in Isaiah on the whole, relatively not often. It occurs in all thirty-two times; of these, sixteen times in the historical chapters xxxvi. xxxix., where it indicates the actual exchange of words in conversation. Beside that, it is only employed where the Lord appears actually speaking, and speaks of Himself in the first person (comp. xxiii. 12; xxix. 13; xlix. 3, 6; lxiii. 8). But in our passage Jehovah is immediately spoken of again in the third person. "The Lord will smite, the LORD will uncover" ver. 17. Moreover, in what follows, the Lord is not introduced again as speaker. It is thus seen that by this formula what follows is only marked as God's word so far as its contents are concerned, and not formally so. But as this is self-evident, it is further plain, that the formula is meant to serve as a transition, a link, a means of uniting. We recognize, therefore, in it a sign that here is a piece of an address, already on hand, that has been skilfully strung on here. As in ii. 11 it was said that all lofty looks shall be humbled and all haughtiness of men be bowed down, so the Prophet here with entire justice declares that also feminine arrogance must expect its share in this judgment. Are proud, etc., stands, therefore, in direct relation with the entire section ii. 6-17. What is said there in general of riches (ver. 7), of arrogance and haughtiness (vers. 11, 12, 17) of works of splendour (ver. 16), has its special application to the proud display of the women. But our passage stands in still closer connection with מַשְׁעֵנָה supportress iii. 1. We showed there that this expression points to the second half of this chapter where the women are spoken of. That these, too, are called "supports," staffs, refers evidently to the fact that women, even in the commonwealth of Israel, played a considerable part. Let it be remembered that the Book of Kings expressly names the mother of each king. Individual women are designated as enjoying political influence in a high degree; Deborah (Judg. iv.); Bathsheba (1 Kings i.); Jezebel (1 Kings xvi. 31 sqq.); Athaliah (2 Kings xi.). We are expressly informed that Solomon's wives had a bad influence over him (1 Kings xi. 3 sqq.). As long as a regular king ruled there must be a woman's court household. If there were none such. then there would be surely no king. How closely kingdom and harem hung together, may be seen from the fact that the possession of the harem obtained as a sign that the royal dignity had been received. Therefore Absalom lay publicly with the concubines of his father (2 Sam. xvi. 21). David, too, inherited the wives of Saul, and this is related in a connection (2 Sam. xii. 8) that leads us to conclude that the fact must have been important to the recognition of David's succession to the throne being a rightful one. Adonijah, after David's death, begs for the hand of Abishag the Shunamite, and we see from Solomon's reply that he regarded this request as an attempt to use the possession of the concubine as a step to the throne (1 Kings ii. 22). Comp. MICHAELIS, Mos. Recht, I. p. 207. SAALSCHUETS, Das Mos. Recht, p. 85. According to this the harem was, in some measure, a political institution, an attribute of royalty as such, and in so far in a special sense a support of the life of the state. Yet if Isaiah here has especially in mind the royal ladies, that does not exclude the other noble and proud women from a share in his reproachs.

In וַתֵּלַכְנָה the imperfect with vav. consec. is not necessarily to be construed as aorist. The word מְשַׂקְּרוֹת is ἅπαξ λεγ. The root שָׂקַר even does not again occur in all the Old Testament. The Aramaic סְקַר may be most suitable to compare here, which means "intueri, conspicari." The Piel then may have the meaning "blinking, winking:" עֵינַיִם stands in the accusat., like גָּרוֹן. There is indeed a סָקַר that means to color, to paint, whence also, the CHALD., ABARBANEL and others express this idea (LUTHER: with painted faces). But the custom of painting the eye-brows black is so universal a custom of the Orient, that it has been justly objected, Isaiah would hardly have spoken out against it. Moreover the rest of the reproachful expressions relate to bodily gestures. BUXTORF in Lex. Chald., Talm, et Rabb., p. 1542 cites the talmudic dictum: "Non creavit deus mulierum ex capite Adami, ne caput suum nimium ornaret and efferret; neque ex oculo, ne esset סַקְרָנִית, oculis omnia observans." HITZIG, justly cites Plaut. Aulul. I. 1, 2: "circumspectatrix cum oculis tuis emissiciis," although this is spoken of an old tramp with thievish propensities. Also טָפַף (from which טַף Toppler, Tripler, Child) is ἅπ. λεγ. The tripping short steps are the necessary consequences of the step-chains which were fastened by means of a ring (עֶכֶס, ver. 18, again only in Prov. vii. 22) surrounding the leg above the ankle joint. The little chains themselves were called צְעָדוֹת ver. 20. The verb עָכַס, which occurs only here, is denominative. According to the context the meaning can be nothing else than; rattling the rings to make a noise, to clink. Comp. HERZOG'S R. Encycl. VII. p. 731. As chastisement for such arrogance the daughters of Zion shall be punished with disgraceful disorders. Their proud head shall become scurfy, covered with scabs, thus loathsomely unclean (Lev. xiii. 2, 6-8; xiv. 56). שִׂפַּח, (which, written with שׂ, occurs here only), is according to some a denominative from מִסְפַּחַת, סַפַּחַת, scab. scurf (vid. Lev. xiii. xiv.) Still it is possible שפח means, to make flow, suppurate, and thus deprive of the hair, and that, so derived, ספחת means the fluid scab or scurf. Comp., at xxxvii. 30. Their shame, to whose impure pleasure those luxurious gestures were meant to minister, shall be disgracefully exposed (xlvii. 3; Jer. xiii. 22, 26; Ezek. xvi. 37, etc.). The singular פֹּת (from פּאת, פָּתָה פָּתַח, pat-ere) occurs only here; the plural 1 Kings vii. 50 of the cardo femina from an obvious resemblance.—עָרָה (from which עֶרְוָה and עָרוֹת loca nuda (xix. 7) which does not occur in the Kal, means nudum esse, hence Piel to make bare, (in Isaiah again only xxii. 6); Hiphil, (because what has been hitherto concealed, when it is laid bare, is at the same time poured out) effundere, (liii. 12), Niphal, effundi (xxxii. 15).

Without excluding the literal rendering of ver. 17, we may still construe the language first in an inexact sense and generalize it. In the day of judgment loathsome uncleanness shall take the place of the splendor of Zion's daughters; disgrace and shame the place of their proud display. The Prophet has in this expressed something in general which he proceeds to specify in what follows. Feminine interest revolves chiefly around two poles: the decking out of the body and the surrender of the body to the husband; therefore about dress and husbands. Therefore the disgrace of the daughters of Zion in what follows is portrayed in these two respects. And first it is shown of what they shall be deprived in the way of dress (ver. 18-23), and what shall be given them instead (ver. 24).

3. In that day—instead of beauty.—Vers. 18-24 "In that day," refers back immediately to ver. 17. But we showed above that not the day of the last judgment is meant here, but only a prelude to it, which, of course, however, combines with the last judgment to make a unity of divine world-judgment. In that day, then, the Lord will take away the adornment (תפארת). All that follows is summed up under this word. The word is found often in both parts of Isa. iv. 2; x. 12; xiii. 19; xliv. 13; lii. 1; lxii. 3; lxiii. 14, etc.). Concerning the עכסים comp., at ver. 16. Concerning the שׁביסים there are two views held. From SCHROEDER down a number of expositors (ROSENMUELLER, WINER, EWALD, KNOBEL, DRECHSLER) have taken the word for a kindred form of the Arabic schumeisa (diminutive of schems, the sun), the letters m and b being interchanged, as is common between these two kindred letters: SCHROEDER proves, besides, from THEOPH, hist. pl. IX. 4 and PLIN. H. N. XII. 14, Σαβις to have been a name of the sun among the Arabians. The meaning then would be little suns i. e., a metallic ornament shaped like a sun. That would suit very well to the following שַׂהֲרֹן, crescents, as generally to the words that precede and follow, all of which designate metal ornaments. In as much as in the following list occur several expressions borrowed from the Arabic (comp. DRECHSLER on ii. 6), and this word in Hebrew is ἁπ λεγ., and even the root שָׁבַס does not again occur, so that word and thing both appear to be of foreign origin, I prefer this view. The other view takes שָׁבַס in the sense of שָׁבַץ and (Aram,) שְׁבַשׁ "plectere, to braid," and שְׁבִיס therefore, for opus reticulatum (LXX ἐμπλόκια) network. hair net: (DELITZSCH, "ribbons for the forehead worn underneath the hair net, and braided of gold or silver thread:" BUXTORF, Lex. Chald., p. 2315, "Ornamentum," etc., a peculiar ribbon ornament, extending in front from one ear to the other"). The שׂהרנים are lunulæ, μηνίσκοι, moonshaped, or rather half-moon shaped decorations. They are mentioned Judg. viii. 21, 26 as neck ornaments of camels. That they had a moon shape appears from this, that sahro in the Syriac, schahr in the Arabic mean the moon. Here, too, therefore word and thing are certainly of foreign origin. ־ֹן is a diminutive ending, comp. אִישׁוֹן; EWALD § 167, a.—נְטִפוֹת (Judg. viii. 26) from נָטַף to drop (comp. Ex. xxx. 34, dropping resin, and Job. xxxvi. 27) are a drop shaped ornament, as they were likely worn as pendants from the ears (ear drops). שֵׁרוֹת (ἁπ. λεγ,) from שָׁרַר torquere, to twist, is torques, a collar, chain, not for the neck, however, but an armlet, bracelet, as is to be seen from the dialects. ONKELOS, e. g., translates, Gen. xxiv. 22, 30, 47, the Hebrew word צָמִיד (the proper word for bracelet for the arm) by שֵׁירָא. Comp., too, שַׁרְשְׁרָה and שַׁרְשָׁה chains Exod. xxviii. 14, 22.—רְעָלוֹת (ἁπ. λεγ.), from רָעַל to tremble, wave, are veils, and that, as appears, of a costly kind: viz. HERZOG, R. Encycl. VII. p. 728.—פְּאֵרִים are diadems, tiaræ, that are also elsewhere named as part of the head ornament of the priesthood (Exod. xxxix. 28; Ezek. xliv. 18), or of the dress of a bridegroom (Isaiah lxi. 10). What part of the head covering or what sort, is not clear.—צְעָדָה from צָעַד, to march, pace, on account of the etymology seems most naturally to mean the step chains (comp. on תעכסנה, ver. 16). But 2 Sam. v. 24 and 1 Chr. xiv. 15, where the word occurs, it seems to mean "the stepping, walking along;" and Num. xxxi. 50; 2 Sam. i. 10 אֶצְעָדָה designates arm bands, arm clasps, as one sees clearly in 2 Sam. i. 10 from the עַל־זְרֹעוֹ. Hence many expositors, both old and new, (among the last, EWALD), translate "arm clasps." And yet it is only אֶצְעָדָה that has this meaning. The circumstance that צְעָדָה occurs twice in the sense of "walking along" is no obstacle to its meaning step-chainlets. For the abstract word could easily be taken in a concrete sense; the walking in the sense of the instrument of walking.—קִשֻּׁרִים (from קָשַׁר to bind) are, according to Jer. ii. 32, comp. Isa. xlix. 18, mentioned as pieces of a bride's outfit. But whether the girdle is meant or bandages (perhaps the breastband, στηθόδεσμος LXX. in Jer. ii. 32) is uncertain.—בָּתֵּי הַנֶּפֶשׁ are smelling bottles. For בית often stands for receptacle, place of storage generally (comp. Exod. xxvi. 29; Job viii. 17; Ezek. xli. 9, and for the very common use of this word in Aram. and Rabb. language, see BUXTORF, Lex. p. 301 sqq.). נֶפֶשׁ, however is breath, scent (comp. Niphal הִנָּפֵשׁ respirare, to breathe out, Exod. xxiii. 12; xxxi. 17. עֲצַת נֶפֶשׁ fragrant wood, Prov. xxvii. 9; and the original passage Gen. i. 20, 30; Job xli. 13). The expression occurs only here—לְחָשִׁים (comp. ver. 3; xxvi. 16) are instruments of magic, amulets.—טַבָּעֹת from טָבַע, imprimere, is the ring, generally, and especially the signet ring. Comp. Gen. xli. 42; Exod. xxv. 12, 14, and many places beside in Exodus.—נִזְמֵי הָאַף are the nose rings which are in use in the East to the present day. Comp. Prov. xi. 22; Ezek. xvi. 12; WINER R. W. B. the word, nose-ring.

So far the prophet has named articles of embellishment made of metal. In what follows he chiefly enumerates articles of clothing proper.—The מַחֲלָצוֹת, according to Zech. iii. 4, are such as are the opposite of filthy garments, therefore stately, splendid clothes. According to the fundamental meaning (חָלַץ, extrahere, exuere) they are clothes that one takes off at home, comp. חֲלִיפוֹת. The expression appears to be one of general meaning, and occurs only here, and in the passage cited from Zech.—מַעֲטָפוֹת (properly covers, from עָטַף operire) are mentioned only here. The word in Arabic signifies the second tunic, broader, longer and provided with sleeves, that corresponds to the Roman stola, the garment peculiar to women.—מִטְפָּחֹת from טפח expandere (xlviii. 13) is the great wide over all, shawl (Ruth iii. 15, the only place beside that the word occurs). חָרִיט is found beside only 2 Kings v. 23, from which place it is seen that it means a bag or pocket that may serve to carry money.—גִּלְיֹנִים, according to LXX. would be διαφανῆ Λακωνικά, i. e., Lacedæmonian gauze dresses that expose the body more than cover it. But גִּלָּיוֹן, viii. 1, is the smooth, polished tablet. Such served for mirrors, as the ancients knew nothing of glass mirrors. Travellers assure us that such mirrors in the form of small plates set in a ring are worn to this day. Comp. HERZOG, R. Encycl. XIV., p. 666.—סְדִינִים are σινδόνες, i. e., garments of fine India linen. It is debated whether undergarments, such as shirts, are meant, or some sort of light thing to throw over one. The word is found again Judg. xiv. 12 sq.; Prov. xxxi. 24.—צְנִיפוֹת (from צָנַף, tegere, velare) are the head-band, turban. The word bands, turbans, occurs lxii. 3; Job xxix. 14; Zech. iii. 5.—רְדִיד (from רָדַד spread, spread under, spread out, xlv. 1; Ps. cxliv. 2; 1 Kings vi. 32) is the wide veil that covered over the rest of the clothes (Arab. rida ridat) Song of Sol. v. 7.—But not only shall all תִּפְאֶרֶת adornment, ver. 18, be taken away, they shall also be replaced by worse things. Instead of בֹּשֶׂם, balsam, (product of the balsam bush, vid. Exod. xxx. 23; Ezek. xxvii. 22; 1 Kings x. 10) מַק shall be given. This latter word is only found again v. 24, where, however, it is written מָק, which has no effect on the meaning. The root מָקַק, diffluere is used of the flowing of matter from a wound; e. g. Ps. xxxviii. 6. מַק seems therefore rather to mean matter than the dry decay. In place of חֲגוֹרָה (apron, Gen. iii. 7; girdle, Isa. xxxii. 11; 1 K. ii. 5) shall be a rope, נִקְפָּה. The word is ἁπ. λεγ. There is conflict regarding the meaning. Some derive it from נָקַף percutere, to strike (x. 34; xvii. 6) and take it in the sense of vulnus (so the CHALD. and the most of the Jewish expositors). But this meaning does not well suit the context. It is better to derive it from נָקַף =circuire, gyrare, circle, gyrate (see xxix. 1; Hiphil הִקִּיף). נִקְפָּה would be, then, feminine of נֶקֶף or נִקֶּף=turning around, i. e., that resulting from twisting. DELITZSCH derives it from קָפָה, contorquere, but this does not occur in biblical idiom, which uses only קָפָא, to contract, congeal.

Instead of the artistically curled hair, shall baldness be given. מִקְשֶׁה (ἁπ. λεγ.,) in apposition with מַעֲשֶׂה is synonymous with מִקְשָׁה Exod. xxv. 18, 31, 36; Jer. x. 5, opus tornatile, twisted, turned work. Baldness, compare 2 K. ii. 23; for women it is doubly disgraceful. And instead of a splendid mantle, shall be given a girding of sackcloth. פְּתִיגִיל, ἁπ. λεγ., is of uncertain derivation and meaning. Expositors waver between the derivation from פָּתַג amplum esse, with affix ־ִיל (like כַּרְמִיל from כֶּרֶם) and that from פְּתִי distance, גִּיל festival joy, and between the meanings fascia pectoralis (VULG.) and broad mantle; yet the grammatical and hermeneutical grounds for the latter overbalance. מחגרת, too, is ἁπ. λεγ. Girding with sackcloth, as is known, is often mentioned as sign of the deepest mourning and humiliation: Gen. xxxvii. 34, Isa. xv. 3; xxii. 12; Jer. vi. 26, &c.

The conclusion of this list of mournful exchanges is made by the phrase: "Branding for beauty." The words are strange. They appear disjointed and unsymmetrical. For וְ, and, is wanting which connects all the preceding members, and thus this small member of the sentence stands independent, and by its inversion (the thing given stands first) in contrast with all that goes before. It appears to me as if the prophet recalled a passage of the law wherein a number of exchanges or recompenses are defined by means of the preposition "instead of." Such a passage is Exod. xxi. 23–25. Among these specifications occurs, "burning for burning." כְּוִיָּה תַּחַת כְּוִיָּה. The Prophet, however, was not speaking of jus talionis, therefore the idem per idem or idem pro eodem, "like for like," did not suit his purpose. He speaks of the recompense that threatened the daughters of Zion. Among the things to be taken from them he had not mentioned beauty, the direct gift of nature, which to women is of the greatest price. He had to this point spoken only of productions of art. Now as beauty is יְפִי (in Isa. again only xxxiii. 17), he might easily happen to think of כְּוִיָּה as a suitable rhyme for it. However, כְּוִיָּה itself does not rhyme, but a word of kindred root, properly its simple masculine form, כְּוִי, which appears only to have been used in the contracted form כִּי (comp. אִי, עִי, צִי, רִי). Thus too the inversion explains itself. For as we find the words, they most resemble the passages in Exod.; much more than if they read "instead of beauty burning." כְּוִי or כִּי is ἅπ. λεγ. Its root is כָּוָה "to burn," and means, like כְּוִיָּה, and like the Arabic kej, the branded mark, στίγμα. If even it cannot be proved that it was customary to mark captives by branding them, that does not affect the matter. It was also not customary to offer them pus instead of balsam. Such traits of poetic speech must not be pressed. Enough if the thought in itself affords a suitable meaning. I think, therefore, the established meaning "brand mark," which indicates a strong contrast with "beauty," is not to be departed from, and we need not with KNOBEL understand "scratchings."

4. The women—our reproach —Ver. 25 —iv. 1. But the misery of the daughters of Zion is not yet exhausted. Worse things yet must happen to them. They shall be robbed, too, of the men. From the singular suffix, it is seen that the Prophet ver. 25 now addresses Zion itself, thus not "the daughters of Zion," ver. 16, but "daughter of Zion." The loss of splendid garments is not to be understood as if only articles of luxury would be taken from the women of Zion. It is seen from ver. 25 that the blow is to be universal, falling upon all. Therefore all shall suffer under it: but the rich and noble most of all. The loss of the men, however, shall concern all in equal measure. For this reason the Prophet no longer addresses the daughters, but the daughter of Zion. מְתִים does not appear to involve the notion of strength, manhood. For it is wont to stand where inferiority, lowness are predicated of the subject man. מְתֵי מִסְפָּר, people of number, a few, Gen. xxxiv. 30, and often. מ׳ מְעָט Deut. xxvi. 5; xxviii. 62. מ׳ שָׁוְא Ps. xxvi. 4; מ׳ אָוֶן Job xxii. 15. מ׳ רָעָב Isa. v. 13: and xli. 14 מְתֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל stands directly parallel with תּוֹלַעַת יַעֲקֹב worm Jacob. It stands then as the antithesis of גְּבוּרָתֵךְ the troops, and designates not the manhood with emphasis, but only masculine individuals (people). גְּבוּרָה (a word of frequent occurrence in Isa. xi. 2; xxviii. 6; lxiii. 15, &c.) only here stands in a concrete meaning=troops. For Jer. xlix. 35 there is no reason for taking it in any other than the usual abstract sense, strength.

And her gates, etc. Ver. 26. אָנָה, to sigh, groan, occurs only here and xix. 8, where, too, it stands with אבל. The latter word is in general more frequent, and common, too, in Isaiah: xxiv. 4, 7; xxxiii. 9; lxvi. 10. Most expositors translate; "and her gates groan and lament." With that פֶּתַח gate, is personified and used by metonymy for the assemblies in the gate, which is grammatically allowable. But I would make three objections: 1) It is surprising that we do not read, then, שַׁעַר, gate. For פֶּתַח is only the door opening (hence so often פתח השער, door of the gate, Josh. xx. 4; Judges ix. 35, 44; 2 Sam. x. 8; Jer. i. 15; xix. 2; Prov. i. 21, etc.), while שַׁעַר stands for gate in its emphatic, and also its comprehensive meaning. 2) Does it not seem strange in this exposition, that the discourse suddenly turns from the women to speak of the totality of the people? For the gates do not represent the women alone, but the entire people; whence DRECHSLER justly calls attention to the fact that this exposition occasions "something fluctuating in the connection of ideas." 3) פֶּתַח, times without number, stands as acc. localis to the question where? or whither? without a preposition, vid. Lexicon and Concordances. It comes very natural therefore to translate; "and they (the women) groan and sigh at her gates." There they await, and there they receive the mournful intelligence. The suffix in פתחיה relates naturally to Zion addressed in the verse before.

The following words are obscure. וְנִקָּתָה can be nothing else than Niph. perf. 3 pers. fem., from נָקָה purum esse. Niphal often occurs in the sense of culpa vacuum, immunem esse, which gives no sense here. Purificari here can only mean "swept out, cleared up, emptied, desolated." In this sense the word does not again occur; only Zech. v. 3, may in some degree be compared. HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis II. 2, p. 503) translates: "on the bareness, off on the bare ground sits she." But נקתה is neither participial nor nominal form. If now we translate: "and she was emptied, desolated, on the ground she sits,"—we must first remark concerning the construction, that DRECHSLER is right in connecting the two verbs so that the first contains an adverbial qualification of the second. Sitting on the ground is the posture of those mourning: xlvii. 1; Job ii. 13; Lam. ii. 10. The subject of נקתה as well as of תשב is Zion, to which also the suffixes in vers. 25, 26, refer. Therefore if the widows of Zion weep at the gates, Zion itself appears desolate and lies on the ground. Yet I confess that this exposition is not entirely satisfactory, although it fits the existing text. Perhaps the text is corrupt in נקתה.

At all events, according to ver. 25, a great scarcity of men exists. For the Hebrew woman that was the greatest misfortune. For in its most ancient parts the Old Testament knows no other genuine life than that on this earth, and thus no other continuation of living after death than by means of children. To be childless was, then, the same as being deprived of continuance after death. It corresponded to the being damned of the New Testament.* Physical reasons, therefore, were not all that made marriage appear as a pressing necessity. It is now said here that seven women (notice the sacred number) shall lay hold of one man and, renouncing all claim of support and clothing, beg only the right to be called his wives.—Only let thy name, etc.—As the temple was called the house that bears the name of Jehovah, without however the temple being called Jehovah Himself, so, among the Hebrews, the wives were not called by the same name as their husbands, which would be to transfer modern customs to the ancients; but the name of the husband was named on her, when she was called this or that man's wife. Comp. "Sarai, Abram's wife," Gen. xii. 17, "Rachel, Jacob's wife," Gen. xlvi. 19. GESENIUS quotes the beautiful parallel from Lucan, Pharsal. II. 342, which was first adduced by GROTIUS.

———da tantum nomen inane
Connubii, Liceat tumulo scripsisse: Catonis Marcia * * * * * * *

—Give only the empty name of marriage. Let my monument be inscribed: Cato's Marcia.

אָסַף with the meaning "auferre, demere," bear away, like xvi. 10; lvii. 1. As a parallel expression comp., too Zech. viii. 23. The division of chapters is evidently incorrect here. That the words "seven women," etc., were carried over to chap. iv., as VITRINGA remarks, happened because it was supposed that the seven women represented the seven graces of the Holy Spirit (xi. 1, 2), thus JEROME and CYRIL—or the believing women under the one man or Christ, the Branch, ver. 2.

* [This extreme statement of the Author cannot pass without challenge. He repeats it substantially p. 259, § 4, p. 606, p. 610, § 3. As he does not support it by any more texts than Gen. xxx. 23; 1 Sam. i. 5 sqq.; ii. 1 sqq.; Luke i. 25, the reader may judge for himself how little foundation there is for the statement. See in the Vol. on Exodus, p. 17, the Translator H O.'s note on the kindred notion that among the Israelites "the reward of the good and the punishment of the wicked was not expected after death, but here on earth."—TR.]

C.—The second prophetic lamp, which, in the light of the glorious divine fruit of the last time, makes known the bad fruits of the present.

CHAPTER IV. 2—V. 30.

1. THE SECOND PROPHETIC LAMP ITSELF AND THE GLORIOUS DIVINE FRUIT OF THE FUTURE DISPLAYED BY IT.

CHAPTER IV. 2-6.

2 In that day shall [a]the branch of the LORD be beautiful and glorious,
And the fruit of the earth shall be [b]excellent and comely
[2]For them that are escaped of Israel,
3 And it shall come to pass, that he that is left in Zion,
And he that remaineth in Jerusalem,
Shall be called holy,
Even every one that is written [3]among the living in Jerusalem;
4 When the LORD shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion,
And shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem from the midst thereof
By the [c]spirit of judgment, and by the [c]spirit of [d]burning.
5 And the LORD will create upon every dwelling place of Mount Zion,
And upon her assemblies,
[e]A cloud and smoke by day,
And the shining of a flaming fire by night:
For [4]upon all the glory shall be [5]a defence.
6 And there shall be a [f]tabernacle for a shadow in the day time from the heat,
And for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2. צְבִי vid. xiii. 19; xxiii. 9; xxiv. 16; xxviii. 1, 4, 5.——גאון and תפארת occur again together only xiii. 19.——פְּלֵיטָה abst., pro concr., comp. iii. 25; x. 20; xv. 9; xxxvii. 31 sq.

Ver. 3. Niph. נֶאֱמַר is a peculiarity of Isaiah. It is found in no book of the Old Testament, relatively so often as in our prophet: xix. 18; xxxii. 5; lxi. 6; lxii. 4 (bis.).——The construction כתוב לחיים is dubious, כָּתַב in this sense is nowhere else construed with לְ, unless perhaps xliv. 5 (wh. see) may be compared. חיים may be abstractum (vita) or concretum (vivi).

Ver. 4. רחץ occurs again in Isaiah only i. 16.——צֹאָה in Isaiah again only xxviii. 8, and xxxvii. 12, K'ri.——The verb הֵדִיחַ is found only in the Hiphil; in Isaiah it occurs only here; it is found elsewhere only in Jer. li. 34; Ezek. xl. 38; 2 Chr iv. 6. As the parallel passages show, it means: "wash away, rinse away," and thereby cleanse. It is therefore synonymous with רָחַץ.

Ver. 5. מִקְרָא which occurs here and i. 13 in Isaiah, and in Neh. viii. 8 (where it seems to mean "lecture"), occurs elsewhere only in the Pentateuch. There, too, with the exception of Num. x. 2, where the מִקְרָא הָעֵדָה convocatio coetus is indicated as the object of the use of the trumpets, it is always joined with קֹדֶשׁ: Exod. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 2 sq.; Num. xxviii. 18, 25 sq.; xxix. 1, 7, 12. It is therefore a liturgical term, and means the assembling of the congregation.——עָנָן occurs again in Isaiah only xliv. 22. But עָשָׁן he often uses: vi. 4; ix. 17; xiv. 31; xxxiv. 10; li. 6; lxv. 5. Moreover נֹגַהּ, which does not occur in the Pentateuch, is peculiar to Isa. l. 10; lx. 3, 19; lxii. 1; comp. ix. 1: xiii. 10. So too להבה flame never occurs in the Pentateuch, except in Num. xxi. 28, where it is not used of the pillar of fire. But it is found in Isaiah v. 24; x. 17; xliii. 2; xlvii. 14. He intimates by it that one must picture to himself, not an even, steady gleam of fire, but an agitated flaming fire.

כי על־כל־כבוד וגו׳. I join these words to what follows, as HITZIG also does. The Masoretic division is probably occasioned by the fact that the preceding sentence from וּבָרָא to לילה present no strongly marked point for setting an Athnach. But this, as is well known, is not at all necessary; comp. ver. 4 and v. 2. And besides, if one disjoins these words from the following, he must conceive such a verb as decet supplied, or at least a תִּהְיֶה, shall be. But this is hardly admissible, which those, too, maintain who take חֻפָּה as Pual ("For all that is glorious shall be defended" GESENIUS; KNOBEL somewhat differently.——חֻפָּה occurs beside this place only in Ps. xix. 6, and Joel ii. 16 in the sense of "bridal chamber, bridal canopied bed." And so it means here a protecting cover, and sheltering baldachin.

Ver. 6. On סֻכָּה booth, see i. 8, the only other place where it occurs in Isaiah.—The expressions צֵל מֵחֹרֶב and מַחְסֶה מִזֶּרֶם recur xxv. 4—צֵל vid. xvi. 3; xxv. 5; xxx. 2; xlix. 2 etc.——חֹרֶב xxv. 5; lxi. 4.——מַחְסֶה xxviii. 15, 17.——מִסְתּוֹר (comp. סֵתֶר זֶרֶם xxxii. 2 and מִסְתּוֹר xlv. 3) is ἅπ. λεγ.——זֶרֶם is a word of frequent recurrence in the first part of Isaiah. Besides the passages already cited see xxviii. 2 (bis.); xxx. 30. Beside those only Job xxiv. 8, and Hab. iii. 10.——מָטָר again in Isaiah v. 6; xxx. 23.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Just at that time, i. e., at the time to which the parallel passage ii. 2-4 refers, the rescued ones of Israel shall partake of a glory that shall appear as fruit of the life that Jehovah Himself shall produce (ver. 2). In consequence of that all that still remain in Jerusalem shall be called holy, all whose names shall be written in the book of life (ver. 3). But the ones left remaining are those that shall be present when all moral filth and all blood-guiltiness shall have been cleansed away by the tempest of the divine judgment (ver. 4). Then shall Jehovah hover over each house and over the assembled total of the dwellers of Jerusalem, as formerly over the tabernacle, with a cloud by day, with smoke and appearance of fire by night (ver. 5), for the presence of the glory of Jehovah shall be protection and shelter against every attack (ver. 6).

2. I regard this section as parallel member to ii. 2-4. Like that, it transports us into the last time: like that, it sets before our eyes the glory that Israel shall then enjoy. Only there is this difference, that, whereas ii. 2-4 describes the outward eminence and exaltation of Zion, as the central point of dominion over all nations, iv. 2-6 rather describes the inward glory of Zion as one that is now purified and sanctified. For the tempest of judgment has cleansed away all morally impure and ungodly elements. Whatever personal life remains in Zion is a divine scion, and therefore whatever the land produces must be glorious divine fruit. And as in the wilderness the cloud by day and the appearance of fire by night was over the Tabernacle, so shall every single house in Israel and the whole congregation in its entirety be marked as the holy abode of Jehovah by the glorious signs of His presence warding off every hostile storm. This is the second prophetic lamp with which the prophet, so to speak, stretches his arm far out and illuminates the distant future. But as in ii. 5—iv. 1 he sets the present that lies between (we comprehend all that precedes that last time as present) in the light of that prophetic word ii. 2-4, and by this means makes manifest the immense difference between the present and the future, so he does likewise here. I am of the opinion therefore that v. has the same subordinate relation to iv. 2-4 that ii. 5—iv. 1 has to ii. 2-4. That v. is not independent, but integral part of the prophecy that begins with ii. 1, has already been asserted by FORERIUS, VOGEL, DOEDERLEIN, JAHN, HITZIG, EWALD (comp. CASPARI, Beitr, p. 234). I maintain the same, only I have other grounds for it than they. If one were to assume with CASPARI (int. al. p. 300) that the passage ii. 2-4,

"is not in the proper sense prophecy; they are repeated, quoted, recited by Isaiah, as a prophecy given to Israel by another prophet, for the purpose of joining on to it the warning and reproof of ii. 5-8,"—then indeed must iv. 2-6 be regarded as the promise appertaining to ii. 5—iv. 1.

But that assumption of CASPARI is as unnatural as can be. The glorious words of MICAH must be no prophecy! But they are so per se. This cannot be controverted. They must serve only as "points of departure and connection!" That would need to be indicated. Then Isaiah must have presented them in a form that would reveal at once that he employs the words only as introduction to his address proper. They must be separated from the discourse of Isaiah, and be expressly designated as a citation by some sort of historical reference. But such is not the case. Isaiah makes the words entirely his own. He does not say that they are borrowed from another: those informed know it and draw their own conclusion; but that is another thing. The main thing is that the LORD has so said, and therefore Isaiah too may use the words and found his discourse on it.

It is clear as day and undisputed that Isaiah from ii. 2 to iv. 1 shows the false estimate of human glory in the light of the divine. But just as clear, it seems to me, is it that Isaiah, in iv. and v., also contemplates, as it were, the condition of the fruits in the field of the hearts of Israel in the present in the light of the fruitage that, in the last time, shall be produced on the soil of the judged and purified Israel. For iv. 2, "the Branch," and "Fruit of the earth" are evidently the main ideas. These both shall become glorious. This, however, is explained ver. 3: all that then remain in Zion shall be called holy, because the tempest of judgment has removed from Zion all pollution and all guilt. Then shall both, each individual and the totality, be fully as secure a dwelling-place of Jehovah as once the Tabernacle was.

Therefore the prophet speaks iv. 2-6 also of a glory indeed, but of a different one from ii. 2-4. In the latter place he has in view more that glory which in that time Israel shall develop externally: it shall as the solitary eminence of the earth shine far around, and all nations shall flow to this eminence. But iv. 2 sq. speaks of that glory that is identical with holiness, the notion "holy" taken in the sense of sanctus and sacer: this glory, however, is first of all inward. But as that outward glory takes the inward for granted, which is indicated ii. 3 by the terms "out of Zion shall go forth the law," etc., so, too, the inward glory cannot last without the outward, which is expressed iv. 2 by the terms "beautiful and glorious, excellent and comely," and plainly enough in vers. 5, 6. When now we read in chap. v. of a vineyard that produces wild grapes instead of grapes, and when v. 7, this is expressly interpreted to mean that Jehovah has found in the field of the hearts of Israel bloodshed and the cry of woe instead of judgment and righteousness, and when, after that, this evil fruit is more particularly characterized in the following sixfold woe, can we then in the least doubt that the section that treats of the bad fruits of the present stands in the same relation to the section immediately preceding which describes the glorious fruits of the last time, that the section ii. 5—iv. 1 concerning false great things does to the section that immediately precedes it, and that describes the true divine greatness.

I do not suppose that this would ever have been doubted, did not chap. v. appear so independent, so peculiar, so distinct in itself and well rounded, and were not suddenly ver. 1, a totally different tone assumed; I mean the parable tone. But we must not overlook the relationship of the contents because of the difference in the form. This relationship will appear plainer as we contemplate the particulars: but we must at this point draw attention to one thing. As ii. 5—iv. 1 the outward decay appears as symptom and consequence of the inward, so in chap. v. the inward decay appears as the root from which the outward develops by an inevitable necessity. According to this the two dominant passages ii. 2-4 and iv. 2-6 stand in an analogous inverted relation, like the sections governed by them ii. 5—iv. 1, and chap. v.

Finally let it be noticed here, what we shall prove in particular further on, that in iv. 2-6, as a matter of course, there occur back looks or references to what has preceded. (Comp. e.g. ver. 4.) This cannot be otherwise, in as much as iv. 2-v. 30 is the second organic half of the great second portal of Isaiah's prophecies. But noticing this does not in the least hinder the assertion that section iv. 2-6 in the main looks forward and not backward.

3. In that day,—spirit of burning.—Vers. 2-4. By the words "in that day" the prophet refers back to "in the last days" ii. 2. For according to all that we have just laid down, iv. 2-6 stands parallel with ii. 2-4, both as to time and subject matter. This last time may have begun since the birth of Christ, but it is not finished; it is fulfilled by degrees through many a rising and subsiding. In this last time, therefore, shall "the branch" and "the fruit of the earth" be for beauty and honor, splendor and glory to the saved ones of Israel. What is "צֶמַח "branch?" The word means germinatio, the sprouting, and means first of all, not a single sprout, but sprouting in general, and the total of all that sprouts. Thus it means Gen. xix. 25: "And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground" (וְצֶמַח הָאֲדָמָה). So again we read, Ezek. xvi. 7: "I have caused thee to multiply as the bud of the field" (כְּצֶמַח הַשָּׂדֶה) i. e. I have made thee like the vegetation of the field. Again Hos. viii. 7: "It hath no stalk, the bud (צֶמַח) shall yield no meal." The word has the same meaning also Isa. lxi. 11; Ps. lxv. 11. In Ezek. xvii. 9, 10, the abstract meaning germinatio predominates. If now we compare Jer. xxiii. 5 and xxxiii. 15, we find that there "righteous Branch" (צֶמַח צַדִּיק) means a single personality. "I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and he shall reign as King, and shall prosper, and execute judgment and justice in the land; in his days," etc. Notice the singular after Branch. So too, Jer. xxxiii. 15. In Zechariah, however, we find צֶמַח Tzemach, has become altogether a proper name. "Behold I will bring forth my servant Tzemach, (Branch)," Zech. iii. 8. And vi. 12: "Behold the man whose name is Tzemach, and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the LORD." If we agree with expositors that refer the Tzemach of Jer. and Zech. (which in them, beyond all doubt, means the Messiah), to our passage as its original source, still the conclusion must not be countenanced that the word is to be taken in the same meaning in our passage as in Jer. and Zech. For in our passage a condition, habitus, is evidently described, not a personality. "Fruit of the land" stands as correlative of "Branch of Jehovah." This is so general and comprehensive an expression, that it is impossible to understand by it any single fruit, even though it were the noblest. The passages xi. 1, 10; liii. 2, do not contradict this. For just in those passages the Messiah is designated, not as the fruit of the land, (or of the earth), in general, but a shoot out of the root of Jesse. "Fruit of the land" in the general and indefinite form of its expression, can only signify the products of the land in general (not of the earth, for, according to the context, only Israel is spoken of). Thus what grows of Jehovah and what grows of the land stand in antithesis; spiritual and corporal fruits, the products of the heavenly and of the earthly life.

But what are the products of the heavenly, spiritual, divine life? This, it seems to me, Isa. himself tells us lxi. 11: "For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the LORD God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before the nations." Thus, "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue and if there be any praise" Phil. iv. 8 (and may not Paul have had Isa. lxi. 11 in his mind?) that is Tzemach of Jehovah. That is the divine fruit with which the fruit of the land stands in contrast, viz.: all corporal life that the land produces in all the kingdoms of nature. Therefore Tzemach of Jehovah comprehends the entire sphere of the free, conscious, personal life, all that is product of "the breath of life" (Gen. ii. 7); whereas "fruit of the land" designates the entire impersonal, corporal life, all that is "the production of the earth" (Gen. i. 12). If this is the meaning of Tzemach of Jehovah in our passage, then this general notion may easily condense and, so to speak, crystallize to the conception of a definite personality. Thus, for instance, the idea of the seed of the woman (Gen. iii. 15) proceeding originally from a conception general and indefinite, gradually, in the consciousness of believing Israel, condensed to the notion of a definite personality.

According to this I cannot agree with those that understand "צמח Tzemach of Jehovah of the Messiah only (as many Jewish and Christian expositors), or of the Church alone (so JEROME: nomen Christianum), or of the people of Israel alone (thus KNOBEL, who confounds "צמח with "מַטָּע), or of Christ and the church (thus ZWINGLI: "both expressions suit to the Branch Christ and to His body the church." HOFMANN's explanation (Schriftbew. II. 2, p. 503 sq.): "What Jehovah causes to grow and the land brings forth, the Prophet opposes to the thousands of human productions with which the previously rebuked luxury decked itself, especially in the case of women," seems to me to construe the idea of Tzemach of Jehovah too narrowly, and too little in its distinction from "Fruit of the land," as well as too much with reference to iii. 16 sqq.

Therefore, the entire products, both of the spiritual and the corporal life shall be such that the rescued ones of Israel shall be highly honored and glorified thereby. That which has its immediate source of life in Jehovah Himself, which is the fruit of His Spirit (Gal. v. 22) must redound to the honor of those in whom it makes its appearance (comp. Rom. ii. 7 sqq.). We read elsewhere (Chap. xxviii. 5) that Jehovah Himself "shall be for a crown of glory and for a diadem of beauty unto the residue of His people." Both amount to the same thing. For where Jehovah is, there He is with His life and with His power; and where He lives and works, there He makes glory. Moreover the fruits of the earth, where the LORD alone becomes the principle of spiritual life, must themselves become glorious and, as it were, the cause of a glory like Paradise. All, in fact, will become new: body and soul, nature and history, heaven and earth.

פרי הארץ (or הָאֲדָמָה) never means anything else than the products of the ground. The expression is found often in the Pentateuch (Gen. iv. 3; Lev. xxv. 19; Num. xiii. 20, 26), most frequently in Deut. (i. 25; vii. 13; xxvi. 2, 10; xxviii. 4, 11, 18, &c.). Beside these only in Jer. vii. 20, and Ps. cv. 35. But all this splendor and glory shall exist only for "the escaped of Israel." This is the conception so frequent in Isa., which he elsewhere designates as "remnant," "him that remaineth," "residue," (שְׁאָר, שְׁאֵרִית, נוֹתָר, נִשְׁאָר comp. ver. 3; vi. 13; x. 20–22; xi. 11, 16; xxviii. 5; xxxvii. 31 sq.; xlvi. 3), and which expresses that, not all Israel, but only the remnant left after the judging and sifting shall partake of the salvation.

Ver. 3 says expressly, that the glory of which v. 2 speaks shall depend on inward purity and spotlessness, on that light that is said to be the garment of God (Ps. civ. 2). This verse, therefore, contains the more particular definition of v. 2. "The left over" (נִשְׁאָר comp. xxxvii. 31) and "the remaining over" (נוֹתָר comp. vii. 22, and DELITZSCH, in loc.) in Zion and Jerusalem (vid. ii. 3) shall be called holy, i. e., not only be so, but be recognized and called such.

This holiness, which becomes God's house, Ps. xciii. 5, is, any way, to be construed objectively as well as subjectively. It includes the sacer and the sanctus. But these holy men of God are His elect in reference to whom He has made the counsel of His love documentary by entering their names in the book of life.

"To be written to the living" or "to the life" calls to mind Psalm lxix. 29, עִם צַדִּיקִים, לֹא יִכָּתֵבוּ "let them not be written with the righteous," or Jer. xxii. 30, where it is said: "write this man עֲרִירִי childless." This book of life is not that in which are written those destined to earthly life (1 Sam. xxv. 29, Ps. cxxxix. 16), but that wherein stand written those appointed to everlasting life. What sort of a book that may be, and how the entry in it comports with free self-determination in men we cannot here investigate. This book is first named Exod. xxxii. 32, 33. Later Isa. in this place, and Ps. lxix. 29; lxxxvii. 4-6; Dan. xii. 1 mention it. In the N. Test. we read of it Luke x. 20; Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5; xiii. 8; xvii. 8; xx. 12, 15; xxi. 27. Some, not without propriety, have reminded, in connection with x. 19; Ezek. xiii. 9; Exod. xxx. 12, etc., of the genealogical registers or roll of citizens, in so far as those inscribed for life are at once citizens of the kingdom of God and of the city of God (Gal. v. 26; Heb. xii. 22; Rev. xxi. 2).

When the Lord shall have washed.—Ver. 4. It seems to me that the contents of ver. 4 show decidedly that it is no premis to ver. 5, but is to be regarded as specification of the time and conditions in reference to vers. 2 and 3. For only the purifying and sifting judgments of God, that cleanse away all filth, bring it about that any holy, divine life still remains in Jerusalem. The filth of the daughter of Zion is not only her moral degradation, but all that appears as fruit of it and means for furthering it; thus the entire apparatus of luxury discoursed of in iii. 16 sqq. Though outwardly showy and splendid, regarded from the Prophet's point of view it was only vile filth. The blood-guiltiness of Jerusalem (comp. i. 15; ix. 4; xxvi. 21; xxxiii. 15) proceeds from the innocent blood shed by the injustice and tyranny of the powerful (i. 15 sqq.). Concerning Zion and Jerusalem, see ii. 3. This cleansing shall be brought about by a spiritual force that is analogous to that force of nature that purifies, viz., the wind. Like that rushes over the earth and bears away all impure vapors, so shall God let loose His judgments over Israel, destroy the wicked and drive to repentance those in whom the Spirit of God finds still a point of contact, thus spiritually purify the nation. I do not think, therefore, that רוּחַ here is to be translated "spirit." The context evidently demands the meaning "wind." In xxx. 28, also רוּחַ is the breath of God, as one sees from the connection with the lips and tongue (ver. 27). Comp. xli. 16, רוּחַ תִּשָּׂאֵם "the wind shall carry them away." Meier translates our passage "breath of wrath." In the kindred passage xxviii. 6, however, the meaning "spirit" seems to predominate. Whether בָּעֵר is kindred to that בָּעַר that means "to burn, to kindle" (see ver. 5; xl. 16; xliv. 15; 2 Chr. iv. 20; xiii. 11) is doubtful. Our בער is, like vi. 13, used in the sense of "to cast off, cut away, brush off," in which sense the word often occurs in Deut. in reference to exterminating the scabby sheep out of the holy theocratic congregation (Deut. xiii. 6; xvii. 7; xix. 19; xxvi. 13 sq., comp. Num. xxiv. 22, &c.) The word therefore involves the notion of a sifting. After the purification is accomplished by judgment and sifting, measures shall be taken against further corruption in that the Lord shall hover with the pillar of smoke and fire over the individual dwellings of Mount Zion and over the whole assembly of the holy nation for their protection.

Ver. 5 וּבָרָא therefore introduces a complementary idea of what precedes. מָכוֹן (again in Isaiah only xviii. 4) is sedes, habitatio parata, stabilita. It is used almost exclusively of the divine indwelling. For with the exception of Ps. civ. 5, where the מְכוֹנִים (foundations) of the earth are named (which any way are a divine work too), מכון stands only for the earthly (Exod. xv. 17, &c.) or the heavenly (1 K. viii. 39, 43, 49, etc.) dwelling-place of God. One is tempted, therefore, to understand מכון here of the temple as God's dwelling-place. But then the כָּל would be incomprehensible. Or if this be translated "whole," then there must be an article. We must, therefore, understand by it all the dwellings that were found on Mount Zion (comp. ii. 2, 3, naming of the city Jerusalem a potiori). The whole of these have become holy dwellings of God, too, inasmuch as their inhabitants are themselves scions of God (ver. 2).

"Assemblies," is evidently in contrast with "every dwelling," and declares that the sign of Jehovah shall hover over both the dwellings of individual families and over the assembled total of the nation. Every single house, as well as the house of Jacob as a whole, shall be God's holy tabernacle, as formerly the typical Tabernacle was alone. Even before the passage of the Red Sea, the pillar of cloud and fire went before the Israelites (Exod. xiii. 21 sq.). It stood as a protection between the armies of Israel and Egypt (Exod. xiv. 19 sq). But when the Tabernacle was completed, the pillar of cloud and fire rested over it (Exod. xl. 34 sqq.).

In the Pentateuch the expression עָשָׁן, smoke, is never used for this wonderful phenomenon. It is put in here in such a way that one does not know whether to join it to עָנָן cloud, or to נֹגַהּ ו shining, etc. According to the accents the former should be done. Moreover it may be urged that smoke is not seen by night. But why then is עָשָׁן placed after יוֹמָם? Some consider the construction a hendiadys: cloud and smoke=smoke cloud; for an ordinary vapor cloud it was not. This may be correct. But from the nature of things smoke belongs to fire. For there is no fire without smoke, nor smoke without fire. Like Hengstenberg, therefore, I refer וְעָשָׁן, and smoke to what follows. Precisely as smoke would the cloud at night be most plainly visible, for then the smoke was seen mounting out of the fire and illuminated by it.

For upon all glory, etc.—If the Prophet, as has been shown, regards every single house as God's holy tabernacle, then he can call it glorious too, like in Exod. xl. 34 sq., that which filled the dwelling of the sanctuary is called the glory of Jehovah. Comp. on ver. 13. This glory of Jehovah in the pillar of cloud and fire served on the one hand for Israel's protection—viz., standing between them and the Egyptians,—on the other for a guide in the desert. The sanctified Israel of the last time will not need a guide, for they will no more wander. They are to be firmly founded on the holy mountain. But they will still need protection. For if even the majority of the nations flow to them, shall then at once all enmity in the world against God's sanctuary be extinguished? Is it not conceivable that both in the world of men and of devils hostile powers may exist, inclined to and capable of doing harm? (Rev. xx. 7 sqq.)

2. The bad fruits of the present in the light of the glorious divine fruit of the last time. Chap. V. 1–30.

a. THE BAD FRUITS OF THE PRESENT SHOWN IN THE PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD.

Chapter V. 1–7.

1 Now will I sing [a]to my well-beloved
A song of my beloved touching his vineyard.
My well beloved hath a vineyard
In [1][b]a very fruitful hill:
2 And he [2][c]fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof,
And planted it with the choicest vine,
And built a tower in the midst of it,
And also [3]made a winepress therein:
And he looked that it should bring forth grapes,
And it brought forth wild grapes.
3 And now, O, inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah,
Judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard.
4 What could have been done more to my vineyard,
That I have not done in it?
Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes,
Brought it forth wild grapes?
5 And now go to; I will tell you
What I will do to my vineyard:
I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up;
And break down the wall thereof, and it shall be [4]trodden down:
6 And I will lay it waste:
It shall not be pruned, nor digged;
But there shall come up briers and thorns:
I will also command the clouds
That they rain no rain upon it,
7 For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel,
And the men of Judah [5]his pleasant plant:
And he looked for [d]judgment, but behold [6]oppression;
For righteousness, but behold a cry.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. Attention has often been called to the artistic, rythmical structure of ver. 1: to אשירה corresponds שירת; to לידידי corresponds דודי. The first clause of the verse concludes with לכרמו; the second begins with כרם, and the third word is again לידידי. קרן rhymes to כרם, and the last three words of the verse end with ן. Moreover the rythm continues into the 2d— ver.; for the three verbs that begin it, resemble one another in formation and ending.

The verb שיר joined with the noun שיר occurs of joyful song in Isaiah in two other places, xxvi. 1; xlii. 10. שירה always has the pronoun הזאת after it (Exod. xv. 1; Num. xxi. 17; Deut. xxxi. 19, 21, 22, 30; xxxii. 44; 2 Sam. xxii. 1; Ps. xviii. 1); only in Isaiah, who beside here uses it xxiii. 15, is it determined by only a noun following in the genitive. ידיד (the closely bound, beloved, friend) used by Isaiah only here. Comp. Deut. xxxiii. 12; Jer. xi. 15; coll. xii. 7; Ps. lx. 7; cxxvii. 2. דוד, kindred to ידיד, is originally an abstract noun—amor, caritas (comp. Song of S. v. 9) especially in the plural (love deeds, fondling, Song of S. i. 2; iv. 4, etc.; Ezek. xvi. 8; Prov. vii. 18, etc.). Then דוד stands for the person beloved (compare the words Liebschaft, Bekanntschaft, acquaintance, מודעת Ruth, iii. 2) and signifies both the beloved generally (Song of S. ii. 3, etc.), and a beloved and near relation (Lev. x. 4; 1 Sam. x. 16, etc.). That it here means the beloved generally appears from its connection with ידיד. This word, too, does not again occur in Isaiah. ל indicates the object after verbis dicendi: Gen. xx. 13; Lev. xiv. 54; Ps. iii. 3; xxii. 31; Isa. xxvii. 2, etc.——קרן is used only here in the Old Testament of a horn shaped hill. In Ovid mountain spurs are called cornua terræ. In Greek too κέρας is so used. Compare the German Schreckhorn, Wetterhorn, etc.——The expression בן־שמן occurs only here. Yet comp. גיא שמנים xxviii. 1, and the kindred expressions used of the fruitfulness of the soil. שמן (xxx. 23; Ezek. xxxiv. 14), משמנים (Gen. xxvii. 28, 39) אשמנים (Isa. lix. 10).

Ver. 2. עזק is ἅπ. λεγ., but its meaning is definitely derived from the dialects.——סקל in this sense only here and lxii. 10.——נטע with double accusative comp. Jer. ii. 21; where, beside, the word is borrowed from our passage.——שרק only here and Jer. ii. 21; Gen. xlix. 11, שרקה; Isa. xvi. 8, שרוקים: etymology doubtful, some taking the underlying idea, to be without seeds, others the shooting up, others purple color [Zech. i. 8]: comp. Leyrer in Herzog's R. Encycl. XVII. p. 612.

Ver. 3. On "Jerusalem and Judah" comp. at ii. 1. The expression ישב ירושלם occurs beside in Isa. viii. 14; xxii. 21; chap. x. 24 ישב ציון occurs. Except these only Zech. xii. 7, 8, 10, uses ישב י׳. The more usual expression is ישבי י׳; 2 Kings xxiii. 2, especially in Jer. (viii. 1; xi. 2; xiii. 13, etc.), and in 2 Chron. (xx. 15; xxi. 11, 13; xxxii. 26, 33, etc.).

Ver. 4. On לעשות Gesenius § 132, Rem. 1.——מדוע קויתי ונו. Comp. i. 2.

Ver. 5. משוכה, which some of the MSS. write with Dag. forte, is = שׂך (Lam. ii. 6) and מסוכה (Mich. vii. 4; Prov. xv. 19). The word occurs only here in Isaiah. The meaning is: a hedge, a thorn hurdle, from שוך sepire (Hos. ii. (8) 6; Job i. 10). והיה לבער et erit ad depascendum, comp. iii. 14; iv. 4; vi. 13. The expression לבער occurs also with the meaning "ad comburendum;" xliv. 15, comp. xl. 16; l. 11.—פרץ in the sense "to tear down" only here. Beside this in liv. 3, in the sense "to break out, extend oneself abroad." גדר may signify the low wall of a vineyard as well as the high wall of a city: comp. Jer. xlix. 3; Num. xxii. 24. In Isaiah the word does not again occur. Hedge and wall might be combined in such a way that the hedge surrounded the foot of the wall so as also to protect it. Yet perhaps the double enclosure is not to be pressed literally, but, may be construed rhetorically, since no actual vineyard is meant.——מרמס conculcatio: vii. 25; 10, 6; xxviii. 18.—Giving up His vineyard, the Lord abandons it to desolation.

Ver. 6. שית בתה appears to correspond to the expression עשה כלה often used, by Jer. especially, but which does not occur in Isaiah. בתה is ἅπ. λεγ. According to its meaning and derivation it is one with בתה vii. 19. The verb בתת does not occur in Hebrew. Yet the meaning "abscindere" is established from the dialects. From that develops בת—the close-cut-off, exactly measured out, as the name of a fluid measure, (comp. ver. 10), and בתה vastatio and בתה abscissum, præruptum.——The vineyard abandoned to desolation will, of course, no more be pruned (זמר in this sense only here in Isa., otherwise xii. 5) and no more digged (עדר in the sense of "to dig" only again vii. 25). Consequently it springs up with thorns and thistles (the construction of עלה with the accusative like xxxiv. 13; Prov. xxiv. 31. The two words שמיר and שית, excepting xxxii. 13, are always joined together by Isa.: vii. 23, 24, 25; ix. 17; x. 17; xxvii. 4. Both words, as one may see from the passages cited, signify combustible vegetation of the desert, although nothing as yet has been established concerning the etymology and meaning of either. But comp. Dietrich, Abhandl. fur semit. Wortforschung, p. 73, and the Denkschrift der Erfurter Akademie von S. Cassel, 1854, p. 74 sqq., cited by Delitzsch.

Ver. 7. נטע occurs again in Isa. xvii. 10, 11. Isaiah uses שעשעים only here.——משפח occurs only here. The verb שפח occurs in Hebrew only in the Piel form שפח iii. 17. It is identical with ספח (Hab. ii. 15) according to a frequent exchange of sound. Not only the Arabic saphacha proves that ספח means effundere, but also passages like Job xxx. 7; then the substantive ספיח that means effusio, inundatio (Job xiv. 19) and effusum, i. e., especially the grain that falls out (Lev. xxv. 5, 11). Of course then משפח means first of all effusio. But for the sake of a play on words, an author may indulge in such an incomplete expression. The reader at once thinks of passages like iv. 4; i. 15, and fills out the conception "sanguinis" of himself. The word צעקה cry, is not repeated in Isaiah. he also chooses it for the sake of the play on words. For my own part I have allowed myself to waive a literal translation in favor of a likeness of sound and to use a word that at least corresponds to the proper intention of the Prophet.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. When we read the introduction of this piece it sounds like a lovely musical prelude. All sounds like singing. It is as if the Prophet tried every harmonious sound of speech in order to turn the hearts of his hearers to joy. But it happens to us as he says, ver. 7, it happened to God in reference to Israel. Instead of a joyful report we receive a mournful one; instead of happiness, a gloomy prospect of evil is presented. The piece therefore bears the character of bitter irony. This is especially in the beginning carried out even to minuteness. The Prophet makes as if he would sing a joyous song, a song of the vineyard, thus perhaps of wine, a drinking song! It shall be of the vineyard of a boon companion. And then the Prophet describes the situation. It is a good site. For there is no better than on a sunny knoll with a good, fat soil (ver. 1 a). But the owner aided nature as much as possible by art (ver. 2 a.). He had a right therefore to expect a good yield. His hopes were disappointed. Instead of good grapes the vines bore wild grapes (ver. 2). Thus far the Prophet speaks. From this point he lets the owner of the vine speak. One looked to hear of a real vineyard. But what sort of a vineyard is that whose owner accuses it and charges it with guilt! Now, therefore, when the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah are summoned to judge between the vineyard and its lord (ver. 3), in as much as he has faithfully done his best, yet instead of grapes has gathered only wild grapes (ver. 4), it is noticed at once that behind this is concealed something else than the story of a real, natural vineyard. And step by step this becomes plainer. For the lord of the vineyard declares that he will tear away hedge and wall, and give the vineyard up to be browsed upon and trampled down (ver. 5), yea, that he will make a ruin of it, he will no more hoe and prune it, but let it grow rank with thorns and thistles, and will forbid the heavens to rain on it (v. 6). This last word lifts the mask entirely. It is now seen who is the owner and who the vineyard. And this is now (v. 7) openly declared: Jehovah is the lord; Israel, summoned to judge between the lord and his vineyard, is itself the vineyard. The Lord had expected of Israel the fruits of righteousness, but only gathered the fruits of unrighteousness. What a contrast between this fruit of the land and that which, according to iv. 2, the land shall one time bear!

2. I will sing—wild grapes. Vers. 1 and 2. Everything in this passage tends to express the idea of disappointment, the contrast between incipient hope and the final, mournful event. Hence the joyous, one may say the lark-like trilling commencement. Every harvest is preceded by a season of hope. Israel too awakened such. How joyous this was, v. 1 portrays. One must not, therefore, be misled by the peculiar joyous tone of v. 1, to think that here begins an essentially new and independent piece. For this sound-coloring of ver. 1, is intentional, is art.

The address begins with אָשִׁירָה, I will sing. One, therefore, expects a שִׁיר, a jovial song: but a קִינָה (Am. viii. 10), a lament follows. What a contrast, therefore, between the sixfold woe of ver. 8 sqq., and this joy bespeaking beginning! לִידִידִי seems, at first sight, to be an ordinary dative, and to say that the prophet would sing to his friend a song, thus likely a song of right hearty and enlivening contents. But לְכַרְמוֹ suggests that that may be an incorrect meaning: for this must mean "in regard to his vineyard." Thus לְ must here be לְ of the object. Then it seems likely that in the preceding case it has the same force. This conjecture becomes a certainty when we read further "my friend (לִידִידִי) had a vineyard." From this it becomes plain: 1) that the friend in each case is the same, for the owner of the vineyard is called both דּוֹד and יָדִיד; 2) that we must translate לִידִידִי in ver. 1 "of my friend," for the song shall treat of the vineyard of his friend; 3) what the Prophet would sing is not a song of his own composing, but one that his friend has made of his vineyard, so that "I will sing" is qualified by the following, "a song of my friend," &c.; 4) from the words "my friend had a vineyard," &c., we know that the song of the friend does not yet begin. For to the end of ver. 2 we have still the words of the Prophet, by which, as it were, he preludes the song of the friend, in order to acquaint the hearer with the facts that the song presupposes. Thus the Prophet gives us one disappointment after the other. Though they are only of a formal kind, still they prepare us for the more earnest and material disappointments that follow.

We have already remarked that with "my friend had," &c., the song of the friend by no means begins, as one would expect, and that what the Prophet himself says is by no means a song, but a very earnest presentation of gloomy facts. This is a further disappointment. That בֵּן, as commentators remark, signifies the natural fruitfulness in opposition to what is artificial appears to me to lie less in the expression itself than in its relation to ver. 2. The usus loquendi in itself is well known: UMBREIT's translation "on the prominence of a fat spot" is incorrect. For בֶּן־שֶׁמֶן in itself is not a "fat spot" but a real son, a man, whom the notion "oil" characterizes (comp. בְּנֵי יִצְהָר Zech. iv. 14). It can only become predicate of a place by connection with an idea of place. Such is קֶרֶן with which בֶּן־שֶׁמֶן stands in apposition. If they were taken as standing in a genitive relation the meaning would be: horn of a man of oil, of one oiled, of an anointed man. However, to this naturally fruitful spot, the owner had done everything that the art of wine culture could suggest. He had hoed it, gathered out the stones, and planted it with a choice vine. But not only did the owner undertake such labor as was important for the flourishing of the vines themselves, but also such as were for the protection of the fruit and putting it to use. Such are the watch tower (vid. Matth. xxi. 33) and the wine press (יֶקֶב, the lower wine-press trough, comp. xvi. 10, Num. xviii. 27, &c.), both of them costly, &c.,—especially the latter, hence וְגַם and also—demanding hard labor, because the wine-press trough, as חָצַב (x. 15; xxii. 16; li. 1, 9) indicates, was hewn out of the rock. See HERZOG's R. Encycl. VII., p. 508, Art. Wine-press, by LEYRER. But—disappointed hope! Instead of עֲנָבִים (in Isa. only here, and vers. 2 and 4) good grapes, the vineyard bore only בְּאֻשִׁים sour grapes. This last word occurs only here and ver. 4. It comes from בָּאַשׁ "to be bad, stink," and means the fruit of the wild vine, the labrusca. It has, therefore, happened to the choice vine according to the word of Jer. (ii. 21), which may be regarded as a commentary on our passage: "thou art turned into a degenerate plant of a strange vine." The noble vine is degenerated and become wild, so that it produces wild grapes instead of grapes. —Comp. Job xxxi. 40.

3. And now, O inhabitants—no rain upon it.—Vers. 3–6. The song of the "friend" begins first at ver. 3. It is, however, no gladsome song, but a lament and a complaint. And the friend is not some good friend or boon companion of the Prophet, but the Lord Himself, which comes out clearly at the end of ver. 6. This one, now, summons the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah to judge between him and his vineyard.

Judge between me, etc.—Comp. ii. 4; Exod. xviii. 16; Ezek. xxxiv. 17, 20, 22. The summons of ver. 3 to judge between the vineyard and its owner, must of itself awaken the thought that no actual, physical vineyard is meant here. For where is the owner that would ever think of laying a complaint against his vineyard? One sees from this, and other obvious traits of the description, that the subject here is not an ordinary vineyard and its owner; and v. 6 b. one is made aware that the owner is God Himself. For only He has the power to cause it to rain, and to shut up the rain. Notice, moreover, how vers. 1 and 2 the Prophet himself has spoken, although announcing a song of the friend, and only at ver. 3 the friend begins to speak, in that with "and now" he takes up the discourse of the Prophet and continues it. One may say: quite unnoticed the Prophet glides over into the part played by him whom properly he has to produce to view. And to the first "and now" corresponds a second in ver. 5, that introduced the judgment, so that the extraordinary judgment begins in precisely the same way that the extraordinary complaint does.

The Lord will command the clouds to let no rain fall on the vineyard. With these words the vail falls completely. It is plain now that the beginning of ver. 1 was irony. A fearful disappointment comes on those that had disappointed the Lord Himself, and, by the art of the Prophet, the reader, too, must share this disappointment, in that he is conducted from the charming pictures of ver. 1, to the dreadful ones that are now to follow.

For the vineyard—a cry.—Ver. 7. Like the prophet Nathan, 2 Sam. xii. 5, first provoked King David to a stern judgment of a wicked man by means of a fictitious story, and then exclaimed: "thou art the man," so here Isaiah explains to the men of Jerusalem and Judah, after they had at least silently given their assent to the judgment on the bad vineyard: "The vineyard of Jehovah is the house of Israel." But this statement is connected by כִּי for, with what precedes, because a consequence of this fact was already indicated at the end of ver. 6. For this not letting it rain explains itself from the fact that the Lord Himself is the owner, and the vineyard is the house of Israel. For, though one must admit that ver. 7 refers to all that precedes, yet still that trait in ver. 1–6 which especially receives its light from the identity of the owner with Jehovah, is precisely that which we read in ver. 6 b.

But why does the prophet vary from the designation "Judah and Jerusalem" hitherto employed by him? Why does he here make "house of Israel" and "men of Judah" parallel? CASPARI attempts in his Beiträgen, p. 164, an extended proof that here, as iv. 2 and i. 2, Israel is Judah as Israel, and as Israel in Judah. But one naturally asks: why, if Isaiah meant only Judah, does he not name Judah exclusively? Why does he suddenly drop the designation used hitherto? But if with the name "house of Israel" he designates Judah (to be) as Israel, is it not therewith admitted that the conception Israel extends over Judah, and is not then this more comprehensive Israel in its totality, the vineyard of Jehovah? It is true that the figure of the vineyard is nowhere in older writings applied either to Judah or Israel. But the Lord calls Israel His people (iii. 12, &c.), His flock (Ps. xcv. 7, &c.), His peculiar treasure (Exod. xix. 5; Deut. vi. 6), His inheritance (Jer. ii. 7; xvi. 18, &c.), and all these expressions refer to Israel entire. Thus it cannot be contested that Israel in the narrower sense belongs also to the vineyard of Jehovah. If now, too, in general, as can not be denied, Judah and Jerusalem form the principal object of the discourse (ii. 1), yet the prophet may here and there cast a glance aside at the kingdom of Israel. Prophets of Jehovah can never forget that Israel, which hastens faster to the abyss of destruction than Judah, as Jer. expressly says: xxxi. 20; comp. Isa. xi. 11 sqq. I therefore share the view of VITRINGA, DRECHSLER, DELITZSCH, that "house of Israel" of course means all Israel. This view is not refuted but rather confirmed by the fact that the men of Judah are presently called "the plant of his pleasure." For this expression that accords to Judah a certain precedence, suits better when "house of Israel" does not signify Judah over again, but the Israel of the Ten Tribes.

The Lord had planted with pleasure. But He was outrageously deceived in His just expectations. He had expected a "fruit of the earth" iv. 2, that would do Him honor. But behold! instead of מִשְׁפָּט mishpot, He gathers מִשְׂפָּח mispahh: instead of צְדָקָה tsedhaka, he gathers צְעָקָה tseaka. The poet here choicely depicts by the word-likeness, which yet conceals a total difference of meaning, the deceptive appearance in the conduct of the Israelites, which at first looked like good vines and then developed a wild wine.

b. THE BAD FRUITS AND THEIR EFFECTS MORE PARTICULARLY DESCRIBED IN A SIXFOLD WOE—AT THE SAME TIME A TWOFOLD CONCLUSION OF THE WHOLE DISCOURSE.

Chapter V. 8–30.

8 Woe unto them that join house to house,
That lay field to field,
Till there be no place,
That [1]they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth!
9 [2]In mine ears said the Lord of hosts,
[3]Of a truth many houses shall be desolate,
Even great and fair, without inhabitant.
10 Yea, ten acres of vineyard shall yield one bath,
And the seed of an homer shall yield an ephah.
11 Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink;
That continue until night, till wine [4]inflame them!
12 [a]And the harp, and the viol, the tabret, and pipe,
[b]And wine, are in their feasts:
But they regard not the work of the Lord,
Neither consider the operation of his hands.
13 Therefore my people are gone into captivity, [c]because they have no knowledge:
And [5]their honorable men are [d]famished,
And their multitude dried up with thirst.
14 Therefore hell hath enlarged [e]herself,
And opened her mouth without measure:
And their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp,
And he that rejoiceth, shall descend into it.
15 And[f] the mean man shall be brought down,
And [f]the mighty man shall be humbled,
And the eyes of the lofty shall be humbled:
16 But the Lord of hosts shall be exalted in judgment,
And[6] [7]God that is holy shall be sanctified in righteousness.
17 Then shall the lambs feed [g]after their manner,
And the waste places of the fat ones shall strangers eat.
18 Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity,
And sin as it were with a cart rope:
19 That say, Let him make speed, and hasten his work,
That we may see it:
And let the counsel of the Holy One of Israel draw nigh and come,
That we may know it.
20 Woe unto them [8]that call evil good, and good evil;
That put darkness for light, and light for darkness:
That put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!
21 Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes,
And prudent [9]in their own sight!
22 Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine,
And men of strength to mingle strong drink:
23 Which justify the wicked for reward,
And take away the righteousness of the righteous from him!
24 Therefore as [10]the fire devoureth the stubble,
And the flame consumeth the [h]chaff,

So their root shall be as rottenness,
And their blossom shall go up as dust:
Because they have cast away the law of the LORD of hosts,
And despised the word of the Holy One of Israel.
25 Therefore is the anger of the LORD kindled against his people,
And he hath stretched forth his hand against them,
And hath smitten them: and the hills did tremble,
And their carcasses were[11] [i]torn in the midst of the streets.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still,
26 And he will lift up an ensign to the nations from far,
And will hiss unto them from the end of the earth:
And, behold, [j]they shall come with speed swiftly:
27 None shall be weary nor stumble among them;
None shall slumber nor sleep;
Neither shall the girdle of their loins be loosed,
Nor the latchet of their shoes be broken:
28 Whose arrows are sharp,
And all their bows bent,
Their horses' hoofs shall be counted like flint,
And their wheels like a whirlwind:
29 Their roaring shall be like a [k]lion,
They shall [l]roar like young lions:
Yea, they shall roar, and lay hold of the prey,
And shall carry it away safe, and none shall deliver it.
30 And in that day [m]they shall roar against [m]them like the roaring of the sea:
And if one look unto the land, behold darkness and [12]sorrow, [13]And the light is darkened[n] in the heavens thereof.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 8. נָגַע is often construed with בְּ: Gen. xxvi. 11; xxxii. 33; Lev. xi. 36; 1 Ki. xix. 5, 7, etc. Comp. especially Hos. iv. 2. Hiphil הִגִּיעַ occurs beside only vi. 7; viii. 8; xxv. 12; xxvi. 5; xxx. 4. קָרַב is generally not construed with בְּ. But when DRECHSLER says that this construction never occurs, it is asserting too much. For Ps. xci. 10 it is said "No plague יִקְרַב בְּאָהֳלֶךָ." Comp. Judges xix. 13. In our passage the construction of the first clause has doubtless influenced that of the second. Hiph. הִקְרִיב only again xxvi. 17.——אֶפֶס (defectus, non-existent) occurs oftener in the second part than in the first: xl. 17; xli. 12, 29; xlv. 6, 14, 22; xlvi. 9, lii. 4, 10; liv. 15. In the first part it occurs again only xxxiv. 12.——The Hophal הוּשַׁבְתֶּם (xliv. 26) indicates that their dwelling alone in the land was not a natural thing, but something contrived. Compare complaints of like import iii. 14 sq.; Mich. ii. 2; iii. 2, sq.

Ver. 9. In mine ears, etc. In xxii. 14 an address of Jehovah begins with the words, "and it was revealed in mine ears," etc. In our passage וְנִגְלָה "and it was revealed" is omitted. It does not follow from this that this or some similar word has fallen out of the text. For the Prophet may very well have had in thought the bare notion of existence as predicate of his sentence; "In mine ears is Jehovah Sabaoth." It must not however be construed in a pregnant sense: Jehovah keeps ever saying to me (liegt mir in den Ohren). For there is not a thought of any resistance on the part of the Prophet that had provoked a persistence on the Lord's side. Neither may the expression mean: Jehovah whispers in my ear; as if the secrecy of the address were meant by it; for there exists no reason for such secrecy. But the Prophet will only say, that what follows he has clearly heard by the inward ear as the word of Jehovah. There lies thus in the expression a distinguishing of actual from merely imaginary hearing. Comp. Ps. xliv. 2; Job xxviii. 22; xxxiii. 8.

The pointing of the word בְאָזְנָי as a pausal form appears to have for its object to separate it from what follows and to signify thereby that in this word alone is contained the predicate of the sentence.—לְשַׁמָּה again xiii. 9, comp. Deut. xxviii. 37; Mich. vi. 16.——מֵאֵין יוֹשֵׁב comp. vi. 11; Jer. ii. 15; iv. 7, etc.; Zeph. ii. 5; iii. 6.

Ver. 11. A likeness of structure is to be noticed in the two halves of the verse. The verb. fin. in the phrase שֵׁכָר יִרְדֹּפוּ relates to the foregoing participle, not simply like יַקְרִיבוּ ver. 8, as the dominant form, but at the same time as assigning the purpose; and so is it too with יַדְלִיקֵם.—The Pi. of אִחֵר again in Isa. xlvi. 13. נֶשֶׁף from נָשַׁף to breathe, to blow, the time of day when cooler air stirs, the morning and evening twilight: comp. xxi. 4; lix. 10. The verb דָּלַק (comp. Ezek. xxiv. 10) is found only here in Isaiah.

Ver. 12. If מִשְׁתֵּיהֶם (sing. comp. Gesenius, § 93, 9) were subject, it must follow וְהָיָה, for this position is constantly maintained after a verb with Vav consec. But if it were predicate, it would say nothing; for what else would music and wine be but a feast. For that וְהָיָה would be superfluous. We construe הָיָה therefore, not as mere copula, but in the sense of being on hand; and there is on hand.——The combination of מַעֲשֶׂה with יָד in a manifold sense is quite current with Isa. ii. 8; xvii. 8; xix. 25; xxix. 23; xxxvii. 19; lx. 21; lxiv. 7; lxv. 22.

Ver. 13. גָּלָה in the sense of "making bare, i. e., clearing out the land" occurs in Isaiah only again xxiv. 11, which passage generally resembles this one.——מְתֵי רָעָב has without reason been discredited, and instead some would read מְזֵי רָעָב according to Deut. xxxii. 24, for מְתִים is wont to be used in a contemptuous sense, comp. iii. 25.——צִחֵה (comp. Green's Gram. § 187,1 b.) is adjectivum ad f. אִלֵּם, גִּבֵּן, עִוֵּר etc., and only occurs here.

Ver. 14. פָּעַר aperire, that always stands with פֶּה (Job xvi. 10; xxix. 23; Ps. cxix. 131) occurs in Isaiah only here. The same with לִבְלִי (comp. Job xxxviii. 41; xli. 25). חֹק again only xxiv. 5.——The suffixes of the nouns are to be referred to the notion "Jerusalem," although immediately before ver. 13, the masculine עַם is used. But it is plain that the Prophet in ver. 14 b., aims at a mimicry of sound. For this purpose he employs the clear a sound as often as possible. Delitzsch calls attention to the omission to draw the tone back on the penult. of the word וְעָלֵז, "so that one may hear the object that is falling down as it rolls and at last strikes bottom." הָדָר comp. ii. 10, 19, 21; xxxv. 2; liii. 2.

Ver. 15. The aorists וַיִּשַּׁח, וַיִּשְׁפַּל, וַיִּגְבַּה are to be construed as Præterita prophetica. Also תִּשְׁפַּלְנָה, with the Vav preceding and separate, is, as Drechsler has remarked = וַתִּשְׁפַּלְנָה.

Ver. 17. רָעוּ is to be taken absolutely, without object. What is understood suggests itself from what precedes. The pronoun of the third person is, as object of the phrase, very often omitted; Gen. ii. 19; iii. 21; vi. 19, 20, 21, etc. It is not necessary, with Gesenius to take כְּדָבְרָם for כְּבְדָבְרָם: for רָעָה very often stands with the accusative of the place that is pastured: xxx. 23; Mich. vii. 14; Jer. vi. 3; l. 19, etc. As their pasture shall the sheep graze over the ruins of Jerusalem, in so far as the inhabited city becomes a sheep walk. When Delitzsch thinks that no accusative object is to be supplied to רָעוּ, but that the determination of the locality results from the context, it is seen that still there is a supplying of the object. One may as well supply the definite locality as object according to frequent usus loquendi, as imagine it from the context. The sense, in any case remains the same.——כְּבֶשׂ found again only i. 11; xi. 6, דֹּבֶר = מִדְבָּר the place whither flocks are driven, found again only Mich. ii. 12. מֵחִים found beside only Ps. lxv. 6, 15. גָּרִים are not גֵּרִים the strangers that are constant dwellers in the land, but as participle from גּוּר, those en passant. The LXX translate ἄρνες. They may have read perhaps גְּדָיִים (כָּרִים). This word, moreover, Schleussner, Hitzig, Ewald and others would restore. But we have shown above that an emphasis rests on the idea of a transitory stopping. גּוּר in Isaiah again xi. 6; liv. 15. The plural חֳרָבוֹת occurs only here in the first part of Isaiah; but six times in the second part: xliv. 26; xlix. 19; li. 3; lii. 9; lviii. 12; lxi. 4. The singular is found only lxiv. 10.

Ver. 18. I take מָשַׁךְ in its usual meaning in which it often occurs with the accusative (in Isaiah again only lxvi. 19, coll. xiii. 22; xviii. 2). חַבְלֵי הַשָּׁוְא are ropes of lies, for what binds them to sin, is the illusion that sin makes one happy. Hence every sin is a fraud (Heb. iii. 13). The expression further calls to mind Jon. ii. 9; Psalm xxxi. 7; and also חַבְלֵי חַטָּאתוֹ Prov. v. 22, and חַבְלֵי אָדָם Hos. xi. 4. Regarding the use of שָׁוְא in Isaiah, comp. i. 13 (מִנְחַת־שׁ׳), xxx. 28 (נָפַת שׁ׳), lix. 4, (דַּבֵּר־שׁ׳). The word occurs only in these places in Isaiah. In כַּעֲבוֹת the prefix בְּ is wanting according to the familiar rule; comp. Gesenius, § 118, Rem. עֲבוֹת (from עָבַת to twist, the twisting, twisted work, rope) Isaiah uses only here. Comp. Hos. xi. 4. עֲגָלָה, "a freight wagon," found too xxviii. 27, 28.

Ver. 19. מַהֵר and יָחִישׁ may be taken transitively and intransitively. I decide for the latter construction, 1) because מַהֵר is used by Isaiah only intransitively (xxxii. 4; xlix. 17; li. 14; lix. 7), יָחִישׁ, that occurs twice beside here (xxviii. 16; lx. 22), is one of these times (xxviii. 16) used intransitively; 2) because in the parallel phrase ותקרב וגו׳ not Jehovah but עֲצַת ק׳ is subject. The sense is any way in both instances the same. The forms יָחִישָׁה and תָּבוֹאָה belong to the few instances of the voluntative ה appended to the third person, (comp. Ps. xx. 4, and the more doubtful cases Lev. xxi. 5; Deut. xxxiii. 16; Job xi. 17; xxii. 21; Ezek. xxiii. 20; Olshausen, § 228 b. Anm. [Green, § 97, 7). Let it be noticed moreover that this He so stands in two pairs of verbs, that each time it is only appended to the last word. It seems that each time it should avail as well for the first word. Comp. i. 24 b.—עֵצָה is a current word with Isaiah that occurs thirteen times in the first part and five times in the second. On "the Holy One of Israel" see i. 4.

Ver. 20. שׂוּם with לְ following in the sense "to make into something;" xiii. 9; xxiii. 13; xxv. 2; xli. 15; xlii. 15; xlix. 11, etc.

Ver. 21. On נֶגֶד פְּנֵיהֶם comp. Hos. vii. 2; Lam. iii. 35; the expression does not again occur in Isaiah. נָבוֹן part. iii. 3; xxix. 14.

Ver. 22. מָסַךְ in Isaiah again xix. 14. מֶסֶךְ = מִמְסָךְ lxv. 11. Hiph. הִצְדִּיק found again l. 8; liii. 11. עֵקֶב only here. שֹׁחַד again i. 23; xxxiii. 15; xlv. 13. Hiph. הֵסִיר frequent in the first part (i. 16, 25; iii. 1, 18; v. 5, 23; x. 13, etc.), in the second part only in lviii. 9. The singular suffix in מכנו must be construed distributively. The righteousness of the righteous they let disappear from him, i. e., from the righteous man in question. Comp., at ii. 8 and i, 23.

Ver. 24. As regards the construction; כאכל is a predicate infinitive dependent on a preposition, which is followed immediately, not as usually by the subject, but by the object, because the order כאכל לשון אש קש offends against euphony; also in xx. 1, the object precedes, because it is a pronoun (אתו). Commentators call attention to the multiplication of sibilants in the sentence. "One hears the crackling sparks, the sputtering flames" says DELITZSCH. חשש occurs only once again in the Old Testament, xxxiii. 11.—רפה is "to become lax, withered, weary, fall away" (especially of the hands xiii. 7). לֶהָבָה is accus. loci.——The suffixes in שרשם and פרחם refer back to those whom the preceding four woes concern. To these then their punishment is announced. מַק only occurs again iii. 24. פֶּרַח (only xviii. 5 again) is the blossom. אָבָק dust, only occurs again xxix. 5.—The second clause of the verse calls to mind i. 4. They were therefore the opposite of "the branch of Jehovah" iv. 2, and much rather comparable to the bad grape-vine, v. 1 sqq. אִמְרָה occurs again xxviii. 23; xxix. 4; xxxii. 9.

Ver. 25. The expression חָרָה אַף does not occur again in Isaiah, and, excepting the part, Niph. xli. 11; xlv. 24, no other form of the verb חרה occurs in Isaiah. Our expression, however, calls to mind, Num. xi. 33, "And the wrath of the LORD was kindled against His people, and the LORD smote the people," as all those numerous places in the Pentateuch, especially Num. where the expression ויחר אף ה׳, "and the anger of the LORD kindled," etc., occurs (Exod. iv. 14; Num. xi. 1, 10; xii. 9, etc.).—נטה ידו is also a reminiscence of the Pentateuch from Exod. viii. 2, 13; x. 22; xiv. 21, 27, where the expression is used of Aaron and Moses as they stretched out the hand to the performance of their miracles. In Isaiah, this expression is repeated in the same manner in xxiii. 11; xxxi. 3, coll. xiv. 26, 27.——רָגַז (Kal., in Isaiah xiv. 9; xxxii. 10, 11; xxviii. 21; lxiv. 1), used of the trembling of the earth (Joel. ii. 10) or of the foundation of the mountains (Ps. xviii. 8, coll. 2 Sam. xxii. 8). The expression that the carcass (נְבֵלָה occurs xxvi. 19) shall be as the sweepings (סוּחָה from סָחָה Ezek. xxvi. 4, everrere, detergere — סְחִי Lam. iii. 45, "leavings, sweepings out;" ἅπ. λεγ.), occurs only here. Elsewhere it is, that the נבלה shall be as dung in the field (Jer. ix. 21), shall be cast as a prey (Deut. xxviii. 26; Jer. vii. 33; xvi. 4; xix 7, etc.), to the wild beasts. The reading חוצות (the London Polyglot has חוּצוֹת) is both etymologically incorrect, and also in conflict with every other place in which the word occurs in Isaiah (x. 6; xv. 3; xxiv. 11; li. 20.

Ver. 26. מֵרָחוֹק does not belong to נָשָׂא, but it has become an adjective conception and takes the place of an adjective, as may be seen from passages like Jer. xxiii. 23; xxxi. 10. The same is true of מִמֶּרְחָק that has the same meaning. The former word occurs in Isaiah twelve times; five times in the first and seven times in the second part (xxii. 3, 11; xxiii. 7; xxv. 1; xliii. 6; xlix. 1, 12; lvii. 9; lix. 14; lx. 4, 9). נֵס a signal set up on a high point; xi. 12; xiii. 2; xviii. 3; xxxiii. 23; lxii. 10. Only in the last named passage does the verb הרים occur. שָׁרַק "to hiss, whistle," is taken from the practice of bee keepers, as may be seen in vii. 18, where the same figure recurs. מקצה recurs xiii. 5; xlii. 10; xliii. 6, thus equally in both parts. In each place, xiii. 5 excepted, הארץ follows it. מְהֵרָה properly substantive = celeritas: recurs lviii. 8; combined with קַל according to Joel iv. 4. קַל recurs in Isa. xix. 1; xxx. 16; xviii. 2. On the change of number in לוֹ, comp., at ver. 23. The singular here apparently indicates that though the signal is given at various times and to different nations, still always, it shall be only one at a time, that they shall be summoned.

Ver. 27. DRECHSLER justly calls attention to the perfect equilibrium in the structure of this ver. 27; in the first hemistich two clauses, each with two members of like arrangement; in the second hemistich two clauses, each with one member, the corresponding words in which rhyme together: שרוך—אזור, נתק—נפתח, נעלין—חלציו. עָיֵף recurs in Isaiah xxviii. 12; xxix. 8; xxxii. 2; xlvi. 1. On כָּשֵׁל see at iii. 8. The Participle (Jer. xlvi. 16; Ps. cv. 37; 2 Chr. xxviii. 15), occurs only here in Isaiah. נום recurs only lvi. 10, יָשֵׁן only here in Isaiah. Niph. נפתח xxiv. 18; xxxv. 5; li. 14.

Ver. 28. צַר in the sense of "stone, flint" occurs only here and ver. 30, if this interpretation is allowable in the second case; it has then the same meaning as צֹר Ezek. iii. 9; Exod. iv. 25 and צוּר ii. 10; viii. 14, etc. Niph. נחשב like ii. 22; xxix. 16, 17; xl. 15.

Ver. 29. לָבִיא (again in Isa. xxx. 6) is by most held to mean lioness. Comp. GESENIUS, Thes. p. 738 . . . On the construction of כַּלָּבִיא see at ver. 18.—ושאג is according to K'thibh וְשָׁאַג, according to K'ri יִשְׁאַג. The reading of K'ri is the correct one, for there is no reason for the perfect with the Vav consec., whereas the imperfect stands here, according to rule, to describe permanent qualities.——נָהַם only here in Isaiah, see Prov. xxviii. 15; xix. 12; xx. 2). Of פָּלַט the form found here is the only one used by Isaiah, and that only here. The formula ואין מציל occurs again xlii. 22, and xliii. 13, in which latter place it sounds the same as the original passage Deut. xxxii. 39.

Ver. 30. The subject of ינהם, "he shall roar," is the same that it has in the preceding verse. But we translate "it roars dull," only to give prominence to the collective more than to the individual as indicated in כנהמת־ים "as the roaring of the sea." The suffix, in עָלָיו can refer only to the one seized, i. e., Judah.—— נהמה occurs only again Ps. xxxviii. 9.——DRECHSLER, has justly called attention "to the sound painting produced by accumulating the buzzing and rumbling sound of m, and n, too," in the first hemistich of this verse. Both sounds are in יִנְהֹם; to this word כְּיוֹם rhymes; in כְּנַהֲמַת־יָם we find m. and n. again, and the syllable am twice.—To this hemistich, which I may say has itself a low rumble, the second is opposed, which portrays the conquered by its many, i e, and a sounds, thus by thinner sounds, that in a measure paint weakness.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The meaning of this section is twofold. First of all it contains a specification of the sour grapes, and a corresponding announcement of punishment. In this matter the Prophet begins with a certain selection. For he does not censure all sins, but only the sins of the eminent, and eminent sins. Thus six evil fruits are enumerated, and what the Prophet has to say with reference to each begins with a woe. But a detailed announcement of punishment follows on each of the first two woes only, after the description of the sinful condition with which they are concerned. For the following woes there follows an announcement of punishment common to all from ver. 24 on. This difference observed by the Prophet in regard to the order of his topics is connected with the second meaning of the passage: that is to say it contains at the same time the twofold conclusion of the second portal, i. e. of the whole discourse from chap. ii.—v. For the announcement of punishment after the second woe, which is in proportion long extended through five verses (v. 13–17), manifestly contains a relative ending: the wicked city sinks into the lower world, and the grass grows over its grave. These are manifestly, I may say, final chords. But in as much as the Prophet, vers. 15 and 16, reiterates verbatim the fundamental thought of his first illumination of the present, he gives us to understand that he would have this first (relative) conclusion refer to the first half of his discourse (chap. ii. and iii). And as he handles the following twice-two woes differently from the first two, he intimates that they have another purpose. They are not interrupted in their sequence by announcements of punishment coming between, but these follow after as common to all. Precisely by this concentration the Prophet gains a highly effective conclusion of the whole discourse, but which at the same time undeniably refers to the second lamp (chap. iv. and v.), just as we have seen that the first (relative) conclusion refers to the first lamp. One recognizes this from the comparison of ver. 24, drawn from vegetation, especially from the notions "root" and "scion," in which the reference back to the צֶמַח branch, chap. iv., as also to the vineyard and its fruit cannot be mistaken.

Thus this most artistically composed ending is at the same time an image of the whole discourse, whose unity, comprising chaps. ii.–v., here becomes most evident. As the twofold division forms the ground-work of the whole discourse, so it does of this conclusion. And this twofold division appears in the conclusion in a double form: first the simple two for the first (relative) conclusion; then the potent, doubled two for the great principal conclusion. From this we know, at the same time, why there must be six woes, and not seven, as one inclines to expect.

The first woe concerns the rich and mighty, that swallow up the property of inferior people, so that at last they possess the land alone (ver. 8). These are threatened that their houses shall be destroyed (ver. 9), and their ground shall become so sterile that ten acres shall yield only a bucketful of must, and a bushel of seed a peck [i. e. 1-16 of a German bushel.—Tr.] of fruits (ver. 10). The second woe pertains to high livers and gluttons, that begin early and leave off late (ver. 11), and who, amid the noise of music and the banquet, never come to regard Jehovah's work (ver. 12). For this the people must wander into exile, and high rank and low rank shall perish of hunger and thirst (v. 13), and be used only to be cast into the jaws of the insatiably greedy underworld (ver. 14). Then shall human pride be humbled (ver. 15), and the Lord, the righteous judge shall appear then as alone high in His righteousness and holiness (ver. 16), the waste places of the fallen grandees shall become the pastures of the flocks of alien tribes (ver. 17). The third woe is proclaimed against the insolent mockers that do evil with a very rage for it (ver. 18), and with blasphemous contempt, challenge the Lord, in whom they do not believe, to oppose His work to their own (ver. 19). The fourth woe strikes those who perversely call exactly that good which is bad, and that bad which is good (ver. 20). The fifth woe concerns the conceited that think they alone are wise (ver. 21). The sixth woe, finally, is proclaimed against the oppressors and unjust, who in order to live high, turn aside justice for a vile reward (vers. 22, 23). The threatening, that those who have despised the law of Jehovah, shall be destroyed root and branch, corresponds to the last four woes in common (ver. 24). For this the people shall be smitten and their dead bodies be cast into the streets like sweepings. But that is not enough even (ver. 25). Foreign nations shall be brought from a distance against Israel (26). They shall vigorously and zealously accomplish the work to which they are called (27–29). Then like the roaring surges of the sea the enemy shall break over Israel. Israel shall see nothing on the earth but dark night: instead of a protection against rain and storm (iv. 6), a dark storm-cloud shall envelop the earth that shall turn aside the vivifying and warming light (v. 30).

This is the result of the contemplation that the Prophet sets forth in regard to the (relative) present. Sad and gloomy as this result is, the realization of that glorious future which he holds in prospect (iv. 2–6) is not thereby hindered: on the contrary it postulates and prepares the way for that future. The words "in that day" point away to that.

2. Woe unto them—yield an epha.—Vers. 8–16. On הוֹי comp. remarks at i. 4. The Prophet first proclaims a woe against the rich and mighty, who with insatiable greed annex the houses and fields of their poor neighbors, so that these are crowded out of the land, and the country becomes the exclusive domain of these oppressors.

This accumulation of property violates both the statutes concerning the inheritance of real estate, and the year of Jubilee (Lev. xxv. 10–13; 25 sqq.). What the Prophet has heard is this; not merely some, but many houses, i. e. the houses, all that there are of them (ii. 3), shall be desolated, and the great and beautiful ones shall be without dwellers. This desolation of the houses is ascribed to the sterility that comes on the land as a punishment from God. For the Pentateuch threatens the disobedience of Israel with this punishment, and that in not a few passages: Lev. xxvi. 18–20; Deut. xi. 17; xxviii. 17 sq., 23 sq., 38 sqq. How great the barrenness shall be may be determined from the fact, that ten acres of vine land will only yield a bucket of wine, and a bushel of seed only the tenth part as much fruit.—צֶמֶד is a pair of beasts of burden bound by a yoke (Judg. xix. 10; 1 Sam. xi. 7; Isa. xxi. 7, 9), then a piece of ground as great as such a צמד could plow up in a day. If a vineyard is not plowed it might still be measured by the acre. How large a surface a צמד might be according to our measures, has never yet been made out. Comp. Unterss. über die Längen-Feld-und Wege-Masse, insbesondere der Greichen und der Iuden von L. Fenner v. Fenneberg, Berlin, 1859, p. 96.

בַּת a bath (comp. at בָּתָּה ver. 6) is the principal measure for fluids, like the ephah for dry measure. Both are the tenth part of a homer or כּוֹר, cor. (Ezek. xlv. 11, 14), בת occurs only here in Isa. חֹמֶר homer, (probably the burden of a חֲמֹר, an ass., whence Judg. xv. 16; 1 Sam. xvi. 2 חֲמוֹר stands directly for חֹמֶר) does not again occur in Isa. in this sense. Also אֵיפָה "an ephah" is only here in Isa. There is still great uncertainty regarding the relation of these measures to those used by us. If Thenius (The ancient Hebrew long and hollow measures, Studien und Krit., 1846, Heft. 1 and 2) is correct, who sets the contents of the homer at 10143.9 Paris cubic inches, then this would about correspond to the burden an ass can bear.

3. Woe unto them that rise up early—shall strangers eat.—Vers. 11–17. The second woe, the longest and most detailed, is directed against the high livers and gluttons. They rise early so as to go soon to drinking; they remain long sitting of evenings so as to inflame themselves with wine. "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning! Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is a noble, and thy princes eat in due season, for strength and not for drunkenness!" Eccl. x. 16, 17; Comp. xxii. 13; lvi. 12; Am. vi. 3 sqq. The Romans called feasts that began before the usual time (i. e. in the ninth hour) tempestiva convivia, seasonable feasts (Cic. de Senect. 14, &c.). Ab octava hora bibere was accounted debauchery (Juven. 1, 49, comp. Gesenius on our ver.). שֵׁכָר is the artificial wine, and יַיִן the natural. The first was prepared partly from dates, apples, pomegranates (Song of S. viii. 2), honey, barley, (ζῦθος, οἶνος κρίθινος, Herz. 2, 77), partly by mixture (like our punch, hence מָסַךְ שֵׁכָר to mingle drink v. 22); Comp. Herzog's R. Encycl. XVII. p. 615. In general comp. xxiv. 9; xxviii. 7; xxix. 9; lvi. 12.

The inflaming caused by wine is physical and psychical; (the former was by the ancients referred to the hepar and oculi, the liver and the eyes); comp. Prov. xxiii. 29 sq.

But to a jovial banquet belongs music. There does not fail כִּנּוֹר (the harp, i. e. a stringed instrument, with strings resting free and plumb on the sounding board, comp. xvi. 11; xxiii. 16; xxiv. 8; xxx. 32), נֵבֶל (i. e., every stringed instrument, whose strings are stretched over a bag-shaped sounding board by means of a bridge, for נֵבֶל is properly the bag.—comp. xiv. 11; xxii. 24), תֹּף (the hand drum, the tambourine, xxiv. 8; xxx. 32), and חָלִיל (the flute, literally bored out, hollow, xxx. 29). Comp. Herzog's R. Encycl. X. p. 126 sqq. If now it is added, "and wine" is their drink, it is to prevent one from thinking that ver. 12 a indicates a different situation from that of ver. 11; rather the identity of both is expressly made prominent.

While nothing is wanting to the scene as regards worldly pleasure and joy, there is the most serious poverty in regard to spiritual life. In this respect they are as if blind and dead; the revelations of God that are written both in the book of nature and in history, they do not in any way regard. The greatest misery ever known to antiquity was destined to follow this luxury, and debauchery that wickedly forgot the one thing needful; the wandering into exile. One may see from Lam. v., how distressingly it went with such a herd of humanity, driven away as they were like cattle. Because the nation had not regarded what would promote its peace, it must go out "unawares," מִבְּלִי דַעַת. In this is signified both: without insight, and unawares. The word designates the subjective state that was portrayed ver. 12 b, and at the same time the manner in which the objective divine judgment should break over them. מבלי דעה is only found here. But in Hos. iv. 6, which comp. מִבְּלִי הַדָּעַת is found in a connection similar to this. Every where beside it reads בִּבְלִי ד׳ (Deut. iv. 42; xix. 4; Josh. xx. 3; Job xxxvi. 12). מִן here is not causative, but negative = without. [Lowth, Barnes and J. A. Alexander retain the meaning of the Eng. Vers.: "for want of knowledge."—Tr.]

The honored, the nobility of the people (כָּבוֹד abstr. pro concr. comp. iv. 5; xvi. 14; xvii. 3; lx. 13; lxvi. 12;) shall become starvelings, and the great crowd (הָמוֹן noise, then what makes noise, the great crowd xvii. 12; xxix. 5–8,) shall pant with thirst. Many, like Gesenius, would take המון to mean the rich, because the word occurs in the sense of "riches, treasures" (lx. 5; Jer. iii. 23). But the Prophet announces the judgment to the entire people (comp. עַמִּי in the beginning of the verse): according to which it is quite suitable for him to divide the totality into nobility and common people. When death has rich harvest on the earth, then the underworld must open its gates wide to receive the sacrifice. According to that then לָכֵן therefore, ver. 14 stands to the לכן ver. 13, not in a co-ordinate but in a subordinate relation. A soul is ascribed to Sheol (the word is with few exceptions, e. g. Job xxvi. 6, feminine). It is therefore personified. The notion "soul" is at the same time used in the meaning of "desire, greed," a usage that is not infrequent in the O.

Test., as is well known. Thus it is used, e.g., Deut. xxiii. 25, "When thou comest into thy neighbor's vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes כְּנַפְשְׁךָ שָׂבְעֶךָ." Comp. Prov. xxiii. 2 בַּעַל נֶפֶשׁ a greedy person; כְּלָבִים עַזֵּי־נֶפֶשׁ Isa. lvi. 11, dogs strong in greediness; comp. Ps. xxvii. 12. The same expression as in our passage is found in Hab. ii. 5. The insatiable nature of the underworld is declared also Prov. xxvii. 20; xxx. 16.

Sheol (in Isa. again xiv. 9, 11, 15; xxviii. 15, 18; xxxviii. 10, 18; lvii. 9), according to the O. Test. representation, is the resting-place of departed souls, corresponding to the Hades of the Greeks, which is conceived of as in the inward part of the earth (hence שְׁאוֹל תַּחְתִּית the lowest hell, Deut. xxxii. 22; Ps. lxxxvi. 13, coll. Ps. lxxxviii. 7; Lam. iii. 55; Isa. xliv. 23; Ezek. xxvi. 20; xxxii. 18, 24), because, naturally, the kingdom of death must be conceived of as in the opposite direction from the kingdom of life. When, therefore, God, the Lord of light, has His seat in light which envelops us from above, then must the kingdom of death be sought under us in the dark depths of the earth.

There are three views regarding the derivation of the word שְׁאוֹל: 1) the older, according to which the word should be derived from שָׁאַל, to demand. The underworld was called "the demanding, the summons," in accordance with its insatiableness (comp. the passages cited above); and because it will only receive and never gives; 2) GESENIUS, and at the same time with him, though quite independently, BÖTTCHER, EWALD, MAURER (comp. Thesaur. p. 1348) maintain that שְׁאוֹל is softened from שְׁעוֹל. But שָׁעַל, which never occurs, must, according to שֹׁעַל the hollow hand, שׁוּעָל the excavator, inhabitant of caves, the fox, מִשְׁעוֹל (Num. xxii. 24) the hollow way, have the meaning of being hollow. Sheol would, then, be "the cavern." 3) HUPFELD, ŒHLER, DELITZSCH, refer the word back to the root של, שול, which is the root of שָׁעַל itself, and has the meaning of "hanging down loose, sinking down," so that Sheol would be "the sinking, going down deep." The matter is still undetermined. If it is opposed to the first explanation that, according to it, a poetic epithet is made the chief name of the kingdom of the dead (comp. ŒHLER in HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XXI. p. 412); so, too, both the other views must make it comprehensible how an א comes to take the place of the middle radical.

All the glory of Jerusalem descends into the wide gaping throat of hell. הָמוֹן means the crowd here too (as in ver. 13), but as there is here no contrast with the honored ones as there, but only the notion of superabundance, of multitude, of tumult is added to that of glory. I allow myself with DRECHSLER to translate "riot and revel." שָׁאוֹן strepitus, noise, is used of the roar of water (xvii. 12, 13), and of a multitude of men (xiii. 4; xxiv. 8; xxv. 5; lxvi. 6). The three substantives designate everything that is splendid and makes a noise, be it person or thing. עָלֵז (ἁπ. λεγ.), too, before which אֲשֶׁר is to be supplied, does not seem to exclude reference to things. For why should not the music and all that pertains to a banquet (ver. 12) be called jovial? Comp. Ps. xcvi. 12.

In as much as the Prophet in vers. 15 and 16 partly repeats verbatim the fundamental thoughts of the first half of this discourse, that we have called the first prophetic lamp (comp. ii. 9, 11, 17), he intimates that the two parts belong to one another. Those false eminences illumined by the first lamp, and the false fruits of which the second treats, lead to the same end: to the humiliation of the wickedly insolent men, and to the proof that the holy and just God is alone high. But why the Prophet just at this point casts back this connecting look, is explained in the fact that here we stand at a point of relative conclusion. This we recognize. as was shown above, partly from the contents of this second woe, which sounds like a finale, partly from the form, for the following woes have a very different structure from this first. But notice with what art the Prophet leads over to the theme of the first lamp, and thus unites the fundamental thought of both lamps. By the description of the destruction of the wicked multitude by hunger and thirst, he comes quite naturally on the idea of their sinking down into the underworld. Therewith he has touched the deepest point of antagonism which human enmity against God can attain. For it goes no deeper down than the jaws of Sheol. This mention of the deepest deep reminds him that therewith, what he had said above on the abasement of human pride, appears in a new light. That is to say it appears, by what is threatened in ver. 14, to be absolute. Precisely thereby the highness of the Lord appears in its fullest light. For He that is able to cast down into the lowest deep must for His own part necessarily be the highest. But He is so as the holy one that judges righteously. Now if the highness of God calls to mind the first lamp, His holiness calls to mind the second (comp. the sacred and sanctifying Branch of God, iv. 2, 3). And thus the fundamental thoughts of the first and second lamp combine most beautifully.

The first half of ver. 15 is repeated verbatim from ii. 9 a. The second half of ver. 15 is, with some abbreviation, taken from ii. 11 coll. ver. 17. מִשְׁפָּט is the judicial act (comp. i. 21); in so far as it is a realization of the idea of righteousness, God at the same time proves Himself to be holy (comp. Ezek. xx. 41; xxviii. 22, 25; xxxvi. 23; xxxviii. 16, 23). For holiness and righteousness belong together like lamps and burning (ver. 17). The Prophet concludes his mournful picture of the future in a highly poetic manner, in that on the site of the once glorious and joyous city, now sunk into the ground (vers. 11, 12), he presents a pasture in which wandering nomads are feeding their flocks. Comp. the quite similar pictures of future change of fortune, vii. 21–25; xvii. 2; xxxii. 13 sq.; Zeph. ii. 14 sq. Commentators have justly pointed out that the present condition of Jerusalem and Palestine may be regarded as a part of the fulfilment of this prophecy. For the ancient city is as if sunk into the ground. A depth of rubbish covers the old streets and open places, and above them new ones are laid out in totally different directions. Only laborious excavations can give a correct picture of the topography of ancient Jerusalem. The land, however, is almost every where become pastures for nomadic Arabian tribes. And when, moreover, one reflects that a foreign people, of another faith and inimical to the Jews, has for a long time reigned in Palestine, it must be confessed that the present time corresponds very exactly to this announcement of the Prophet. Yet it must not be overlooked that the circumstances mentioned only touch the outward side of the fulfilment. It cannot be doubted that ver. 14 has been fulfilled also in a deeper, more inward, and, I may say, transcendental way. For what has become of the land we know. But had not the Prophet also a thought of the immortal souls of men?

The חרבות מחים are the ruins that once belonged to the fat and rich, and were then the opposite of mournful, waste wrecks, that is to say, places of splendor and prosperity. Strangers shall devour the products of these wastes, i. e. the grass growing there, that is use it for their cattle. By this is implied that the places shall lie unnoticed and without owners. Only stranger, nomadic shepherds, in passing along, will stop there with their flocks.

4. Woe unto them—may know it.—Vers. 18, 19. The third woe is directed against audacious sinners who make unbelief in God's punitive justice the foundation of their wicked doings. The fact that the Prophet represents these people as impiously bringing down the divine judgment on themselves, has caused many commentators to construe מָשַׁךְ in the sense of "attrahere, draw toward," and עָוֹן in the sense of "guilt" (Ewald, Umbreit), or "punishment of sin" (Gesenius, Knobel, and others). But if the Prophet meant to say this, and to express that those had drawn on themselves by deeds what they had invoked by words, i. e. the judgments of God, he would certainly have employed expressions that would more exactly correspond to the notions מַעֲשֵׂה י׳ and עצת קדוש י׳, thus words that mean directly "punishment, judgment, destruction, ruin." I do not deny that under some circumstances the words עָוֹן and חטאה may be taken in a sense bordering very nearly on "guilt of sin, and punishment of sin" (comp. the passages cited by Knobel, Gen. iv. 13; xix. 15; Ps. xxxi. 11; Zech. xiv. 19; Prov. xxi. 4; to which, also, I would add Isa. xxvii. 9, where these words in the parallelism correspond to one another. See at the place). But, in the present instance, precisely the choice of these words proves to me that the Prophet did not think of the identity of the fruits of those doings with the display of the divine justice, but only of a causal relation between those doings and the divine justice. They sin away so boldly, precisely because they believe there is no danger of a day of vengeance. The idea of "boldly sinning away" the Prophet expresses in his vigorous style, in that he compares those wicked men to draught horses, that drag a heavy wagon by means of stout ropes. Like these beasts lay themselves to the traces with all their might in order to start the load, so these lay themselves out to sin with all their might. They pull with might and main, they surrender themselves to sin with a diligence and expenditure of power worthy of a better cause.

That say, etc.—Ver. 19. What chains them so fast to sin, and makes them so zealous in its service, is just that they do not believe in the divine announcement of a day of retribution. They express their unbelief in a contemptuous challenge to Jehovah to expedite His work, i. e. His work of judgment and punishment, to fulfil His purpose of retribution. They wish for an early coming of this manifestation of judgment. For they would like to experience it. They dare so much. They are not afraid of it, though it were true; but they do not believe it is true. With impious irony they even call Him, in whose display of justice they do not believe, by His title; the Holy One of Israel. They would have it understood thereby, that He is so called, it is true, but He is not this. Comp. xxviii. 15; Jer. v. 12 sq.; xvii. 15; Ezek. xii. 22.

5. Woe unto them—the righteous from him.—Vers. 20-23. That ver. 20 does not speak merely of perversion of justice, as some would have it, appears from the generality of its expressions, and from ver. 23. This perversion of the world whereby exactly bad is good, and good bad, is Satanic. For if the devil became God, as he attempts to become (2 Thess. ii. 4), it would happen thus. But evil has in the physical domain, its correlate in darkness and bitterness, as good has in light and sweetness. For what darkness and bitterness are for the body, such is evil for the spirit, and what light and sweetness are for the body, such is good for the spirit. Thus, Ps. xix. 9, the commandment of the Lord is clear as light, and ver. 11, sweeter than honey and the honey comb. But bitter appears in many places as the symbol of evil: Num. v. 18 sq.; Deut. xxxii. 32 sq.; Jer. ii. 19; Acts viii. 23; Heb. xii. 15. That to the bad it is just bad that tastes good, we read Job xx. 12; Prov. v. 3, 4.

Ver. 21. The Prophet pronounces the fifth woe against the proud self-deification, to which divine wisdom counts for nothing, but its own for everything. Comp. Prov. iii. 7; Jer. viii. 8 sq.; ix. 22 sq. The sixth woe, finally, vers. 22, 23, strikes the unjust and oppressors, who sell justice in order to obtain the means for enjoying a dissolute life. מסך שׁכר, mixing of drink, comp. on ver. 11. It is debatable whether the Hebrews were acquainted with wines prepared with spices. Hitzig, Hendewerk, Delitzsch, maintain that proof that they did is wanting, and take מסך שׁ׳ = temperare aqua, to mix with water, in which sense the later Jews use מָזַג. According to Buxtorf, this word means: "miscuit, temperavit vinum affusa aqua" whence it is used directly for "infundere, to pour into." Comp. מֶזֶג Song of Sol. vii. 3. On the other hand Gesenius (with whom under the word מזג Hitzig had agreed) see word מסך, Winer (R. W. s. v. Wein, Drechsler, Knobel, Leyrer (in R. Encyl. xvii. p. 616) maintain most decidedly that the Hebrews were acquainted with spiced wines. Winer and Leyer dispute even that the use of vinum aqua temperare among the Jews can be certainly proved. These scholars named cite Prov. ix. 2, 5 in proof of the existence among the ancients of spiced wine (which is to be distinguished from that prepared from fruit, honey, barley), in which passage the מסך that is simultaneous with the killing, must point to another mixing, than that with water, which latter must be coincident with the pouring out. They further cite a passage in Mischna Maaser scheni 2, 1 (non condiunt oleum . . . sed condiunt vinum; si inciderit in id mel et condimenta, unde melius reddatur, illa in melius confectio fit juxta computum;) and also Plin. Hist. nat. xiv. 13, 14, 15 19 where he speaks of vinum aromatites, myrrhinum, absynthites, etc.; and further to the New Testament expressions οἶνος ἐσμυρνισμένος Mark xv. 23, κεκερασμένον ἄκρατον, Rev. xiv. 10; and to a passage in Dioscor. 5, 64 sq. According to these evidences I do not see how it can be doubted that the Hebrews were acquainted with spiced wines.

6. Therefore as—stretched out still.—Vers. 24, 25. On the fourfold woe of vers. 18–23, now follows the announcement of the punishment to be shared in common. It is joined on by לָכֵן like ver. 13. The people are compared to stubble and hay, who, according to iv. 2, ought to be a flourishing divine branch. And quick as stubble is devoured by fire or hay disappears in the flames, shall their root decay and their bloom pass away like dust. Thus here too Israel is again represented as a plant, a figure that reminds us strongly of iv. 2 sqq., consequently of the second prophetic lamp. Hay and stubble are very inflammable stuff. But those roots and blossoms, that ought properly to be fresh and full of sap, shall fly away, dissolved as they are in dust and decay, as easily as hay and stubble are devoured by the flames.

The threatening of ver. 24, as appears from the suffixes, concerns immediately those against whom the preceding four woes were proclaimed. But as ver. 13, the banishment of the entire nation is represented as the consequence of the sins of those greedy and riotous men, so here it is shown how the waves of destruction shall roll on to the utmost periphery, and thus seize the whole people. I refer עַל־כֵּן "therefore," not merely to the second clause, but to the whole of ver. 24. Although all the verbal forms in 25 a, point to the past, the things themselves that they declare fall in the future. This is evident from (ver. 24) the relation of the announcement of punishment to the sin, which is indicated as present (ver. 18 sqq.), and from the parallel between the threatenings of ver. 9 sq., and ver. 13 sq.—Comp. Drechsler, in loc.—But it were not impossible that Isaiah employs here the past forms, because facts of the past float before his mind, that were to be regarded, too, as proofs of the wrath portrayed in ver. 25, without, however, representing the entire fulfilment of the threatening. If, then, as to its chief import ver. 25 has respect to the future, and, in contrast with the blows to be expected from a distant people (ver. 26 sqq.), indicates the blows to be expected out of the midst of Judah herself, or from the immediate neighborhood, then there might be a reference in "the hills did tremble" to the earthquake in Uzziah's time (Am. i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5), and in "their carcases," etc., a reference to those 120,000 men of Judah, that Pekah, the king of Israel slew in one day: 2 Chr. xxviii. 6. The formula, "for all this, his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still." (ix. 11, 16, 20; x. 4), expresses the thought that something still greater is coming. Thus then this formula introduces the chief conclusion of the discourse which corresponds to that relative conclusion, vers. 13–17. For if foreign nations from a great distance are called to accomplish a judgment, it is to be expected in advance that this judgment shall be decisive, and of mighty consequence. In fact, too, it was ever nations from a distance that destroyed the respublica Israelitarum. Call to mind the Assyrians, Babylonians, Romans. And those that came the farthest, did the work of destruction the most effectually.

7. And He will lift up,—deliver it.—Vers. 26–29. The whole description is general, and not special. That is, it is not a single, particular nation, but only the genus of foreign, distant nations in general that is described. The prophecy, therefore, finds its fulfilment in all the catastrophes that brought foreign powers against Israel, from the Assyrians to the Romans. Evidently Isaiah has in mind the fundamental prophecy Deut. xxviii. 49 sqq., from which the expression גּוֹיִם מֵרָחוֹק "nations from afar," is taken verbatim, and of which also the וְנָשָׂא "and He shall lift up," reminds one. It is remarkable that after the arrival of those Babylonian ambassadors, 2 Kings xx. 14, Hezekiah should himself apply our passage, and so give testimony to its fulfilment, in that, when asked by the Prophet, whence these people came, he replied, "They are come from a far country (מֵאֶרֶץ רְחוֹקָה), from Babylon." The description that now follows in vers. 27–29, of the enemy that is summoned, is not of any individual enemy, in fact is not at all historical, but generic and ideal in character. For, in reality, there is no army, where no one grows tired nor stumbles, in which no one sleeps nor slumbers, etc. The Prophet would only express in poetic form, the greatest activity, unweariedness, and readiness for conflict. There is a similar description Jer. v. 15 sqq. Their eagerness for battle, and their zeal for the cause is so great that they neither slumber, nor sleep. The girdle (xi. 5; Jer. xiii. 11), that binds the garment about the hips (xi. 5; xxxii. 11; coll. iii. 22) does not get loose on any one; no one breaks (xxxiii. 20; lviii. 6, Pi.), the strings (only here in Isaiah, comp. Gen. xiv. 23), by which the sandals (xi. 15; xx. 2) are fastened to the feet.

Ver. 28. The equipment of the enemy, too, is admirable. The arrows are sharp; the bows are bent, (an ideal trait, for in reality bows could not be ever bent, that is, trod on with the foot, xxi. 15). The hoofs (only here in Isaiah), of the steeds are hard as stone. As the ancients did not understand shoeing horses, hard hoofs were an important requisite in a war horse, comp. Mich. iv. 13, and χαλκόποος, κρατερώνυξ. The impetuous, thundering roll of their wheels makes them resemble a tempest. The same figure recurs lxvi. 15. Comp, beside xvii. 13; xxi. 1; xxix. 6.

The 29th verse finally describes the attack and victory of the enemy. The discourse which, to this point, has had almost a regular beat, and progressed, one might say, with a martial step, now becomes irregular and bounding. With mighty impetuosity that reveals itself in a battle cry that is compared to the roaring of a lion, the enemy attacks. It is strange that the Prophet expresses this thought doubly. But this doubled expression has apparently only a rhetorical aim. If we take into account the comparison of deep growling, we receive the impression that the Prophet would indicate that the enemy has at command every modulation of the lion's voice. The moment the lion seizes his prey, he ceases to roar, and one hears only deep growling. The seized prey he saves for himself: i. e., he bears it away out of the tumult. כְּפִיר (recurs only xi. 6), is the young lion no longer sucking but become independent of its dam. גור is the sucking lion. The plural is used here, probably, on purpose to make prominent the numbers in contrast with לָבִיא.

8. And in that day—the heavens thereof.—Ver. 30. The Prophet hastens to the conclusion. For this purpose he comprehends all that he has still to say in one figure drawn with a few, yet strong traits. It is also a proof of the great rhetorical art of the Prophet, that he does not name Judah. He rather allows to be guessed what was painful to him to say. For we need not refer the words only to what immediately precedes, as if it were declared that what is described ver. 30, happens on the same day as that of which ver. 29 speaks. For that is to be understood of course. But this "in that day" refers back to ii. 11, 17, 20; iii. 7, 18; iv. 1 and to iv. 2, so that hereby is intimated that this prophecy too, shall be fulfilled in the "last days." And as iv. 2 speaks of a day of great happiness, the passage previously named, however, of a day of dreadful judgment, so the Prophet refers back to both, meaning to intimate that when these final dreadful visitations of the last time shall have come upon Israel, then shall come the daybreak of salvation. I see therefore in this phrase "in that day" a fresh proof of the connection of chap. v., with the preceding chapters ii. iv. Like surges of the sea, therefore, raging and roaring, shall the enemy fall on Judah in that day? DELITZSCH appropriately refers to Sierra-Leone because, "those that first landed there, mistook the noise of the surf breaking on the precipitous shore for the roar of lions." The subject of ונבט (Niph. ἁπ. λεγ.), is evidently Judah. But the further meaning of these words presents great difficulties. I think two passages shed light on this one. The first is cited by all commentators, viz.: viii. 42. When we read there: "And He looks to the earth and behold trouble and darkness," (צָרָה וַחֲשֵׁכָה) we are justified in taking חשך צר in our passage together; either צר as adjective (compressed, thick darkness, חֹשֶׁךְ is masc.), or as apposition (VITRINGA, HENDEWERK), or as genitive (darkness of anguish). According to that we must separate, then, צָר from וָאוֹר, a union for which there is no other authority than the (for us not binding) Masoretic tradition, and then we must read וְאוֹר. For this reading, however, we have the support of another passage, which, so far as I know, has never hitherto been adduced by any expositor for the elucidation of our verse, viz.: Job xviii. 6. There we read אוֹר חָשַׁךְ בְּאָהֳלוֹ "the light shall be dark in his tent." That passage speaks of the wicked whose light goes out, and whose fire burns no longer, in whose tent, therefore, it is dark. Can then the coming together of these words אור חשך be accidental? I am the less inclined to believe this, as the thought, that the light itself becomes dark, and not the lighted room, is a very specific one. Something similar may be found xiii. 10; Ezek. xxxii. 8; Joel iv. 15.—עֲרִיפִים is ἁπ. λεγ. It is derived from ערף "to drop down," which occurs only Deut. xxxii. 2; xxxiii. 28. עֲרָפֶל appears to be kindred to it. As עֲרָפֶל originates from עָרָף by the addition of the letter ל like כַּרְמֶל from כֶּרֶם and בַּרְזֶל from בְּרַז (CHALD., fixit, transfixit) see GREEN § 198, 2 c, and as עֲרָפֶל very often joined to עָנָן (Deut. iv. 11; v. 19; Joel ii. 2; Zeph. i. 15; Ezek. xxxiv. 12) undoubtedly means the cloudy obscurity, the thick clouds, so עריפים can be nothing else than the rain clouds out of which the rain drops down.

This rain cloud is now regarded as the tent covering of the earth, or at least as belonging to it, like e. g., xl. 22 it says: "that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in," (comp. Job xxxvi. 29; Ps. civ. 2 sqq.). The expression "in his tent" would not be suitable. For the light that illumines a tent, stands within under the tent cover. But the light that illumines the earth, is above and beyond the heavenly tent cover. If, then, it is to be dark on earth, the light must be hindered from penetrating down from above. Therefore I translate: "and the light becomes dark through its clouds." The fem., suffix is therefore to be referred to אֶרֶץ, "earth." It will not do to refer it to אור, as GESENIUS does, referring to Job xxxvi. 32 (Thes. p. 1072), because then it must read חֲשֵׁכָה. If one would, with HITZIG, make אור dependent on נִבַּט, then the expression is surprising. For the opposite of "earth" is not "the light," but "the heaven." The explanations "distress and light" (DELITZSCH), and "stone and gleam" (i. e., hail and lightning, DRECHSLER) seem to me to pay too little regard to the two parallel passages quoted. I would, moreover, call attention to the fact that in this אור חשך there lies, too, a significant reference to the doings of the people who, according to ver. 20 "make darkness light and light darkness." Because they do that, their light shall be darkened wholly and permanently. And at the same time we find here a remarkable antithesis to iv. 5. 6. There God creates upon Mount Zion a cloud by day and flaming fire by night, for a shade by day against the heat, and for shelter against rain and storm. Here darkness of anguish shall cover the earth and the rain-clouds shall not only overwhelm the unprotected earth with their showers, but beside these keep back the light, therefore, in a sense, be a shelter before the light. Thus this chapter, which had apparently begun so joyously, ends in deepest night and gloom. One feels that the discourse of the Prophet has exhausted itself. We are at the end. Nothing can follow these mighty, and at the same time vain words but—silence. But the informed know well that the two prophetic lamps that are thrust out before (ii. 1–4 and iv. 2-6) stretch out beyond this period of misfortune. When, then, ver. 30, it reads "in that day," we know that this is a hint that refers back out of the midnight gloom of this conclusion to the comforting beginning iv. 2. That very day, when the evil fruits of the vineyard sink away in night and horror, begins for the "Branch of Jehovah" the day of light, and of eternal glory.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ii. 2. Domus Dei, etc. "The house of God is built on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, who, themselves, too, are mountains, quasi imitators of Christ. (They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, Ps. cxxv. 1.) Whence, also, upon one of the mountains Christ founded the Church and said: Thou art Peter, etc., Matth. xvi. 18." JEROME.——"We can understand Jerusalem by the mountain of God, for we see how the believing run thither, and how those that have accepted the testimony come thither and seize the blessing that proceeds thence. But we may also by the house of God understand the churches spread over land and sea, as we believe St. Paul, who says, 'we are the house of God,' Heb. iii. 6. And so we may recognize the truth of the prophecy. For the Church of God stands shining forth, and the nations, forsaking wickedness that has long had dominion over them, hasten to her and are enlightened by her." THEODORET.—— Ecclesia est, etc. "The church is a mountain exalted and established above all other mountains, but in spirit. For if you regard the external look of the church from the beginning of the world, then in New Testament times, you will see it oppressed, contemned, and in despair. Yet, notwithstanding, in that contempt it is exalted above all mountains. For all kingdoms and all dominions that have ever been in the world have perished. The church alone endures and triumphs over heresies, tyrants, Satan, sin, death and hell, and that by the word only, by this despised and feeble speech alone. Moreover it is a great comfort that the bodily place, whence first the spiritual kingdom should arise, was so expressly predicted, that consciences are assured of that being the true word, that began first to be preached in that corner of Judea, that it may be for us a mount Zion, or rule for judging of all religions and all doctrines. The Turkish Alcoran did not begin in Zion—therefore it is wicked doctrine. The various Popish rites, laws, traditions began not in Zion—therefore they are wicked, and the very doctrines of devils. So we may hold ourselves upright against all other religions, and comfort our hearts with this being the only true religion which we profess. Therefore, too, in two psalms, Ps. ii. and cx., mount Zion is expressly signified: "I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion;" likewise: "The LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion." LUTHER.

2. On ver. 2. LUTHER makes emphatic, as something pertaining to "the wonderful nature of this kingdom," that "other kingdoms are established and administered by force and arms. But here, because the mountain is lifted up, the nation shall flow (fluent), i. e., they shall come voluntarily, attracted by the virtues of the church. For what is there sweeter or lovelier than the preaching of the gospel? Whereas Moses frightens weak souls away. Thus the prophet by the word fluent, "flow," has inlaid a silent description of the kingdom of Christ, which Christ gives more amply when He says: Matth. xi. 12, "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force," i. e. "they are not compelled, but they compel themselves." "Morever rivers do not flow up mountains, but down them; but here is such an unheard-of thing in the kingdom of Christ."—STARKE.

3. LUTHER remarks on "and shall say: come," etc. "Here thou seest the worship, works and efforts and sacrifices of Christians. For they do only the one work, that they go to hear and to learn. All the rest of the members must serve their neighbors. These two, ears and heart, must serve God only. For the kingdom rests on the word alone. Sectaries and heretics, when they have heard the gospel once, instantly become masters, and pervert the Prophet's word, in that they say: Come let us go up that we may teach him his way and walk in our paths. They despise, therefore, the word as a familiar thing and seek new disputations by which they may display their spirit and commend themselves to the crowd. But Christians know that the words of the Holy Ghost can never be perfectly learned as long as we are in the flesh. For Christianity does not consist in knowing, but in the disposition. This disposition can never perfectly believe the word on account of the weakness of the sinful flesh. Hence they ever remain disciples and ruminate the word, in order that the heart, from time to time, may flame up anew. It is all over with us if we do not continue in the constant use of the word, in order to oppose it to Satan in temptation (Matth. iv.). For immediately after sinning ensues an evil conscience, that can be raised up by nothing but the word. Others that forsake the word sink gradually from one sin into another, until they are ruined. Therefore Christianity must be held to consist in hearing the word, and those that are overcome by temptations, whether of the heart or body, may know that their hearts are empty of the word."

4. VITRINGA remarks on the words, "Out of Zion goes forth the law," v. 3. "If strife springs up among the disciples concerning doctrine or discipline, one must return to the pattern of the doctrine and discipline of the school at Jerusalem. For יֵצֵא "shall go forth," stands here only as in Luke ii. 1, "There went forth a decree from Cæsar Augustus." In this sense, too, Paul says,

1 Cor. xiv. 36, "What? came the word of God out from you?" The word of God did not go forth from Corinth, Athens, Rome, Ephesus, but from Jerusalem, a fact that bishops assembled in Antioch opposed to Julius I. (SOZOM. hist. eccl. III. 8, "the orientals acknowledged that the Church of Rome was entitled to universal honor—although those who first propagated a knowledge of Christian doctrine in that city came from the East"). CYRIL took יָצָא in the false sense of κατελέλοιπε τὴν Σιών, "has forsaken Zion." When the Lord opened the understandings of the disciples at Emmaus, to understand the Scriptures and see in the events they had experienced the fulfilment of what was written concerning Him in the law, Prophets and Psalms, He cannot have forgotten the present passage. Of this we may be the more assured since the words: "Thus it is written and thus it behooved Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead the third day: And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations beginning at Jerusalem." Luke xxiv. 46, 47, point clearly to vers. 2 and 3 of our passage. Therefore too, JUSTIN MARTYR Apol. i. (commonly ii.), § 49, says: "But where the prophetic spirit predicts the future, he says: from Zion shall go forth the law, etc. And that this finally came to pass in fact, you may credibly assure yourselves. For from Jerusalem have men gone forth into the world, twelve in number, and these were unlearned, that knew not how to speak. But by the might of God they have proclaimed to all mankind that they were sent by Christ in order to teach all the word of God."

"Zion is contrasted here with Mount Sinai, whence the law came, which in the Old Testament was the foundation of all true doctrine: But in the New Testament Mount Zion or Jerusalem has the privilege to announce that now a more perfect law would be given and a new Covenant of God with men would be established. Thus Zion and Jerusalem are, so to speak, the nursery and the mother of all churches and congregations of the New Testament."—STARKE.

5. FÖRSTER remarks on the end of ver. 3, that the gospel is the sceptre of Jesus Christ, according to Ps. cx. 2 and xlv. 7 (the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre). "For by the word Christ rules His church (Rom. x. 14 sqq.)."

6. On ver. 4. "Pax optima rerum." FOERSTER. The same author finds this prophecy fulfilled by Christ, who is our peace, who has made of both one, and broken down the partition that was between, in that by His flesh He took away the enmity (Eph. ii. 14). FOERSTER, moreover, combats the Anabaptists, who would prove from this passage that waging war is not permitted to Christians. For our passage speaks only against the privata Christianorum discordia. But waging war belongs to the publicum magistratus officium. Waging war, therefore, is not forbidden, if only the war is a just one. To be such, however, there must appear according to THOMAS, part. 2 th. quæst. 40. 1) auctoritatis principis, 2) causa justa, 3) intentio bellantium justa, or ut allii efferunt: 1) jurisdictio indicentis, 2) offensio patientis, 3) intentio finem (?) convenientis.

7. On ver. 4. JEROME regarded the time of Augustus, after his victory at Actium, as the fulfilling of this prophecy. Others, as COCCEIUS, refer the words, "they shall turn their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks," to the time of Constantine the Great; and the words "nation shall not lift up sword against nation" to the period of the restoration of religious peace in Germany,—finally the words: "they shall no more learn war," to a future time that is to be hoped for. Such interpretations are, however, just as one-sided as those that look only for a spiritual fulfilment of prophecy. For how is an inward fulfilment of this promise of peace to be thought of which would not have the outward effects as its consequence? Or how is an outward fulfilment, especially such as would deserve the name, conceivable without the basis of the inward? Or must this peaceful time be looked for only in heaven? Why then does the promise stand here? It is a matter of course that there is peace in heaven: for where there is no peace there can be no heaven. The promise has sense only if its fulfilment is to be looked for on earth. The fulfilment will take place when the first three petitions of the Lord's prayer are fulfilled, i. e. when God's name shall be held holy by us as it in itself is holy, when the kingdom of God is come to everything, without and within, and rules alone over all, when the will of God is done on earth as in heaven. Christendom makes this prayer quite as much with the consciousness that it cannot remain unfulfilled, as with the consciousness that it must find its fulfilment on earth. For, if referred to heaven, these petitions are without meaning. Therefore there is a time of universal inward and outward peace to be looked for on earth. "It is not every day's evening," i. e. one must await the event, and our earth, without the least saltus in cogitando, can yet experience a state of things that shall be related to the present, as the present to the period of trilobites and saurians. If one could only keep himself free from the tyranny of the present moment! But our entire, great public, that has made itself at home in Philistia, lives in the sweet confidence that there is no world beside that of which we take notice on the surface of the earth, nor ever was one, nor ever will be.

8. On ver. 4. Poets reverse the figure to portray the transition from peaceful to warlike conditions. Thus VIRGIL, Georg. I. ver. 506 sq.:

Non ullus aratro
Dignus honos, squalent abductis arva colonis.
Et curvæ rigidum falces conflantur in ensem.

Aeneide VII. ver. 635 sq.:

Vomeris huc et falcis honos, huc omnis aratri
Cessit amor; recoquunt patrios fornacibus enses.

OVID, Fast. I. ver. 697 sqq.:

Bella diu tenuere viros. Erat aptior ensis
Vomere, cedebat taurus arator equo.
Sarcula cessabant, versique in pila ligones.
Factaque de rastri pondere cassis erat.

9. On ver. 5. As Isaiah puts the glorious prophecy of his fellow-prophet Micah at the head, he illuminates the future with a splendid, shining, comforting light. Once this light is set up, it of itself suggests comparisons. The questions arise: how does the present stand related to that shining future? What difference obtains? What must happen for that condition of holiness and glory to be brought about? The Christian Church, too, and even each individual Christian must put himself in the light of that prophetic statement. On the one hand that will humiliate us, for we must confess with the motto of Charles V.: nondum! And long still will we need to cry: Watchman what of the night (xxi. 11)? On the other hand the Prophet's word will also spur us up and cheer us. For what stronger impulse can be imagined than the certainty that one does not contend in vain, but may hope for a reward more glorious than all that ever came into a man's heart? (lxiv. 4; 1 Cor. ii. 9).

In the time of the second temple, in the evenings of the first days of the feast of Tabernacles, great candelabras were lighted in the forecourt of the temple, each having four golden branches, and their light was so strong that it was nearly as light as day in Jerusalem. That might be for Jerusalem a symbol of that "let us walk in the light of the LORD." But Jerusalem rejoiced in this light, and carried on all sorts of pastime, yet it was not able to learn to know itself in this light, and by this self-knowledge to come to true repentance and conversion.

10. On ver. 8, "their land is full of idols." "Not only images and pictures are idols, but every notion concerning God that the godless heart forms out of itself without the authority of the Scripture. The notion that the Mass is effective ex opere operato, is an idol. The notion that works are demanded for justification with God, is an idol. The notion that God takes delight in fasts, peculiar clothes, a special order of life, is an idol. God wills not that we should set up out of our own thoughts a fashion of worshipping Him; but He says: "In all places where I record My name, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee," Exod. xx. 24 —LUTHER.

11. On ii. 9–21. When men have brought an idol into existence, that is just to their mind, whether it be an idolum manu factum, or an idolum mente excogitatum, there they are all wonder, all worship. "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Then the idol has a time of great prosperity and glory. But sooner or later there comes a time when the judgment of God overtakes the idol and its servants. God suffers sin to become ripe like men let a conspiracy, like they let fruit ripen. But when the right time comes then He steps forth in such a fashion that they creep into mouse-holes to hide themselves, if it were possible, from the lightning of His eye and His hand. Where then are the turned-up noses, the big mouths, the impudent tongues? Thus it has often happened since the world began. But this being brought to confession shall happen in the highest degree to the puffed-up world at that day when they shall see that one whom they pierced, and whom they thought they might despise as the crucified One, coming in His glory to judge the world. Then they shall have anguish and sorrow, then shall they lament and faint away with apprehension of the things that draw nigh. But those that believed on the Lord in His holiness, shall then lift up their heads for that their redemption draws nigh. At that time, indeed, shall the LORD alone be high, and before Him shall bow the knees of all in heaven, on earth, and under the earth, and all tongues must confess that Christ is the LORD, to the glory of God the Father.

12. On ii. 22. Of what do men not make idols! The great industrial expositions of modern times often fill me with dismay, when I have seen how men carry on an actual idolatrous worship with these products of human science and art, as if that all were not, in the end, God's work, too, but human genius were alone the creator of these wonders of civilization. How wickedly this so-called worship of genius demeans itself! How loathsome is the still more common cultus of power, mammon and the belly!

13. On iii. 1 sqq. Causa σωστική, etc. "The saving cause of the commonwealth is the possession of men of the sort here mentioned, which Plato also knew, and Cicero from Plato, each of whom judge, commonwealths would be blessed if philosophers, i. e., wise and adept men were to administer them."—FOERSTER. The same writer cites among the causes why the loss of such men is ruinous, the changes that thence ensue. All changes in the commonwealth are hurtful. XENOPH. Hellen. 2: "εἰσὶ μὲν πᾶσαι μεταβολαὶ πολιτειῶν θανατηφόροι." ARISTOT. Metaph. 2: "αἱ μεταβολαὶ πάντων ταραχώδεις."

14. On ver. 1. "The stay of bread," etc. VITRINGA cites Horat. Satir. L. II., 3 v. 153 sq.:

Deficient inopem venæ te, ni cibus atque
Ingens accedit stomacho fultura ruenti.

And on ver. 2 sq. he cites CICERO, who, De Nat. Deorum III., calls these "præsidia humana," "firmamenta reipublicæ." On ver. 6 sq. the same author cites the following passage from LIVY (xxvi. chap. 6): "Cum fame ferroque (Capuani) urgerentur, nec ulla spes superesset iis, qui nati in spem honorum erant, honores detrectantibus, Lesius querendo desertam et proditam a primoribus Capuam summum magistratum ultimus omnium Campanorum cepit!" On ver. 9 he quotes SENECA: De vita beata, chap. xii.: "Itaque quod unum habebant in peccatis bonum perdunt peccandi verecundiam. Laudant enim ea, quibus erubescant, et vitio gloriantur."

15. On iii. 4 and 12. FOERSTER remarks: Pueri, etc. "Boys are of two sorts. Some are so in respect to age, others in respect to moral qualifications. So, too, on the contrary there is an old age of two sorts: "For honorable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor that is measured by number of years. But wisdom is the true gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is the true old age." Wisd. iv. 8, 9. Examples of young and therefore foolish kings of Israel are Rehoboam ("the young fool gambled away ten whole tribes at one bet" 1 Kings xii). Ahaz, who was twenty years of age when he began to reign (2 Kings xvi. 2). Manasseh who was twelve years (2 Kings xxi. 1,) and Amon who was twenty-two years (2 Kings xxi. 19).

16. On iii. 7. FOERSTER remarks: Nemo se, etc. "Let no one intrude himself into office, especially when he knows he is not fit for it," and then cites: "Seek not of the LORD pre-eminence, neither of the king the seat of honor. Justify not thyself before the LORD; and boast not of thy wisdom before the king. Seek not to be judge, being not able to take away iniquity." Ecclus. vii. 4-6."—"Wen aber Gott schickt, den macht er auch geschickt."

17. On iii. 8. "Their tongue and their doings are against the LORD." Duplici modo, etc. "God may be honored by us in two outward ways: by word and deed, just as in the same way others come short; "to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds, which they have committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." Jude 15.—VITRINGA.

18. On iii. 9. "They hide not their sin." Secunda post, etc. "The next plank after shipwreck, and solace of miseries is to hide one's impiety."—JEROME.

19. On iii. 10. "Now He comforts the pious as in Ps. ii. His anger will soon kindle, but it shall be well with all that trust in Him. So Abraham, so Lot was delivered; so the apostles and the remnant of Judah when Jerusalem was besieged. For the Lord helps the righteous (Ps. xxxvii. 17, 39)."—LUTHER.

20. On iii. 13, 14.

"Judicabit judices judex generalis,
Neque quidquam proderit dignitas papalis,
Sive sit episcopus, sive cardinalis,
Reus condemnabitur, nec dicetur qualis."

"Rhythmi vulgo noti," quoted by FOERSTER.

21. On iii. 16 sq. Usus vestium, etc. "Clothes have a four-fold use: 1) they are the badge of guilt, or souvenir of the fall (Gen. iii. 7, 10, 21); 2) they should be coverings against the weather; 3) they may be ornaments for the body, (Prov. xxxi. 22, 25); 4) they may serve as a mark of rank (2 Sam. xiii. 18).—The abuse of clothes is three-fold; 1) in regard to the material, they may be costlier or more splendid than one's wealth or rank admits of; 2) in respect of form, they may betray buffoonery and levity; 3) in respect to their object, they may be worn more for the display of luxury and pride than for protection and modest adornment."—FOERSTER.

22. On iv. 2. "Germen Jehovae est nomen Messiæ mysticum, a nemine intellectum, quam qui tenet mysterium Patris et Christi. Idem valet quod filius propago Patris naturalis, in quo patris sui imago et gloria perfectissime splendet, Jessaiae in seqq. (ix. 5) ילד, בן, filius, Joanni ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ υἱὸς πρωτότοκος, μονογενής, processio Patris naturalis. Est hic eruditi cujusdam viri elegans observatio, quae eodem tendit, quam non licet intactam praetermittere. Comparat ille inter se nomina Messiæ צמח דוד (Jer. xxiii. 5) et צמח יהוה in hoc loco. Cum autem prior appellatio absque dubitatione innuat, Messiam fore filium Davidis, docet posteriorem ἀναλογικῶς non posse aliud significare quam filium Jehovae, quod nomen Christi Jesu est μυστικώτερον, omni alio nomine excellentius. Addit non minus docte, personam, quae hic germen Jehovae dicitur, deinceps a propheta nostro appellari Jehovam (xxviii. 5)." — VITRINGA. This exposition, which is retained by most Christian and orthodox commentators, ignores too much the fundamental meaning of the word צֶמַח, "Branch." It is, nevertheless, not incorrect so far as the broader meaning includes the narrower concentrically. If "Branch of Jehovah" signifies all that is the personal offshoot of God, then, of course, that one must be included who is such in the highest and most perfect sense, and in so far the passage xxviii. 5 does not conflict with exposition given by us above.

[J. A. ALEXANDER joins with VITRINGA and HENGSTENBERG in regarding "the fruit of the earth," as referring to the same subject as "the branch of the LORD," viz.: the Messiah; and thus, while the latter term signifies the divine nature of the Messiah, the former signifies His human origin and nature; or if we translate "land" instead of earth, it points to his Jewish human origin. Thus appears an exact correspondence to the two parts of Paul's description, Rom. i. 3, 4, and to the two titles used in the New Testament in reference to Christ's two natures, SON OF GOD AND SON OF MAN.—TR.].

23. On iv. 3, 4. Great storms and upheavals, therefore, are needful, in order to make the fulfilment of this prophecy possible. There must first come the breath of God from above, and the flame of God from beneath over the earth, and the human race must first be tossed and sifted. The earth and mankind must first be cleansed by great judgments from all the leaven of evil. [J. A. ALEXANDER, with LUTHER, CALVIN, EWALD, maintains concerning the word Spirit in ver. 4, that "the safest and most satisfactory interpretation is that which understands by it a personal spirit, or as Luther expresses it, the Spirit who shall judge and burn."—TR.]. What survives these judgments is the remnant of which Isaiah speaks. This shall be holy. In it alone shall the LORD live and rule. This remnant is one with the new humanity which in every part, both as respects body and soul, will represent the image of Christ the second Adam. This remnant, at the same time, comprehends those whose names are written in the book of life. What sort of a divine book this may be, with what sort of corporal, heavenly reality, of course we know not. For Himself God needs no book. Yet if we compare the statements of the Revelation of John regarding the way in which the last judgment shall be held, with certain other New Testament passages, I think we obtain some explanation. We read Matt. xix. 28, that on the day of the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, the twelve apostles, too, shall sit on twelve thrones to judge the generations of Israel. And 1 Cor. v. 2, we read that the saints shall judge the world. But, Rev. xx. 11, we find again the great white throne, whereon sits the great Judge of the living and the dead, after that, just before (ver. 4), it was said: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them." Afterwards it reads (ver. 12): "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." And (ver. 15). "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." From this description there seems to me to result that the books necessarily are meant for those who are, by the Supreme Judge charged with the judgment of particular ones. To this end they need, in the first place, many books that contain the works of individuals. God has a book-keeping for the life of every man. This divine record will be produced to every single one at the day of judgment. Is he a Jew? by one of the twelve Apostles. Is he a heathen? by some other saint. No man shall be able to remonstrate against this account for it will carry the evidence of truth in itself, and in the consciences of those to be judged. Should such a protest occur, the arraigned will be referred to the book of life. This is only one. For it contains only names. After this manner will the separation be accomplished, spoken of in Matt. xxv. 32 sq. For those whose names are found in the book of life go to the right side; the rest to the left. Then the great Judge Himself takes up the word in the manner described in Matt. xxv. 34 sqq., and calls the righteous to Himself, that they may inherit the kingdom that is prepared for them. But the wicked He repulses from Him into everlasting fire, that is prepared for the devil and his angels, in regard to which the account of the judgment in Matt. xxv., as far as the end is concerned, harmonizes entirely with Rev. xx. 15.

24. On iv. 5, 6. "The pillar of fire and cloud belongs to the miraculous graces by which the founding of the Old Testament kingdom of God was glorified just as the New Testament kingdom was by the signs that Jesus did, and by the charismata of the Apostolic time. But that appearance was quite appropriate to the state of developed revelation of that time. This had not reached the New Testament level, and not even the prophetic elevation that was possible under the Old Testament, but only the legal in which the divine stands outwardly opposed to the human. God is present among His people, but still in the most outward way; He does not walk in a human way among men; there is, too, no inward leading of the congregation by the Holy Spirit, but an outward conducting by a visible heavenly appearance. And, for these revelations to the whole people, God makes use entirely of nature, and, when it concerns His personal manifestation, of the elements. He does so, not merely in distinction from the patriarchal theophanies, . . . , but, particularly in contrast with heathenism, in order to accustom the Israelitish consciousness from the first not to deify the visible world, but to penetrate through it to the living, holy God, who has all the elements of nature at command as the medium of His revelation."—AUBERLEN.

As at the close of John's Revelation (chaps. xxi., xxii.) we see the manifestation of the Godhead to humanity return to its beginning (Gen. ii., iii., iv.), in as much as that end restores just that with which the beginning began, i. e. the dwelling of God with men, so, too, we see in Isa. iv. 5, 6, a special manifestation of the (relative) beginning time recur again in the end time; the pillar of fire and cloud. But what in the beginning was an outward and therefore enigmatical and unenduring appearance, shall at last be a necessary and abiding factor of the mutual relation between God and mankind, that shall be established for ever in its full glory. There shall come a time wherein Israel shall expand to humanity and humanity receive power to become Israel, wherein, therefore, the entire humanity shall be Israel. Then is the tabernacle of God with men no more a pitiful tent, made of mats, but the holy congregation is itself the living abode of God; and the gracious presence of Almighty God, whose glory compares with the old pillar of fire and cloud, like the new, eternal house of God, with the old perishable tabernacle, is then itself the light and defence of His house.

25. On iv. 5, 6. "But give diligence to learn this, that the Prophet calls to mind, that Christ alone is destined to be the defence and shade of those that suffer from heat and rain. Fasten your eyes upon Him, hang upon Him as ye are exhorted to do by the divine voice, 'Him shall ye hear!' Whoever hearkens to another, whoever looks to any other flesh than this, it is all over with him. For He alone shelters us from the heat, that comes from contemplating the majesty (i. e. from the terror that God's holiness and righteousness inspire), He alone covers us from the rain and the power of Satan. This shade affords us a coolness, so that the dread of wrath gives way. For wrath cannot be there where thou seest the Son of God given to death for thee, that thou mightest live. Therefore I commend to you that name of Christ, wherewith the Prophet adorns Him, that He is a tabernacle for shade against the heat, a refuge and place of concealment from rain and tempest."—LUTHER.—With some modification, we may apply here the comprehensive turn FOERSTER gives to our passage: 1) The dwelling of Mount Zion is the church; 2) the heat is the flaming wrath of God, and the heat of temptation (1 Pet. iv. 12; Ecclus. ii. 4, 5); 3) tempest and rain are the punishments of sins, or rather the inward and outward trials (Ps. ii.; Isa. lvii. 20); 4) the defence or the pillar of cloud and fire is Jesus Christ (1 Cor. x.).

26. On v. 1–7. This parable has a brother in the New Testament that looks very much like it. I might say: the head is almost the same. For the beginning of that New Testament parable (Matth. xxi. 33; Mar. xii. 1), "A man planted a vineyard, and set an hedge about it, and digged a wine-fat and built a tower," is manifestly imitated after our passage. But here it is the vineyard that is bad, while there, in the New Testament, the husbandmen are good for nothing. Here the Lord appears as at once owner and cultivator of the vineyard; there the owner and cultivators are distinguished. This arises from the fact that the Lord Jesus apparently had in His mind the chiefs of the people, "the high-priests and elders" (Matth. xxi. 23, 24). From this it is manifest that here as there the vineyard is the nation. In Isaiah, however, the vineyard, that is to say the vine itself is accused. The whole people is represented as having equally gone to destruction. In the Synoptists, on the other hand, it is the chiefs and leaders that come between the Lord and His vineyard, and would exclude Him from His property, in order to be able to obtain it wholly for themselves, and divide it amongst them. Therefore there it is more the wicked greed of power and gain in the great that is reproved; here the common falling away of the whole nation.

27. V. 8. Here the Prophet denounces the rich, the aristocracy, and capital. Thus he takes the part of the poor and lowly. That grasping of the rich and noble, which they display sometimes like beasts of prey, at other times gratify in a more crafty and legal fashion, the Prophet rebukes here in the sharpest manner. God's work is opposed to every sin, and ever stands on the side of those that suffer oppression, no matter what may be their rank. God is no respecter of persons (Deut. x. 17 sq.).

28. V. 11-17. The morning hour, the hour when light triumphs over darkness, ought to be consecrated to works of light, as it is said: Aurora Musis amica, ἠώς τοι προφέρει μὲν ὁδοῦ, προφέρει δὲ καὶ ἔργου (HESIOD. ἐργ. κ. ἡμ. 540; Morgenstund hat Gold im Mund. "It was," says FOERSTER, "a laudable custom among the Persians, that the chamberlains entering in to their kings early in the morning, cried out with a loud voice: 'Arise, O king, attend to business, as Mesoromastes commands.'" On the other hand, "they that be drunken are drunken in the night," 1 Thess. v. 7 sq. So much the worse, then, when men do the works of night even in the early hour, and dare to abuse the light. "Plenus venter despumat in libidines," says AUGUSTINE. In vino ἀσωτία (Eph. v. 18). Corpus, opes, animam luxu Germania perdit. MELANCTHON. On ver. 15 FOERSTER cites the expression of AUGUSTIN: "God would not suffer any evil to be done in the world unless some good might thence be elicited."

29. V. 18. "Cords of vanity are false prejudices and erroneous conclusions. For example: no one is without sin, not even the holiest; God does not take notice of small sins; he that is among wolves must howl with them; a man cannot get along in the world with a scrupulous, tender conscience; the Lord is merciful, the flesh is weak, etc. By such like a man draws sin to him, binds his conscience fast, and resists the good motions of preventing grace. Thick cart-ropes signify a high degree of wickedness, the coarsest and most revolting prejudices. For example: God has no concern about human affairs; godliness delivers no one from misery and makes no one blessed; the threatenings of the prophets are not to be feared; there is no divine providence, no heaven, no hell (Deut. xxix. 17, 18, 19). Out of such a man twists and knots a stout rope, with which he draws to him manifest blasphemy, entangles himself in it, so that often he cannot get loose, but is sold as a servant under sin (Rom. vi. 16; 1 Kings xxi. 20, 25)." STARKE.

30. V. 19. "The wicked mock at the patience and long-suffering of God, as if He did not see or care for their godless existence, but forgot them, and cast them out of mind (Ps. x. 11), so that the threatened punishment would be omitted. They would say: there has been much threatening, but nothing will come of it; if God is in earnest, let Him, etc.; we don't mind threats; let God come on if He will! Comp. xxii. 12, 13; xxviii. 21, 22; Am. v. 18; Jer. v. 12; viii. 11; xvii. 15; Ezek. xii. 21 sqq." STARKE.

31. V. 20. "To make darkness of light, means to smother in oneself the fundamental truths that may be proved from the light of nature, and the correct conclusions inferred from them, but especially revealed truths that concern religion, and to pronounce them in others to be prejudices and errors. Bitter and sweet have reference to constitution, how it is known and experienced. To make sweet of bitter means, to recommend as sweet, pleasant and useful, what is bad and belongs to darkness, and is in fact bitter and distasteful, after one himself believes he possesses in the greatest evil the highest good." STARKE.

32. V. 21. "Quotquot mortales," etc. As many as, taking counsel of flesh, pursue salvation with confidence of any sort of merit of their own or external privilege, a thing to which human nature is much inclined, oppose their own device to the wisdom of God, and, according to the prophet, are called wise in their own eyes (xxviii. 15; xxx. 1, 2; Jer. viii. 8, 9; ix. 23 sq.; xviii. 18). VITRINGA.

33. V. 26 sqq. The Prophet here expresses in a general way the thought that the Lord will call distant nations to execute judgment on Jerusalem, without having in mind any particular nation. VITRINGA quotes a remarkable passage from the excerpts of JOHN ANTIOCHENUS in VALESIUS (p. 816), where it is said, that immediately after TITUS had taken Jerusalem, ambassadors from all the neighboring nations came to him to salute him as victor and present him crowns of honor. TITUS refused these crowns, "saying that it was not he that had effected these things, but that they were done by God in the display of His wrath, and who had prospered his hands." Comp. also the address of TITUS to his soldiers after the taking of Jerusalem in JOSEPH. B. Jud. VII. 19.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. ii. 6-11. Idolatry. 1) What occasions it (alienation from God, ver. 6 a); 2) The different kinds: a. a coarse kind (ver. 6 b, ver. 8), b. a more refined kind (ver. 7); 3) Its present appearance (great honor of the idols and of their worshippers, ver. 9); 4) Its fate at last (deepest humiliation before the revelation of the majesty of God of all that do not give glory to Him (vers. 10, 18).

2. ii. 12-22. The false and the true eminence. 1) False eminence is that which at first appears high, but at last turns out to be low (to this belongs impersonal as well as supersensuous creatures, which at present appear as the highest in the world, but at last, in the day of the Lord of Hosts, shall turn out to be nothing); 2) The real eminence is that which at first is inconspicuous and inferior, but which at last turns out to be the highest, in fact the only high one.

3. iii. 1-9. Sin is the destruction of a people. 1) What is sin? Resisting the Lord: a. with the tongue, b. with deeds, c. with the interior being (vers. 8, 9); 2) In what does the destruction consist (or the fall according to ver. 8 a)? a. in the loss of every thing that constitutes the necessary and sure support of the commonwealth (vers. 1-3); b. in insecure and weak props rising up (ver. 4); c. in the condition that follows of being without a Master (ver. 5); d. in the impossibility of finding any person that will take the governance of such a ruinous state (vers. 6, 7).

4. iii. 4. Insurrection is forbidden by God in express words, who says to Moses "that which is altogether just thou shalt follow," Deut. xvi. 20. Why may not God permit an intolerable and often unjust authority to rule a land for the same reason that He suffers children to have bad and unjust parents, and the wife a hard and intolerable husband, whose violence they cannot resist? Is it not expressly said by the Prophet "I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them?" "I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath," Hos. xiii. 11. THOLUCK.

5. iii. 10–13. "Let us learn to distinguish between false and real comfort." 1) False comfort deals in illusion: the real deals in truth; 2) The false produces a present effect; the real a lasting one; 3) The false injures the one comforted; the real is health to him." HARMS.

6. iv. 2–6. The holiness of God's Church on earth that is to be looked for in the future. 1) Its preliminary: the judgment of cleansing and purifying (ver. 4); 2) What is requisite to becoming a partaker? a. belonging to the remnant (vers. 2, 3); b. being written in the book of life (ver. 3); 3) The surety of its permanence: the gracious presence of the Lord (vers. 5, 6).

7. v. 21. The ruin of trusting in one's own wisdom. 1) Those that have such confidence set themselves above God, which is: a. the greatest wickedness, b. the greatest folly; 2) They challenge the Divine Majesty to maintain its right (ver. 24).

C.—THE THIRD PORTAL.

CHAPTER VI.

We have already shown above, in the general introduction to the threefold entrance, that Isaiah would not place this account of his call at the head because he felt the need of preparing his readers for it. At the same time he brings it about that this, not merely elevated, but holy, and even holiest of all dramas, is put in the place that becomes a holiest of all, that is to say, not without, but within; not in aditu, but in adyto. As in the temple, the court of the priests and the holy place, with the altar of incense, constituted the approach to the holiest of all, so, too, here Isaiah puts two entrances in front of that history that really transposes us into the inmost sanctuary, that explains to us how it was possible that Isaiah, the son of Amoz, should be admitted to the vision of God, and had the boldness to offer himself as God's messenger. If one were not governed by the illusion that only chap. i. can be an introduction, it would never enter his mind that chap. vi. is the account of a second call to a merely special mission. DELITZSCH remarks: "What UMBREIT says, that chap. vi. makes the impression on every unprejudiced mind of being the inaugural vision of the Prophet cannot in fact be denied. Only the position that chap. vi. has in the book wields a contrary influence against this impression as long as it does not admit of being understood in some other way. But the impression remains (as with i. 7–9) and even reappears." Well, then, we bring the impression that chap. vi. makes (of being the account of the inauguration) into the most harmonious relation to the place it holds in the book, by explaining it as the third, the most elevated and holiest entrance to the prophecies of Isaiah. Concerning the time of its composition not much need be said. That Isaiah wrote chapter vi. no one denies. Whether, then, he wrote it immediately after he had the vision, or later, is indifferent. From the nature of things the former is more probable. At all events he assigned the chapter its present position when he made up his book.

THE SOLEMN INAUGURATION OF THE PROPHET.

CHAPTER VI. 1–13.

1 IN the year that king Uzziah died I saw also the LORD sitting upon a throne,
2 high and lifted up, and [1]his train filled the the temple. Above [2]it stood the sera-phim: each one had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain 3 he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly. And [3]one cried unto another, and said,

Holy! holy! holy! is the LORD of hosts:
[3]The whole earth is full of his glory.
4 And the [b]posts of the [4]door moved at the voice of [a]him that cried, and the house
5 was filled with smoke. Then said I, Woe is me! for I am [5]undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the LORD of hosts.
6 Then flew one of the seraphim unto me, [6]having [d]a live coal in his hand, which 7 he had taken with the tongs from off the altar: and he [7]laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin [e]purged.
8 Also I heard the voice of the LORD, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go 9 for us? Then said I, [8]Here am I; send me. And he said, Go, and tell this people, Hear ye [9]indeed, but understand not;
And see ye [10f]indeed, but perceive not.
10 Make the heart of this people fat,
And make their ears heavy, and [g]shut their eyes,
Lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears,
And understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed.
11 Then said I, LORD, how long? And he answered,
Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant,
And the houses without man,
And the land be [11]utterly desolate;
12 And the LORD [h]have removed men far away,
[i]And there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land.
13 But yet in it shall be a tenth,
[12j]And it shall return, and shall be eaten:
As a [k]teil tree, and as an oak, [l]whose [13m]substance is in them, when they cast their leaves.
So the holy seed shall be the substance thereof.

[4] Heb. threshold.
[5] Heb. cut off.

[7] Heb. caused it to touch.
[8] Heb. Behold me.

[10] Heb. in seeing.

[l] of which in falling a stump remains.
[m] a holy seed is their stump.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. The prophet designates the Lord as אֲדֹנָי (with the sign of the accusat., but without the article as a proper noun). Both אָדוֹן (i. 24; iii. 1; x. 16, 33; xix. 4) and אֲדֹנָי (iii. 17, 18; iv. 4; vi. 1, 8, 11; vii. 14, 20; viii. 7; ix. 7, 16; x. 12; xi. 11; xxi. 6, 8, 16; xxix. 13; xxx. 20; xxxvii. 24; xxxviii. 16) occur only in the first part of Isaiah.—רם ונשׂא is used by Isa. ii. 13, 14, and lvii. 15, where the Lord Himself is so named.—שׁוּלִים the hem, the broad folded train of which the hems are the ends. The word (used mostly of the priestly garments, Exod. xxviii. 33, 34; xxxix. 24, 25, 26; comp. Jer. xiii. 22, 26; Nah. iii. 5) does not again occur in Isaiah.

Ver. 3. מְלֹא (is not infin., which is always מְלֹאת, but) is substantive, written oftener מְלוֹא. Comp. viii. 8; xxxi. 4; xxxiv. 1; xlii. 10.

Ver. 7. Piel כִּפֶּר and Pual כֻּפַּר in xxii. 14; xxvii. 9; xxviii. 18; xlvii. 11.

Ver. 8. לָנוּ after יֵלֶךְ, is grammatically considered Dat. commodi. Who will do us a service by going? is the sense.

Ver. 10. The verb שָׁמֵן, pinguem esse, is found in the Kal. only Deut. xxxii. 15, and Jer. v. 28; beside the present the Hiph. occurs only Neh. ix. 25, with the meaning "to become fat." The ears shall become heavy, hard of hearing, deaf. כָּבֵד (Kal) is used in this sense lix. 1. Also the word is used of the eyes (Gen. xlviii. 10) and of the tongue (Exod. ix. 10 [כְּבַד adj.]). Comp. Zech. vii. 11 (Hiph.). The Hiph. occurs more frequently of making heavy, i. e., hardening the heart: Exod. viii. 11, 28; ix. 34; x. 10. הָשַׁע is the Hiph. imperat. from שָׁעַע oblinere, to besmear, plaster over (comp. xxix. 9; xxxii. 3). רָפָא is always used transitively. It must therefore be thought of as joined to the general, ideal subject, which the notion of the verb of itself suggests. As is well known, especially verbs that designate a trade or an occupation in some art are wont to be so used. Therefore may a verb that signifies the healing art be readily so construed. Isaiah resorts to this mode of speech not seldom; vii. 24; viii. 4; xxi. 9; xxxiv. 11. One might fall on the conjecture by comparison of liii. 5, that as there so here it ought to read נִרְפָּא.

Ver. 11. As to particulars, it is to be noted that עַד אֲשֶׁר אִם "until" (comp. beside Gen. xxviii. 15; Num. xxxii. 17) involves a conditional sentence; the end does not come, except that before, etc.——In the root שָׁאָה the meaning "to be desert" developes out of the meaning "to make a noise, to rage;" comp. xvii. 12 sq.; xxxvii. 26, and substantive שָׁאוֹן v. 14; xiii. 4; xxiv. 8; xxv. 5; lxvi. 6.——מֵאֵין יוֹשֵׁב comp. on v. 9. — מֵאֵין אָדָם comp. Jer. xxxii. 43; xxxiii. 10, 12. The expression occurs beside here only in the second comforting discourse of Jeremiah.

Ver. 12. The Piel רִחַק is used by Isaiah again only xxvi. 15; xxix. 13. On the contrary Kal. occurs in the second part: xlvi. 13; xlix, 19; liv. 14; lix. 9, 11. The Hiph. does not occur in Isaiah at all.

עֲזוּבָה properly the forsaken one, fem. But this feminine here must be taken as the collective genus, so that the word signifies the forsaken (the forsakenness, desolation). Comp. xvii. 2, 9.

Ver. 13. לְבָעֵר comp. iv. 4.——אֵלָה is terebinth (i. 30) and אַלּוֹן oak (ii. 13; xliv. 14). Both are extremely lasting trees, that become very old and grow steadily in size. Comp. Gesen. Thes. p. 51; Job xiv. 7-9.——שַׁלֶּכֶת occurs again only 1 Chr. xxvi. 16, where a שַׁעַר שַׁלֶּכֶת is spoken of. Is this the gate of casting out (probably only an opening in the wall through which things were thrown out) then the word here is dejectio, prostratio (comp. Jer. ix. 18). Instead of בָּם we look for מֵהֶם according to our mode of expression. But the Hebrew in his way of representation sees, as it were, the idea of the whole tree before him still, and in or on this ideal tree he distinguishes the stump still present and the (in reality severed) trunk. This is that use of בְּ that may be called partitive. Comp. at x. 22.——אֲשֶׁר and בָּם belong together.——זֶרַע קֹדֶשׁ (comp. i. 4; Ezr. ix. 2) signifies the still-existing principle of holy life. The suffix in מַצֶּבֶת (מַצַּבְתָּהּ) only here in Isaiah, מַצֵּבָה xix. 19) refers to עֲשִׂירִיָּה.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Isaiah describes in plain and simple language, by which the grandeur of the contents is only made the more conspicuous, how, in the year that King Uzziah died he saw the Lord sitting on a high, elevated throne. The train of His garments filled the temple (ver. 1). Seraphim surrounded Him, each having three pairs of wings: one covered the countenance, one the feet, and with the third they flew (ver. 2). One cried to the other the thrice-holy (ver. 3), a cry whose power shook the threshold. But the house was full of smoke (ver. 4). The majestic vision awakes in the Prophet the feeling of his sinfulness, and the fear that he shall be destroyed, because he, as a sinful man, has seen the Lord (ver. 5). But one of the Seraphs reconciles him with a glowing coal that he has taken from the altar (vers. 6, 7). Thereupon the Prophet hears the voice of the Lord himself, who asks: whom shall I send? Isaiah offers himself as messenger (ver. 8). He is accepted and his commission is imparted to him. But this commission is of an extraordinary character. For it is not so much told him what he shall announce, but what shall be the immediate consequence of his announcement. That is to say, he shall speak to the people, but with the (express) consciousness that not only will it be of no use, but that the people will become only the more hardened (vers. 9, 10). The Prophet, without regarding the difficulty for himself in the matter, only inquires, because the fate of his people distresses him, how long this anger of the Lord against His people is to last (ver. 11 a.). This answer is: until all is destroyed (ver. 11 b.), the land devoid of men (ver. 12), and not more than a tenth part of the inhabitants remain in it, that shall be dealt with as a tree that was felled for burning. For such becomes a prey to the flames to the very stump that remains in the ground. So there will remain of Israel but the remnant of a remnant (ver. 13). The structure of the chapter is extremely simple: vers. 1–4 describe the scene of the transaction; vers. 5–7 the terror of the Prophet and the allaying of it; vers. 8–13 his call to the prophetic functions and the commission imparted to him.

2. In the year—filled with smoke.—Vers. 1–4. The year that Uzziah died was the year 758 B. C. Jerome (in the Epist. 18 ad Damas.) remarks that this was the same year "quo Romulus, Romani imperii conditor, natus est," that Romulus was born. The theocracy declines: the world-power springs up. It is asked whether the event took place before or after the death of Uzziah. Without doubt the event took place before the death, but the record of it was made after it. For if both occurred before Uzziah's death there would have been no mention made of it. If both occurred after the death of the king, then the event would belong to the period of Jotham's rule, and one would justly look for the name of this king. Thus what has been just stated remains the only possible answer to the above question. Our passage then agrees very well with i. 1, for then Isaiah had prophesied already under Uzziah. Moreover, xiv. 28 ("in the year King Uzziah died") supports this explanation, for there it is presumed in the whole context that Uzziah still lives. The opinion of those Rabbis, who, following the lead of the Chaldee, understand the passage to refer to the civil death of Uzziah, i. e., to his becoming a leper, is justly pronounced by Gesenius a rabbinical caprice.

How did Isaiah see the Lord? In reality? or only in the idea, i. e. in fancy, so that, then, the grand painting were only the poetic clothing of a purely subjective, inward transaction? The latter is the opinion of rationalistic expositors. For example, Knobel says: "At all events there happened a moment in Isaiah's life, when the seer, in holy, divine enthusiasm, soared aloft to Jehovah and heard the Lord's call to the prophetic office. This event of his God-inspired inward man he portrays in the passage before us, and amplifies it with free, poetic art, more completely than he experienced it." But one must be, just a rationalist, to hold that such a transaction cannot possibly be an historical fact, and therefore that it must be declared to be unreal. At the same time one must resolve to pronounce what the Prophet professes to do a pious fraud. For that he would only give a poem is neither intimated in the narrative itself, nor does the character of the entire book suggest it. The Prophets are historians, even where they write poetry. The Prophet speaks here as an historian. Did he represent as an outward calling what was only inward, he would have arrogated an honor that did not become him, and this very arrogance would have deprived him of all claim to credibility. For countless ones have received an inward call. But precisely this outward call, just that which Isaiah here beheld, heard and spoke, is so extraordinary, that only privileged men can boast that they have experienced the like. Of Jeremiah (chap. i.) and Ezekiel (chaps. i.-iii.) similar things are told. These men, as Isaiah himself, would be guilty of wicked presumption did they invent a glorious, outward call. We must therefore hold the narrative of Isaiah to be historical.

But if real, was it a physical or spiritual reality? That is to say, did Isaiah behold all this with the eyes of the body or the eyes of the spirit (ἐν πνεύματι)? With the eyes of the body these things are not to be seen. Spiritual corporality can only be taken notice of by the opened inward sense (2 Kings vi. 17). Therefore something, real of course, but only inward, can be meant here, a spiritual beholding of spiritual reality (1 Kings xxii. 17 sqq.; Ezek. viii. sqq.; Dan. vii. 13 sqq.; Rev. i. 10 sqq., etc.).

To this is joined the inquiry: In which temple did Isaiah see the Lord? In the earthly, at Jerusalem, or in the heavenly, the pattern of the former? It is no reason against the former, that Isaiah was no priest, and therefore dared not go into the temple. Amos, also, was no priest, and yet saw the Lord in the temple (chap. ix. 1). The Prophet did not need to be in the temple bodily in order to see what was present in the temple. Comp. Ezek. viii. 3.—But in the earthly temple the throne of the Lord was the ark of the covenant. On this account it is expressly called יֹשֵׁב הַכְּרֻבִים "dwelling between the cherubim" (2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kings xix. 15; Isa. xxxvii. 16; Ps. lxxx. 2; xcix. 1; 1 Chr. xiii. 16). Why should Isaiah, if he saw the Lord in the earthly temple, not have named the ark of the covenant? The expression "throne high and elevated" does not appear to point to the ark of the covenant. For it cannot be said that it is high and lifted up. We shall therefore have to place the vision in the upper, heavenly sanctuary (the original of the Tabernacle in the first place, Exod. xxv. 9, 40; xxvi. 30; xxvii. 8, and afterwards of the temple). Thither Isaiah was transferred in spirit.

The Seraphim are not mentioned anywhere else in the whole Old and New Testaments except here. The word שְׂרָפִים is found Numbers xxi. 6, but as qualifying נְחָשִׁים (God sent among the people burning, fiery serpents). The singular שָׂרָף occurs, too, Num. xxi. 8; Deut. viii. 15; Isa. xiv. 29; xxx. 6, but always in the sense of "serpent." In Num. xxi. 8, it is synonym of נָחָשׁ. For it is said there; make thee a שָׂרָף, serpent, and set it on a pole. And then ver. 9, it proceeds: and Moses made a נְחַשׁ נחשת and set it on a pole. Again Deut. viii. 15 נָחָשׁ שָׂרָף are found joined. In both places in Isaiah, we read שָׂרָף מְעוֹפֵף. Therefore, שָׂרָף evidently means the serpent, but only by an originally predicate description becoming the designation of the chief conception. For originally שָׂרָף means "the burner," from שָׂרַף "to burn, burn up." The burning smart of a wound occasioned this designation. It is, moreover, not impossible that the burning fire is designated by the word שָׂרָף because it moves itself serpent fashion. And in so far the roots ἕρπειν, serpere and שָׂרַף may agree; and an original connection between שָׂרָף and serpens might exist, only the meaning "to crawl," would not be the medium of this connection. For only the burning fire is thought of as crawling; but the serpent is called שָׂרָף, not because it creeps, but because it burns. On these grounds I do not believe that the angel name שָׂרָף has anything to do with the serpent. According to our passage indeed, the Seraphim have human form, for they have a countenance, they have feet (ver. 2) and hands (ver. 6). But, Gesenius, before this has shown that the Seraph has nothing whatever to do with the Egyptian Serapis, by the proof that this name has sprung from the names Osiris and Apis (Osar-Api). Comp. Thesaur. p. 1342. Gesenius, with whom recently Herm. Schultz agrees, takes the word in the meaning of the Arabic scharaph (nobilitas), schariph (sheriff, princeps), comp. Dan. x. 13; viii. 25; which, however, hardly agrees with the use of the Hebrew שרף given above. That the Seraphim belong to the highest rank of the angel world, appears from their relation to God and His throne as it is described in our chapter. For they appear here in immediate nearness to the divine throne, and beside them no others are named. That the Seraphim are essentially identical with the Cherubim, has been maintained already by Maimonides (in the מורה הנבוכים iii. 6). Hendewerk, has tried to prove the identity in the dissertation De Seraphim a Cherubim in Bibliis non diversis, Königsberg, 1836. So, too, Stickel in the Stud. u. Krit. 1840 Heft. II. Boehmer also takes this view (Herzog's R. Encycl. IV. p. 24). Of course the passage Rev. iv. 8 seems to favor this view strongly. For there we find ascribed to Cherubim on the one hand the animal forms of Ezekiel, (i. and x.), and on the other the six wings and the Trishagion (thrice holy) of the Seraphim. It appears to me that the forms of John combine in themselves the traits of the Cherubim and Seraphim, and if it is said that the Seraphim of Isaiah differ from the Cherubim of Ezekiel so, too, do the Johannic Cherubim differ from those of Ezekiel, and the Seraphim of Isaiah are the mediating member. After all the question is an open one. If it is asked; why are the Seraphim called "the burning ones?" Philo answers: "because they devour the unformedness of matter, bring it into form and order, and thereby render it a Cosmos." Boehmer, among others, calls them "fire beings, that burn up everything unholy." LANGE (in the Art. Zorn Gottes, HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XVIII. p. 662 sq.), distinguishes the revelation of wrath against universal human sinfulness and sin, and the revelation of wrath against the conscious revolt against the revelation of salvation in law and gospel. The first degree seems to him symbolized by God's dominion over His Cherubim (Gen. iii. 24; Ps. xviii. 11–15; civ. 4), the second by His appearance between the Seraphim (Isa. vi.). "That the Seraphim represent a vision of the judgment of fire, in which, with the hardening of the people, the temple must burn up, is expressed also in the meaning of the word "the consumers." When Isaiah received the call to preach the hardening of the people, he saw, also, in spirit the temple occupied by the fire angels of God, and filled with smoke." Apart from the distinction between Seraphim and Cherubim, which I do not think has sufficient motive, it only seems to me that their meaning is too narrowly construed in the above. They do not merely serve as a revelation of the wrath of God. They belong, since there was a world, to the immediate organs of the divine revelation in the world generally. They are ever with God, and "rest neither day nor night," and when they ceaselessly offer praise, honor, and thanksgiving to Him that lives from everlasting to everlasting, and when they thereby give the tone, as it were, to the song of praise of the four and twenty elders (Rev. iv. 8 sqq.), so it is seen plainly, that they have not only a mission in relation to the wicked, but also in relation to the pious, even to God Himself. It does not decide the matter of their significance in general, that they appear just here in a moment when wrath is revealed, and that a Seraph burns away the sin of the Prophet. However, this is not the place to penetrate deeper into these mysteries (μυστήρια).

The Seraphim stood ממעל לו, "above him. By a very frequent usage עמד is joined with על so that by this preposition the one standing is represented, so to speak, as covering up the one before whom he stands, from the eyes of the spectator standing opposite; Gen. xviii. 8; xxiv. 30; Exod. xviii. 13; Jud. iii. 19; vi. 31; 2 Kings xxiii. 3; Jer. xxxvi. 21; 2 Chr. xxiii. 13. Even standing before Jehovah is designated by this preposition Job i. 6; 1 Kings xxii. 19; Zech. iv. 14; vi. 5.—But in our passage it is not merely said עָלָיו, but ממעל לו. This expression is so strong that we can do nothing else than represent the Seraphim to ourselves as hovering about the LORD, "and with two he flew," so that they stood, not indeed above his head, but relatively above him. Each Seraph had six wings. The imperfects manifestly serve to indicate a continuous circumstance that is an essential part of the scene, whereas the perfects וקרא and ואמר, "and cried and said," express an incident that forms part of the transaction. For what the Seraphim did with their wings went on continuously and does not belong to the transaction. But the crying out belongs to the transaction, yet does not go on continuously, but is only an incident that serves to finish the picture. We cannot suppose that the crying out continued while the Prophet, and the Seraph and the LORD talked. TARG. JONATHAN happily translates ver. 2 b., "duabus velabat," etc. "With two (wings) each one veiled his face that he might not see, and with two he veiled his body, that he might not be seen."

It must not be concluded from זה אל זה that there were only two Seraphim, but that there were two choirs, say one on either side. Alternative song is founded in the essence of communion. It is the musical expression of the διαλογισμοί that move the congregation. Therefore it is found in the heavenly congregation as well as in the earthly. But the Seraphim sing "Holy, holy, holy is Jehovah Sabaoth; fullness of the whole earth is His glory." Thus they praise Him here as the Holy One, because in what follows (ver. 9 sq.), He makes known in what degree His holiness shall react against unholy Israel. DELITZSCH calls attention to the fact that Isaiah cherished his whole life through, a deep, indelible impression of that holiness of the LORD that confronted him here so mightily in word and aspect. Fourteen times in the first part does he use the expression קדוש ישראל, "Holy One of Israel," which is, as it were, the concentrated expression of that impression; fifteen times in the second (comp. at i. 4), whereas the expression occurs beside only thrice in the Psalms, (lxxi. 22; lxxviii. 41; lxxxix. 19), twice in Jer. (l. 29; li. 5), and once in 2 Kings xix. 22 parallel with Isa. xxxvii. 23.

But why this thrice repeated קָדוֹשׁ? There are, to be sure, examples of such repetition that only aim at rhetorical emphasis (Jer. vii. 4; Ezek. xxi. 32; Nah. i. 2). In fact CALVIN and VITRINGA construe the thrice holy in this sense, while, yet, they expressly say that they would not exclude a deeper significance. HERM. SCHULTZ, (Alttest. Theol. I. p. 345) says: "the choir rests on a song and counter song, combined in the double choir, therefore the threeness of the Holy." But here we stand before the holiest of all of the Godhead, that is opened up for a moment, and receive a glimpse into the βάθη τοῦ θεοῦ (1 Cor. ii. 10, "the deep things of God"). The Christian consciousness, from the remotest period, has not been able to resist the impression that this thrice-holy is a reflex of the triune being of the Godhead. And in the New Testament sphere this impression is the more justified because the evangelist John (xii. 41) says expressly Isaiah saw the glory of Jesus when he heard the words of ver. 10. In that John says nothing extraordinary. Rather he quite accords with Peter who says (1 Pet. i. 11) that the Spirit that swayed in the Prophets of the Old Testament was the Spirit of Christ; and with Paul, who says (1 Cor. x. 4) it was Christ that as a spiritual rock led Israel through the wilderness. This is only the confirmation of what we have long known as the significance of the Son, viz.: that He is the medium, and therefore also the mediator of all and every revelation.

In regard to the second clause of ver. 3, the question arises, first of all, what is subject? Is מְלֹא subject, then earth is the principal notion, and it is said here what fills it. Is כְּבוֹדוֹ subject, then the glory of God is the principal notion and it is declared here how comprehensive it is. The latter alone corresponds with the context. But the further inquiry arises: whether כָּבוֹד, "glory," is to be taken in an active or a passive sense, i. e., as praise, or as majesty, glory. The two cannot be essentially disconnected. For as God's glory is everywhere, so in a certain sense also it is everywhere praised. For its very enemies even must involuntarily do it honor (Ps. viii. 2, 3). And I do not see why in our passage one should separate the two. Does it not then become those who sing unceasingly the praise of God in His immediate presence to declare that, not only they, but the entire creation continually proclaims the praise of the Lord? But it says only "all the earth." Of course: for this song of praise sounds here primarily for one man and for men. It is just in respect to these that the truth is declared, on the one hand comforting, on the other appalling, that the glory of the LORD is everywhere, and everywhere it makes itself known and felt. Comp. xl. 5; Hab. iii. 3; Num. xiv. 21; Ps. lxxii. 19.

Ver. 4. אַמָּה signifies in Hebrew primarily the elbow-socket (Armgelenk-Mutter), i. e., the depression resembling the box screw (Schraubenmutter), in which the arm turns itself, the elbow. The word has this meaning, too, in the noted passage 2 Sam. viii. 1, where it is said that David took from the Philistines אֶת־מֶתֶג הָאַמָּה. The bridle of the elbow is the contrast of מֶתֶג שְׂפָתַיִם Isa. xxxvii. 29, "the bridle of the lips," a bridle attached to the elbows. The meaning of 2 Sam. viii. 1 is that the Israelites had the bridle of the Philistines, no longer in their mouths indeed, yet still on their arms, so that they were hindered from the free use of them. Therefore אַמָּה is the elbow, from which the meaning "ell" is derived. Accordingly אמות הספים are the elbows of the sills. The sills are compared to the arms and the joints in the angle are the arm joints or elbows. Because the sills, and in fact both the upper and lower, and as well as the side beams, are joined together in these, therefore they are the centre of motion, and every shock felt in such a centre must be communicated to all the radii. אַמָּה occurs only here in this meaning. סִפִּים (only here in Isaiah) are the sills, and primarily the under sills. For the upper sill is called מַשְׁקוֹף and the side posts מְזוּזוֹת (Exod. xii. 7, 22, 23). But in our passage סִפִּים as denominatio a potiori stands for all parts of the door-way. The verb נוּעַ occurs only in the first part of Isa. vii. 2; xix. 1; xxiv. 20; xxix. 9; xxxvii. 22.—קול הקורא (comp. xl. 3) is primarily "the voice of the caller." But in what precedes it speaks, not of one, but of many criers. Thus we know that קורא is to be taken collectively and as concr. pro abst.

The house filled with smoke.—It was then not full of smoke from the commencement, and still less did a cloud of smoke conceal the Lord as Exod. xl. 34; 1 Kings viii. 10. For (ver. 1) Isaiah saw the Lord. It has been said, the smoke came from the altar of incense (ver. 6) and symbolized the seraphic praise. There may appear some truth in that from a comparison of Rev. v. 8; viii. 3 sq. But it seems to me that the smoke has still another meaning. In so far as it constitutes an antithesis to the light in which the Lord dwells, it seems to me, wherever it occurs in connection with the appearance of the divine glory, to signify the reverse side of the same, the severity, the wrath of God. Thus here, too, the smoke, with whose appearance is connected immediately in ver. 5 the Prophet's confession of sin and mortal fear, introduces the words of condemnation which the Lord afterward speaks to the Prophet as the manifestation of His holy indignation. Comp. iv. 5; ix. 17; xiv. 31; xxxiv. 10; li. 6; lxv. 5.

3. Then said I —— is purged.—Vers. 5-7. After the Prophet had heard the Seraphim praise the holiness of the Lord, after he had beheld them themselves in the splendor of their holiness, and also had seen its consequence, the wrath, imaged in the smoke, he is seized with the feeling of his own sinfulness. Every creature that beholds or comes in contact with an immediate trace of the divine Being, has a sense of not being able to exist under the burden of the absolute majesty (Gen. xvi. 13; xxxii. 31; Exod. xxxiii. 20; Jud. vi. 22 sq.; xiii. 22; 1 Sam. vi. 19 sq.; 2 Sam. vi. 7). This sense must have made itself felt in the Prophet in the highest degree, seeing he beheld the divine Being in a greater proximity and clearness, than, since Moses at least, ever a man did. He cries, therefore: woe is me (comp. i. 4), I am lost (xv. 1; Hos. iv. 6; x. 7, 15), for a man of unclean lips am I, and among a people of unclean lips do I dwell! That he emphasizes just the unclean lips comes from the fact that he had just heard the Seraphim bring an offer of praise with clean lips. In contrast with these circumcised lips he becomes conscious how his are uncircumcised (Exod. vi. 12); in contrast with these calves of the lips (Hos. xiv. 3) and with this fruit of the lips (Prov. xviii. 20; Isa. lvii. 19; Heb. xiii. 15) he feels that he is quite unfit for such an offering, both in respect to his own person, and in respect to that totality to which he belongs; in fact that this unfitness, when he has gone with it into the jurisdiction of the highest King (xxxiii. 22; xli. 21; xliii. 15; xliv. 6) must bring upon him the sentence of death. "Such is the confession which the contrite Prophet makes; on this confession follows the forgiveness of sins, which is confirmed by a heavenly sacrament, and is extended to him by a seraphic absolution."—DELITZSCH.

The altar, which is mentioned, we must think of as an altar of incense, since any other kind of offering than incense in the heavenly sanctuary is inconceivable, and the glowing coals also indicate an altar of incense. From this altar one of the Seraphim took with the tongs a רִצְפָּה "hot coal." That he took it with the tongs, not only corresponds to the usage of the earthly sanctuary (Exod. xxv. 38; Num. iv. 9; 1 Kings vii. 49), but has in any case also its internal reasons, as that even in the sphere of heavenly corporal existence such distinctions occur, or that the touching with the tongs has a symbolical meaning.

רִצְפָה (comp. רֶשֶׁף Hab. iii. 5; Song of Solomon viii. 6) is something aglow, whether coal or stone. The word occurs only here [in Isaiah.—Tr.] In the earthly sanctuary the burning of incense was performed by taking coals from the altar of burnt-offering and pouring them on the altar of incense, and then upon these was scattered the incense (Lev. xvi. 12; comp. x. 1). In the heavenly sanctuary there was no altar of burnt-offering. At all events רִצְפָה designates the glowing body on which the incense was cast in order to burn it. With such a glowing body, therefore, the Seraph touched the lips of the Prophet in order to reconcile him. The Prophet's lips are touched with fire therefore, and that with the same holy fire out of which proceeds the cloud of smoke. Thus from the place that occasioned in him before the painful feeling of his uncleanness, must the holy fire penetrate and burn out the entire man. It must burn up all uncleanness. The Seraph shows himself here right properly as שָׂרָף, as burner. As water has primarily generating and fructifying power, but secondarily also a judging and destroying power (comp. creation, the flood, and Baptism), so fire has primarily devouring, and thereby judging, purifying, and secondarily warming and illuminating power. Omnia purgat edax ignis, vitiumque metallis excoquit, says Ovid Fast. iv. 785. Τὸ πῦρ καθαίρει, τὸ ὕδωρ ἁγνίζει (Plut. quæst. rom. 1). Comp. Num. xxxi. 23; Herzog's R. Encycl. IX. p. 717 sq.—As here the touching takes place for the purpose of atonement, so Jer. i. 9 it is for the purpose of inspiration; in Dan. viii. 17 sq.; x. 8 sqq.; Rev. i. 17, it is for the purpose of imparting strength.

4. Also I heard—and be healed.—Vers. 8–10. The Lord Himself now begins to speak. Having seen Him (ver. 1), Isaiah now hears Him. "I heard" corresponds to the "and I saw" (ver. 1). It is worthy of notice that the Lord asks: whom shall I send? that He, therefore, as it were, calls for volunteers. So we read, too, 1 Kings xxii. 20, that the Lord in an assembly of heaven, portrayed very much as the one here, asks: "Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead?" There it appears, ver. 23 (from the circumstance that Micaiah would have been a deceiver, if a real transaction were reported in vers. 19–22) that this prophet only narrates a fictitious vision. But anyway the representation remains that the Lord not only gives His servants and messengers command and commission according to His own election, but also proposes the undertaking of a commission to the voluntary determination. Now when the Lord in our passage, as was said, calls for volunteers, as it were, this is not to be explained by the greater difficulty or danger of the mission. For Isaiah's mission was not as difficult and dangerous as that of Moses or Jeremiah. Now Moses resists the commission all he can (Exod. iii.), though he was an אִישׁ חַיִל, "able man," as few were. Luther says of him (on the call of Moses, Exod. iii.): "Moses begins, as it were, a wrangling and disputing with God, and will not accept this office." Jeremiah refuses because he feels himself really too young and made of too tender stuff. Ezekiel, too, appears inwardly at least to have had no relish for undertaking the commission. For he is exhorted not to be disobedient (Ezek. ii. 8), and, though he does not express them, his doubts and fears are disarmed (Ezek. ii. 6—iii. 9). Jonah, the most rebellious and self-willed of all Prophets, actually flees from the Lord. All these, who would not, are not even asked if they will, but they must. Isaiah, who will, is asked. It appears, therefore, that the manner of the calling is regulated according to the individuals. Where the Lord in His chosen and prepared instruments (Jer. i. 5) observes also the subjective readiness of mind, He affords it the opportunity to manifest itself by the question: "who will." That the Lord, by this question, would not draw out something concealed from Himself is manifest. For how can a thing be unknown to the Lord? There was, in fact, no one there but Isaiah that could have replied to His question. For, it could only be a man that could be in question for the undertaking of the prophetic office in Israel. No such person except Isaiah was present. The question is therefore a form by which the Lord honors the רוּחַ נְדִיבָה, "free spirit" (Ps. li. 14 (12)), that He knew was present in the Prophet, in that He gave it opportunity to manifest itself.

Who are the many for whom the service is to be done? The plural is here as little as Gen. i. 26; iii. 22; xi. 7 mere form (Plur.-majest). It is rather, as Delitzsch expresses it, communicatively intended. Jehovah includes the whole assembly. He honors thereby the assembled ones, by taking for granted that His interest is theirs and their interest His. Isaiah at once replies: "Behold, here am I; send me." This prompt offer quite corresponds with the strong and bold spirit of Isaiah. There is no need of assuming that he had already been called, and had already been in office for a time. He, the mighty man, is at once conscious that this is his affair. He feels that he can do it, and he will do it, too. We find here not a trace of fear or other consideration. It was, however, no proud self-sufficiency that led the Prophet. He has just been reconciled in fact as a sinner. The flame that blazes in him and impels him must have been a pure flame. He feels himself strong in Him that makes him mighty (Phil. iv. 13; Isa. xl. 29 sq.). This "here am I; send me" is, however, so grand, in fact, when one reflects on the examples of other prophets mentioned already, it is so unique in its way, that one understands wherefore Isaiah would not put this history of his calling quite in the beginning of his book, but rather makes it the third portal of his prophetic building. He feared this intrepid ready-mindedness would be found incomprehensible. He puts in advance of it therefore two other entrances, that the reader may learn thereby to know him and thus come prepared to this scene of his calling. And, in fact, he that has read chapters i.—v. must confess that here "is a Prophet" (Ezek. ii. 5; xxxiii. 33), a man that had the stuff in him, and the right to say, "Here am I; send me."

In vers. 9, 10 follows out of the mouth of the Lord Himself the commission that the Prophet must discharge. The manner of imparting this commission is directly the opposite of what is usual among men in like circumstances. One seeks, namely, in giving a servant or messenger a hard commission, to represent it, at least, at first, in the most advantageous light. This the Lord does not do. On the contrary, He plainly emphasizes just the hardest part. He acts as if the Prophet were to have nothing joyous to announce, but only judgment and hopeless hardening. Isaiah is called the evangelist of the Old Testament. But there is not a trace of it found here. It is not once said even that he shall warn, exhort, threaten. But, overleaping all intermediate members, only the sorrowful effect is emphasized, and that with such pointedness, that, what in truth can be only an unintended effect, appears as directly designed. It is as if the Lord would give the intrepid man that had said "here am I, send me," to understand at once, that he would require all his boldness in order to carry through the commission he undertook. Grammatically the words offer almost no difficulty. The inf. absol. in ver. 9 cannot have an intensive meaning, as though the Lord had said: hear and see well, with effort, zeal and diligence. For then must they even attain to understanding. But the Lord would say: spite of the much, and ceaseless hearing they shall still understand nothing. This ceaseless but still fruitless hearing is only the correlative of that ceaseless but fruitless preaching, of which especially Jeremiah so often speaks (Jer. vii. 13, 25; xi. 7, etc.). Let it be noticed, too, that Jeremiah every where points, as the cause of this fruitless hearing, to the שְׁרִירוּת לֵב, "the hardness of heart," and the stiffening of the neck (הִקְשׁוּ אֶת־עָרְפָּם Jer. vii. 26). The Prophet never spoke to the people such words as we read in ver. 9. Therefore it cannot be the meaning of the Lord that He should so speak. But the Lord would say: Whatever thou mayest say to this people, say it not in the hope of being understood and regarded, but say it with the consciousness that thy words shall remain not understood and not regarded, although they might be understood and regarded, and that consequently they must serve to bring out the complete unfolding of that hardness of heart that exists in this people, and thereby be a testimony against this people and a basis of judgment. Thus ver. 10 it is not meant that the Prophet shall do what is the devil's affair, that is, positively and directly lead men off to badness and godlessness. Rather the Lord can ever want only the reverse of this. If, then, it says: "harden the heart, deafen the ear, plaster up the eyes, that they may not see, nor hear, nor take notice and be converted to their salvation," still this form of speech seems to me to be chosen for the sake of the Prophet. There is, namely, a great comfort for him in it. For what is sadder for a man of God than to see day after day and year after year pass away without any fruit of his labor, in fact with evidence that things grow rather worse than better? Is it not for such a case a mighty comfort to be able to say: that is precisely what the Lord predicted, yea, expressly indicated as His relative and previous intention. Thus one sees that He has not labored in vain, but that He has performed his task. And inasmuch as that judgment is still only a transition point, and by the wonderful wisdom of the Lord, shall become a forerunner of higher development of salvation, so the servant of God can say this for comfort, that even out of the judgment of hardening, that it is His part to provoke, salvation shall grow. God's wrath, in fact, is never without love. The preliminary earthly judgments, as is well recognized, are to be regarded as chastenings, that have a becoming-better as their aim. And if a people like Israel suffers one judgment after another through thousands of years, and still never becomes better, until at last the Lord breaks in pieces the economy of the Old Testament, like one shivers an earthen vessel by throwing it on the ground, so just this destroying of the old covenant is the previous condition to the arising of a new one, that attains to what the old one could not. But the individuals themselves whose hardening and judgment is an example and beacon for the afterworld? Here we touch on a difficult point. Will those whose fall was the riches of the world (Rom. xi. 12) be eternally damned, or will their fall here below also for them become some time a means to their conversion and raising them up again? The answer to this appears to me to lie in Rom. ix.-xi. But here is not the place to go into it more particularly.—Heart, ear, eye (comp. xxxii. 3, 4) are named as the representatives of the inward sense; the heart represents the will, eye and ear the knowing. The heart shall become fat and covered with grease, and thereby be made incapable of emotion.

After it is said what shall be done in regard to the three organs, it is said what shall be guarded against by such doing; and here a reversed order is observed in respect to the positive phrases. What must be guarded against is something immediate and something mediate. Immediately must seeing, hearing and observing be hindered; mediately the penitent conversion and being saved.

In the N. T. our passage is cited five times. In Matth. xiii. 14; Mark iv. 12; Luke viii. 10 it is applied to the fact that Jesus always spoke to the people in parables. Thereby was the prophecy of our passage fulfilled. Jesus would manifestly say: Were I not to speak in parables, then they would understand nothing at all; my discourse would outwardly rebound, and not penetrate at all, and consequently effect no condition of responsibility on their part. But as I speak by parables, my discourse at least penetrates so far that a certain relative understanding, and consequently, too, a responsibility, is possible. But in as much as they oppose themselves to the realization of this possibility of understanding, they let it be known that evil has the upper hand in them: thus they pronounce in a measure their own judgment. Our passage is cited in John xii. 40 as explaining why the Jews could not believe in Jesus spite of the signs He did. To this end our passage is construed in the same sense in which the Synoptists take it: even the signs of Jesus, no matter how near they come, still do not bring about faith, because the susceptibility is wanting. Finally in Acts xxviii. 25 sqq. Paul makes use of our passage in order to prove generally the unsusceptibility of the Jewish nation to the preaching of the gospel.

5. Then said I——substance thereof.—Vers. 11–13. The announcement of the judgment of hardening in vers. 9, 10 sounds quite absolute. Yet the Prophet hears underneath all that it is not so intended. It is impossible that the Lord should quite and forever reject His people, and abrogate the promises given to the fathers. He asks, therefore, "How long, Lord?" (comp. Ps. vi. 4; xc. 13; Hab. ii. 6). He would say: What are to be quantitively and qualitatively the limits of that judgment of hardening? The answer is: First there must be an entire desolation and depopulating of the land; and when at last still a tenth of the inhabitants is in the land, that tenth part also must be decimated till nothing is left but the stump of a root or stem. That shall then be the seed of a holy future. The meaning of the words is perfectly clear.

The construction is as follows: and still there is in it (the land) a tenth part, and this is again decimated—after the manner of or in resemblance to the terebinth and oak, in which, when felled, a stump remains, its stump (of the tenth) is holy seed. Therefore a stump always remains, and that suffices to guarantee a new life and a new glorious future. This has been steadily verified in the people Israel, both in a corporeal and spiritual respect. After every overthrow, yea, after the most fearful visitations, that aimed at the very extinction of the people, a stump or stem was still always left in the ground. This people is even not to be destroyed. There is nothing tougher than the life of this everlasting Jew. And in spiritual respects it is just the same. Though every knee seems to bow to the old or the new Baal, yet the Lord has preserved always a fragment (7,000 it is called, 1 Kings xix. 18) in faithfulness.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

On ver. 1. The question: why this vision in the year of Uzziah's death? coincides evidently with the question: why an Isaiah any way, and why was he needed just at this time? If prophets were to be, then must prophecy at some time culminate; and that happened in Isaiah, the greatest of all the prophets that have written. Thence Isaiah can stand neither at the beginning, nor at the close. Not at the beginning, for he is far in advance of the elementary stadium; he represents the summit. Not at the close, for in the days of decline art cannot flourish. It needs quiet times for its development. Such a quiet time (relatively) was that of the four kings under whom Isaiah labored. CASPARI (Beitr. p. 218) says of the Uzziah-Jotham period, that for the kingdom of Judah it was 1) a time of great power and prosperity, 2) beside the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 18, 20), it was the greatest period since its existence by the rending away of the Ten Tribes from the house of David, 3) the longest continued prosperity during its existence, 4) the last that it had till it fell, 5) the only period of prosperity during Isaiah's prophetic ministry. But this period of prosperity was, so to speak, only the spring-time, the youth and formative period of the Isaiah prophecy. It was under Ahaz especially that it had to make trial of itself. The league with Assyria fastened the gaze of the Prophet on the Assyrian dominion, the Babylonian embassy in Hezekiah's time (chap. xxxix.) on that of Babylon. Although, even under Ahaz and Hezekiah, there were wars and great distress by means of the Syrians and the Ephraimites, as also by the Assyrians, still the destruction was graciously postponed.

In that time, therefore, when the theocracy began to show its relations to the worldly powers in a decisive way, there appeared a prophet, who, thoroughly cultivated under the prosperous period of Uzziah and Jotham, could recognize the portentous characteristics of the time of Ahaz and Hezekiah, and see deep into the signs pregnant with the future; and who could reveal their meaning with such wisdom, power and art as are seen in the book of Isaiah. When Uzziah died, Isaiah was just old enough and far enough advanced in training to begin the prophetic career; under Ahaz he had attained manly maturity; and under Hezekiah, with glorified vision, like one near his death, he beheld the glories of redemption.

2. On ver. 1. Jerome inquires: how could Isaiah have seen the Lord, seeing John says (John i. 20) "No man hath seen God at any time," and God Himself said to Moses: "Thou canst not see my face; for there shall no man see me and live," Exod. xxxiii. 20? He replies to the question: that not only the Godhead of the Father, but also that of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, are invisible to bodily eyes, because one essence is in the Trinity. But the eyes of the spirit are able to behold the Godhead according to the saying: "blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," Matt. v. 8. And Augustine cites this saying of Jerome approvingly, and comments on it (Epist. ad Fortunatianum) Addendo ergo, etc.: "Therefore by saying in addition, 'but the eyes of the spirit,' he makes vision of this sort totally different from every kind of bodily vision. But lest any might think he spoke of the present time, he subjoins the testimony of the Lord, wishing to show what he had called eyes of the spirit: by which testimony the promise is declared, not of a present, but of a future vision."

3. On ver. 2. FOERSTER explains the fact of the Seraphim covering their feet with their wings as proof that they would confess that their holiness was imperfect and impure in comparison with the absolute holiness of God. For this he cites Job iv. 18, "Behold, He put no trust in His servants; and His angels He charged with folly," and xv. 15, "Behold, He putteth no trust in His saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in His sight."

4. It was even the opinion of many Rabbis that a trace of threeness of the divine essence was contained in the three times holy of the Seraphim. PETER GALATINUS (Italian, baptized Jew, Franciscan monk) in his Arcanis catholicae veritatis II. 1, has proved this especially of RABBI SIMON JOCHAI and JONATAN BEN UFIEL (the Targumist). Comp. RAYMUNDUS MARTINI in the pugio fidei, and especially JOH. MEYER in the Dissertatio theologica de mysterio sacrosanctae trinitatis ex solius V. Ti. libris demonstrato. Harderwich, 1712.

On the ground of this recognized reference to the Trinity, this song of the Seraphim has obtained great significance in Christian liturgies to the present time. "Its introduction into them has been ascribed to IGNATIUS, Bishop of Antioch († 116), and already in a letter of CLEMENT, Bishop of Rome († 100), there is found a hint of it. Pope SIXTUS I. († 130) is said to have adopted it into the Romish mass." SCHOEBERLEIN, Schatz des liturg. Chor. und Gemeindegesangs I. p. 333. [On the Trishagion comp. a Bib. Encycl. or BINGHAM'S Antiquity of the Christian Church, Book XIV. ii. § 3, 4, and Book XV. iii. § 10].

5. On ver. 4. If a typical meaning of the shaking of the door-posts is insisted on, it must be sought in that power of the revelation of divine glory that affects and moves everything, impressing both personal and impersonal creatures; and an example must be found in the events attending the death of Christ (Matth. xxvii. 50 sq.).

6. On ver. 5. "God does not put angels into the pulpit, but poor, weak men. The angels do not know how sinful men are affected; but ministers of the Church, chosen from men, know that well."—FOERSTER.

7. On ver. 8. VITRINGA remarks here that Christian expositors, GROTIUS excepted, explain the change from the singular to the plural number, in "whom shall I send, and who will go for us" as implying the Trinity. "CALVIN, too," he says, "and PISCATOR, usually more cautious than others in observations of this sort, here plainly utter this sentiment." ["This explanation is the only one that accounts for the difference of number in the verb and pronoun."—J. A. ALEXANDER.—TR.]. The opinion of the Jews, however, is that God is represented metaphorically here, as taking counsel with His family, i. e. the angels. VITRINGA remarks also that SANCTIUS attributes to THOMAS and HUGO the important emphasis laid on the plural "for us," which involves the meaning "who will go for us and not for himself."

8. On vers. 9 and 10. What God says to the Prophet here rests on a law that may be called the law of the polarity of the will. For every thing here concerns the will, i. e., that will-do that is conditioned by the will-be (comp. my book, Der Gottmensch, p. 46 sqq.). As in electricity similar poles repel one another, and dissimilar attract, which depends on the principle of deep inward relationship and mutual completion, so in like manner it happens in spiritual life. The Lord says, John viii. 37: "My word hath no place in you," and again, ver. 43: "Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my words;" which question he proceeds to answer himself (ver. 44): "ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do;" and immediately after He says, ver. 47: "He that is of God heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not because ye are not of God."

Therefore where the word of God comes in contact with a heterogeneous pole, it is repelled. And not only that, but that negative pole becomes more intensely negative by the exercise of its negative power. And the stronger the power that provokes its energetic reaction, and the oftener this provocation occurs, so much the more is it strengthened in that negation till it becomes quite hardened. The magnet loses its power by disuse, whereas frequent use strengthens it. Thus we find that every where the most glorious, clearest, loveliest testimonies to divine truth are not received where the will is wanting to receive them, i. e., where, to speak biblically, the flesh is stronger than the spirit. Therefore must all prophets of the Lord be hated and persecuted in proportion as they announced the truth mightily and penetratingly; and that hate must attain its climax in opposing Him who was Himself the truth.

8. On ver. 13. "Paul, also, when he represents the rejection of the Jews in Rom. xi., calls the race, ver. 16, a holy root, and, vers. 23-25, severed branches that God will again graft in." STARKE.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On ver. 3. The thrice holy of the Seraphim a revelation. 1. Of the holiness of God. 2. Of His glory. 3. Of the Trinity.

2. On vers. 5-8. The way of reconciliation to God prefigured by the example of the Prophet Isaiah. 1. The beginning of this way is the knowledge of sin: a. occasioned by the knowledge of the holiness of God, b. manifesting itself by the confession of sin, c. constraining one to cry for deliverance (woe is me). 2. The end of this way is the forgiveness of sins: a. made possible by the sacrifices to which the altar points, b. applied by the word and sacrament (the address of the angel and the live coal), c. appropriated by faith (the Prophet yields himself to the action of the angel).

3. On ver. 8. Installation address. Whom shall I send? etc. Herein lies: 1. The divine call to office. 2. The high importance of the office. 3. The joyful inspiration for the office. HAHN.

4. On vers. 9-13. The fruit of preaching. 1. It is gratifying only in a small portion of the hearers (ver. 13*b*; Matt. xxii. 14). 2. In most hearers it is rather mournful, because by preaching: a. they are only moved to the full unfolding of their enmity; b. they are made ripe for judgment (vers. 11-13 a).

II.—THE FIRST GRAND DIVISION.

CHAPTERS VII.—XXXIX.

FIRST SUBDIVISION.

CHAPS. VII.—XII.

Israel's Relation to Assyria as Representative of the World-Power generally in its Destructive Beginning and Prosperous Ending.

Chapters vii.—xii. deal wholly with the relation of Israel to Assyria. They show how the way was opened for this relation by the unhappy league that Ahaz concluded with the king of Assyria for protection against Syria and Ephraim. The Prophet announces first that the fear of the Syrians and of Ephraim is groundless: but Assyria is to be feared. Taking with Assyria a comprehensive view of all later developments of the world-power, he announces to Israel a second exile, corresponding to that of Egypt as the first, but also a second return, corresponding to that glorious return in which Moses led them. This deliverance will be brought about by a Branch that is to be expected from the house of David, that shall spring as son of a virgin from the apparently dried up root of this house, and, in the might of the Spirit of God, will found a kingdom of peace that shall embrace and have dominion over all nature.

This prophetic cycle divides in three parts. In the first part (chap. vii. 1—ix. 6) the Prophet opposes to the false reliance on the aid of Assyria against the apparent danger that threatened from Syria and Ephraim, the ideal figure of a child, that finds its type in the half-frightful, half-comforting phenomenon of the virgin's son Immanuel, partly in the form of a son born to the Prophet himself: types that at the same time are earnest of a preliminary deliverance.

In the second part (chap. ix. 7—x. 4) the Prophet turns to the Israel of the Ten Tribes, with a short, as it were, passing word. Prompted by their proud words, as if it were a little thing for them to make good the loss so far sustained from Assyria, the Prophet announces to Ephraim that what they regarded as the end was only the first of many degrees of ruin that they were to suffer from Assyria.

In the third part (chap. x. 5—xii. 6) the Prophet turns against Assyria itself. Because it would not be the instrument of the Lord in the Lord's sense, to it is announced its own destruction, but to Israel deliverance and return by the Messiah the Prince of Peace.

A.—THE PROPHETIC PERSPECTIVE OF THE TIME OF AHAZ.

CHAP. VII. 1—IX. 6.

In the beginning of the reign of Ahaz Judah was seriously threatened by the league between Syria and Ephraim. Thereupon Isaiah received the commission from Jehovah to say to Ahaz that there was nothing to fear from Syria and Ephraim. Ahaz being summoned to ask for a sign as pledge of the truth of this announcement, refused to do so. In punishment a sign is given to him. He must hear that a virgin of the royal house, probably his daughter, is pregnant, and will bear a son. But this son of a virgin shall receive the exceeding comforting name, "Immanuel." Before he will be able to distinguish between good and evil, the lands of Syria and Ephraim shall be forsaken and desert. But danger threatens from that side from which Ahaz hopes for help and deliverance—that is, from Assyria. For Assyria will turn the holy land into a desert. Shortly after, the Prophet announces that a son will be born to himself. He does not do this publicly, however, but to two reliable men. At the same time the Prophet must set up a public tablet with the inscription, Maher-shalal-hash-baz. When the boy was born, he received these words as his name. And it was revealed as the meaning of the words, that before the boy could say father and mother, the spoil of Damascus and Samaria would be carried away by the king of Assyria. By this second child, then, substantially the same thing was predicted as by the first, the son of the virgin. Both prophecies must in general have occurred in the same period, in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz (743 B. C.). Only the announcement of Immanuel precedes somewhat that of Maher-shalal-hash-baz. Wherefore this double prediction of the same thing? It seems to me that the announcement of Immanuel was intended immediately for the royal family. For it was a sign involving punishment (comp. comment on vii. 14). But the people, too, were mightily concerned in this affair. Therefore there was given to them a special sign by Maher-shalal. Such is the extent of the two prophecies at the beginning of Ahaz's time. It is seen that each has for its central point the future birth of a child. From viii. 5 on follows a series of short utterances, all of which relate to the same subjects. The words viii. 5–8 are a warning directed primarily to Ephraim, not to despise the kingdom of Judah, nor to over-estimate the power of Syria and Ephraim, for Assyria will overflow the latter like a stream, and then, of course, Judah too. Chap. viii. 9–15 contains a threatening proclamation to the nations of that time that conspired against Judah, and a warning to Judah not to fear these conspiracies, but rather to let the Lord be the only subject of fear. Finally a conclusion follows (viii. 16—ix. 6) which sounds almost like the testament of the Prophet to his disciples. For, after a brief prayer to Jehovah to seal the law and testimony in the hearts of his disciples, he sets forth himself and his disciples as living signs and wonders that exhort men to have faith in Jehovah, warns against the temptation to superstitious divination, and exhorts to cleave to the law and testimony. For only therein, in the troublous days to come, may be found comfort and restoration.

And now that the prophet's testament may be also a prophetic testament, prayer and exhortation merge into a prophetic vision. The gaze of the Prophet is directed to the remote future. Dark lies the future before him. But just in the quarter that the darkness is deepest, in the least regarded northern border of the holy land, he sees a bright light arise, which marvellously (one involuntarily calls to mind Correggio's painting of the Nativity) has its origin in the person of a child, that proves to be the promised Branch of David, and restorer of David's kingdom to everlasting power and glory. If our conjecture is correct, that we have here the Prophet's testament to his disciples, then we may well conceive why it is introduced just here. First, it has the same obscure prophetic background that was given by the perspective of the abandonment of Israel to the power of Assyria; and then, like both the chief prophecies described above, it makes the dispersion of that obscurity by the clear light of salvation proceed from the person of a child that is to be looked for.

We may accordingly sketch out the division of our section as follows:

I. The two chief prophecies concerning the birth of the virgin's son and the Prophet's son. vii. 1—viii. 4.
   1. The prophecy of the virgin's son Immanuel. vii. 1–25.
      a) Isaiah and Ahaz at the conduit of the upper pool. vii. 1–9.
      b) Isaiah in the bosom of the royal family announcing a sign: the Virgin's Son Immanuel. vii. 10–25.
   2. Isaiah giving the whole nation a sign by the birth of his son Maher-shalal-hash-baz. viii. 1–4.

II. Supplements.
   1. Those that despise Shiloah shall be punished by the waters of the Euphrates. viii. 5–8.
   2. Threatening against those that conspire against Judah, and against those that fear these conspiracies. viii. 9–15.
   3. The testament of the Prophet to his disciples. viii. 16—ix. 6.
      a) Prayer and exhortation merging into prophetic vision. viii. 16–23 (ix. 1).
      b) The light of the future proceeding from a child, that is to be born of the race of David. ix. 1–16 (2–7).

I.—THE TWO CHIEF PROPHECIES CONCERNING THE BIRTH OF THE VIRGIN'S SON AND OF THE PROPHET'S SON.

Chapter VII. 1—VIII. 4.

1. THE PROPHECY OF THE VIRGIN'S SON IMMANUEL.

Chap. VII. 1–25.

a) Isaiah and Ahaz at the conduit of the upper pool.

Chap. VII. 1–9.

1 And it came to pass in the days of Ahaz the son of Jotham, the son of Uzziah, king of Judah, that Rezin the king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah, king of Israel, went up toward Jerusalem to war against it, but could not [a]prevail against it.
2 And it was told the house of David, saying, Syria [1]is confederate with Ephraim.
And his heart was moved, and the heart of his people, as the trees of the wood are 3 moved with the wind. Then said the Lord unto Isaiah, Go forth now to meet Ahaz, thou, and [2]Shear-jashub thy son, at the end of the conduit of the upper pool in the 4 [3]highway of the fuller's field; and say unto him,

Take heed, and be quiet;
Fear not, [4]neither be faint-hearted
[b]For the two tails of these smoking fire-brands,
For the fierce anger of Rezin with Syria, and of the son of Remaliah.
5 Because Syria, Ephraim, and the son of Remaliah,
Have [c]taken evil counsel against thee, saying,
6 Let us go up against Judah, and [5d]vex it,
And let us make a breach therein for us,
And set a king in the midst of it, even the son of Tabeal:
7 Thus saith the [e]Lord God,
It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass.
8 For the head of Syria is Damascus,
And the head of Damascus is Rezin;
And within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken, [6]that it be not a people.
9 And the head of Ephraim is Samaria.
And the head of Samaria is Remaliah's son.
[7f]If ye will not believe, surely, ye shall not be established.

[1] Heb. resteth on Ephraim.
[3] Or, causeway.
[5] Or, waken.
[7] Or, Do ye not believe? it is because ye are not stable.

[2] That is, The remnant shall return.
[4] Heb. let not thy heart be tender.
[6] Heb. from a people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Chap. VII. Ver. 1. עָלָה is used not only of motion towards a place that is conceived of as higher (e. g., 1 Kings xii. 27 sqq.; 2 Kings xxiv. 1, and יָרַד of the opposite, e. g. 1 Kings xxii. 2; 2 Kings viii. 29) but also of any hostile proceeding, entering on a plan (1 Sam. xvii. 23, 25; Mich. ii. 13; Neh. ii. 2, etc).—יָכֹל changed 2 Kings xvi. 5 to יָכְלוּ comes from the preceding עָלָה, and from the additional idea, perhaps, that Rezin was the chief person.

Ver. 2. נוּחַ is never used in the sense of niti, confidere. But it is used of swarms of birds, grasshoppers and flies, that settle down somewhere (ver. 19; Exod. x. 14; 2 Sam. xxi. 10). Such is its meaning here: the army of Syria has settled down like a swarm of grasshoppers on the spot where the army of Ephraim was encamped. Comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 12. On the fem. נָחָה after אֲרָם comp. 2 Sam. viii. 5; x. 10; coll. xiv. 15, 18.

Ver. 3. תְּעָלָה occurs again in Isaiah only xxxvi. 2. מְסִלָּה Isaiah used often beside here: xxxvi. 2; xi. 16; xix. 23; xxxiii. 8; xl. 3; xlix. 11; lix. 7; lxii. 10. כּוֹבֵס only here and xxxvi. 2, in Isaiah.

Ver. 4. After הִשָּׁמֵר should follow properly a negative notion, whence the word always has after it the conjunctions פֶּן or אַל or the preposition מִן (as solitary exceptions, comp. Exod. xix. 12; xxiii. 13). Therefore a negation must be supplied out of the following השקט, "take heed of (unbelieving, thus sinful) disquietude, but rather be quiet." The direct causative Hiphil הַשְׁקֵט has evidently the meaning that Ahas must control his anxiety, quiet himself. The word occurs in Isaiah again xxx. 15; xxxii. 17; lvii. 20, whereas the Niph. נִשְׁמַר occurs in Isaiah only here. יֵרַךְ Niph. of רָכַךְ; with the exception of Ps. lv. 22, it always occurs in connection with לֵבָב or לֵב in the sense of becoming weak, timorous (Deut. xx. 3; Jer. li. 46; 2 Ki. xxii. 19; Job xxxiii. 16); it does not occur again in Isa. Only once he uses the Pual i. 6. זָנָב (according to Isa. ix. 13, 14; xix. 15) "the tail, the end piece." אוּד (found beside only Am. iv. 11; Zech. iii. 2) is the charred stick of wood that may have been used to stir the fire. עָשֵׁן "smoking," only here in Isaiah, and Exodus xx. 18. בחרי אף וגו, to understand the prefix בְּ to be of time — "while glowing" (Drechsler, Delitzsch, Knobel, Gesenius) seems to me unsuitable. מִן marks the object of fear. בְּ following rather distributes the common notion "smoking firebrands" to the two so-named, as בְּ often stands after general expressions of number, (especially after כֹּל). Comp. Exod. xii. 19, "whosoever eateth leaven shall be cut off בַּגֵּר וּבְאֶזְרַח הָאָרֶץ." Gen. vii. 21; ix. 2, 10. Comp. Ewald, § 217 sq. The LXX. translates singularly ὅταν γὰρ ὀργὴ τοῦ θυμοῦ μου γένηται, πάλιν ἰάσομαι. Καὶ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Ἀράμ καὶ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Ῥομελίου, etc. Gesenius correctly conjectures that the translator instead of אפרצין reads ארפאבן, or rather ארפאובן.

Ver. 6. הֲקִיץ is Hiph. from קוּץ. The fundamental meaning is: "to experience a shaking, a shock." From this are derived the meanings a) timere, "trembling, quaking," (ver. 16, Exod. i. 12; Num. xxii. 3); b) taedere, fastidire. Disgust brings about a shock (comp. "es schüttelt mich") which, when it is powerful, occasions vomiting (קוֹא) (comp. e. g. Gen. xxvii. 46; Num. xxi.

b); c) in the Hiphil: "to wake up;" for waking up is the effect of a shock that the sleeper experiences from without or within. In this sense, however, the Hiphil is evidently a direct causative, since it properly means "to make a shaking, a shaker." Wherever else this Hiph. הֵקִיץ occurs, except our verse, it means "to awake." Our verse is therefore the only one where the word occurs as the causative of the notion קָץ — timere (verse 16). Many expositors therefore have hesitated to take the word in this sense. Thus Fuerst (Concord., p. 988) would give our הקיץ the meaning incidere, impungere, or abscindere, in that he combines it with קוֹץ "thorn," or with קַיִץ tempus abscissionis, "harvest." Gesenius, (Thes. p. 1208) proposes to read נְצִיקֶנָּה coarctemus, urgeamus, (xxix. 2, 7). However, as this Hiphil is in any case unusual, it seems better to take it in a sense that is suggested by something near at hand, ver. 16. The feminine suffix here and afterwards in נבקענה and בתוכה relates plainly to Judah as land. The meaning of the Hiph. הבקיע is not quite clear. The fundamental meaning of the word is: "to split." It is used of splitting wood (Eccl. x. 9, coll. Gen. xxii. 3) of eggshells (Isa. lix. 5) of the earth from which springs forth the fountain (Ps. lxxiv. 15) of the waters of the Red Sea (Ps. lxxviii. 13); it is said that a besieged city is split when it is taken, that is, a breach is made in its walls (2 Ki. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 2; lii. 7; Ezek. xxvi. 10). In the last-named sense it is used 2 Chr. xxxii. 1, where it is said of Sennacherib: "He encamped against the fenced cities and thought לִבְקְעָם אֵלָיו." where the constructio praegnans is important to the exposition of our passage. The word however is also used of a land. 2 Chron. xxi. 17 we read of the Philistines and Arabians: "they came up into Judah, וַיִּבְקָעוּהָ, and carried away all the substance," etc. Beside the present place, the Hiph. occurs only 2 Kings iii. 26, where it is used of an intended breaking forth on the part of an enclosed army. According to all this, the use of the word for breaking through, forcing a fortified city, seems to me to settle the meaning. A land is forced, broken through, as well as a city, when the living wall that defends it, the defensive army is broken through. Thus the sense of our passage will be: let us break through it (the land of Judah) i. e., take it by breaking through the protecting army, and thereby take it to ourselves. There lies in the expression, beside the pregnant construction, at the same time a metonomy.

It is not known who "the son of Tabeal" was. טָב is the Hebrew טוֹב (comp. טַבְרִמּוֹן 1 Kings xv. 18); the ending אַל is changed in the pause from אֵל, whereby, perhaps intentionally, arises the meaning "not good" (good for nothing). If the name was of Israelitish origin (comp. טוֹבִיָּה) then likely that Tabeal or his son was a fugitive of Judea of note. The name is found again Ezra iv. 7. On the Assyrian monuments of the time of Tiglath-Pileser is mentioned however an I-ti-bi'-i-lu, or Ti-bi'-i-lu, with the addition "mat A-ru-mu" i. e., from the land of Aram.

Ver. 8 b. The position of these words is surprising. Why do they not stand after ver. 9 a? And how is the ו at the beginning of ver. 8 to be construed? Is it that paratactic Vav, that is determined only by the connection? And what is it that so determines it? Shall we regard it as causal, which were quite grammatical? (Comp. Gen. xxiv. 56; Deut. xvii. 16; Ps. vii. 10, etc. Ewald's Gram., § 353 a; Gesen. § 155, 1 c). Or shall we, like Chrysostom and Calvin, with whom Tholuck agrees, take it in the sense of νῦν or interea? Take one or the other and it is not satisfactory. It seems to me to answer best, to assume that the words are a sample of the oracle-like, lapidary style (Lapidarstils) and thence no grammatically correct construction is to be looked for. Did the words in question stand after 9 b, whither Lowth has transposed them, then indeed the disposition of the sentence would be more correct, but the construction would be monotonous. ראשׁ occurring four times in succession would sound bad. By the interposition of ver. 8 b, this evil is avoided. Thus manifoldness is combined with equilibrium. And thus, without ignoring the difficulties, we will still recognise the possibility of the passage being genuine as it is, against which there is grammatically nothing to oppose (comp. Tholuck. Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen, and Ewald). Examples of the construction ובעוד שׁשּׁים ו׳ Gen. xl. 13, 19; Josh. i. 11; 2 Sam. xii. 22; Isa. xxi. 16; Jer. xxviii. 3, 11; Am. iv. 7. יֵחַת is imp. Kal. from חָתַת fractus est. xxx. 31; xxxi. 4; li. 6, etc.—מֵעָם—מִהְיוֹת עָם, comp. xvii. 1; xxiii. 1; lxii. 10.

Ver. 9. Niph. נֶאֱמַן is firmum, stabilem, perennem esse (xxii. 23, 25; xxxiii. 16; xlix. 7; lv. 3; lx. 4). כִּי is pleonastic, but very expressive, and is to be treated as dependent on an ideal verbum dicendi (Num. xxii. 29, 33; Ps. cxxviii. 4).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. And it came to pass———with the wind.—Vers. 1, 2. This war expedition of the united Syrians and Ephraimites is mentioned 2 Kings xv. 37; xvi. 5 sq. and 2 Chr. xxviii. 5 sq. Were one to follow the statement of 2 Kings xv. 30, then Pekah did not at all live to see Ahaz. For there it reads: "And Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy against Pekah, and smote him and slew him, and reigned in his stead in the twentieth year of Jotham the son of Uzziah." If Pekah was killed after Jotham's death under Ahaz, it must any way read "in the first year of Ahaz" But according to all other data, Pekah must undoubtedly have lived to see Ahaz. For 2 Kings xv. 1 it reads that Ahaz became king in the seventeenth year of Pekah, who, according to xv. 27, reigned twenty years. How otherwise could Pekah, according to Isa. vii. 1, wage war against Ahaz? How could Tiglath-Pileser, according to 2 Kings xv. 29, whom Ahaz summoned (2 Kings xvi. 7), in Pekah's day, still occupy the region of Ephraim and carry the people away? But the statement of 2 Kings xv. 30 b proves itself false in other ways. For, vers. 32, 33, we read that Jotham became king in the second year of Pekah, and reigned sixteen years. Accordingly Jotham must have died in the eighteenth year of Pekah. Therefore Pekah survived Jotham, and not Jotham Pekah, as ver. 30 gives the impression. Hitzig (Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. I. p. 212) makes the original form of the statement to be: "And he killed him in the twentieth year of his reign, and became king in his stead;" but the following "of Jotham the son of Uzziah," etc., are the superscription of ver. 32 sqq.

However this may be, the statement of ver. 30 b is in any case incorrect. Therefore we have here a plain example of the corruption of the text, unless we assume an inexact or erroneous use of original sources.

Pekah not only survived Jotham, but he lived during three years of Ahaz, because, according to ver. 27, Pekah reigned twenty years, and in his seventeenth year Ahaz became king. Therefore in these three years must occur the events related in Isa. vii. and viii. DRECHSLER says correctly, the spoiling of Ephraim, spoken of 2 Kings xv. 29, presupposes the conception, birth, and learning to talk of "Hasten-spoil, Quick-prey" (Isa. viii. 3 sqq.); consequently one must say that the attack of Rezin and Pekah must be located in the first half of the three years that the latter lived in common with Ahaz.

Rezin was the last king of independent Syria—for by his overthrow it became an Assyrian province. The founder of the kingdom of Syria of Damascus was Rezin (רְזוֹן), who, having run away from his lord Hadadeser, king of Syria of Zobah, gathered a horde of fighting men, and settled with them in Damascus (1 Kings xi. 23 sqq.). From that period we find the Syrian power, hitherto divided into many small kingdoms, concentrated under the king of Damascus. Rezin is followed by Hezion (חֶזְיוֹן, if he is not identical with רְזוֹן as EWALD, Gesch. d. V. Isr. III. 151, and THENIUS, on 1 Kings xv. 19, conjecture); he by his son Tabrimon, who, according to 1 Kings xv. 19, appears to have made a league with Abijam the king of Judah, which Benhadad, son and successor of Tabrimon, renewed with king Asa; an untheocratic proceeding, which, according to 2 Chr. xvi. 7, provoked the sharp censure of the prophet Hanani. We have, then, here the example of a league that a king of Judah made with the heathen king of Syria in order to war upon Baasha, king of Israel, to which in addition must be observed the grave fact that Benhadad at the very time was in league with Baasha, and consequently must have been solicited to break an existing alliance.

Thus the league between Pekah and Rezin against Ahaz appears as a retribution for the league that Asa had made with Benhadad against Baasha. That Benhadad, whom we may call Benhadad I., was succeeded by Benhadad II., of whom we read that he combined thirty-two kings under his supreme command against Israel (1 Kings xx. 1 sqq.). Benhadad II. was succeeded by Hazael, who murdered his master (1 Kings xix. 15; 2 Kings viii. 7 sqq.). Hazael was succeeded by Benhadad III., his son (2 Kings xiii. 24); finally Rezin succeeded him; his name possibly is identical with that of Rezin, the founder of the dynasty, as GESENIUS (Thesaur. p. 1307) and BAIHINGER (HERZOG'S Real-Encyclop. VII. p. 44) conjecture. The sounds ז and צ, as is well known, being nearly related (ds and ts; comp. צָעַק and זָעַק, צָהַר and זָהַר, עָלַץ and עָלַז, צָעַר and Aram. זְעַר, etc.). But if רְזוֹן and רָזוֹן (Prov. xiv. 28, where the word is parallel with מֶלֶךְ) and רֹזְנִין (Judg. v. 3; Ps. ii. 2, gravis, augustus, princeps, stand related in root and meaning, we would then see this kingdom of Damascus also begin and end with an Augustus.

Pekah, son of Remaliah, an otherwise unknown name, was שָׁלִישׁ of the king Pekahiah. LUTHER translates the word by Ritter = "knight," but it means properly "chariot warrior," because three always stood on a chariot (comp. Exod. xiv. 7: xv. 4). It signifies a follower generally (2 Kings x. 25), as well as particularly a favored follower, on whose hand the king leaned (2 Kings vii. 2, 17, 19). Pekah killed his master after a reign of two years (2 Kings xv. 23 sqq.). Like all other rulers of the kingdom of Israel, "he did that which was evil in the sight of the LORD," ver. 28. Our passage is explained by the parallel passages, 2 Kings xvi. 5 sqq. and 2 Chron. xxviii. 5 sqq.

The words of 2 Kings xvi. 5 sqq. correspond almost verbatim with Isa. vii. 1. Such difference as there is indicates that the author of 2 Kings meant, not that Jerusalem itself, but only the king, was hard pressed,—meaning, of course, the king as representative of the land. Moreover that the author of 2 Kings drew from Isaiah, and not the reverse, appears to me beyond doubt. For 2 Kings is without doubt a much more recent book than Isaiah. At most, Isaiah could only have used one of the sources used by the writer of 2 Kings. But why need the Prophet look into the archives of the kingdom for a summary notice of an event of his own times, and known to all his contemporaries? Combining then the accounts of 2 Kings and 2 Chron. we obtain the following facts: 1, the hostile incursion of Rezin and Pekah into Judah; 2, a defeat of Ahaz by Rezin (2 Chr. xxviii. 5); 3, a defeat of Ahaz by Pekah (vers. 6–15); 4, the taking of Elath by the Syrians (2 Kings xvi. 6); 5, an expedition of Rezin and Pekah against Jerusalem (Isa. vii. 1), with which also the notice Isa. vii. 2 of the fact that "Syria has settled upon Ephraim" has more or less connection.

The question arises: Is the expedition referred to in our passage identical with that related 2 Kings and 2 Chron.? or if not, did it occur before or after the latter? At the first glance, indeed, one is liable to regard Isa. vi. 1 as a brief, summary notice of all the transactions of that war. But then it is surprising that this notice—with the promises that follow it in close connection—gives the impression that the war progressed in a way wholly favorable for Judah; whereas we know from the parallel passages that Judah suffered severe defeats and prodigious loss. Therefore we cannot take our verse as such a parallel and summary account. But it is impossible also that what our passage recounts preceded the defeats of which we have account in the parallel passage. For then the statements of our passages would equally disagree with the event. They would announce only good, whereas in reality great misfortunes occurred. We must therefore assume that our passage refers to an expedition that occurred after the events of 2 Kings xvi. 5 sqq., and 2 Ch. xxviii. 5 sqq.; and we must conceive of the matter as follows: Rezin and Pekah operated at first separately, as is expressly indicated, 2 Chr. xxviii. 5. The former, likely, traversed the East of Judah's territory and proceeded at once south toward Elath. But Pekah engaged in battle with Ahaz to the north of Jerusalem, with the bad result for Ahaz, related 2 Chr. xxviii. 5 b sqq. After these preliminary successes, Rezin and Pekah united their armies and marched against Jerusalem itself. This is the expedition of which our passage informs us, and this is the meaning of נחה ver. 2. The expedition, however, did not succeed. For Ahaz had applied to the King of Assyria, and the news that the latter was in motion in response to the request of Ahaz, moved the allied kings to hasten home into their countries. Thus is explained why Isaiah vii. 1 speaks only of an intended war against the city of Jerusalem, and why the author of 2 Kings who mistook our passage for a general notice, and used it as such, resorted to the alterations we have noticed (viz., the omission of "against it," and "they besieged Ahaz, but could not overcome him" 2 Kings xvi. 5). This is essentially the view of CASPARI too (in the Universitäts-Programm über den syrisch-ephraimitischen Krieg, Christiani, 1849), with which DELITZSCH agrees (in his review of the foregoing writing in REUTER'S Repert., April, 1851, reprinted in his commentary).

In regard to ver. 1 b, a double matter is to be noticed: 1. that it does not say "he could not take it, or make a conquest of it" or the like; but he could not make war upon it. That must plainly mean that Rezin and Pekah could not find even time to begin the siege. 2. The clause "he could not," etc., must be construed as anticipation of the result, which the Prophet, after the well-known Hebrew manner of writing history, joins on to the account of the beginning. What follows then ver. 2, and after, is thus, as to time, to be thought of as coming between ver. 1 a and b.

To the house of David.—Ver. 2. This expression (found again in Isaiah only, ver. 13 and xxii. 22) can, indeed, mean the race of David, (comp. 1 Sam. xx. 16; 1 Kings xii. 16, 20, 26, etc.); and ver. 13 the plural שִׁמְעוּ, "hear ye," seems really to commend this meaning. But the singular suffix in לְבָבוֹ and עַמּוֹ "his heart," "his people," proves that the meaning is not just the same. Therefore it seems to me that "house of David" here means the palace, the royal residence. There was the seat of government, the king's cabinet; thither was the intelligence brought. It is as when one says: it was told the cabinet of St. James, or the Sublime Porte. Of course the expression involves reference to the living possessor of the government building, and the governing power, the king. Hence the language proceeds with pronouns (suffixes) in the singular.

2. Then said the Lord——the son of Remaliah.—Vers. 3 and 4. The Prophet receives command to go and meet the king, who had gone out, and thus whose return was to be looked for. But he must not go alone, but in company with his son, Shear-jashub. The son is no where else mentioned. The name signifies the chief contents of all prophecy, according to its two aspects. In the notion שְׁאָר Shear, is indicated the entire fulness of the divine judgments, that the Prophets had to announce: whereas יָשׁוּב Jashub opens up the glorious prospect of the final deliverance. [The name means a remnant may return. —TR.] Comp. i. 8, 9; iv. 3; vi. 13; x. 20 sqq. (especially ver. 21 where the words שְׁאָר יָשׁוּב expressly recur). We have shown in commenting on Jer. iii. sqq.; xxxi. 16–22 what an important part the notion שׁוּב "to return," plays in Jeremiah's prophecy. The significance of Shear-jashub's name, however, makes us notice, too, that the Prophet himself bears a significant name. יְשַׁעְיָהוּ means "salvation of Jehovah." And that the proclamation of salvation, comfort is the chief contents of His prophecies Israel has long known, and acknowledged. An old rabbinical saying, quoted by ABARB. reads ספר ישעיהו כלו נחמתא comp. Introduction. Threatening and consolation therefore go to meet Ahaz embodied in the persons of Isaiah and his son, yet so that consolation predominates, as also the words that Isaiah has to speak are for the most part consolatory. Had Israel only been susceptible of this consolation!

The locality where Isaiah was to meet the king is mentioned xxxvi. 2, and in the same words. There, Rabshakeh, the envoy of Sennacherib, according to that passage, held his interview with the men that Hezekiah sent out to him. It must, therefore, have been an open, roomy spot, suited for conferences. According to the researches of ROBINSON, against which the results of KRAFFT, WILLIAMS and HITZIG prove not to be tenable, (comp. ARNOLD in HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XVIII. p. 632 sq.), the upper-pool is identical with the Birket-el Mamilla, which in the west of Jerusalem lies in the basin that forms the beginning of the Vale of Hinnom, about 2100 feet from the Jaffa Gate. Moreover this pool is identical with "the old pool" mentioned xxii. 11. Hezekiah, when he saw that Sennacherib was coming (2 Chr. xxxii. 2 sqq.), stopped up the fountains outside of the city, and conducted the water of the fountain of Gihon and that of the upper-pool in a new conduit between the two walls (xxii. 11 coll. 2 Kings xx. 20; 2 Chr. xxxii. 30), in contrast with which it was that the upper-pool was called the older. The fuller's field, the place where the fullers washed, fulled and dried their stuffs, must have been in the neighborhood of a pool. Now JOSEPHUS (Bell. Jud. V. 4, 2) speaks of a μνῆμα γναφέως, "fuller's monument," that must have had its position north of the city. For this reason many (WILLIAMS, KRAFFT, HITZIG) look for the fuller's field in the neighborhood of the fuller's monument. But fuller's field and fuller's monument need not necessarily be near one another. For the latter does not necessarily concern the place of the fullers as such, but may have been erected on that spot to a fuller or by a fuller for any particular reason unknown to us. And anyway the existence of a pool in ancient times north of Jerusalem cannot be proved. Therefore the fuller's field lay probably in the neighborhood of the upper-pool west of the city.

Ahaz had probably a similar end in view at the upper pool to Hezehiah's, according to 2 Chr. xxxii. 2 sqq. It was to deprive the enemy of all fountains, brooks and pools, and yet preserve them for the use of the city. The end was obtained by covering them over above and conducting them into the city. Perhaps in this respect Ahaz did preparatory work for Hezekiah (comp. ARNOLD, l. c.). The Prophet warned the king against sinning through unbelieving despondency. The expression "fear not, neither be faint-hearted," is here and Jer. li. 46, borrowed from Deut. xx. 3, where it is said to the people how they must conduct themselves when they stand opposed in fight to superior forces of the enemy. The expression occurs only in the three places named. Why Ahaz should not fear is expressed in this, that the enemy that threatened him are compared to quenched firebrands and stumps of torches. Two firebrands are mentioned in the first clause, and yet the idea is distributed over three bearers, Rezin, Syria and the son of Remaliah. We see that the Prophet takes prince and people as one; and here he names the two halves of the whole, as instantly afterwards ver. 5, Ephraim and the son of Remaliah, but the second time he does not mention Rezin at all, but only opposes Syria to Ephraim and its king. There appears to me to lie in this an expression of contempt for Rezin, who first is named in connection with his nation and the second time, not at all, so that he plainly appears as a secondary person. On the other hand contempt was expressed for Pekah by calling him only the son of Remaliah. But what is the son of Remaliah, a man utterly unknown, opposed to the son of David!

3. Because Syria——shall not be established.—Vers. 5–9. The conclusion of the premise "because Syria, etc., have taken evil counsel," etc., begins ver. 7, "thus saith the LORD." The evil counsel is set forth ver. 6. "It shall not come to pass," says literally, what is expressed figuratively by לא תקום = it shall not stand. For there underlies the latter expression the figure of a prostrate body that attains to standing, therefore gets to its feet and to life. Comp. xiv. 24; xxviii. 18; xlvi. 10; Prov. xix. 21. Had this promise been given at the first beginning of the Syro-Ephraimite war, it would have found no complete, corresponding fulfilment. For, as shown above, the counsel did not remain quite unaccomplished. Precisely the הַבְקַע (ver. 6), "the forcing a breach," succeeded, according to 2 Chr. xxviii. 5. Hence we must, in accordance too with נָחָה ver. 2, assume, that Isaiah addressed this prophecy to Ahaz after the beginning of the second act of that war.

For the head of Syria, etc.—Ver. 8. These words are very difficult. Especially has the second clause of ver. 8, given great offense both by its contents and by its position. Many expositors therefore attempt, either to alter the text, or to reject the words ובעוד to כעם as a gloss. These, in some instances very ingenious, attempts may be found recapitulated in GESENIUS. The Prophet had said, ver. 6, that Syria and Ephraim had the purpose of making the son of Tabeal king in Judah. That shall not come to pass, says ver. 7. This assertion is established by the double statement vers. 8 and 9. The latter consist of two members each, of which the first corresponds to the third, and the second to the fourth. The first and third member are constructed in pyramidal form: Syria, Damascus, Rezin,—Ephraim, Samaria, Pekah. But the third member is quite conformed to the first in reference to what is affirmed of the subjects. Thus it says: the head of Syria is Damascus, and the head of Damascus is Rezin. And likewise; the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria is Pekah. Saying that Damascus had dominion over Syria and Rezin over Damascus, accurately designates the limits of the power of Rezin and Damascus. They may command within these limits and no more. Therefore they have not the power to set a king over Judah according to their pleasure. Moreover, if Damascus is head of Syria and Rezin the head of Damascus, the question arises, too: what sort of a head is it? Is it a strong, mighty head to which no other is equal, that is therefore safe in its sphere of power, and unassailable in it? This question must be negatived. For how can it be said of Damascus, the great, beautiful, and rich city, but still the profane and heathen city, that she enjoys the privilege of being unassailable; that she is able under all circumstances to protect and maintain her dominion? And what of Rezin? Is he an elect? Can his name give a guaranty of the permanence of the region he rules? Not at all. Quite otherwise is it in Judah, where Jerusalem, the city of God, stands opposed to the city of Damascus, and the theocratic king of David's line to the profane, heathen ruler. Behind Jerusalem and the house of David, stands the Lord as the true head in chief of Israel. What is then the head of Syria, and Damascus compared with the head of Judah and Jerusalem? Thus is explained why Judah has nothing to fear from Rezin and Syria. But of Ephraim ver. 9, the same thing is affirmed. Plainly the Prophet would intimate that Pekah and Samaria, too, have only a sphere of power limited to Ephraim, and that Samaria is not to be brought into comparison with Jerusalem, nor the son of Remaliah with the son of David, that consequently, Ephraim is essentially the same as the heathen nation Syria, and just as little to be dreaded by Judah. Thus the meaning of ver. 8 a, and 9 a, as also their relation to one another is perfectly clear. But what of the two other members ver. 8 b, 9 b? If we had only to do with 9 b, it would be an easy affair; for it contains a very appropriate conclusion to 8 a, 9 a. It is, if I may so speak, double-edged. Judah is not to appropriate unconditionally the comfort of the promise given to it. Only if it believes and obeys its Lord, need it have nothing to fear from Syria and Ephraim. But if it does not believe in the Lord, it shall itself fall to pieces as the others. It cannot be said that anything essential would be wanting if ver. 8 b were not there. Neither can it be said, that in that case an essential member would be abstracted from the outward structure. For 8 a and 9 a correspond; but 9 b is the one conclusion that corresponds to both these members in common. Only if 9 b, were wanting, would there be an essential member missing. For then it would appear strange that 9 a, should have no conclusion like 8 a, and an appropriate termination to the whole address would be wanting. But even if 8 b appear unnecessary in the context, that is not saying that it is generally out of place. Many have affirmed this, because it contradicts ver. 16, because it does not suit the cheering character of the address, and because the Prophets anyway never have such exact figures. As regards the relation to ver. 16, it was long ago pointed out that to the desertion of the land, that was the consequence of the Syro-Ephraimite war (2 Kings xv. 29), in fact to the deportation by Salmanassar, not sixty-five years, but a much less number of years elapsed. Hence, after the example of PISCATOR, JACOB CAPPELLUS and others, USHER (Ann. V. T., at the year 3,327) proposed to take as the concluding point of the sixty-five years, the planting of Assyrian subjects in the deserted region of Ephraim (2 Kings xvii. 24) which, according to Ezr. iv. 2, took place under Esar-haddon. This fact, which indeed may be regarded as the sealing of the doom of Ephraim in regard to its existence as a state, must coincide with the time of Manasseh, and can with the carrying away this king, which according to the assumption of the Jewish chronology in Seder Olam. p. 67, took place in the twenty-second year of his reign. This would of course bring out the sixty-five years.

14 years of Ahaz.
29 " " Hezekiah.
22 " " Manasseh.
65 years.

This reckoning, indeed, rests on no sure data, but it is still possible, and we can meanwhile quiet ourselves and say: if the Prophet meant the sixty-five years so, there exists no contradiction of ver. 16, and תעזב, shall be forsaken, is not to be taken in an absolute sense. And the comfort that Ahaz was to find in the ruin of Ephraim that was to happen only after sixty-five years, was this, that he could say: a city devoted to remediless ruin, even though not in a very short time, is not to be feared. But as for the exact data of figures, THOLUCK (D. Proph. u. ihre Weiss., 1861, p. 116 sqq.), has proved the existence of such in the Old Testament (xvi. 14; xx. 3; xxi. 16; xxxviii. 5; comp. Ezk. iv. 5 sqq.; etc.). Whatever may be thought of the reason of the matter, the fact itself cannot be denied; and I do not comprehend how DIESTEL (in KNOBEL'S Komm. 4 Aufl. p. 66) can contend against this reality, on which everything here depends.

In order that Judah may partake of the blessing of this promise, it must itself fulfil a condition; the condition especially on which depends the blessed fulfilment of all promises: it must believe. If it believes not, which, alas, was the actual case, then it will not continue to exist itself.

[J. A. ALEXANDER on ver. 4. The comparison of Rezin and Pekah to the tails or ends of firebrands, instead of firebrands themselves, is not a mere expression of contempt, nor a mere intimation of their approaching fate, as BARNES and HENDERSON explain it, but a distinct allusion to the evil which they had already done, and which should never be repeated. If the emphasis were only on the use of the word tails, the tail of anything else would have been qually appropriate. The smoking remnant of a firebrand implies a previous flame, if not a conflagration. This confirms the conclusion before drawn, that Judah had already been ravaged.

Pekah being termed simply the son of Remaliah, is supposed by some to be intended to express contempt for him, though the difference may after all, be accidental, or have only a rhythmical design. The patronymic, like our English surname, can be used contemptuously only when it indicates ignoble origin, in which sense it may be applied to Pekah, who was a usurper

On ver. 5. The suppression of Pekah's proper name in this clause, and of Rezin's altogether in the first, has given rise to various far-fetched explanations, though it seems in fact, to show that the use of names in the whole passage is rather euphonic or rhythmical than significant.

On ver. 9. Another rendering equally natural to that of Luther (viz.: if ye believe not, then ye abide not) is; "if ye do not believe (it is) because ye are not to be established."]

b) Isaiah in the bosom of the royal family giving a sign by announcing the Virgin's Son Immanuel.

CHAP. VII. 10–25.

10 [1]MOREOVER the LORD spake again unto Ahaz, saying,
11 Ask thee a sign of the LORD thy God;
[2]Ask it either in the depth, or in the height above.
12, 13 But Ahaz said, I will not ask, neither will I tempt the LORD; And he said,
Hear ye now, O house of David;
Is it a small thing for you to weary men,
But will ye weary my God also?

14 Therefore the LORD himself shall give you a sign;
Behold, a virgin [a]shall conceive, and bear a son,
And [2]shall call his name Immanuel.
15 Butter and honey shall he eat,
[b]That he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good.
16 For before the child shall know
To refuse the evil, and choose the good,
The land that thou abhorrest
Shall be forsaken of both her kings.[c]
17 The LORD shall bring upon thee,
And upon thy people, and upon thy father's house,
Days that have not come,
From the day that Ephraim departed from Judah;
Even the king of Assyria.
18 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the LORD shall hiss
For the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt,
And for the bee that is in the land of Assyria.
19 And they shall come, and shall rest all of them
In the [d]desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks,
And upon all thorns, and upon all [4e]bushes.
20 In the same day shall the LORD shave [f]with a razor that is hired,
Namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria,
The head, and the hair of the feet:
And it shall also consume the beard.
21 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That a man shall [g]nourish a young cow, and two sheep;
22 And it shall come to pass,
For the abundance of milk that [h]they shall give he shall eat butter:
For butter and honey shall every one eat
That is left [5]in the land.
23 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That every place [i]shall be,
Where then were a thousand vines at a thousand silverlings,
It shall even be for briers and thorns.
24 With arrows and with bows shall men come thither;
Because all the land shall become briars and thorns.
25 And on all hills that shall be digged with the mattock,
Then shall not come thither [j]the fear of briers and thorns:
But it shall be for the sending forth of oxen,
And for the treading of lesser cattle.

[1] Heb. and the LORD added to speak. [2] Or, make thy petition deep. [3] Or, thou, O Virgin, shall call. [4] Or, commendable trees. [5] Heb. in the midst of the land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 10. וַיּוֹסֶף י׳ occurs again in Isaiah only viii. 5.

On ver. 11. The words הַעְמֵק וגו׳ admit of several explanations. But that must be excluded at once which reading שְׁאָלָה (with the tone on the ultima) takes the word as substantive. For "request" is שְׁאֵלָה, and there is no reason for assuming that the Masorets punctuated falsely. The explanation is very old that takes שְׁאָ֫לָה as a pausal form for שְׁאֹלָה (Gen. xxxvii. 35; xlii. 38; xliv. 29, 31; Num. xvi. 30, 33; Ezek. xxxi. 15 sqq.). The LXX. VULG., PESCH., ARAB. have it, and it commends itself in point of sense very much. For when it says: "Descending deep into hell, or mounting up to the height," both members correspond admirably both in respect to sense and to sound. But this construction is dubious. For the examples cited by EWALD § 93, a, 3, rest all of them on this, that an existing or possible form with a may be chosen in pause for the form with o in accordance with the law of variation. For there is no such thing as an o changed into a in pause.

We must therefore take שְׁאָלָה as imperative (comp. רְגָזָה xxxii. 11; שְׁמָעָה, סְלָחָה Dan. ix. 19; סְעָדָה 1 Kings xiii. 7. Then הַעְמֵק (xxix. 15; xxx. 33; xxxi. 6) הַגְבֵּהַ (Ps. cxiii. 5) are inf.abs. with a gerund sense: "going deep ask or mounting up high."

On ver. 12. ולא־אנסה a paratactic construction.

On ver. 13. The construction המעט מכם means originally "is it from you out (from your point of view) a little?" The כִּי has a causal sense: because ye insult my God. One sees that to insult men is a small matter, an unsatisfying indulgence to your haughtiness. Comp. Num. xvi. 9; Job xv. 11; Ezek. xxxiv. 18.

On ver. 14. Regarding עַלְמָה it may be considered settled that directly and properly it can never signify a married woman. It may, perchance, be used of a young married woman, whose youth or youthful looks one would especially emphasize, like Ruth (ii. 5, 6) as a young wife is called נַעֲרָה. But in point of fact no such form of expression occurs in the Old Testament. On the other hand a virgin, as such, (as virgo illibata) is never called עַלְמָה. For the proper term for virgin is בְּתוּלָה (Gen. xxiv. 16; Lev. xxi. 3, 13, 14; Deut. xxii. 14, 19, 20; Jud. xix. 24; 2 Sam. xiii. 2, 18) and virginity is בְּתוּלִים (Deut. xxii. 15, 17; Judg. xi. 37 sq.; Ezek. xxiii. 3, 8). עַלְמָה is fem. of עֶלֶם (1 Sam. xvii. 56; xx. 22) and has nothing to do with עָלַם "to conceal." עֶלֶם, however, is from a root עָלַם, kindred to עוּל (trans. sugere, potare, intr. redundare, succulentum, vegetum esse). The latter עָלַם occurs in Hebrew only in the words עֶלֶם, עַלְמָה, עֲלוּמִים (ætas juvenilis of women Isa. liv. 4, of men Ps. lxxxix. 46; Job xx. 11; xxxiii. 25) more common in the dialects, where it has the meaning of "becoming fat, thick, strong, mature, manly." עלמה occurs (not to count the musical term עֲלָמוֹת Ps. xlvi. 1; 1 Chron. xv. 20) six times: Gen. xxiv. 43; Exod. ii. 8; Prov. xxx. 19; Ps. lxviii. 26; Song of Sol. i. 3; vi. 8. In none of these passages can it be proved to have the sense of virgo illibata or conjux. Especially from Song of Sol. it appears that the third class of the occupants of Solomon's harem comprised the עֲלָמוֹת. Was virginity characteristic of them? Prov. xxx. 19 is difficult. According to all the foregoing it seems to me certain that every בְּתוּלָה is indeed a עַלְמָה, but not every עַלְמָה a בְּתוּלָה. As עֲלוּמִים is the time of youth generally, and may be used of men as well as of women, (בתולים could not be said of men) then עלמה is the young woman, still fresh, young and unmarried, without regard to whether still a virgin in the exact sense.——הנה הע׳ הרה, that these words may be read: "behold, the virgin is pregnant," is owned by every one. The expression occurs twice beside. Gen. xvi. 11 the angel says to Hagar, who was already pregnant: הִנָּךְ הָרָה וְיֹלַדְתְּ בֵּן וְקָרָאת שְׁמוֹ יִשְׁמָעֵאל. This passage has, moreover, so much resemblance to ours that we must suppose that it was in the Prophet's mind. Judg. xiii. 5, 7, it is at least very probable, considering ver. 12, that the wife of Manoah was already pregnant. The form קָרָאת in the original passage, Gen. xvi. 16, is 2 pers. fem. In our passage it may also be 3 pers. fem. For this form is still to be found Gen. xxxiii. 11; Exod. v. 16 (?); Lev xxv. 21; xxvi. 34; Deut. xxxi. 29; Jer. xiii. 19; xliv. 23; 2 Kings ix. 37 (K'thib); Ps. cxviii. 23. It is seen that the form occurs most frequently in the Pentateuch, while Jer. xliv. 23 is a verbatim quotation from Deut. xxxi. 29; and 2 Kings ix. 37, there exists likely an error of the pen, thus leaving only two instances not in the Pentateuch beside our verse. The form occurs nowhere else in Isaiah.

On ver. 15. That לדעתו is not: "until his knowing," appears from this, that the Prophet would in that case say that from his birth on to the years of discretion the boy would be nourished with butter and honey, and then no longer. Thereby, too, the prospect of a brief period of desolation for the land would be held out, which plainly is not the meaning of the Prophet. For Isaiah had in mind the periods of exile, both the Assyrian and the Babylonian, and neither comprises in itself and in the Prophet's representation so short a period. That the latter is so is seen in the way he expresses himself (ver. 17 sq.) on the occasion and extent of the desolation. Therefore לדעתו means: "toward the time of his knowing; or about the time." Comp. לְעֵת עֶרֶב, לְעֶרֶב, לָאוֹר, לַבֹּקֶר, Ps. xxx. 6; Job xxiv. 14; Gen. iii. 8; viii. 14; xlix. 27, etc.——חמאה is "thick milk," lac spissum, (comp. Gen. xviii. 8; Judg. v. 25; Prov. xxx. 33).

On ver. 16. That the Prophet says האדמה and not הארץ, has for its reason doubtless that he would designate Syria and the territory of the Ten Tribes by one word. But the two together did not constitute an ארץ, but a land complex in a physical sense.—On קָץ comp. at ver. 6.

On ver. 17. The form of expression אשר לא באו is like Exod. x. 6; xxxiv. 10; Dan. ix. 12. The construction למיום וגו is like Jer. vii. 7, 25; xxv. 11. All that follows depends as one notion on the distributive לְ. Without לְ Exod. x. 6.

On ver. 18. והיה ביום ההוא, this formula occurs vers. 21, 23; x. 20, 27; xi. 10, 11; xvii. 4; xxii. 20; xxiii. 15; xxiv. 21; xxvii. 13, and not again. In this formula יום does not designate only a day in the ordinary sense, but, according to circumstances, an undetermined period, like we use the word "period."——זבוב only here in Isaiah.——יְאֹר is an Egyptian word (comp. on xix. 6) which, however, has become naturalised in Hebrew. It is partly appellative, and as such means "ditches" (Exod. viii. 1; Isa. xxxiii. 21) and rivers (Nah. iii. 8; Dan. xii. 5); partly a proper name, and as such means the Nile (xix. 7, 8; xxiii. 10). The יארי מצרים (comp. xix. 6; xxxvii. 25; 2 Kings xix. 24) are the canals of the Nile (Exod. viii. 1).

On ver. 19. בַּתּוֹת is ἅπ. λεγ. If it is kindred to בָּתָה (v. 6) which is most probable, it means abscissum praeruptum, the steep side of a wady.——נְקִיק (found beside only Jer. xiii. 4; xvi. 16) is, as appears plain from Jer. xiii. 4, "the cleft."——נַעֲצוּץ (again only lv. 13) is "the thornbush; נַהֲלֹל (from נָהַל Exod. xv. 13; Isa. xl. 11; xlix. 10; li. 18, "to lead to pasture") pascuum, the pasture, grazing ground.

On ver. 20. גִּלַּח and תער only here in Isaiah. שְׂכִירָה subs. abstractum (conductio), but may be also fem. of שָׂכִיר (conductus, "hired") occurs nowhere else. This razor is to be had בעברי נהר. נהר without article, like Mich. vii. 12, and Jer. ii. 18 (which passage, moreover, looks back to ours), is the Euphrates. The עִבְרֵי נָהָר are the two sides of the Euphrates; for עֵבֶר alone may mean the territory on the hither side as well as the further side (comp. Josh. xxiv. 2, 3, 14, 15; 2 Sam. x. 16; 1 Chr. xix. 16, with 2 Kings v. 4; Ezra viii. 36; Neh. ii. 7, 9; iii. 7), and עֲבָרִים are the sides generally: Exod. xxxii. 15; 1 Kings v. 4; Jer. xlviii. 28; xlix. 32.——שְׂעַר רַגְלַיִם is euphemistic, like Deut. xxviii. 57; Isa. xxxvi. 12 K'ri. Comp. Jud. iii. 24; 1 Sam. xxiv. 4. תִּסְפֶּה proves that the Prophet uses תַּעַר as fem., which usually is masc. Thereby the adjective construction of שְׂכִירָה is confirmed as the correct one. Regarding the usus loquendi, comp. xiii. 15; xxix. 1; xxx. 1.

On ver. 21. שְׁתֵּי צֹאן, because female sheep, yielding milk are meant. He does not kill them, but lets them live, raises them. חִיָּה is "to make live." This does not occur only when something dead, or non-existent, is called into life: but also when something living, but on the point of dying, is let live; therefore "preserves alive." Comp. xxxviii. 1; Gen. vii. 3; 2 Sam. xii. 3; 1 Kings xviii. 5, etc.

On ver. 23. On שָׁמִיר וָשַׁיִת see on v. 6.

On ver. 25. Both the verb נֶעְדַּר and the substantive מַעְדֵּר occur only in Isaiah, viz., here and v. 6.——מִשְׁלַח is a place where cattle are allowed to roam free (comp. xxxii. 20). The expression belongs to Deuteronomy, where only, except here, it is found; Deut. xii. 7; xv. 10; xiii. 21; xxviii. 8, 20.—מִרְמָס see on v. 5.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Moreover the Lord——tempt the Lord, vers. 10–12. When Isaiah says: "Moreover the LORD spake," he puts himself quite in the background. He gives prominence only to the proper author of the address, as ver. 3, he reports only the words of Jehovah to himself, and passes over the performance that was his, a man's work, as a matter of course. Though Ahaz was a backslider, the divine love on its part does not let him go. The LORD says still to him: I am thy God. De jure He is so, though de facto so no longer. Because Jehovah still loves Ahaz, He seeks to reclaim him, coming to him half way, and holding out His hand in order to make return as easy for him as possible. That is, the LORD demands no unconditional faith from Ahaz, but He permits him to attach his faith to any condition that he will. If Jehovah fulfils the condition, then that is security, or the sign, that Jehovah deserves to be believed, that He is therefore the God He gives Himself out to be.

There is no other instance of submitting to a man's choice what the sign shall be. It may be fearlessly said that for Isaiah to propose to Ahaz the choice of a miraculous sign is itself a sign. It is a pledge that he serves the true, living, and almighty God; that therefore there is such a God, who not only can do miracles, but who, under circumstances, will do them. Had Isaiah offered Ahaz this choice without possessing the power to perform what he promised, he would have been either a deceiver or a crazed enthusiast. In the name of science, rationalistic expositors may be challenged to prove that Isaiah was a deceiver or an enthusiast. In any case the Prophet leaves it to Ahaz, from what part of the universe he will have a miracle.

The reply of Ahaz is hypocritical. He acts as if he still believed in Jehovah, and as if he declined the proposal only through fear, lest he should have the appearance of tempting God (Deut. v. 16). But he had already his own plans. He had already resolved to oppose to the gods and kings of Syria and Ephraim, not Jehovah, the God of Judah, but the gods and the king of Assyria.

[Ver. 11. "Ask it in the depth," etc. There may be an historical relation between this expression and Deut. xxx. 11-14, and Jno. iv. 11-13, and Rom. x. 6-8, and comp. Ps. cxxxix. 6-10, that makes them useful for mutual interpretation. Τὴν ἄβυσσον, Rom. x. 7, seems to show that Paul combines the language of Deuteronomy and Isaiah, and also to favor the LXX. and VULG. in reading our passage as if שְׁאֹלָה were meant.—TR.].

2. And he said——Immanuel, vers. 13, 14. It seems to me that this form of address, joined to the "moreover the LORD spake," ver. 10, intimates that the Prophet spoke these words, not on the spot mentioned ver. 3, but in the house of David, i. e., in the royal palace, and before the royal family, and that the contents of his address concerned very nearly the house of David as a family, (not merely as representative of the government). הַלְאוֹת, "to weary," corresponds exactly to the French ennuyer, which means primarily the discomfort one experiences from anything that lasts too long, and then any sort of discomfort. Without doubt Ahaz had often enough made trial of human patience. But "to weary men" seems to point to the fact that in Ahaz's refusal lay an insult to the Prophet. For this refusal might be regarded as indirectly repelling an insane presumption on the part of Isaiah. Still, doubtless, the insult to his God is the chief matter to the Prophet. Notice that by "my God" here, he in a measure retracts the "thy God" of ver. 10. By this one word he lets Ahaz know that by his unbelief he has excluded himself from a part in the LORD. Full of this displeasure, the Prophet declares to the house of David: Because ye will have no sign, one shall be given to you. The sign must therefore be one that Ahaz could observe, and every meaning that ignores this, must from the outstart be regarded as mistaken. It is further clear that the sign which Ahaz must accept against his will must be of a character unpleasant to him. The whole connection shows this clearly. The unbelief, the desertion, the hypocrisy of Ahaz must be punished. Had he accepted the offer of the LORD, he might at will have chosen a sign from any sphere. But because he insolently declined the offer, he must put up with a sign that will appear in a very delicate quarter, and consist in a fact very unpleasant for him. Consider in addition that the Prophet, as we learned above, spoke these words in the royal palace, and before the royal family, and we obtain an important threefold canon for the exposition of the passage: the sign must have been for Ahaz, 1) recognized; 2) unpleasant, punishing; 3) of concern to his whole family.

Behold the virgin, etc.—"Behold" has great emphasis. "It stands here as if the Prophet raised his hand, signed to all the world that they should be still and give heed to this the chiefest miracle of which he would now preach." (Foerster).—On העלמה see Text. and Gr. Who is "the virgin" here? To whom does the definite article point? We must at the outset exclude all those exposisions according to which the Alma = "virgin" is a purely ideal person, whether belonging to the present or the future. What sort of a sign for Ahaz could it be, if the Prophet in spirit saw in the remote future a virgin that bore the Messiah; even if, by means of an ideal anticipation, the wonderful child, which formed, as it were, the soul of the people's life, is construed as representative of the contemporaries of Ahaz (Hengstenberg)? It is no better when, by a figurative construction the Alma is made to mean Israel, out of which a people of salvation shall arise, which, after it has endured the consequences of the present ignorance, shall know to prefer the good to the bad (v. Hofmann). It is the same with the explanation of W. Schultz Prof. in Breslau, Stud. and Krit., 1861, Heft. IV.) who by comprehending under the Alma or virgin the Messiah and His mother, and all their typical forerunners, understands by this person "the quiet ones of the land, who needed not the king nor his co-operation." The canon we have set up as imperative, is equally violated by Kueper (Die Proph. d. A. B. übersichtle dargestellt, Leipzig, 1870, p. 216): he admits that Alma does not necessarily mean a pure virgin, yet he lays especial emphasis on the virginity of the mother, because it may be inferred from the name Immanuel, which proves the piety of the mother; and he sees precisely in this virginity the threat against Ahaz, because it follows that Immanuel is to be born without co-operation of a man of the race of David. For it is impossible that Ahaz could infer this virginity thus from the words of the Prophet. Beside, there is nothing threatening in the promise that the Messiah shall be born as the Son of God in the sense of Luke i. 35, without co-operation of a man, of the race of David; it is rather the highest honor. The latest attempt at exposition, too, by Ed. Engelhardt (Zeitschr. f. Luth. Theol. and K. 1872 Heft. IV.), does not satisfy. "The house of David cannot be destroyed before the promised deliver comes forth from it. The mother is therefore, yet to appear that bears Him, and this mother, determined by the word of the Prophecy, it is that the Prophet means here "(l. c. page 627)." How is it to be proved that העלמה was a standing expression for the mother of the Messiah? What, moreover, was there punitive in this? What in the text says that the house of David would be destroyed after the birth of the Messiah's mother? Moreover, how is this conceivable? To express what Engelhardt fancies is the meaning of the Prophet, the words must read: the Alma has not yet borne. What sort of a sign, would that be?

Others adopt an ideal construction in the sense that they regard the birth of a son from the Alma, at the time indicated, as an idea, a possibility, without reference to its realization ("were a virgin to conceive this instant a boy as an emblem of his native land, the mother would name her babe like the land at that time must say: God was with us," Eichhorn, comp. J. D. Michaelis, Paulus, Staehelin, etc.). The arbitrariness of this exposition is manifest; the Prophet does not speak hypothetically, but quite categorically. This sign, too, would be neither observable, nor threatening.

Others find the key to the exposition (Rosenmueller, Ewald, Bertheau), in the supposition that Isaiah saw the Messiah Himself in the child to be born, and that consequently we have before us, an erroneous hope and an unfulfilled Prophecy. But it is incredible that the Prophet, accompanied as he was by his son Shearjashub, could have expected in so short a period the fulfilment of the Prophecy contained in his name. The people must first become a remnant. Comp. the Prophet's inquiry vi. 10 and the reply ver. 11. If the Alma does call her son Immanuel, he is not necessarily therefore really Immanuel. It may mean only that he signifies the Immanuel. And so, too, viii. 8, the land of Immanuel is not the land of the present, but of the future Immanuel, who only is the true Lord and Master of the land. In viii. 10 where עִמָּנוּ אֵל is written separately as two words, can at most only a play on the name Immanuel be recognized. Moreover if Isaiah saw in the boy Immanuel the Messiah himself, then must certainly his mother be the legitimate wife of a member of the family of David. But it is incredible that עַלְמָה alone without any qualification, can mean married women.

The ancient Jewish explanation, according to which the Alma was the mother of Hezekiah, that Abi, daughter of Zachariah (2 Kings xviii. 2), was shown by Jerome even to be impossible, inasmuch as Hezekiah at the time Isaiah spoke these words was already 12 years old. The later Jewish explanation ranks among its supporters Faustus Socinus, Joh. Crellius, (Socinian), Grotius, (who in his De ver. religionis Christ. still presented the orthodox view, but afterwards went over to Crellius' views), Joh. Ludwig Von Wolzogen (Socinian), John Ernst. Faber (in the Anm. zu Harmar's Beobachtungen über den Orient, etc., I. S. 281), [Put Dr. Barnes here: only that he includes a reference to Messiah, according to Matth. i. 22.—Tr.] Gesenius, Hitzig, Heudewerk, Knobel, etc. According to this view the Alma is the wife of the Prophet himself, either the mother of Shear-jashub, or a younger one, at that time only betrothed to him. But this is wrecked on the impossibility of referring העלמה to the wife or the betrothed of the Prophet without any nearer designation and without the faintest hint of her being present. Beside, how should the family of the Prophet happen to have the Immanuel born in it? Were the promises to David to be transferred to Isaiah? Kimchi and Abarbanel modify this view by saying that by the Alma must be understood the wife of Ahaz. But then, instead of something bad, the Prophet would rather have announced something joyful. Others again understand by the Alma any virgin, not more particularly specified, that was present at the place of interview, and to whom the Prophet pointed with the finger.

For my part I believe, that in expounding our passage, it is an exegete's duty to leave out of view at first Matt. i. 23. We have only to ask: What, according to the words and context, did Isaiah in that moment wish to say, and actually say? How far his word spoken then was a prophecy, and with what justice Matt. i. 18 regards the fact recounted there as the fulfilment of this prophecy will appear from inquiry that must be made afterwards. Bearing in mind then the canon proposed above, and we obtain the meaning: Behold the (i. e. this) virgin (i. e. this yet unmarried daughter of the royal house) is pregnant, etc. After the indignant words of the Prophet, ver. 14*a*, that roll up like dark clouds, we must look for a sign that strikes the house of David like thunder and lightning. Doubtless Ahaz was not the only guilty person. While Joshua (xxiv. 15) had said: "I and my house will serve the Lord," Ahaz had said the contrary. If not, why did the Prophet, instead of addressing himself to the king with such emphasis, address the whole house? And did what was said iii. 16 sq. about the luxury of the daughters of Zion have no application to the women in the household of Ahaz? Therefore the whole house must with terror endure the shame of one of the princesses who was present being pointed out as pregnant. That is the bold manner of the prophets of Jehovah—a manner that is no respecter of persons—the "sackcloth roughness" of men that know that they have Almighty God for their support. Thus, for example, Jeremiah said to king Jehoiakim that he should be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem, Jer. xxii. 19.

As regards the sense, it remains essentially the same whether קרתא is translated "thou wilt call" or "she will call." For in any case the word is spoken in presence of the Alma. She herself takes note of what the Prophet announces in regard to the name to be given. Whether she is spoken to or spoken of, remains immaterial. If God, with no expression of disapproval, says "she will call him Immanuel," is not that as much as to say: "she shall so call him?" She would hardly have thought of that name herself. It was not a usual name. It is found only here in the Old Testament. It was a beautiful name, rich in consolation. The Lord would have spoken quite differently if the name had given Him displeasure. That such was not the case, we see from viii. 8, 10 very decidedly. If often occurs in Scripture that mothers give names to their children: Gen. iv. 25; xix. 37 sq.; xxix. 32; xxx. 6, 8, 11, 13, 18, 20, 24; xxxv. 18; 1 Sam. i. 20. Often the name is determined by divine command: Gen. xvi. 11; xvii. 19; Hos. i. 4, 6, 9; 1 Chron. xxii. 9; Matt. i. 21. Here, now, grave doubts arise. Is it conceivable that God has made a fallen woman the type of the θεοτόκος, and an illegitimate child the type of the Son of God become man? The objections to our view, founded on the piety of the Alma (see above), disappear when we refer back the giving of the name to the announcement of the divine will. For if the Alma does not name the child Immanuel self-prompted, she gives no proof of fearing God and faith in God. She did only what she could not have omitted to do without defying the divine will. But how is it conceivable that God should make such a child the bearer and symbol of His holy purpose of salvation, a child to which clung the reproach of illegitimate birth, that was therefore the fruit and the continual monument of sin, whose mother, in fact, in some circumstances, might have incurred the penalty of stoning, according to Deut. xxii. 21? How can this fruit of sin bear the holy name of Immanuel? Does this not involve the dangerous inference that God does not take strict account of sin? that in some cases He does not mind using it as means and instrument for His plans? To this I would reply as follows. The Prophet is extremely sparing in portraying the historical background of his prophecies. He indicates only what is indispensable. It is just this scantiness that makes our passage so difficult, and all efforts at expounding it suffer alike from this. For there is not a single one against which it may not be objected that one explanatory statement or other is necessary to its complete establishment. It seems to me that the presence of the article in "the Alma" is easiest explained if, in the circle to which the Prophet addressed, there was only one person present that could be designated as Alma. In every language in such a case a more exact pronominal definition may be dispensed with. Besides, in Hebrew, the article in some cases has decidedly a demonstrative meaning, and can be used δεικτικῶς (comp. הַפַּעַם, הַשָּׁנָה, הַיּוֹם, הַלַּיְלָה).

The Prophet, as the servant of Jehovah, might come to the king unannounced. Though hated by the king, the king still dreaded him, and, according to ver. 12, Ahaz did not venture to express his unbelief openly, but only under the mask of reverence. Assuredly Nathan did not first request an audience and permission to deliver a message of Jehovah's to the king (2 Sam. xxiv. 11 sq.). And thus we may assume that the Prophet came to the palace at a time when the king was not surrounded by officers of state—at least not by these alone, but also by his family. And in the circle into which Isaiah stepped in the discharge of his prophetic disciplinary office there must have been one—but only one—daughter of the royal house who was indeed unmarried, but no longer a virgin. More than this we do not know. The Prophet writes no more than he said, perhaps out of compassion, or perhaps to avoid making the person in question the object of honors she did not deserve (possibly of idolatrous worship in after days). By revealing this secret to the dismay of the family, the Prophet had of course given a sign, a pledge of the credibility of what was promised ver. 7. For whoever knew that secret of the past and present could know also the secret things of the future. And the king could at once ascertain the verity of the sign that was given. Of course he might take measures to defeat the prophecy and render its accomplishment impossible. But what good would that do? The chief thing, that there was a boy in the body of the (supposed) virgin, he could not undo, and this boy was called, and was de jure, and indeed de jure divino, Immanuel, even though the king (or his mother) gave him no name at all, or another name. [See addenda of Tr. pp. 127, 128.]

But how shall we account for so unholy a transaction being made the type of the holiest transaction of history? Here we must consider the relation of our passage to Matt. i. 23. The sacred history narrates that Mary, before Joseph took her home, was found with child, and that Joseph had resolved not to denounce her, but to leave her privately (Matt. i. 18 sq.). Ought it to surprise us if this part of the history of the fulfilment should be prefigured, too, in the period of the prophecy? But why just so and then? If that event, that the mother of the Lord was to be found pregnant before marriage, was to be prefigured, could it be done otherwise than that there should happen to a virgin in a natural way and in sinful fashion what happened to Mary in a supernatural way and without sin? Sinful generation occurs in the list of the ancestors of Jesus more than once. Compare only the genealogy in Matthew that calls especial attention to these cases by naming the mother concerned. Remember Judah and Tamar. And not to mention Rahab and Ruth, there is Solomon, born of David and the wife of Uriah. "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity and in sin did my mother conceive me," Ps. li. 7, applies to the whole genealogy, and, apart from the birth, we must apply to every individual of it the words: "there is none that doeth good, no, not one" (Ps. xiv. 3; Rom. iii. 10 sq.). Let one call to mind the sins of a Jacob, a David, a Solomon, and one must say it depends on circumstances which was the more unworthy vessel, they or this unfortunate virgin. In short, we here stumble on secrets of divine sovereignty that we cannot fathom. The day shall declare it (1 Cor. iii. 13).

Moreover Immanuel is only a transitory apparition. He is named only here and chap. viii. It is a single though significant point, that is visible above the horizon once and then disappears again. Therefore it is also to be noted that spite of Matt. i. 23, and that the words of the angel Luke i. 31 remind us of our text and of Gen. xvi. 11, Mary still did not receive command to call her son Immauel. Had our passage the significance that is attributed to it; were it a direct prophecy of the birth of Jesus from a virgin, then properly the name that the son of Mary was to bear was already settled, and one can't comprehend why the angel (Luke i. 31) gives another name. But Immanuel is not Himself and immediately Jesus. He is only a type, like many others. And, indeed, as a son of a virgin, He is a type of that reproach of antenuptial conception which the Saviour of the world had to bear as a part of the general reproach that was meted out to Him, and which He has now-a-days to bear still. This is a point that prophecy might not pass in silence, and yet could touch only lightly.

But by his name he points to the faithfulness of God that will not forsake His people, even when they have become a בְּנֵי־זְנוּנִים, and have signalized their desertion of Him by the alliance with the secular power. And this faithfulness is itself a pledge in turn of that which had determined on the most glorious visitation of the people (Luke i. 78) in the person of the God-man, precisely for that time when the nation would lose the last remnant of its independence in the embrace of the secular power. All the features must not be pressed; which is the case with ver. 15 sqq. especially. The prophetic word hovers freely over present and future, combining both, yet leaving both their peculiarities. It was God's providence that Isaiah should select these words that at the same time fitted so wonderfully the event narrated Matth. i. 18 sqq., to whom the tongue of an Isaiah was just as subservient as that of a Caiaphas (Jno. xi. 51).

3. Butter and honey——the King of Assyria.—Vers. 15–17. Butter and honey is by no means a mean food. That appears from Deut. xxxii. 13, 14; Job xx. 17, where the words rather mean a very noble food. Comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 29. Nor do they appear in any passage of the Old Testament, as children's food. Rather from ver. 21 sqq. it appears that butter and honey represent natural food in contrast with that procured by art. For butter comes immediately from milk, and honey, too, may be had ready from bees in a form that men can enjoy. And as Palestine had and still has many wild bees, on account of which it is called a land "flowing with milk and honey" (comp. Exod. iii. 8, 17, sqq. and the characteristic passage 1 Sam. xiv. 25 sqq.; Jud. xiv. 8), therefore we may suppose that wild honey (Matth. iii. 4) is especially meant here. Therefore the boy shall eat butter and honey on to the time when he shall know evil and good (anni discretionis). If the ability to distinguish good and evil is employed as marking a period of time, it can only be in a moral sense. For even the smallest child distinguishes in a physical sense what tastes bad and what good. Moreover the expression reminds one of Gen. ii. 9, 17; iii. 5, 22; comp. Deut. i. 39. Naturally the land must be deserted before the boy knows how to distinguish between good and evil, in order that at the time when this happens, his food may be reduced to butter and honey.

The two kings of the land are Rezin and Pekah. It may be seen from ver. 2 how great was the dread of these experienced by Ahaz.

The Lord shall bring, etc.—It is to be noticed here, first of all, that the Prophet adds these words roughly and directly, without any particle connecting them with what goes before. This mode of expression is explained by the fact that the Prophet contemplates the transactions of ver. 17 as immediately behind those of ver. 16. From his point of view he sees no interval between them. That is not the same as saying that there is no interval between. Prophecy sees all as if in one plane, that in the fulfilment is drawn apart in successive planes. Hence one may say: Isaiah prophesies here the Assyrian and Babylonish exile. For the desolation that (ver. 16) is to befall Ephraim happened by the carrying away of the Ten Tribes (comp. 2 Kings xvii. 6, 23 sqq.). But what the Prophet predicts ver. 17 sqq. was fulfilled by the captivity of Judah more than 120 years later. Accordingly, the relation of the prophecy to the fulfilment takes the following shape. Our prophecy must have happened in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, consequently about the year B. C. 743. The first devastation and partial desolation of the territory of Ephraim by the Assyrians, i. e., by Tiglath-Pileser, happened already in the time of Pekah (2 Kings xv. 29), who died B. C. 739. The boy, that was to be born according to ver. 14, in fact did not live to see any period of the desolation of his native land, nor did he use butter and honey in the manner designated. This form of expression is traceable solely to contemplation of events together that in reality are far apart. For Judah succumbed to such a devastation not till 130 years later. But if we may assume that a child awakes to moral consciousness in its third or fourth year, and is consequently to be regarded as a personality, capable of distinguishing between good and evil, then that child was alive to see the first inroad of the Assyrians into the territory of Ephraim (and Syria according to 2 Kings xvi. 9) and consequently the beginning of the fulfilment of our prophecy. But did it live to see the beginning, then the Prophet might regard it as one that had lived through the entire fulfilment, because, as remarked before, he does not distinguish successive plains of fulfilment. And he has good reason for this. For as all consequences are contained in the principle, so in the first-fruits of fulfilment are contained the rest of the degrees of fulfilment. For him, who has an eye open to divine realities, all these degrees are ideally contained, but just on that account divinely and really contained in the degree that is the first-fruits. For divine ideas bear the pledge of their reality in themselves. Therefore where a complex of divine ideas is realized even in its beginnings, there the whole is become real for Him who contemplates things with an eye divinely illuminated. Thus Jeremiah regards the world-dominion of Nebuchadnezzar, the subjection of all nations under his power, and the seventy years of Judah's exile as realized practically by the battle at Carchemish, although, to human eyes, Nebuchadnezzar during several years did nothing to extend his kingdom on one side or other. Comp. my remarks on Jer. xxv. 11. So, too, the Lord says Matth. xxiv. 34; Luke xxi. 32, "This generation shall not pass away till all this be fulfilled." He could, with entire justice, say that the generation then living would live to see the last judgment because they would witness the beginning of it, the destruction of Jerusalem. Comp. Van Oosterzee on Luke xxi. 32.

It is seen from the foregoing that, regarding the passage in the light of its fulfilment, we understand "the king of Assyria" ver. 17, to include the king of Babylon. But Isaiah could speak here only of the king of Assyria. For in the foreground of his tableau of the future he saw only the king of Assyria. He did not know, or did not need to intimate that the king of Babylon stood behind the former as continuer and accomplisher. The Assyrian king, this would-be-helper and protector, for whose sake Ahaz has so impiously contemned the support of Jehovah (see on ver. 12), just he must be designated as the instrument of the judgment that was to burst in on unbelieving Judah and its equally unbelieving royal house. Thus it appears how impossible it is to treat the words "the king of Assyria" as a gloss, like Knobel and Diestel do. If the words were not there, there would be no hint as to who was to be the instrument of the judgment predicted vers. 16, 17. The words connect very well with "days" in apposition as being explanatory—for it is just as easy to say "bring days on a people" as "bring a king upon any one."

4. And it shall come to pass——treading lesser cattle.—Vers. 18–25. These verses connect very closely with ver. 17, as its amplification. This happens as follows: that in a section underlying which is a duality, there is described first, the means and instruments of the desolation, second the consequences of the desolation. The means and instruments are characterised in a twofold image. First, the destroyer is compared to flies and bees, second, to a razor. The flies mean Egypt, the bees Assyria. But both images merge into one, into that of the razor, and Assyria appears as the razor, by which we are to understand not Assyria alone, but also Babylon. The consequences of the desolation, again, are portrayed under a double figure, or rather by the presentation of two examples. The first example: a man has nothing of his cattle left but a little cow (young cow). But he feeds on thick milk, for, in consequence of the superabundance of food for stock, the remnant of the inhabitants will feed on butter and honey. The second example is itself again divided in two: a.) a vineyard once well cultivated, planted with noble vines, is so overgrown with thorns and thistles, that no one ventures into it without bow and arrow; b.) all the once cultivated heights are so overgrown with thorns and thistles, that they are only fit for the pasture of cattle.

Will hiss, etc.—Jehovah's might and sovereignty will reveal itself here in the most glorious manner. He only needs to whistle (comp. on v. 26; Zech. x. 8), and the flies of Egypt and the bees of Assyria come obedient to His call. That Egypt was a land abounding in flies may be supposed from the warmth of its climate and the frequent overflows with their slimy sediment. Comp. Exod. viii. 12 sqq. If the flies at the extreme ends of the canals (see crit. note on יאֹר) are called, those that are nearer would not stay away. The expression then means that all the Egyptian flies, even the farthest off, shall come on.—The Assyrians are compared to the bee as noble, martial, strong, dangerous. Assyria had many bees. Comp. Knobel in loc. Therefore the entire land, to the steep, rocky ravines and cliffs of the brooks, and to the prickly thorn hedges and the trampled cattle pastures will be covered (נָחוּ comp. a ver. 2) with the swarms of flies and bees. Thus, extensively and intensively, an entire devastation of the land is predicted. The same appears by the second figure ver. 20. Ahaz, at a great price, had hired the Assyrian king as an ally against Syria and Ephraim. For this purpose he had not only sacrificed great treasures but also the independence of his land. For he had caused it to be said to Tiglath-Pileser: "I am thy servant and thy son, come up and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria and out of the hand of the king of Israel." 2 Kings xvi. 7. For this purpose he sent the Assyrian the gold and silver that was in the house of Jehovah and in the house of the king. The definite article in בתער

הַשְּׂכִירָה, "the hired razor," was both historically justified and comprehensible to Ahaz, who must have felt the reproach that lay in the expression. Thou hast hired a razor to shave others, says Isaiah to him, but this razor will shave thee. In Lev. xiv. 8 sq. the shaving off all the hair on the body is prescribed as a part of the purification to be observed by one recovered from leprosy. Perhaps the Prophet would intimate that this devastation was also an act of purification, by which the nation was to be purified from the leprosy of sin, that therefore the punishment is intended for the improvement of those that would accept the chastisement (Prov. viii. 10; xix. 20). The shaving bald evidently signifies the entire devastation and emptying of the land in every quarter and with regard to men, cattle and every other possession.

In vers. 21-25, the degree and extent of the devastation is portrayed by two illustrative figures. The first example shows that instead of skilful cultivation, the grass shall grow rank. A man rescues from his stock a heifer, the Prophet supposes, (comp. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34; Deut. xxi. 3; 1 Sam. xvi. 2) and two sheep. Because there is no regular cultivation, grass grows in every field. Therefore there is abundant pasture for the few cattle. Beside, the wild bees produce honey in abundance. Thus honey and butter are the food of that man and of all the remnant of the inhabitants still in the land. The second example presents a still greater degree of uncultivated wildness; the whole land growing rank with thorns and thistles. And this greatest wildness appears in a double gradation: first, every place for growing wine appears covered with thorns and thistles (vers. 23, 24), and then the same is affirmed of all the hills. It is hard to find a distinction here, because wine grows on the hills, or mountains, too. It seems to me that the Prophet carries out completely in this last member the duality which, as was remarked, rules in the whole section. Everything is double. Already in ver. 18 we have flies and bees, meaning Egypt and Assyria; ravines and clefts of the rock; thorn-hedges and pastures. Only ver. 20 neglects the rule, because the Prophet would designate the two enemies in an unity. But ver. 21 and on, this rule of duality is carried out, and at the close becomes emphatic. We observe two degrees of growing wild. In the first appear: one man and the entire remnant of the inhabitants, cattle and sheep, butter and honey. The second degree, subdivides in two again, in which appears to me to lie the emphasis, and both are characterized by the double notions of thorn and thistle, arrow and bow, a seeding place for cattle, and a trampling place for sheep. The thousand vines and thousand shekels recall Song of Sol. viii. 11. In Syria at the present time the vineyards are still taxed according to the number of the vines; a good vine at one Piaster = about four cents. Therefore, the price of one shekel = to about 25 cents is high. The construction of ver. 23 betrays a certain luxuriance and rankness. The first or the last יִהְיֶה "shall be" is certainly an excess. Perhaps the Prophet would thereby express by word painting the rank growth of the weeds. Will one go into the property with bow and arrow in order to hunt, or to protect himself? I believe, with GESENIUS, both. He that goes in will need his weapons for protection; he that would hunt needs only to go into the nearest vineyard. The protecting fence is gone; beasts wild and tame, penetrate into it. The vineyards of Israel are now a copy of what Israel itself as the vineyard of Jehovah had become (ver. 5).

[J. A. ALEXANDER on vii. 14-16. "The two interpretations that appear to me the most plausible, and the least beset with difficulties are those of LOWTH and VITRINGA, with which last HENGSTENBERG's is essentially identical. Either the Prophet, while he foretells the birth of Christ, foretells that of another child, during whose infancy the promised deliverance shall be experienced; or else he makes the infancy of Christ Himself, whether seen as still remote or not, the sign and measure of that same deliverance. While some diversity of judgment ought to be expected and allowed in relation to this secondary question, there is no ground, grammatical, historical or logical, for doubt as to the main point, that the church in all ages has been right in regarding this passage as a signal, and explicit prediction of the miraculous conception and nativity of Christ." On הָעַלְמָה. "the Alma." "It is enough for us to know that a virgin or unmarried woman is designated here as distinctly as she could be by a single word. That the word means simply a young woman, whether married or unmarried, a virgin or a mother, is a subterfuge invented by the later Greek translators, who, as Justin Martyr tells us, read νεᾶνις, instead of the old version παρθένος, which had its rise before the prophecy became a subject of dispute between Jews and Christians. The use of the word in this connection makes it, to say the least, extremely probable that the event foretold is something more than a birth in the ordinary course of nature."

"To account for the Alma by a second marriage of Ahaz, or of Isaiah, or by the presence of a pregnant woman, or the Prophet's pointing at her," "may be justly charged with gratuitously assuming facts of which we have no evidence, and which are not necessary to the interpretation of the passage." "A further objection is, that though they may afford a sign in one of the senses of the word, viz.: that of an emblem or symbol, they do not afford such a sign as the context would lead us to expect. It seems very improbable, after the offer to Ahaz, which he rejected, that the sign bestowed (unasked) would be merely a thing of every-day occurrence, or at most the application of a symbolical name. This presumption is strengthened by the solemnity with which the Prophet speaks of the predicted birth, not as a usual and natural event, but as something which excites his own astonishment, as he beholds it in prophetic vision."

This last objection applies equally to the Author's theory of the Alma being an unmarried princess detected in pregnancy. In addition to all the other assumptions of this theory, which are greater than those of any other, it must be assumed that the pregnancy was at a stage that could be kept secret from the scrutiny that ever characterized the regime of the women's apartments in an oriental family. Otherwise it would be no sign in the Author's sense.

The Author's threefold canon has its foundation in what are obviously conjectures. Whether the sign was to be such as Ahaz was to test, because he would see it accomplished, depended precisely on the sign itself. It might be a sign like that to Moses Exod. iii. 12, which could only be fulfilled after other events predicted, with which it was associated as a sign, had come to pass. Comp. Isa. xxxvii. 30. It may have been like those signs given by Christ to unbelievers in His day, that were not meant to induce belief in those that asked, but were the refusal of a sign to them. (vid. Jno. ii. 18–22; Mat. xii. 38–40). If it was such a sign, then the Author's first canon is an error. Whether the sign was meant for the whole royal family, according to this third canon, depends wholly on the "house of David" having the meaning he gives it. Yet that meaning has no other foundation than the conjecture that Isaiah had intruded on the private, domestic retirement of Ahaz. The second canon, viz.: that the sign in its form must be punitive, is only an assumption. The contrary is as easily assumed.

The connection of the words vers. 10–16 with the ver. 9 b is very close. The belief there challenged is, by a second message, brought to the test. Ahaz does not stand the test. He does not believe, or he would joyfully avail himself of the offered sign, as Hezekiah did later 2 Kings, xx. 8 sq. Thereupon Isaiah proceeds to denounce the consequences already threatened ver. 9 b, that must follow unbelief. But first, as to unbelieving Saul was announced the man after God's own heart that was to be raised up in his place, so to Ahaz is announced, in a clearer light than ever before, the promised "seed of the woman" who would deliver Israel. But before that would come to pass, the two kingdoms of which Israel was composed, Judah as well as Ephraim must suffer desolation. Thus the prophecy of Immanuel relates to Christ alone, as J. H. MICHAELIS and others suppose (vid. J. A. ALEX. in loc.); and ver. 16 is (with HENDERSON) to be understood of Canaan and its two kingdoms, Ephraim and Judah. This view encounters fewer difficulties than any other, while such as it does encounter are felt as much by any other. On the other hand it is much in favor of this view, that there is then in ver. 17 simply a continuation and amplification of the theme begun in ver. 16, and no such abruptness as the Author, with most expositors, finds in what ver. 17 announces.

The chief difficulty is that in כִּי בְּטֶרֶם יֵדַע הַנַּעַר the כִּי must be given the force of "but" (UMBREIT). Yet כִּי may have its usual sense "for," and assign the reason why an Immanuel, that knows good and evil, shall be needed. For before such a one comes, those that call good evil and evil good (vid. v. 20), etc., shall have brought the inheritance of Jehovah to that extremity, by their unbelief, where only such a deliverer can save.—TR.

On ver. 18. "Assyria and Egypt are named as the two great rival powers, who disturbed the peace of Western Asia, and to whom the land of Israel was both a place, and a subject of contention. The bee cannot of itself denote an army, nor is the reference exclusively to actual invasion, but to annoying and oppressive occupation of the country by civil and military agents of these foreign powers. It was not merely attacked, but infested by flies and bees of Egypt and Assyria. Fly is understood as a generic term, including gnats, mosquitoes, etc., by HENDERSON, and bee as including wasps and hornets, by HITZIG and UMBREIT."

On ver. 20. "The rabbinical interpretation of שער רגלים is a poor conceit, the adoption of which by GESENIUS [and NAEGELSBACH—TR.], if nothing worse, says but little for the taste and the "æsthetic feeling" which so often sits in judgment on the language of the Prophet. The true sense is no doubt the one expressed by EWALD (von oben bis unten) [from head to foot] and before him by CLERICUS." J. A. ALEX.]

2. ISAIAH GIVING THE WHOLE NATION A SIGN BY THE BIRTH OF HIS SON MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ.

CHAPTER VIII. 1–4.

1 MOREOVER the LORD said unto me, Take thee a great [a]roll, and write in it with 2 a man's [b]pen concerning [1]Maher-shalal-hash-baz. And [c]I took unto me faithful wit-
3 nesses to record, Uriah the priest, and Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah. And I
[2]went unto the prophetess; and she conceived and bare a son. Then said the LORD
4 to me, Call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz. For before the child shall have knowledge to cry, My father, and my mother, [3]the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away before the king of Assyria

[1] Heb. in making speed to the spoil, he hasteneth the prey, or, make speed, etc. [2] Heb. approached unto.
[3] Or, he that is before the king of Assyria shall take away the riches.

[a] tablet. [b] stylus. [c] I will take.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 1. חֶרֶט (found only here and Exod. xxxii. 4), is an instrument for cutting in, engraving in wood, metal, wax, etc., the chisel, style. It stands here as stylus, metonymically as efficiens pro effecto, i. e., the writing instrument stands for the writing. חרט אנוש seems to me not to mean writing of the common man in distinction from that of men of higher degree, say, a popular as distinguished from priestly writing. [In an ordinary and familiar hand, J. A. ALEXANDER, BARNES.] For in the first place it is very doubtful if אֱנוֹשׁ has this meaning. The word is distinguished from אָדָם (comp. Ps. lxxiii. 5) but only by its poetic use. It occurs in Isaiah six times, here, and xiii. 7, 12; xxiv. 6; xxxiii. 8; li. 7; lvi. 2. In the second place we have no trace of there being two sorts of writing in use among the Hebrews before the exile. The passages Hab. ii. 2; Ps. xlv. 2, cited by some in support of the notion, prove nothing. I much rather believe that a contrast of human and superhuman writing is meant. For as Paul distinguishes between human and angel tongues (1 Cor. xiii. 1) so we may distinguish between human and angel writing. Of the latter, Dan. v. 5 sqq. offers us an example. Comp. Exod. xxxii. 32; Ps. lxix. 29; cxxxix. 16; Dan. xii. 1; Rev. xix. 12; xx. 12, 15; xxi. 12, 27. For the prophets were not merely "hearers of the words of God," but also "men whose eyes were open," "who saw the vision of the Almighty" (Numb. xxiv. 3, 4). The לְ is variously explained. It is taken as constructio periphrastica (acceleratura sunt spolia or accelerationi spolia, comp. Gen. xv. 12; Jos. ii. 5; Isa. x. 32; xxxvii. 26; xxxviii. 20, etc.), as depending on כְּתֹב in the sense of commanding (1 Chr. xxi. 17), as sign of dedication, or as stating the object. The first two explanations are inadmissible, because לְ would then fit only the first member (מַהֵר as infinitive), not the second (חָשׁ particip.). לְ can thus be taken only as a dedication or as stating the aim. Both these ways of explaining it agree in not taking מהר as infin., but as a verbal adjective like Zeph. i. 14 (comp. מְאֵן, מְקַל). But they differ in sense. This can be no dedication in the common sense. For there is no gift to be presented to Maher-shalal, only the attention of the nation is directed to him. The לְ can define therefore only the reference or the destiny, the aim. It is thereby said that this tablet with its inscription concerns a Maher shalal-hash-baz, but of whom absolutely nothing is known, not even whether a person or a thing. Comp. Ezek. xxxvii. 16. The case is different with Jeremiah xlvi. 2; xlviii. 1; xlix. 1. Comp. on Jer. xlvi. sqq.

On ver. 2. ואעידה וגו׳ the LXX. translates μάρτυράς μοι ποίησον, as if וְהָעִידָה stood in the text. So, too, the SYR., CHALD. and ARAB. in the London Polyglot which HITZIG follows. The VULG. translates: "et adhibui;" it therefore read וְאָעִידָה; and so, too, would EICHHORN, DE WETTE, ROORDA, KNOBEL, and others read. But, after mature consideration, I find there is no ground for departing from the reading of the text. It is perfectly supported by testimony. First of all it is the more difficult reading, and both the others give evidence of being attempts to relieve the difficulty by correction. Then, too, Isaiah never uses the cohortative form with the weakened sense, as it occurs elsewhere with the Vav consec. imperf. in the first pers., especially in Dan., Ezra, and Neh. Thus the form וָאָעִידָה especially occurs Neh. xiii. 21 (along with וָאָעִיד ibid. ver. 15). Why did not Isaiah write וָאָעִיד as Jeremiah did in precisely the same sense, chap. xxxii. 10? Comp. 1 Kings ii. 42. The form וְאָעִידָה is found Deut. xxxi. 28; Ps. l. 7; lxxxi. 9; Jer. vi. 10, everywhere as cohortative. —העיד עדים like Jer. xxxii. 10, 25, 44.

On ver. 4. יִשָּׂא = "one will bear."—חַיִל in the sense of possession, riches, treasures is found beside here x. 14; lx. 5, 11; lxi. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Moreover the Lord said——the king of Assyria.—Vers 1-4. A compound token! First, Isaiah is to take a large tablet (only found beside iii. 23; here is meant certainly a tablet coated with smooth wax), and write on it with human handwriting some words. It is therefore assumed here that there is a superhuman handwriting (see Text. and Gram.) and that the Prophet could understand and make use of it (comp. Dan. v. 5 sqq.). But Isaiah must not employ this superhuman, but common, human writing. Isaiah must write on the tablet "Maher-shalal-hash-baz." It is clear that when he wrote these words they were not designated as the name of a son to be expected. For, first, there is nothing of this in the text. Second, there is a two-fold gradation of the prophecy wherein the first stage gives a pledge of the second. The words on the tablet are the prophecy of a Maher-shalal-hash-baz to be looked for; the appearance of the latter is therefore the fulfilment of this prophecy, and so the guaranty that the event, to which the significant name itself in turn refers, shall certainly come to pass.

The Lord commands the Prophet therefore to set up a tablet with the inscription mentioned, and at the same time makes known his will, that Uriah and Zechariah shall act as witnesses. What they are to witness is as little stated as that Isaiah shall accomplish the will of the LORD in regard to the witnesses and that he actually did this. The latter is assumed as being a matter of course. This scantiness is too common in the prophetic manner of narrating to cause us any surprise. The former is to be obtained from the context. For when we read immediately after: "And I went unto the Prophetess," etc., it is plain that the witnesses should testify that Isaiah, at the time he set up the tablet, had communicated to them that he would approach his wife, and that she, in consequence, would become pregnant and bear a son. But why, it may be asked, did not the Prophet declare this publicly? Not out of regard for propriety certainly; for there would not have been anything the least offensive in doing so. But why must then the witnesses receive this announcement? I can think of no other reason than the enmity and vindictiveness of Ahaz. He was, we may be sure, only half rejoiced at the quieting of his fears in regard to the impending danger from Rezin and Pekah. The way in which he, according to vii. 10 sqq., received that reassuring announcement, and what was connected with it as a further finger-board for the remote future (vii. 17 sqq.), all this was calculated to embitter him and his against the Prophet. Had, therefore, the Prophet announced publicly the pregnancy of his wife, the mother and child might have incurred danger. This was easiest avoided by imparting the announcement only to witnesses, who, however, were in such esteem with the nation, that their assurance that they had at the proper time received such a communication from the Prophet was universally credited. Then we obtain the following chain of events. First, the tablet. This, makes known in general that the LORD purposes a great crisis of war, and that it is to be looked for shortly. Immediately thereupon the witnesses receive the announcement of the pregnancy of the Prophetess, The son is born, and thereby, on the authority of the witnesses, is given to all, the pledge that the event to which the inscription of the tablet and the corresponding name of the child pointed, shall really come to pass.

Whether Uriah is the priest mentioned, 2 Kings xvi. 10 sqq. [BARNES, J. A. ALEXANDER], who, out of regard for Ahaz, placed in the temple the altar made after the heathen pattern, is just as doubtful as whether Zechariah is identical with the one said to be the author of Zech. ix–xi., or with the son of Asaph (2 Chr. xxix. 13).

Isaiah's wife is hardly called Prophetess, because she was the wife of a Prophet, but because she herself was a prophetic woman. We do not indeed know of prophecies of which she was the authoress, but she, along with other things of the Prophet's family, was set for a sign and wonder (ver. 18).

Our exposition of vii. 14 of itself shows that the present history is not coincident with vii. 10 sqq., and therefore that Maher-shalal is not identical with Immanuel. Yet the present narrative is nearly related to vii. 10 sqq. In both, pregnancy and the birth of a son are pledges of deliverance. In both, a stage of development in the child is made the measure that defines the period of the deliverance. But a child can say father and mother, sooner than it can distinguish between good and evil. If then, as also the place of the passage in the book, indicates, what is now narrated, took place somewhat later than the events vii. 10 sqq., it agrees very well. Both have the same objective end, viz., the rendering harmless Syria and Ephraim. Therefore the later one must use the shorter time measure. As Pekah and Rezin lived during the events prophesied here, yet the former died B. C. 739, so the transactions related here must fall between B. C. 743 and 739. The king of Assyria did not at that time destroy Samaria. He only desolated a few border regions (2 Kings xv. 29). But as we showed at vii. 17, that the prophecy contemplated two events, inwardly related, but separated as to time, so it is here. That first, preliminary devastation of the region of Ephraim bears the later one (2 Kings xvii. 6) so really in it, that the Prophet is justified in comprehending both together.

II.—THE SUPPLEMENTS.

1. THOSE THAT DESPISE SHILOAH SHALL BE PUNISHED BY THE WATERS OF THE EUPHRATES.

CHAP. VIII. 5–8.

5 THE LORD spake also unto me again, saying,
6 For as much as this people [a]refuseth
The waters of Shiloah that go softy,
And rejoice [b]in Rezin and Remaliah's son;
7 Now therefore, behold, the LORD bringeth up upon them
The waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory;
And he shall come up over all his channels,
And go over all his banks;
8 And he shall pass [c]through Judah; he shall overflow and go over,
He shall reach even to the neck;
And [1][d]the stretching out of his wings shall fill
The breadth of thy land, O Immanuel.

1 Heb. the fulness of the breadth of thy land shall be the stretching out of his wings.

a contemns. b with. c over into. d the flapping of his, etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 6. וַיֹּסֶף דַּבֵּר comp. at vii. 10.——לְאַט is compounded of אַט (1 Kings xxi. 27) lenitas and the prefix. The prefix is used like in לָרֹב, לָבֶטַח (Ewald, § 217 d); comp. Gen. xxxiii. 14; 2 Sam. xviii. 5; Job xv. 11.——Corrections of the reading like מְסוֹס (Meier — "fainting away before Rezin," x. 18) and וּמָשׁוֹשׁ ("and blind groping seized," Boettcher Achrenl. p. 80, comp. Job v. 14 are unnecessary. Isaiah often uses the verb שׂוּשׂ (xxxv. 1; lxi. 10; lxii. 5; lxiv. 4; lxv. 18 sq.; lxvi. 10, 14) and the substantive שָׂשׂוֹן (xii. 3; xxii. 13; xxxv. 10; li. 3, 11; lxi. 3) and מָשׂוֹשׂ (xxiv. 8, 11; xxxii. 13 sq.; lx. 15; lxii. 5; lxv. 18; lxvi. 10). Here מָשׂוֹשׂ seems chosen for the sake of a paranomasia with מָאַס. The following אֶת cannot be the sign of the accusative, because the subject of joy is never so designated. It resembles the proposition like lxvi. 10 (שִׂישׂוּ אִתָּהּ מָשׂוֹשׂ). Joy with Rezin and Pekah is the rejoicing that is felt in communion, in connection with these rulers. Moreover the substantive מְשׂוֹשׂ is dependent on יַעַן, which accordingly governs two clauses, a verbal and a nominal clause. Thus, too, Drechsler. There is then no need for regarding מְשׂוֹשׂ as the status absol. according to Ewald, § 351, 6. According to a usage especially common with Isaiah, the status constr. stands before the preposition.

On ver. 7. עָצוּם וְרַב combined like Exod. i. 9; Deut. vii. 1; ix. 14; xxvi. 5; Joel ii. 2, 5; Mic. iv. 3; Zech. viii. 22; עָצוּם signifying rather the intensive, רַב the extensive greatness.——כָּבוֹד here involves the secondary notion of "might," as elsewhere that of riches (x. 3; lxi. 6; lxvi. 12, the last citation seeming to stand in intentional contrast with our passage. Comp. the Latin opes). Knobel regards אֶת־מֶלֶךְ to כְּבוֹדוֹ as a gloss, because "good poets do not add explanatory notes to their metaphors." As if Isaiah were only a poet, and had not, too. a very practical interest! Comp. vii. 17, 20.——אָפִיק (not again in Isaiah) is the bed of a torrens, synonymous with נַחַל (Josh. i. 20; iv. 18); גְּדוֹת, plur. tantum, in Isa only here; besides Joel iii. 15; iv. 18; 1 Chr. xii. 15 K'ri (beside K'thib גְּדִיוֹת), is from גָּדָה, kindred to גָּדַד incidit, secuit, is "the indentation, the shore-line, the shore."

On ver. 8. חָלַף (comp. on ii. 18) is originally "to change" thence transire (to change place, whence "to change" in hunters' language said of wild game). Comp. xxi. 1; xxiv. 5. שָׁטַף means the spreading out, עָבַר the pressing forward (both notions joined as in xxviii. 15, 18), עַד־צַוָּאר יַגִּיעַ the height of the water.——מֻטּוֹת from נָטָה "to spread out," are the out-spreadings, expansiones; ἅπ. λεγ.——The sing. וְהָיָה is in consequence of the verb coming first.——מְלֹא is to be construed in an active sense (comp. vi. 3; xxxi. 4; xxxiv. 1; xlii. 10). רֹחַב not again in Isaiah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This section has the external mark of a supplement in the transition formula "the Lord spake also again," which occurs again only vii. 10, and which here as well as there intimates that an interval occurred between these words and what goes before. But the contents, too, show that we have no immediate and necessary amplification of the foregoing words and deeds before us. Nothing more is said of the son of the Prophet. Rather the language turns suddenly against the Ephraimites who contemned the quiet fountain of Shiloah, i. e. David's kingdom, and rejoiced in communion with Rezin and the son of Remaliah (ver. 6). Therefore the floods of the Euphrates, which the Prophet himself explains as meaning the king of Assyria, shall overflow Ephraim (ver. 7), but of course Judah also, the land of Immanuel (ver. 8). The mention of Rezin and Pekah, the calling Judah land of Immanuel, and the threatening of overflow by Assyria, prove that these words belong to the same period as the preceding chief prophecies. And as the expression "Immanuel" presupposes the transactions narrated vii. 10, the insertion of this section at this place is completely explained.

2. The Lord——Remaliah's son.—Vers. 5, 6. Most authorities agree that the fountain of Shiloah or Siloam is on the south side of Jerusalem; vid. Robinson's Palestine, Vol. I. p. 501-505. The name (written שִׁלֹחַ, שִׁלּוֹחַ and שִׁילֹחַ) means emissio, or emissus (comp. הַמְשַׁלֵּחַ מַעְיָנִים, "He sendeth the springs," Ps. civ. 10; hence ἀπεσταλμένος "sent" Jno. ix. 7; comp. Ewald § 156 a). It occurs only here, John ix. 7 and Luke xiii. 4, in which last place is told of the tower of Siloam (so LXX and New Testament, Aqu. and Symm., Theod. spell the name Σιλωά: Vulg.: Siloe). Yet the name שֶׁלַח which the בְּרֵכַת הַשֶּׁלַח "pool of Siloah," Neh. iii. 15, bears is very probably identical with our Shiloah. The descent between the fountain of Mary above and the fountain of Siloam is very little, therefore the flow is very gentle and soft.

The weak brooklet, welling up at the foot of Moriah and Zion, represents the unobservable nature of the kingdom of God in the period of its earthly humility. It recalls the form of a servant which the Lord assumed, and the "I am meek and lowly in heart" (Matth. xi. 29). This feature is prominent in all the stages of the history of salvation. Outwardly Israel was the least of all nations (Deut. vii. 7); Bethlehem was the least of the cities of Judah (Mic. v. 1); David was the youngest among his brothers, and his father supposed he must be of no account at the election of a king (1 Sam. xvi. 11 sqq.). So, too, at the time of our present history, the kingdom of David was very small and weak amid the world-powers. If now and then it arose to greater power, that makes but one resemblance more to the intermittent fountain of Shiloah.

And rejoice, etc. The passage is easily explained if one only notices that the Prophet does not till ver. 8 represent the swelling stream as overflowing also the territory of Judah. Then "upon them" ver. 7 means those whom the Assyrian stream, that comes in from the north, overflows first. That is evidently the Ephraimites. Therefore by the people ver. 6, to whom "upon them" refers back, must, at least primarily, be understood the nation of the Ten Tribes. The nation Israel, then, i. e. Ephraim looks down contemptuously on the kingdom of Judah as on a weak flowing brooklet, and meanwhile with proud self-complacency rejoices in its own king and in the alliance with the Syrian king that added to his strength. This haughtiness shall not escape the avenging Nemesis. From the Euphrates shall mighty floods of water overflow first Ephraim and then Judah. ["To understand this it is necessary to remark that the Euphrates annually overflows its banks."—BARNES]. That by this is meant the king of Assyria with all his glorious army, Isaiah himself proceeds to explain. It is a proof that the Prophet before this had the territory of Israel in mind, that here he makes so prominent the trespassing of the waters into Judah's territory, the spreading beyond its borders. In ver. 8 b, the Prophet by a glorious figure compares the volumes of water to a bird spreading out its wings, to which he is evidently moved by the fact that the floods of water mean army hordes. Accordingly he designates the wings of the army as the wings of the extended flood. Because the space covered by the expanded wings coincides with the breadth of the land, so it may be said that the stretching out of the wings is at the same time the filling up of the land. It is very significant that the Prophet closes his address so emphatically with the word "Immanuel." He signifies thus that the land is Immanuel's, and that consequently the violence is done to Immanuel. It is plain that Immanuel is written as a proper name, from the suffix in ארצך. Yet most editions separate the words, and several versions too, as LXX. and ARAM., translate accordingly. The occasion for this is the, of course, correct notion that in the word there is an intimation of comfort that is to be the stay of Israel in that great tribulation. But evidently the Prophet has immediately in mind a person, whom he addresses. He turns to Him who is predicted in the birth of that child vii. 14. Although He is a person of the future, still the Prophet knows Him as one already present. How else could he turn to Him with this lamentation? Herein, then, lies a preparation for what the Prophet says of the promised one in the predicates of ix. 5 (6).

2. THREATENING AGAINST THOSE THAT CONSPIRE AGAINST JUDAH, AND AGAINST THOSE THAT FEAR THESE CONSPIRACIES.

CHAPTER VIII. 9–15.

9 [a]ASSOCIATE yourselves, O ye people, [1]and ye shall be broken in pieces;
And give ear, all ye of far countries:
Gird yourselves, [b]and ye shall be broken in pieces:
Gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces.
10 Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought;
Speak the word, and it shall not stand:
For God is with us.
11 For the LORD spake thus to me [2c]with a strong hand,
[d]And instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people, saying,
12 Say ye not, A confederacy,
[e]To all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy;
Neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid.
13 Sanctify the LORD of Hosts himself;
And let him be your fear, and let him be your dread.
14 And he shall be for a sanctuary;
But for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence
To both the houses of Israel,
For a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.
15 And many among them shall stumble,
[f]And fall, and be broken,
And be snared, and be taken.

[1] Or, yet. [2] Heb. in the strength of hand.

[d] To warn me not to walk. [e] as often as this people, etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 9. רעו. The forms and meanings of the roots רעע, רוע and ירע cross each other in a peculiar manner. רעו can only come from the root רָעַע; but to this root has been transferred the meaning, too, of רוּע. Although originally רוּעַ has the meaning malum esse, as appears from the imperf. Niph. יֵרוֹעַ (Prov. xi. 15; xiii.

20) which can only be derived from a root עוּ, yet this root never occurs in Kal., but all Kal forms that mean "to be evil" are to be derived from a root רָעַע (comp. יֵרַע Num. xi. 10, then the adjective רַע, and perhaps, too, the forms רָעָה Deut. xv. 9; 2 Sam. xix. 8 and infin. רֹעַ Eccl. vii. 3). On the other hand רָעַע has undoubtedly the meaning "to break" (Ps. ii. 9; Jer. xi. 16; xv. 12, etc.). We must therefore choose here between the meanings "be evil" and "break." With Drechsler and others, I prefer the latter, because "be wicked" and "break in pieces" involve no contradiction; for wherefore may not what is wicked also break in pieces? ["Gesenius in his latest lexicons gives this verb its usual sense of being evil, malignant, which is also expressed by Luther (seid böse, ihr Völker). It is here equivalent to do your worst." J. A. Alexander.].——מֶרְחָק frequent in Isaiah (x. 3; xiii. 5; xvii. 13; xxx. 27; xlvi. 11; plural מֶרְחַקִּים xxxiii. 17).——The double imperatives הִתְאַזְּרוּ וָחֹתּוּ sustain an adverbial relation to one another: break up yet break in pieces yourselves; gird ye yourselves, and spite of it break in pieces. Comp. Green., § 130, 2. The former word seems to me not to mean bellum parare, for the war is far progressed; but in accord with the proper vis vocabuli, the girding the loins, bracing oneself up as men are wont to do in the midst of an attack.

On ver. 10. עוּץ only here and Judg. xix. 30. On עֵצָה comp. on v. 19.——Pual תֻּפַר only here in Isaiah (Jer. xxxiii. 21; Zech. xi. 11).——Other forms of פרר; xiv. 27; xxiv. 5, 19; xxxiii. 8; xliv. 25.

On ver. 11. חֶזְקָה wherever else it occurs (2 Chr. xii. 1; xxvi. 16; Dan. xi. 2) means "the being strong," and is used everywhere of the fortified power of a potentate. חזקת היד is therefore "the hand being strong." It is the hand of God that comes over the prophets (Ezek. i. 3; iii. 22; viii. 1; xxxiii. 22; xxxvii. 1; xl. 1) and in fact our expression signifies the condition that Ezekiel describes with the words יַד יי עָלַי חָזָקָה iii. 14.——וְיִסְּרֵנִי cannot be the perf., or it must read יִסְּרַנִי. But the imperf. stands as jussive with the Vav. consec. (Comp. Ewald, § 347 a). ויסרני is, then, not co-ordinate with כה אמר as Knobel and even Ewald would have it; but it continues and declares the object of בחזקת היד, co-ordinate with the latter, subordinate to the former (Delitzsch). As regards the form, the imperf. יִסֹּר underlies it, which Hos. x. 10 is used in the first person.—The preposition מִן is to be treated as dependent on the notion of "holding back, restraining," contained in יסרני (constructio praegnans).

On ver. 12. לְכֹל וגו does not designate the object that is given a name. For then the second member must read: יֹאמַר הָעָם הַזֶּה לוֹ קֶשֶׁר. But, as Drechsler justly remarks, לְ before כֹּל = darauf hin, bei, "at," "with," and כֹּל has the meaning cunque (compare אֶל־כָּל־אֲשֶׁר Prov. xvii. 8, "whither-so-ever"). Not so often as those, not incessantly shall they say קֶשֶׁר, as if there were nothing in the world to fear but this. מוֹרָא only here in Isaiah.——הַעֲרִיץ Hiph. in Isaiah also ver. 13 and xxix. 23. Kal. ii. 19, 21; xlvii. 12. From xxix. 23 it is seen that Isaiah uses the word in the sense of "timere aliquid;" in our passage it means "to fear" and ver. 13 "to affright." Thus it appears that Isaiah uses the Hiph. sometimes as indirect, sometimes as direct causative, and then uses the latter in a transitive sense.

On ver. 13. In מוראכם Isaiah has evidently in mind Gen. ix. 2; Deut. xi. 25.

On ver. 14. מִקְדָּשׁ (again in Isa. xvi. 12; lx. 13; lxiii. 18) means sanctuary generally, here evidently with the additional notion of asylum (comp. 1 Kings i. 50 sq.; ii. 28 sqq.). ו before לְאֶבֶן is adversative.——נֶגֶף only here in Isaiah and moreover אבן נגף ἅπ. λεγ.——מִכְשׁוֹל "that over which one stumbles," (again lvii. 14; צור מכשול only here).——פַּח (παγίς, "cord," vid. xxiv. 17 sq.). מוֹקֵשׁ "loop-snare" of the bird-catcher, only here in Isaiah.

On ver. 15. The operation of מכשול and פח are in ver. 15 represented by five verbs, of which the first three relate to נגף and מכשל, and the last to פח and מוקש.——Many, e. g., Gesenius, Hitzig, Umbreit, refer בָּם to the two notions of stone and snare. But as Knobel justly remarks, it is a "chief thought of Isaiah that the judgments overtake the sinners; the pious are left as a remnant: i. 25, 28; vi. 13; xxviii. 18 sq.; xxix. 20 sq.; xxxiii. 14."——כָּשַׁל comp. iii. 8. Niph. נשבר xiv. 29; xxiv. 10; xxvii. 11; xxviii. 13; xli. 1.——יָקֹשׁ xxix. 21; xxviii. 13, in which last cited passage the verbs here employed are repeated excepting נפלו.——לכד again in Isaiah only xx. 1; xxiv. 18.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Having reproved the perverse policy of the earthly-minded Israel, the Prophet proclaims to the nations conspiring against Judah that they, the breakers-in-pieces, shall themselves be broken in pieces (vers. 9, 10). Then he says—turning to the spiritually-minded Israel—the Lord has emphatically warned them against the ways of the fleshly-minded (ver. 11) and forbidden them to regard the conspiracy of the enemies as most to be dreaded (ver. 12). Jehovah ought to be feared (ver. 13). He is to the one a sanctuary (asylum), to the others, a stone of stumbling and a snare (ver. 14, 15).

2. Associate——God is with us.—Vers. 9, 10. These words are addressed to the עַמִּים "peoples;" vers. 5–8 were addressed to "this people," ver. 6. Evidently then "peoples," ver. 9, is contrasted with "this people," ver. 6. The Prophet plainly addresses nations, that arm themselves against the land of Immanuel, devise plans, issue commands. Nothing shall come of all this. Comparing vii. 7, it is seen that Syria and Ephraim must be meant here. A remarkable contrast is put, when he that has broken others to pieces himself breaks to pieces. Syria and Ephraim had already done Judah considerable harm (comp. on vii. 1, 2); ver. 9, they are challenged to prepare still more, but spite of the breaking already accomplished, and these first attempts, they shall themselves be broken to pieces. The Prophet moreover summons distant nations to take notice of this for their own warning. The clause: "give ear—countries" is a parenthesis. As the Prophet repeats the words of vii. 7 "and it shall not stand," with little alteration, he intimates that he has the same matter in his mind. And in fact vii. 5 sq., speaks of "evil counsel" on the part of Syria and Ephraim against Judah, the land of Immanuel, as here of "taking counsel together," and "speaking a word." By this arises the conspiracy (קֶשֶׁר) spoken of ver. 12, which can mean nothing but the alliance of the two states named. כִּי עִמָּנוּ אֵל. For the third and last time we have the words Immanuel. They must certainly be read separate here as a clause. They express the idea of the name as an independent judgment. The world-power must shiver on the rock Israel, for it is thereby the strong rock in that God is with it. But this strong rock is not the Ἰσραὴλ σαρκικός, but the Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικός [not the fleshly Israel, but the spiritual Israel]. Comp. Ps. ii.

3. For the Lord——your dread.—Vers. 11-13. Judah is safe from the breaker-in-pieces, for God is with it (ver. 10). That is, in a certain sense, not unconditionally. For the LORD will be an asylum only to those who fear and sanctify Him; but to others, who fear men more than Him, He will be their fall. "For the LORD spake thus," etc.: "for," relates to the thought contained in the words Immanuel, "God is with us." This thought is both established and limited by what follows. For God is with that part of the people only that fears Him above all things, loves and trusts Him alone. Therefore the Prophet says that this word of the LORD was directed to him. But he is representative of the believing Israel. Therefore ver. 12 continues with "say ye not," and those addressed are expressly distinguished from "this people," ver. 11.

"Ye shall not say conspiracy."—Ver. 12. It is impossible that the Prophet can mean to say: "Ye shall not call everything conspiracy that people call conspiracy!" For what sort of confederations did they incorrectly call conspiracies? May, perhaps, Pekah's alliance with Rezin be justified here? Or is some conspiracy of the Prophet and his followers against Ahaz (ROORDA) approved of? Or, are the believing Israelites warned against taking part in conspiracies (HOFMANN, DRECHSLER), which does not the least lie in the words? According to vii. 2, the heart of Ahaz, and his people quaked like trees before the wind, when intelligence came to Jerusalem of the union of Syria with Ephraim. At that time, assuredly, the political wiseacres might be seen in every corner putting their heads together, and anxiously whispering: קֶשֶׁר קֶשֶׁר, "conspiracy, conspiracy." They called the alliance of Pekah with Rezin a קֶשֶׁר and saw therein, of course with some justice, the chief danger of Judah. Thus, the Prophet adds, "and what they fear shall not ye fear." It must therefore have been a conspiracy that was the subject of fear to the mass of the nation of Judah. The meaning then is that men ought not to say "conspiracy" so often, not so incessantly to have this word in their months, and make the conspiracy the matter of greatest concern.

4. Sanctify——be taken.—Vers. 13-15. Here begins the antithesis, that says what ought to be. They ought to sanctify Jehovah, (comp. xxix. 23, the only other instance of this Hiph.); He ought to be the object of fear, the terror-maker. In such a case He will be for man a safe, sheltering, holy asylum (comp. Ps. xv. 1; xviii. 3; xxiii. 6; lxxxiv. 5). But He will be a stone of stumbling to those that fear Him not. Therefore the two houses of Israel, Judah and Ephraim, shall be destroyed just by the LORD. It would have been better for this fleshly Israel, had it never known the LORD. Jerusalem is mentioned expressly, because, as capital city, its example had great influence. To it the LORD will be a snare.

[J. A. ALEXANDER on vers. 12-14. "קֶשֶׁר, according to etymology and usage, is a treasonable combination or conspiracy. It is elsewhere commonly applied to such a combination on the part of subjects against their rulers (2 Kings xi. 14; xii. 21; xiv. 19; xv. 30). It is not strictly applicable, therefore, to the confederacy of Syria and Israel against Judah (GESENIUS, ROSENMULLER, HENDERSON, etc.), nor to that of Ahaz with the king of Assyria (BARNES, etc.). It would be more appropriate to the factious combinations among the Jews themselves (ABEN EZRA, KIMCHI), if there were any trace of these in history. The correct view seems to be: that the opposition of the Prophet and his followers to seeking foreign aid, viz.: Assyrian, as a violation of duty to Jehovah, like the conduct of Jeremiah during the Babylonian siege, was regarded by the king and his adherents as a treasonable combination to betray them to their enemies. But God commands not to regard the cry of treason or conspiracy, nor to share the real or pretended terrors of the unbelievers."

On ver. 14. מִקְדָּשׁ. "Although the temples of the gods were regarded as asylums by the Greeks and Romans, no such usage seems to have prevailed among the Christians till the time of Constantine (BINGHAM'S, Orig. Eccles. viii. 11, 1). As to the Jews, the only case which has been cited to establish such a practice seems to prove the contrary. So far was the altar from protecting Joab, that he was not even dragged away, but killed on the spot. [The same obtains with 1 Kings i. 50 sq., cited by NAEGELSBACH. —TR.]. The word was meant to bear the same relation to תקדישו (in ver. 13) that מורא bears to תיראו and מעריץ to תעריצו. God was the only proper object to be dreaded, feared and sanctified, i. e., regarded as a holy being in the widest and the most emphatic sense. Thus explained מקדש corresponds almost exactly to the Greek τὸ ἅγιον, the term applied to Christ by the angel who announced His birth (Luke i. 35). In 1 Pet. ii. 7, where this very passage is applied to Christ, ἡ τιμή seems to be employed as an equivalent to מקדש as here used. To others he is a stone of stumbling, but to you who believe He is ἡ τιμή, something precious, something honored, something looked upon as holy. The same application of the words is made by Paul, Rom. ix. 33. These quotations seem to show that the Prophet's words have an extensive import, and are not to be restricted either to his own times or to the times of Christ. The doctrine of the text is, that even the most glorious exhibitions of God's holiness, i. e., of His infinite perfection, may occasion the destruction of the unbeliever."]

3. THE TESTAMENT OF THE PROPHET TO HIS DISCIPLES.

CHAPTER VIII. 16—IX. 6.

a) Prayer and Exhortation merging into prophetic vision.

CHAPTER VIII. 16-23. (IX. 1.)

16 [a]BIND up the testimony,
Seal the law among my disciples.
17 And I will wait upon the LORD,
That hideth his face from the house of Jacob,
And I will look for him.
18 Behold, I and the children whom the LORD hath given me
Are for signs and for wonders in Israel
From the LORD of hosts, which dwelleth in Mount Zion.
19 And when they shall say unto you,

That [c]peep, and that mutter:
Should not a people seek unto their God?
For the living[d] to the dead?
20 To the law and to the testimony:
If they speak not according to this word,
[e]It is because there is [1]no light in them,
21 [f]And they shall pass through it, hardly bestead and hungry:
And it shall come to pass, that when they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves,
And curse their king and their God,
And look upward.
22 And they shall look unto the earth;
And behold trouble and darkness, dimness of anguish;
[g]And they shall be driven to darkness.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 16. תְּעוּדָה beside here and ver. 20 occurs only Ruth iv. 7. The meaning is "testifying;" in the passive sense, "that which is testified," which then may be taken in various senses. The divine will which the prophets testify to men (Exod. xix. 21, 23; Deut. viii. 19; 1 Sam. viii. 9; Jer. xi. 7; xlii. 19; Am. iii. 13, etc.) has for contents both what men ought to do and what God has resolved to do. צוֹר imper. from צָרַר constringere, colligare (xi. 13); חָתַם (in Isaiah again only xxix. 11) is "to seal."—לִמֻּד occurs only Isa. l. 4; liv. 13 and Jer. ii. 24; xiii. 23. It means doctus, eruditus; and is used both of spiritual and of physical relations.

On vers. 17, 18. According to our construction it might be expected that there would be וַאֲנִי before חִכִּיתִי. But this וַאֲנִי follows in ver. 18; for הנה אנכי does not mean "behold, I am here," but, "behold I." I do not deny that in itself it may mean the former. But I believe that were this the Prophet's meaning he would have expressed it in a less mistakable form by writing הִנְנִי before אנכי or (Gen. xlix. 16) הִנֵּנוּ. I think הנה אנכי, then, is epexegetical of the subject of חכיתי. Then is explained why this subject is not more distinctly marked by וַאֲנִי. The Prophet obtains a more emphatic prominence for it in the הנה אנכי.—אות and מוֹפֵת are combined as in Deuteronomy (Deut. iv. 34; vi. 22; vii. 19; xiii. 3; xxvi. 8; xxviii. 46; xxix. 2; xxxiv. 11. Comp. Isa. xx. 3.—מֵעִם וגו depends on אתות ומופתים. This addition is, in relation to אשר נתן־לי י׳, not superfluous.

On ver. 19. אוֹב means an inflated leather bottle (occurs only Job xxxii. 19, and as a proper name Num. xxi. 10; xxxiii. 43), then the distended body of the ventriloquist, and then, not only the ventriloquist himself, (1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 9; 2 Kings xxiii. 24; Isa. xix. 3; and the passage previously cited) but the pretended spirit of the dead that spoke by him (1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 8; Is. xxix. 4; 1 Chr. x. 13). In many of these passages it is indeed doubtful which of these two meanings the word may have; or if it does not have both. Elsewhere the word seems to mean the secret art, necromancy, divination itself (2 Kings xxi. 6; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6). The plural is always אֹבוֹת. Because this plural occurs also Job xxxii. 19, it cannot for that reason be concluded that only women were possessed of this necromancy (בַּעֲלַת אוֹב, 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, the witch of Endor). Still it is surprising that בַּעַל אוֹב (masc.) is found only in the Talmud (vid. Gesen. Thes. p. 35). יִדְּעֹנִי never occurs alone, but always joined with אוֹב. It means "the knowing one, wise one, or wizard." Delitzsch, very much to the point, compares δαίμων according to Plato = δαήμων, "the much knowing being."——צִפְצֵף Pilpel, found only in Isaiah. The word primarily is used of the chirping of birds (x. 14; xxxviii. 14), then of the voice proceeding out of the ground (xxix. 4).——הָגָה is likewise a word that imitates a sound (comp. ach. achzen). As צפצף represents a high, shrill sound, so הגה does a low one; for it is used for the growling of a lion (xxxi. 4), of the rolling of the thunder (Job xxxvii. 2), of the low murmuring of the dove (xxxviii. 14; lix. 11). It occurs again in Isa. xvi. 7; xxxiii. 18; lix. 3, 13. In classic antiquity, too, we find a gentle, chirping, whispering voice ascribed to the dead. Comp. Iliad XXIII. 101, where it is said of the soul of Patroclos "ᾤχετο τετριγυῖα;" Odyss. xxiv. 5-9, where τρίζειν stridere is equally ascribed to the souls of the dead suitors and to the whirring of the bats in the dark caves. Other examples see in Gesenius, in loc. In our passage the necromancers are said to hiss and mutter, because they imitated the voice of the dead in this fashion.——דָּרַשׁ with אֶל (elsewhere it is construed with לְ Ezek. xiv. 7, or with בְּ 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 2 Kings i. 2) by reason of Deut. xii. 30; xviii. 11, occurs in Isaiah three times; here, xi. 10; xix. 3; comp. Job v. 8. The preposition is perhaps to be treated as depending on the notion of "penetrating" that is contained in that of investigation.

On ver. 20. לְתוֹרָה ו is an exclamation, a sort of shout of command. But if one must have a grammatical construction, the לְ may be taken as dependent on דִּרְשׁוּ or תִּפְנוּ (comp. Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6), whereby the remark of Gesenius (Thes. p. 728) obtains, that "אֶל praemittitur homini, לְ rei locoque." Delitzsch compares Jud. vii. 18. לַיהוָה וּלְגִדְעוֹן, but it is doubtful whether חֶרֶב is not to be supplied there according to ver. 20.

Expositors differ extraordinarily about אִם־לֹא. The explanation is grammatically quite incorrect that makes אֲשֶׁר begin the apodosis, and construes it as a particle of asseveration or of the apodosis (= כִּי) Vitringa, Rosenmueller, Gesenius, etc.). Others (De Wette, Maurer, Ew., Hitzig, Drechsler) take אִם־לֹא as a form of adjuration: "they will say truly." But this involves an evident contradiction. For how can he who turns to the law and testimony curse his king and God in time of need? Others (Knobel, Delitzsch) take it as an interrogative particle, referring it back to הֲלֹא ver. 19: "Or will not they accord in this word that are without dawn?" But from the context it appears that this is just what they will not do. I construe אִם־לֹא simply = nisi, and begin the apodosis with וְעָבַר ver. 21 (so, too, Diestel).——שַׁחַר (comp. xix. 12) occurs xlvii. 11; lviii. 8, as figure of the dawning revelation of salvation.

On ver. 21. בָּהּ is referred by Vitringa, Maurer, Delitzsch, etc., to אֶרֶץ understood as a matter of course, ver. 22. But this אֶרֶץ is not so a matter of course, because it first appears after; and עָבַר cannot be said only in relation to the notion "land." Roorda, Drechsler refer it more correctly to the condition intimated by אֵין לוֹ שַׁחַר.——נִקְשֶׁה is the ἅπ. λεγ. If קָשָׁה means durum esse, "to be hard, heavy," then נִקְשֶׁה is "treated hard, grieved, oppressed."——רָעֵב (ix. 19; xxix. 8; xxxii. 6; xliv. 12; lviii. 7, 10) adds to the notion of outward pressure that of incapacity to bear, that is occasioned by hunger. The full (Deut. xxxii. 15; Ps. lxxviii. 29; Prov. xxx. 9) has easily too much, the hungry too little strength.——Hithp. הִתְקַצֵּף only here Kal. xlvii. 6; liv. 9; lvii. 16, 17; lxiv. 4, 8.——קִלֵּל I construe with בְּ in the sense of "curse against one." Elsewhere it is construed with the accusative, and the following בְּ signifies the higher power by which one swears, i. e., by whose mediation one imprecates evil on the object of his wrath (1 Sam. xvii. 43; 2 Kings ii. 24). But with that construction there would be wanting here an object of the cursing (Diestel). And it is much more natural that one enraged should curse the cause of his sufferings than the sufferings themselves. קִלֵּל may be construed with בְּ after the analogy of verbs that mean striving (xix. 2; xxx. 32, etc.) and being angry (Deut. iii. 26; Ps. lxxviii. 62; Gen. xxx. 2; xliv. 18, etc.).——On ver. 22. הִבִּיט Hiph. xviii. 4; xxii. 11; xlii. 18; li. 1, 2, 6, etc. צָרָה וַחֲשֵׁכָה, "distress and darkness," vid. comment. on ver. 30.——מְעוּף caligo "obscurity," ἅπ. λεγ.——צוּקָה found again xxx. 6; Prov. i. 27.——אֲפֵלָה (again lviii. 10; lix. 9) is used for thick darkness, e. g., Exod. x. 22.——מְנֻדָּח some take in the sense of "scared away," so that the transition would begin here. "As to this time the nation will have been rejected, so from now on shall misfortune, as it were, be exiled" (Drechsler). But the words אֶפֶס כִּי are so completely co-ordinate with both the foregoing members of the sentence, and on the other hand the transition is so utterly without anything to indicate it, that this meaning cannot be satisfactory. Others (Knobel, Delitzsch) explain after the analogy of Jer. xxiii. 12, as if it read וּבָאֲפֵלָה הוּא מְנֻדָּח, or וְהִנּוֹ בָּאֹפֶל כִּי. But this also seems too artificial. The omission of the subject, when it is especially looked for on account of its generic difference from the subjects of both the foregoing members, must raise a doubt. But נָדַח has by no means only the signification "to scatter, disperse." In Deut. xx. 19 it means impellere (securim), 2 Sam. xv. 14, propellere, immittere (miseriam) Prov. vii. 21 depellere, "drive away; seduce." Why then may not אפלה מנדח mean tenebrae immissae, whereby, because the notion dispellere undoubtedly lies in the word, it may be taken in the sense of ab omni parte immissae, longe lateque diffusae? So substantially Saadia, Ko-

CHEE. As regards the incongruity of gender, it need give no surprise. The predicate is to be construed as neuter: tenebras immissum, expansum aliquid. It is apparent that in the three members of ver. 22 b reigns the law of unity in manifoldness. For evidently these three members are so far alike that in all of them the words are in pairs, and the notion of darkness recurs as the chief one. But in the first member occurs hendiadys (distress and darkness—obscuring distress, or distressing obscurity), in the second both are merged into one notion, dimness of anguish; in the third the predicate is added in an adjective, i. e., participial form.

On ver. 23. I construe the words אם לא ver. 20 on to כי לא מועף וגו׳ מנדח ver. 22 as a parenthesis, and refer כי לא מועף וגו׳ to לתורה ולתעודה ver. 20. Where law and testimony live in men's souls, there, spite of distress (מוּצָק only here in Isaiah; comp. Job xxxvi. 16; xxxvii. 10), is no darkness. לא מוּעָף ἅπ. λεγ. notice in Mu-aph a reverse vowel pointing from Ma-uph, ver. 22, a play of words that reflects the contrast of thought.—לָהּ anticipates the idea of "land" contained in next clause.—כָּעֵת וגו—כְּ is not a conjunction "as," but a preposition, and signifies the coincidence (ix. 2; Gen. xviii. 1, 10, 14; xxxix. 18; Jud. ii. 4, etc.)—"about the first time." This "first time" evidently extends to the dawn of the new time that begins with the Messiah; and עת האחרון "last time" coincides therefore with אחרית הימים (ii. 2).—קַל means levem, tenuem, exilem esse (Gen. viii. 11; Job vii. 6; Nah. i. 14; Jer. iv. 13, etc.), therefore the Hiph. (again in Isaiah only, xxiii. 9) levem, exilem reddere.—אַרְצָה a poetic form of אֶרֶץ (comp. Job xxxiv. 13; xxxvii. 12).—והאחרון is best construed as accusative of time. It might, indeed, be taken as nominative, but elegance is against it. The same regions, that in the first clause of the verse are described as the object of the הֵקַל "degrading," are now, in the second clause, by other divisions and names, said to be the object of הכביד, "glorifying." ["The English version supposes a contrast that requires הֵקַל to be taken in the sense of lightly afflicting, as distinguished from הִכְבִּיד to afflict more grievously. But this distinction is unauthorized by usage."—J. A. ALEXANDER].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. I cannot help thinking that in this section we have a farewell address of the Prophet; as it were, his spiritual will. That it speaks of "disciples," whereas there is no mention of them elsewhere, is a hint that here lies before us a written archive specially meant for them. What, then, could the Prophet have given his disciples in this written form, but something that must be valuable to them for the time, when he could no longer communicate with them by word of mouth as he could at that moment? Then, too, the prayer to the LORD, to seal in the disciples law and testimony, the emphatic reference to the pledges of faith given in the persons of himself and his sons, the warning against future seductions, and the reference to that which could give light and comfort in the troublous days to be expected,—all this brings me to the conviction that here we have actually the spiritual testament of Isaiah to his disciples.

2. Bind up —— my disciples.—Ver. 16. The opening words of this will connect appropriately with the LORD's words of exhortation ver. 13. I have no doubt that the words ver. 16, are addressed to Jehovah. For only the LORD can do this binding up and sealing. The prophets might seal a book roll, or declare that the meaning of a prophecy is to be shut up till a certain time (vid. Dan. viii. 26; xii. 4, 9; Rev. x. 4; xxii. 10; Isa. xxix. 11; Jer. li. 60 sqq. and my comment); but they cannot seal the divine revelation in the hearts of men. Moreover, in all the following verses the Prophet is the speaker, and the change from the words of God to the words of the Prophet must certainly have been more distinctly marked than by the simple ו before חכיתי. The mention of binding up and sealing in a spiritual sense was perhaps occasioned by the actions appropriate to the real documents (vid. Jer. xxxii. 9 sqq.). Having so disposed of the writing that contained his own will, the Prophet prayed the LORD to do still better, and enclose and seal up his testament in the hearts of his disciples. For the propriety of the metaphor, vid. Prov. iii. 3; vii. 3; Jer. xxxi. 33. They are the same as "are written to life," Isa. iv. 3. As primarily "the law" means the Mosaic law, which was the basis and norm of all prophetic announcements (Deut. xiii. 1 sqq.; xviii. 18 sqq.), and which the Prophets ever and again had to reimpress (Jer. xxix. 19), so Isaiah must mean by "the testimony" all additional prophetic testimony, especially all threatenings and promises that referred to the future. In the prayer he makes for his disciples, he does not intend the preservation of the divine testimony unto the proper time for its revelation, but he would thereby give to themselves the only true support and comfort for the evil days to come. As, according to ver. 17, his faith in the word of God was his own sole comfort, so (ver. 20) he directs his disciples to the law and testimony, warning them against every false comfort (ver. 19). Though Isaiah had primarily disciples and scholars in mind, we need not suppose he was at the head of a school of prophets. What he would teach them was religious truth, not to prophesy. And thus about this group of scholars, as about a nucleus, would gather all in Jerusalem and Judah that had any heart for the spiritual jewels of Israel.

3. I will wait—— in mount Zion.—Vers. 17, 18. This affords a touching insight into the personal life of the Prophet. He enforces the prayer just made by confessing that he holds fast to the LORD, and waits (vid. v. 4; xxv. 9; xxvi. 8; xxxiii. 2; li. 5; lix. 9, 11; lx. 9; lxiv. 2), notwithstanding the LORD seems to have forsaken the house of Jacob (he evidently means "this people," the fleshly Israel) and hidden His face (comp. l. 6; liii. 3; liv. 8; lix. 2; lxiv. 6). But he does not hope alone. His children hope with him. This is significant. We know, indeed, nothing about the age of the children. That our passage follows close on viii. 1-4, is no proof that it originated in that period. Isaiah would hardly at that time have designated his children (plural) as companions of his faith. For Maher-shalal was hardly yet born, and this circumstance speaks rather for later composition. Isaiah knows that his children are not only children of his body, but of his spirit too. They are miraculous children, products, not only of nature, but of the divine effective power. (Rom. ix. 7 sqq.: Gal. iv. 28 sq.). Therefore, not only are his and their names prophetic, but their birth, too, is such; at least that of Maher-shalal. Thus they are by their existence as by their names אֹתוֹת, signa, τύποι τοῦ μέλλοντος (Rom. v. 14) "finger boards," and מוֹפְתִים, miraculous pledges of miracles. "Which Jehovah has given me;" by these words Isaiah points to the support of his hope. For why should not we hope in God who has done such wonders? Our passage, moreover, recalls the words of Joshua xxiv. 15: "I and my house will serve the LORD."

4. And when they shall say——to the dead.—Ver. 19. The Prophet now adds a warning against seduction to idolatrous necromancy. And does not this warning give the impression of proceeding from a man who is on the point of leaving his own, and who, before his departure, seeks to protect them against impending danger? "And when they shall say," presents the superstition as at hand and to be dreaded. From ii. 6; iii. 2 sq., we see that various sorts of superstitious divination were practised among the Jews at that time. Such were expressly forbidden in the law. Comp. Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6, 27; Deut. xviii. 10, 11. In all these passages אֹבוֹת "familiar spirits" and יִדְּעֹנִים "wizards" are named together, and Deut. xviii. 11 the words דֹּרֵשׁ אֶל־הַמֵּתִים "necromancer" are expressly added: so that Isaiah seems to have had this passage in mind.

The second clause of the verse, "should not," etc., is usually regarded as the reply of the believing disciples to those who tempted them [J. A. ALEXANDER]. But this seems to me unnecessary. It is primarily the answer that Isaiah himself gives, and it is to be understood that the disciples are to reply to the same effect. According to the Prophet, those seductive temptations are to be met by two arguments. First, he urges that every nation must inquire of its god as the chief disposer of its destiny. Therefore Israel ought to turn to Jehovah. It appears from this that the Prophet assumes the position that Jehovah is the national god of Israel, without challenging the existence of other gods, and that he assumes that those tempters recognise Jehovah as the proper national god. (God of the fathers). The second argument Isaiah takes from the representation of the ancients of the relation of the dead to the living. Only he that lives in the body lives really. By death he sinks deep down. Comp. FRIEDR., NAGELSBACH, Homer. Theol. VII. § 14 sqq. Nachhomer. Theol. VII. § 14 sqq. But how nearly Hebrew representations approach those of classic antiquity, may be seen from passages like xiv. 9 sqq.; Ezek. xxvi. 20 sq.; xxxi. 14 sqq.; xxxii. 17 sqq.; Isa. xxxviii. 18 sq.; Ps. vi. 6: lxxxviii. 4 sqq.; Job xiv. 10 sqq. It is therefore folly, nonsense, to seek any help for the living among those gone down deep. Thus the words בְּעַד וגו are to be construed interrogatively: "For the living (shall one inquire of) the dead?"

4. To the law——Galilee of the nations.—Vers. 20–23 (ix. 1). Now Isaiah refers his disciples to the divine source of light and comfort, which alone can keep them upright in the impending evil days. Whoever does not find these his support, will undoubtedly be destroyed. Who shall say: "To the law and the testimony?" All that have no dawn. They are such as nowhere see in any outward relations a ray of light, that announces the day of salvation. When such see no inward comfort and support by means of God's word, they wander oppressed and hungry, etc. As hunger smarts, it readily happens that such fall into a bitter rage and curse their king and God, thus both the heavenly and earthly government, as being to blame for their sufferings. Most expositors understand by מַלְכּוֹ "his king" that a divinity is meant; and only differ as to whether, according to Ps. v. 3; lxviii. 25, Jehovah is meant, [so J. A. ALEXANDER and BARNES] or, according to Am. v. 26; Zeph. i. 5, the idols; agreeing that "king" and "God" mean the same person. But against this speaks: 1. ב occurring twice; 2. the following "he looks upward and to the earth he looks." Similar blasphemy is described as a symptom of the anti-Christian time Rev. xvi. 9, 11, 21.

Wherever the wretched look, above or to earth, everywhere presents itself only the mournful sight of dark distress.

About the first time, etc.—Ver. 23 (ix. 1). The Prophet now intimates what sort of light shall arise to the believing from the law and testimony. He shall know from the prophecy, which the Prophet with these very words gives to his own (to which however, others still are added later), that the North of Palestine, which heretofore was little regarded compared with the South, shall attain to great honor, and become a place of great blessing to the whole land. He evidently refers to the Messianic time, and intimates that the glory of it will illuminate in an eminent way that northern region of Palestine. More particularly as to the how? and when? the Prophet does not know. If it is asked why he predicts this just here, we may see the ground for it in the fact that at that time, it was just from that northern quarter of the Ten Tribes, that great danger threatened Judah. The war with Syria and Ephraim was the occasion of this whole series of prophecies. The gaze of the Prophet is emphatically fastened on the North. What wonder if on this occasion he not only predicts the impending judgment of this northern land, but also the glory in store for it!

Zebulon was bounded on the North by Naphtali, eastward by the sea of Galilee, westward by Asher and Phœnicia (comp. Josh. xix. 10 sqq.). Naphtali possessed the north-east of Canaan west of Jordan, for it touched the base of Antilebanon, was bounded on the east by the sea of Galilee, on the south by Zebulon, and on the west by Asher. (Josh. xix. 32 sqq.). As "the way of the sea," according to the context, must be a land inhabited by Israelites, it cannot be the coast of the Mediterranean, as some have supposed; for Phœnicians dwelt there. It can only be the coast of the יָם כִּנֶּרֶת "the sea of Chinnereth"(Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3; xiii. 27)—עבר הירדן "bank of Jordan," is East Jordan land. The expression, with and without "the sun-rising," is extremely common (Gen. l. 10 sq.; Num. xxxv. 14; Deut. i. 1, 5; Josh. i. 14 sq.; ii. 10, etc.). The region named here גליל הגוים "Galilee of the nations," (ἀπ. λεγ.), was originally called הַגָּלִיל "the Galilee," (the bent, the circuit, circulus, annulus, comp. כִּכָּר) and was a part of Naphtali. Comp. Josh. xx. 7; xxi. 32; 1 Chr. vi. 61; 1 Macc. ii. 63. The region is called also אֶרֶץ הַגָּלִיל (1 Kings ix. 11), and הַגָּלִילָה (2 Kings xv. 29).

In Jud. i. 30-33 we are told that, as elsewhere, the Canaanites were not exterminated from this region. From the nature of things, in a region so distant from the national sanctuary, the heathen element would increase more than elsewhere. The continual intercourse with neighboring heathen in war and peace, moreover, the depriving the land of its Israelite inhabitants by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xv. 29) may have gradually given the heathen element a preponderance. From the New Testament, we know that the Jews looked down on the Galileans with a certain contempt (Jno. i. 46; vii. 41, 52; Acts ii. 7). When, Jno. vii. 41 the Jews questioned whether the Messiah would come out of Galilee, when they, ver. 52, asserted, too, that not even a Prophet was to come out of Galilee, it is the more remarkable that, as Delitzsch quotes, Talmud and Midrasch say: that "the Messiah shall be revealed in Galilee, and from out Tiberias shall the redemption dawn." But Matthew sees in the fact that Jesus "came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea coast in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim" a fulfilment of our prophecy, and justly (vid. Matt. iv. 13 sqq.). For that the Prophet notices such special traits of the Messianic picture of the future as the ante-nuptial conception, and the going forth from Galilee will not surprise these who reflect that these special matters are no trifles, but of greatest importance, and thus in a high degree worthy of prophetic notice. For they belong essentially to that fundamental character of the plan of redemption, whereby the Redeemer and His kingdom shall rise out of the depth of humility and ignominy to honor and glory.

[J. A. Alexander with Henderson, Cocceius and others regard the words ver. 16 as spoken to the Prophet "by God, or, as some suppose, by the Messiah, the מִקְדָּשׁ mentioned in the foregoing verse; and likewise vers. 17 and 18, because there is no intimation of a change in the speaker, and because Heb. ii. 13, v. 17 is quoted as the words of the Messiah, not as an illustration, but as a proof that Christ partook of the same nature with the persons called His children. Delitzsch and v. Hofmann (vid. their comment on Heb. ii. 13), who agree in treating these words of vers. 16-18 as the Prophet's, and yet recognize a typical and prophetic reference to Christ, explain the use made of this in Heb. l. c. by the canon: "it admits of no doubt that the writers of the New Testament, allow themselves to quote utterances of typical Old Testament personages concerning themselves as utterances, and words of Christ." Delitzsch.—Tr.].

b) The light of the future proceeding from a child that is to be born of the race of David.

Chapter IX. 1-6. (2-7).

2 (1) The people that walked in darkness, have seen a great light:
They that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.
3 (2) Thou hast multiplied the nation,
And [1]not increased the joy:
They joy before thee according to the joy in harvest,
And as men rejoice when they divide the spoil.
4 (3) [2]For thou hast broken the yoke of his burden,
And the staff of his shoulder,
The rod of his oppressor,
As in the day of Midian.
5 (4) [3]For[4] every battle of the warrior is with confused noise,
And garments rolled in blood;
[5]But this shall be with burning and [6]fuel of fire.
6 (5) For unto us a child is born,
Unto us a son is given:
And the government shall be upon his shoulder:
And his name shall be called
Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God,
The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.

7 (6) [c]Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end,
Upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom;
[d]To order it, and to establish it
With judgment and with justice, from henceforth even for ever.
The zeal of the LORD of hosts will perform this.

[1] Or, to him. [2] Or, When thou breakest. [3] Or, When the whole battle of the warrior was, etc.
[4] And it was, etc. [5] Heb. meat.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 1. צַלְמָוֶת is regarded by almost all later authorities as modified from צַלְמוּת (root צלם "to be dark"). But I rather side with BOETTCHER (De inferis, § 190 sq., 285, and Neue exeg. Krit. Aehrenl. II., p. 124), who, referring to עַזְמָוֶת (name of a person, 2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chron. xxvii. 25, and of a place, Neh. vii. 28; xii. 29; Ezra ii. 24; comp. Song of Sol. viii. 6) explains it as a superlative expression. The word often stands parallel with חֹשֶׁךְ and other kindred expressions (Job iii. 5; x. 21; xxviii. 3; Ps. cvii. 10, 14, etc.). It is a poetic term and intensive of חֹשֶׁךְ, being related to it as the night of death to common night. The word does not again occur in Isaiah.——נָגַהּ Kal. only here in Isaiah; Hiph. xiii. 10.

On ver. 2. Had the Prophet meant the heathen, he would have written גּוֹיִם. הַגּוֹי is evidently a distinct and single people.—In what follows, the most important inquiry is whether K'thibh or K'ri presents the correct reading. Of the old versions TARG., JON. and SYRUS decidedly read לוֹ; the LXX., too, so expresses itself that this reading is detected. But JEROME and SYMMACHUS read לֹא. But many as have been the attempts, no one has yet been able to obtain a satisfactory sense from the latter. I therefore take לוֹ for the correct reading (as do KNOBEL, DRECHSLER, DELITZSCH [J. A. ALEXANDER] among the later authorities). It stands in front as in Jer. vii. 7, 8, 9, 14, 33; Prov. xxiv. 8, because an emphasis rests on it.

On ver. 3. עֹל סֻבֳּלוֹ, "the yoke of his burden." Of the noun סֹבֶל only this form occurs, and that, in this verse, x. 27; xiv. 25. How the primary form is to be pointed is thus undecided. But we are justified in assuming סֹבֶל (= סֵבֶל 1 Kings xi. 28) after analogy of גָּדְלוֹ (Ps. cl. 2) from גֹּדֶל (ix. 8; x. 12, etc.) as with קָבְצוֹ (Jer. iv. 7), קָמְצוֹ (Lev. ii. 2; v. 12; vi. 8). גֻּשְׁמָהּ Ezek. xxii. 24. Comp. EWALD, § 255 b.——The goad of the neck is explained by "the goad of the driver." מַטֶּה and שֵׁבֶט occur not seldom together in Isa. x. 5, 15, 34; xiv. 5; xxviii. 27; xxx. 31 sq.——הַנֹּגֵשׂ בּוֹ is evidently an allusion to Exod. v. 6, where Pharaoh's task-masters are called נֹגְשִׂים בָּעָם. Only in these two passages does נגשׂ occur with בְּ (after analogy of verbs that mean a physical holding to, holding fast, penetrating into: דָּבַק, נָגַע, הֶחֱזִיק, אָחַז, etc.; comp. נָהַג בָּם xi. 6).

On ver. 4. The כִּי at the beginning seems to me to be not co-ordinate with, but subordinated to the כִּי that begins ver 3.——The words סְאוֹן סֹאֵן בְּ׳ are very difficult. The ancient versions all vary, and it is evident the word was unknown to all. JOSEPH KIMCHI first cited the Syriac סָאוּנָא, מְסָאנָא, סְאוּן, מְסַן — calceus, ocrea, caliga, as also to the like meaning Chaldaic סֵינָא and מְסָנָא (comp. Aetheop. אֳסאן). To this explanation assent, among modern authorities, ROSENMUELLER, GESENIUS, HENGSTENBERG, EWALD, DRECHSLER, BOETTCHER, DELITZSCH, DIESTEL. I side with these, and give to סְאוֹן the meaning "boot," and סֹאֵן, as particip. of the verbi denom. סָאַן "to boot, to stride in boots."——רַעַשׁ is understood by many of the noise of battle, according to Jer. x. 22 (GESENIUS, DELITZSCH [J. A. ALEXANDER] etc.). But the expression is not too strong for the heavy tramp of the booted foot, as DELITZSCH says it is, since, Ps. lxxii. 16, it is even used of the rustling of the standing grain. Besides, the Prophet would depict here the wild noise of the impetuous advance, as afterwards the shocking look of the blood-stained garments. HOHEISEL has shown from PLIN. Hist. Nat. IX. 18, that soldiers' boots were stuck with nails (clavi caligares). He also cites JOSEP. De bello jud. VI. 1, 8, where it is told of a centurion who had τὰ ὑποδήματα πεπαρμένα πυκνοῖς καὶ ὀξέσιν ἥλοις, and JUVEN. Sat. III. 247 sq., where one cast down in the tumult says: "Planta mox undique magna calcor et in digito clavus mihi militis haerit." מְגֻלָּלָה part. Pual, from גָּלַל, which Isaiah uses again only in the Niph. (xxxiv. 4).—The Vav before הָיְתָה is that paratactic ו which we must render by a relative pronoun "that, this."—The phrase היה לשׂרפה is found only here and lxiv. 10.——מַאֲכֹלֶת only here and ver. 18.

On ver. 5. יֶלֶד means both the new-born child (Exod. i. 17; ii. 3, 6), and also the grown boy (Gen. xlii. 22, etc.). Isaiah uses the word pretty often: ii. 6; viii. 18; xi. 7; xxix. 23; lvii. 4, 5. The following בֵּן defines the sex. In 1 Chron. xxii. 9, where the birth of Solomon is promised to David, it is said: הִנֵּה בֵן נוֹלָד לָךְ. It is not impossible that the source whence the chronicler drew suggested the Prophet's words here.——וַתְּהִי is praeter. propheticum. For the Prophet sees the entire life of the Messiah child as actually before him.——The noun מִשְׂרָה, principatus, principatum, is found only here and ver. 6. The root שָׂרָה, kindred to שָׂרַר, whence שַׂר. שָׂרָה is not used in Hebrew in the sense of dominari, principatum tenere.——עַל שִׁכְמוֹ, "The shoulders are mentioned here as ver. 3, x. 27, in as much as they bear and carry (Gen. xlix. 15; Ps. lxxxi. 7), the office bearer having the office, as it were, on his shoulders," HENGST. יִקְרָא must be taken impersonally, as often: Gen. xi. 9; xvi. 14; Num. xi. 34; Jos. vii. 26; Jud. xv. 19. The TARGUM JONATHAN, translates on the assumption that only שַׂר־שָׁלוֹם is the name of the child, and that all that precedes is the name of him that bestows the name, for it renders thus: "et appellabitur nomen ab admirabili consilii, Deo forti, qui manet in aeternum, Messias, cujus diebus pax super nobis multiplicabitur. The most Rabbis follow this view, referring the predicates, "everlasting Father, Prince of peace," to Hezekiah. Even the Masorets would have only these predicates just named regarded as the name of the child, as may be seen from the Sakeph over גִּבּוֹר. But every one looks for the name of the one to be named after שְׁמוֹ, and not for that of the one giving the name. As the expressions אֵל גִּבּוֹר, אֲבִי־עַד, שַׂר־שָׁלוֹם form pairs, symmetry requires that פֶּלֶא יוֹעֵץ be regarded as a pair. If we construe it as two words, we have five names, which does not harmonize with the duality underlying the passage. Beside it has an analogy in פֶּרֶא אָדָם (Gen. xvi. 12) which is predicated of Ishmael. In this the man is properly subject and the notion "wild ass" is attribute. It might read אדם פרא: but the expression would not be so strong. Ishmael is not said to be a man that might be called a wild ass; but he is called directly a wild ass, that is at the same time a man accordingly, a human (two-legged) wild ass. So too is פלא יועץ stronger than יועץ פלא; for the latter would be the counsellor of a wonderful thing, or, that is a wonder, whereas the former presents the subject as a personal wonder, i. e., a wonderful one that gives counsel. Comp. the expressions יְמִים כְּמִסְפָּר, אֲנָשִׁים מְעַט, which are stronger than if the words were reversed. פֶּלֶא may be either st. constructus or absolutus, but the latter gives the more intensive sense.——אל גבור cannot be "strong hero" (GESEN., DE W., MAUR.) because (as KNOB. says) אֵל does not occur as an adjective and because it does not read גִּבּוֹר אֵל. Like most words of this formation, גִּבּוֹר is a substantive, but it is no abstract noun, and the boundary of nomina concreta substantiva and adjectiva is fluctuating (comp. יִלּוֹד 2 Sam. v. 14). So הַגִּבּוֹר stands as attribute of אֵל in the midst of adjectives, Deut. x. 17; Jer. xxxii. 18: and Isaiah x. 21 אֵל גִּבּוֹר is undoubted predicate of the absolute Godhead.——אֲבִי עַד. Names compounded of אֲבִי are frequent. In many it means pater meus (thus is properly pointed אָבִי), e. g. in אֲבִיהוּא, אֲבִיאֵל, אֲבִיָּה: for pater Dei, Jehovae is a dogmatic, and pater illius (for אביהוא) is a grammatical impossibility. In the names where אֲבִי is st. constructus, e. g., אֲבִיעֶזֶר, אֲבִיחַיִל, אֲבִישָׁלוֹם, אֲבִישׁוּעַ, etc., it may be doubtful whether it is genitivus auctoris or attributivus. But in אֲבִי עַד the genitive of the author is inconceivable: eternity has no author. We must take it then as genitive of the attribute — Father whose predicate is eternity.

On ver. 6. מַרְבֵּה (formed like מַרְאֶה, מַשְׁקֶה, מַעֲשֶׂה), means multiplicatio, "increase," and occurs again only xxxiii. 23. ELIAS LEVITA conjectures that originally the text read לָם רַבָּה (eis multiplicatur imperium), which is little probable. We might rather conjecture that it originally read לְהַרְבֵּה, to which also the LXX. would agree, which ends ver. 5 with αὐτῷ and begins ver. 6 with μεγάλη ἡ ἀρχὴ αὐτοῦ; from which it may be inferred they read לה (— לו) רַבָּה הַמִּשְׂרָה. The unusual construction would facilitate the change to לם רבה. [On the ם clausum see J. A. ALEXANDER in loc.]——אֵין קֵץ vid. ii. 7. HENGSTENBERG would have למרבה וגו depend on אֵין קֵץ. Grammatically this is admissible. But then למרבה would be superfluous. One would only expect למשרה. Evidently מרבה corresponds to אין קץ and stands in the same relation to משרה as אין קץ to שלום.——על כסא and על ממלכתו relate to the subject and not to the object of the increase and peace-making.——The infinitives להכין and לסעדה I hold to be gerundive infinitives: thus is avoided the tautological relation to למרבה וגו', i. e., the repetition of the aim.——קִנְאַת is a two-edged word. It involves both the notion of the negative zeal consuming all that is opposed to it, and the notion of the positive zeal that provides and furthers all that serves the purpose. The same words occur again xxxvii. 32. Beside that, קנאה is found xi. 13; xxvi. 11; xlii. 13; lix. 17; lxiii. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The progress at the close of chap. viii. to this first part of chap. ix. is like that from early dawn to sunrise. "No dawn," viii. 20, "No darkness," viii. 23 (ix. 1), "Light is risen upon them," ix. 1, represent the stages in which the successive unfolding of the light contained in the Law and Testimony takes place. The light becomes not only clearer and brighter, but wider extended vers. 1–4 (2–5). All this blessing proceeds from a child, a son that is born to the people. It is a wonderful child; that is proved by his might and his names, that point to an origin above the earth. The child is a son of David, and will raise up the kingdom of David on the foundation of justice and righteousness. All this shall appear as accomplished by the zeal of Jehovah ver. 6 (7).

2. The people——divide the spoil.—Vers. 1, 2. The people that walk in darkness is certainly the same as viii. 23. So Matt. iv. 16 understands the passage. But if the great light first rises on this part of the Israelitish nation, it will still not be confined to them. How could such great salvation be the portion of one member and not of the whole organism? The imagery is like l. 10; lx. 1 sq. The distresses referred to viii. 21 must necessarily have had a hurtful effect on the population numerically. Hence increase of the nation necessarily belongs to the new dawning day of happiness and prosperity. This benedictio vere theocratica is elsewhere, too, promised as the physical basis of the period of Messianic prosperity. Comp. xlix. 18–21; liv. 1–3; Jer. iii. 16 (and my comment in loc.); xxiii. 3 sq. We assume that "the people" means Israel, not the heathen (see above, Text. and Gram.).

The nation, dwindled down to a remnant, is without joy; but, as no blessing comes singly, the nation, again become numerous, has great joy. This joy is so great because it is a joy before the Lord (Ps. xlii. 3; xcv. 2; c. 2). For substance comp. Jud. v. 30; Ps. iv. 8; lxviii. 13; cxxvi. 5 sq.; Isa. xxxiii. 23.

3. For thou hast broken——fuel of fire.

—Vers. 3, 4. These verses mention a twofold negative cause of joy: 1, the deliverance from the burden of oppression; 2, the cessation of war. The deliverance from oppression is mentioned first. But in order to give assurance that its recurrence is not to be apprehended, it is added that all arming for war, with its consequences, is for ever done away. Israel does not free itself by its own power from the yoke and goad of the driver. The Lord has done it like once He destroyed Midian by a little band that was not even armed (Jud. vii., especially ver. 2). The overthrow of the Midianites is mentioned x. 26 in the same sense as here. The deliverance from bondage is especially described as everlasting, in that, ver. 4, the absolute end of all warlike occupation is announced. For as long as there is war, there are the conquered and slaves. Only when there is no more war does slavery cease, to which no one submits except by compulsion. Comp. for substance Ps. xlvi. 9, 10; Ezek. xxxix. 9, 10; Zech. ix. 10. ROSENMUELLER recalls the fact that there exist coins of Vespasian and Domitian on which Peace is represented as kindling with a torch a heap of the implements of war.

4. For unto us a child——will perform this.—Vers. 5, 6. A third כִּי "for" refers the totality of all the blessings before named to a personal cause, to a child that is bestowed as a gift to Israel and all mankind. Herein lies the reason why the prophetic testament of Isaiah is inserted at this place. For, from chap. vii. on, the Prophet has represented the Messianic salvation as proceeding from the race of David in a genuine human way by means of conception, pregnancy and birth. Thus the statement fits this place very well, that one day there will be a birth, the fruit of which will be a child, which, fashioned wonderfully and infinitely higher than all other human children, will establish the kingdom of David, his ancestor, not only on the firmest foundations, but shall raise it up to the point of eternal power and peace.

There is no need of a definite subject for ויקרא "and one shall call," as the present has nothing to do with an actual name for use and calling. The name-giving is only ideal, not real, i. e., it is not the end, but means to the end, viz., the characteristic. The Prophet invents the names only in order by this means to characterize the child briefly, thus to say what he is, not how he shall actually be called by name. It is in this respect like יְהוָה צִדְקֵנוּ "Jehovah our righteousness" (Jer. xxiii. 6) and many other similar designations (comp. i. 26; lx. 14; Jer. xi. 16; Ezek. xlviii. 35, etc.). A wonder-counsellor is one (הִפְלִיא עֵצָה xxviii. 29) "wonderful in counsel," who forms wonderful, unfathomably deep purposes, into which "the angels desire to look" (1 Pet. i. 12). "Mighty God" being added, intimates that He has the power to accomplish His purposes. In this expression "God" is the chief word, and "mighty" is the attribute (see above, Text. and Gram.). Therefore the child is expressly called אֵל, "God," and that, too, God, who is at the same time Hero.

The question arises: can this name אֵל "God" be applied to a creature, and in what sense? Ps. lxxxii. 1, 6, comp. John x. 34 sq., are cited, where princes are called אלהים "gods." When the Jews would have stoned Jesus "for blasphemy and because, being a man, he made himself God," Jesus replied by referring to the Psalm: "Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods?" Evidently He would say that it is not under all circumstances blasphemy to predicate divinity of a man, because otherwise the Psalm could not possibly have spoken so of men. He therefore does not deny that he had called Himself God, but He challenged the right of the Jews to charge Him on that account with blasphemy, because it was possible He may have called Himself God in that sense that was allowable from their standpoint.

It appears therefore that the notion אלהים certainly can be used in various senses, and in some circumstances may be said of a creature, and without blasphemy. But there is a difference between אֵל and אֱלֹהִים. For the former is never used in the wide sense in which we see the latter used. אֵל always means the Godhead in a specific or absolute sense, even in passages like Gen. xxxi. 29; Deut. xxviii. 32; Mich. ii. 1; Prov. iii. 27. In Ezek. xxxi. 11 אֵיל=אֵל, comp. HAEVERNICK in loc. and Ezek. xxxii. 21. We must, of course, admit that for the Prophet himself there hovered a certain obscurity about this expression. For it is impossible for us to ascribe to him the full, clear insight into the being of the person of Christ and of His Homoousia with the Father. It was the New Testament fulfilment, and especially the Resurrection of the Lord, that first brought full light in this respect. The term "mighty God" must be contemplated from a double standpoint. From that of the Old Testament the expression appears to be a term of indefinite extent. It is possible that it designates the absolute Godhead, but it is far from clear in what sense. But if we contemplate the expression from the New Testament point of view, and in the light of its fulfilment, i. e., in the light of the Resurrection and Ascension, then it is plain not only that it may be taken as the predicate of the absolute Godhead, but that it must be so taken. For there is no son of David that can be regarded as the fulfiller of this prophecy except Jesus of Nazareth. But He is "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead," Rom. i. 4.

But in what sense is eternal fatherhood (אבי עד) ascribed to the child (יֶלֶד) in our passage? From the fact that the Son is called "Everlasting Father," we know at once that it does not mean the Father that from eternity begot the Son. But we must here, too, distinguish between the Old Testament and the New Testament points of view, and must say that from the former the entire comprehensiveness of the expression is not appreciable. When Isaiah lxiii. 16 and lxiv. 7 calls Jehovah the true Father of Israel, this passage may be taken as saying that the Son is the eternal Mediator of this love. But from 1 Corinth. xv. we learn that the Son will be the Second Adam, Mediator of incorruptibility and immortality (vers.

53) for His own. Finally the child is called "Prince of Peace," because, according to ver. 6, He stands at the head of a kingdom to which is assured eternal peace. This assurance is founded on the fact that this King will be David and Solomon in one person: David in so far as He casts down every enemy; Solomon in so far as he reaps peace from this sowing of war (Ps. lxxii. 3, 7; Jer. xxxiii. 6; Mic. v. 4, etc.).—Of the increase, etc. The Prophet sees the promised Son enthroned with highly significant titles that He may be a true semper Augustus, ever an augmenter of the kingdom and institutor of eternal peace. To this end the child is set on David's throne and over David's kingdom. The expected Son is Davidic. It is the Son that is promised to David 2 Sam. vii., the real Solomon; for his kingdom of peace shall have no end. That quantitative and qualitative influence of the augmentatio and pacificatio is only possible by founding the kingdom on judgment and justice (comp. on i. 21), and by carrying out every single act of administration in this spirit. And upon his kingdom to order it is taken from 2 Sam. vii. 12, where it is said: "I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish His kingdom" (וַהֲכִינֹתִי אֶת־מַמְלַכְתּוֹ). Comp. vers. 13, 16; 1 Chron. xvii. 11; xxii. 10; xxviii. 7; Prov. xx. 28.

[J. A. ALEXANDER on ver. 6. "The word קִנְאָה, "zeal," expresses the complex idea of strong affection comprehending or attended by a jealous preference of one above another. It is used to signify God's disposition to protect and favor His people at the expense of others. Sometimes, moreover, it includes the idea of a jealous care of His own honor, or a readiness to take offence at anything opposed to it, and a determination to avenge it when insulted. The expressions are derived from the dialect of human passion, but describe something absolutely right on God's part for the very reasons which demonstrate its absurdity and wickedness on man's. These two ideas of God's jealous partiality for His own people and His jealous sensibility respecting His own honour are promiscuously blended in the usage of the word, and are perhaps both included in the case before us, or rather the two motives are identical; that is to say, the one includes the other. The mention of God's jealousy or zeal as the procuring cause of this result affords a sure foundation for the hopes of all believers. His zeal is not a passion, but a principle of powerful and certain operation. The astonishing effects produced by feeble means in the promotion, preservation, and extension of Christ's kingdom can only be explained upon the principle that the zeal of the Lord of Hosts effected it."

"Is not this the reign of Christ? Does it not answer all the requisite conditions? The Evangelists take pains to prove by formal genealogies His lineal descent from David; and His reign, unlike all others, still continues and is constantly enlarging. HENDEWERK and other modern German writers have objected that this prophecy is not applied to Christ in the New Testament. But we have seen already that the first verse of the chapter and the one before it are interpreted by Matthew as a prophecy of Christ's appearing as a public teacher first in Galilee, and no one has denied that this is part of the same context. Nor is this all. The expressions of the verse before us were applied to Christ, before His birth, by Gabriel, when he said to Mary (Luke i. 32-34), "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end." The historical allusions in these words show clearly that the person spoken of was expected, or, in other words, a subject of prophecy; and though the terms are not precisely those used by Isaiah, they agree with them more closely than with any other passage. Indeed the variations may be perfectly accounted for upon the supposition that the angel's message was intended to describe the birth of Christ as a fulfilment, not of this passage only, but of several others also which are parallel with this, and that the language was so framed as to suggest them all, but none of them so prominently as the one before us, and the earlier promise upon which it was founded. Comp. 2 Sam. vii. 11, 12; Dan. vii. 14, 27; Mic. iv. 7, etc."]

B.—THREATENING OF JUDGMENT TO BE ACCOMPLISHED BY MEANS OF ASSYRIA, ADDRESSED TO ISRAEL OF THE TEN TRIBES.

CHAP. IX. 8 (7).—X. 4.

To the prophecies that denounce impending judgment against Judah, of which Assyria was to be the agent, is joined a prophecy, that announces the same fate for the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. For, that the latter are the subject of this prophecy appears, 1) because, in the whole passage, only Israel or Jacob (ix. 7, 11, 13), the "Ephraimites and inhabitants of Samaria" (ver. 8) appear as those addressed; never Judah. For ver. 8 shows plainly that we must so understand Jacob and Israel (ver. 7), because those receiving the word spoken of in ver. 7 are designated as "the whole people," and they in turn in the second clause of ver. 8 are specified, not as Judah and Israel, but as Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria: 2) because ver. 20 we notice that the totality who are there reproached with ruinous dissensions are divided into Ephraim and Manasseh. These are opposed to one another; if they unite it is for the purpose of attacking Judah. If Judah were included in the totality addressed there, it must read: "Ephraim Judah, Judah Ephraim." But Ephraim and Manasseh are designated as the mutually contending members; Judah as one outside of the community and the common object of their hatred. We will show below that ver. 11 a does not conflict with this interpretation.

As to the period to which this prophecy belongs, we may ascertain it from ix. 9. It appears there that at this time pieces must have been rent away from the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. We know of only one such diminution of their territory occurring in that period. It is that related 2 Kings xv. 29. According to that account Tiglath-Pileser, who had been invoked by Ahaz, depopulated a great part of the eastern and northern region of that kingdom. At that time the Ephraimites must have boasted that it would be easy to repair the damage they had suffered. Isaiah felt that he must meet this foolish notion, which took the damage done by Tiglath-Pileser for the conclusion of their visitation, with the announcement that that visitation was only the beginning, only the first of many following degrees. If, then, the foregoing prophecies (vii.—ix. 6) fall in the time before the introduction of the Assyrians, then our present passage belongs to the period immediately after. And if chapters vii.—ix. 6, are attributed to the beginning of the three years, when both Pekah and Ahaz were living, say about 743 B. C., then the present prophecy belongs to the close of this period, say about 740–39 B. C. (Comp. on vii. 15–17.)

The form of our passage is artistic, yet simple. Proceeding from the underlying thought that what the Ephraimites took for the end, was only the first stage, the Prophet builds up his prophecy in three stages, each of which points to the succeeding one with the refrain: "for all this His anger is not turned away, but His hand is stretched out still." Even the last concludes with these words to show that the judgment on Israel continues still beyond the immediate horizon of the prophetic view. This extreme visible horizon is the exile (x. 4). Beyond that the Israel of the Ten Tribes has disappeared to the present day. They experienced no restoration like Judah did. But to "the day of visitation and desolation" (x. 3) the punishments increase as the inward corruption grows. After that visitation to which the audacious words ix. 9 refer, Israel, instead of recovering and growing strong, is renewedly hard pressed on the East and the West. But still more comes (ix. 11 b). Still the people are not converted to Him that smites them. Therefore the punishment falls first of all on the leaders of the people, who have proved themselves betrayers, whose sins must be expiated by the betrayed down to the young men, the widows and the orphans (vers. 13–16). But still more comes. For the people are as a forest on fire: for the flames of discord spread on all sides with devouring and desolation (vers. 17–20). Injustice and violence, according to the constant Old Testament sentiment, the chief cause of the ruin of states, bring the people to the verge of the abyss. Then no seeking for aid from foreign nations will avail. Nothing remains but to submit to the horrors of exile. But still more comes. For even the carrying away into exile is not yet the end of God's judgments on Israel (x. 1–4).

Thus we have four sections, of which the first two have each five verses, the last two four verses. They may be set forth as follows:

1. The supposed end is the beginning of the judgment (ix. 7–11).
2. The deceivers the bane of the deceived (ix. 12–16).
3. Israel devouring itself by the flames of discord (ix. 17–20).
4. Injustice and violence fill up the measure and precipitate Israel into the horrors of exile (x. 1–4).

1. THE SUPPOSED END IS THE BEGINNING OF THE JUDGMENT.

Chapter IX. 8–12. (7–11).

8 (7) The Lord sent a word into Jacob,
And it hath lighted upon Israel.
9 (8) And all the people shall know,
Even Ephraim and the inhabitant of Samaria,
That say in the pride and stoutness of heart,
10 (9) The bricks are fallen down, but we will build with hewn stones:
The sycamores are cut down, but we will change them into cedars.
11 (10) Therefore the Lord shall set up the adversaries of Rezin against him,
And [1][a]join his enemies together;
12 (11) The Syrians before, and the Philistines behind;
And they shall devour Israel [2]with [b]open mouth.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.

[2] Heb. with whole mouth.
[b] a full mouth.

Ezek. xl. 42; lapides caesurae, i. e., caesi, only here in Isa. ——That בָּנָה means not simply exstruere, construere, "build up," "construct," but also simply struere "to pile," "pile up," appears from passages like 1 Kings xviii. 32; Exod. xx. 25.——שִׁקְמִים only here. גדע x. 33; xiv. 12; xxii. 25; xlv. 2 (from these examples it appears that it is wont to be joined with נפל); but the context shows that not cutting down trees is meant, as DRECHSLER supposes, but breaking down wooden buildings. חלף (see on viii. 8) is "to exchange." Hiph. is = "let come in as exchange, reparation;" comp. xl. 31; xli. 1.

On ver. 10. וישגב and also ויאכלו, ver. 11, are praeter. propheticum. The ו involves at the same time adverbial meaning. DRECHSLER remarks that שׂגב Pi. has always the meaning "to make high, unattainable, place higher, defendere, munire." But then it is construed with מן (Ps. lix. 2; cvii. 41). That עליו stands here proves that the word is taken in an offensive sense, which it may very well have. Moreover it is to be noticed that שׂגֵּב stands in contrast with the high structures which the Israelites purpose in ver. 9.——It is incomprehensible how EWALD can prefer שָׂרֵי, the reading of some MSS. to צָרֵי of the text; or how CHEYNE can construe צרי ר׳ as genitive of the subject, seeing that the same power that slew Resin and conquered his land, not twenty years later actually made an end to the kingdom of Ephraim.——סִכְסֵךְ is found only here and xix. 2. The verb סָכַךְ, with all its derivatives (סֻכָּה, סְכּוּת, מָסָךְ, סֹךְ) has the sense of "covering." Now there is a word שֵׂךְ, spina (Num. xxxiii. 55) and שֻׂכָּה telum acutum (Job xl. 31). As regards the exchange of ס for שׂ compare שָׂכַךְ Exod. xxxiii. 22. Seeing the meaning "to cover" in the sense usual with the Hebrews, i. e., "to protect," does not at all suit here (comp. ver. 11), and "to cover," = "to cover with arms, to arm," cannot be supported, I prefer, with TARG., SYR., SAAD., GESENIUS (Thes.), DELITZSCH, [J. A. ALEXANDER], to take סִכְסֵךְ in the sense of "to set on," stimulare, concitare.

On ver. 11. The formula בכל־זאת וגו׳ beside here and vers. 16, 20; x. 4, is found only ver. 25.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Lord sent —— cedars.—Vers. 8-10 (7-9). It seems to me that the words, "A word has the LORD sent," etc., "is fallen," etc., must be judged of according to passages like Job iv. 12; xxxv. 4; Ps. lxii. 12. As in those, a single little word, tossed to them, as it were, from the mouth of the Lord as from a judging and destroying power, is opposed to human pride and haughtiness, so the Prophet here opposes a single, brief word of the LORD to the Ephraimites which, as it were, falls by the way, but which suffices to humble that foolish pride. "The word" (דָּבָר) therefore, stands first with emphasis, as if the Prophet would say: only a word, nothing more has the LORD sent. And this word has, as it were, fallen in Israel by accident. I prefer to compare Ruth iii. 18, for the meaning of נָפַל "to fall," rather than Dan. iv. 28, because there, too, is the underlying idea of (at least seeming) accident. This mode of expression, by which the Prophet represents the following language as something accidental and by the way, has its reason, likely, in this, that Isaiah is a Prophet primarily for Judah, and not for Israel. He therefore steps beyond the sphere of his own proper activity with these words, which fall like a morsel from the table prepared for the children.

Jacob stands only poetically for Israel. It can mean the whole nation, and the people of the Ten Tribes just as well as the name Israel (comp. ii. 3, 5, 6; viii. 17). Only the context decides in what sense the name is to be taken where it occurs. In the introduction to this section, we have showed that both Jacob and Israel mean the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. This antithesis of Jacob and Israel in parallelism occurs here for the first time. It is found again as designation of the entire Israel, x. 20; xiv. 1; xxvii. 6; xxix. 23; xl. 27; xli. 8, 14; xlii. 24; xliii. 1, 22, 28; xliv. 1, (2), 5, 21, 23; xlv. 4; xlvi. 3; xlviii. 1, 12; xlix. 5, 6. This antithesis is found first in Hos. xii. 13 (of the Patriarch): then in Micah, and relatively the oftenest in him: Mic. i. 5; ii. 12; iii. 1, 8, 9. In Nahum ii. 3. In Jeremiah ii. 4; xxx. 10; xxxi. 7; xlvi. 27. Ezek. xxxix. 25. From this it appears that the form of expression is pre-eminently characteristic of Isaiah. If it is asked: what kind of word the LORD sent? I would refer for answer neither to v. 25 nor to vii. 14 sqq. For both are remote. Those are right that take ver. 8, or say ver. 10 sq., as the word referred to in ver. 7. Nothing is more natural; any word more remote must be more exactly designated. The word "they shall know it," ver. 8, favors this. For what should the Ephraimites know? Certainly, the very word of which ver. 7 speaks. At the same time the context makes it clear, that they should learn how ill the plan of Jehovah (according to ver. 10) will suit their proud plans. Therefore, "the word," ver. 7, is identical with the object of "they shall know," ver. 8, and we are justified in translating "and shall know it."

"Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria" are contrasted here just as "the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem," v. 3, comp. i. 1; ii. 1. The Ephraimites and Samaritans, then, shall come to a certain knowledge, as persons that are in a state of pride and height of courage, for which just that knowledge commends itself as the best remedy. Wherein the pride consists is said ver. 9.

The haughty language consists of two simple, easily understood contrasts. Wood and stone are the chief materials for building. Bricks are poorer than hewn stones, and sycamores than cedars. "Sycamore trees are common in Palestine," as THEODORET in loc. says. Flourishing in low places, (signum camporum sunt sycamori,) says the JERUS. GEMARA, comp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 28); they are prized as wood for building, but not compared with the cedar. (Comp. under Text. and Gram.) The sense of the figurative language is plain. They acknowledge that Ephraim has suffered, but they hope abundantly to repair all these damages.

2. Therefore the Lord——stretched out still.—Vers. 11, 12 (10, 11). Jehovah's doing ver. 10 sq. brings to nought the proud hopes of ver. 9, and is announced here as the contents of "the word" of ver. 7. They would rise high, but the LORD raises above even their high house, the oppressors of Rezin. These oppressors are the Assyrians. They had proved themselves such even at that time. They are called oppressors of Rezin, because Israel's strength at that time, lay in the alliance with Rezin. The same power that killed Rezin, and conquered his kingdom, actually made an end of Ephraim not twenty years later. Syria itself, compelled by Assyria, is represented as marching against Ephraim. Because of the words, "the Philistines behind," DELITZSCH supposes that the Prophet, from ver. 11 on, extends his view and has in mind all Israel, since the northern kingdom never had to suffer from the Philistines, whereas (acc. to 2 Chr. xxviii. 16–19) an invasion by the Philistines in Judah is expressly mentioned as belonging to the judgments of Ahaz's time. But if this were so, ver. 12 (11) would need to be more distinctly disconnected from ver. 11 (10). For, as they stand, the words "the Syrians—behind" must be taken as dependent on יסכסך "will set on," and the nations named here as specifications of "the enemies" ver. 11 (10). But then those attacked by Syria and the Philistines are identical with Ephraim to whom "him" and "his" (the suffixes in איביו and עליו (ver. 10) refer. But ver. 12 a (11) is not to be taken in a literal sense. Syria and the Philistines represent East and West. Isa. ii. 6; xi. 14 puts the Philistines as representatives of the West as opposed to (קֶדֶם) the East. Moreover we must not take "eating with a full mouth" as meaning a complete destruction. On the contrary, we see from ver. 12 b (11), that recurs afterwards three times, that the Prophet would say: ye hold the damage that ye hope easily to repair, to be the end of your calamity. But I say to you: you are destined to have your oppressors come on you from every side in superior power, and yet even this will be but the beginning of the end.

2. THE DECEIVERS THE BANE OF THE DECEIVED.

CHAP. IX. 13–17 (12–16).

13 (12) FOR the people turneth not unto him that smiteth them,
Neither do they seek the LORD of hosts.
14 (13) Therefore the LORD will cut off from Israel head and tail,
[a]Branch and rush, in one day.
15 (14) The ancient and honourable, he is the head;
And the prophet that teacheth lies, he is the tail.
16 (15) For [1]the leaders of this people cause them to err:
And they that are [2]led of them are [3]destroyed.
17 (16) Therefore the LORD shall have no joy in their young men,
Neither shall have mercy on their fatherless and widows:
For every one is an [b]hypocrite and an evil-doer,
And every mouth speaketh [4]folly.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.

[1] Or, they that call them blessed.
[2] Or, called blessed of them.
[3] Heb. swallowed up.
[4] Or, villainy.
[b] unclean and abominable.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 12. By וְ before הָעָם the thought of this verse is paratactically co-ordinated with the foregoing, whereas it ought properly to be subordinated in the form of assigning a reason. For had the people been converted by the chastisement, then had the wrath of Jehovah been turned away. We have here therefore one of those frequent instances where the וְ demands definition, which however the reader must supply.—לֹא־שָׁב sounds like an echo of the same words in the foregoing verse.——עַד, especially after שׁוּב, not seldom stands for אֶל: Deut. iv. 30; xxx. 2; Joel ii. 12; Amos iv. 6-11; Isa. xix. 22, etc. It appears that all these prophetic passages just cited rest on the original passage in Deuteronomy also cited. The expression דָּרָשׁוּ recalls Deut. iv. 29.——The article before מַכֵּהוּ is against the rule. The exception is to be explained by the pronominal force of the article according to which it refers back to ver. 11 b.

On ver. 13. ויכרת and ויהיו, ver. 15, must be taken as praet. propheticum, with which accord the fut. imperf. ישמח and ירחם ver. 16.——כִּפָּה found only here, xix. 15 and Job xv. 32.——אגמון found again only xix. 15; lviii. 5, what grows in אֲגַם, "the swamp."——נשׂוא פנים comp. on iii. 3.——מוֹרֶה in Isaiah again only xxx. 20.

On ver. 15. מאשׁרי comp. on iii. 12. Notice the paronomasia of the last two words.

On ver. 16. חָנֵף properly, "unclean, spotted," pollutus, immundus: x. 6; xxiv. 5; xxxiii. 14.——מֵרָע pausal form of מֵרֵעַ, unless it is = ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ as KNOBEL translates.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

For the people——he is the tail.—Vers. 12 (13)–14 (15). The four expressions, head and tail, palm-branch and rush, are to be found in the same order xix. 15. Many expositors (since Koppe's Anmm. zum Lowthschen Iesaias, 1799, sqq. the most of them) have misunderstood the figures. They have taken head and tail, as well as palm-branch and rush, as a figurative expression for "honorable and insignificant," and, because ver. 14 does not suit this construction, they have declared it to be not genuine. But just that ver. 14 ought to have convinced the expositors that head and tail did not mean superior and inferior, but two sorts of leaders, the genuine and the bad, i. e. those who as the elders and as men of high standing had a natural right to be leaders, and those that by lying prophecies presumed to leadership. Knobel says: "making the tail to mean a prophet that teaches lies is false, because the false prophets, too, were leaders of the people, and therefore belonged to the head." But that is what the prophet means. Only the irony has not been understood, with which Isaiah declares the false prophets to be such as have their place where the tail is. Thus he mocks them. He intimates thereby that the lying prophets are only seeming heads, but in fact representatives of the region of the tail, and that if men take them for heads and follow in the direction of their would be heads, then Israel will go directly backward instead of forward. Such is essentially the exposition of Drechsler and Umbreit. ["The false Prophets are called the tail, because they were morally the basest of the people, and because they were the servile adherents and supporters of wicked rulers. With respect both to the head which they followed and the body of which they were the vilest part, they might justly be called the tail. The Prophet does not make a like explanation of the palm-leaf and the rush, because they are not equally suited to express his contempt for the false Prophets."—J. A. Alexander]. The palm-branch growing high up on the trunk, so named because of its resemblance to a hand (כַּף, Latin palma) means of course the elevated ones, the rush the lowly. Thus three of the figures represent the leaders, and only one, those that are led, the humble ones. "One day" (comp. x. 17; xlvii. 9) expresses that the destruction comes with such might as to take off its victim with one blow.

2. For the leaders——destroyed.—Ver. 16 (15). As Isaiah intimates here the final destiny of leaders and led, the verse corresponds to "will cut off," ver. 14 (13) being, as it were, the specification of the notion. The leaders are misleaders of the people, and are themselves given over to error and its peril; but those led astray are swallowed up (iii. 12), a figure that recalls the position of the rush in the water. For, if it is long submerged, it perishes.

3. Therefore——stretched out still.—Ver. 17 (16). It might be objected to the Prophet that among the led were many that were irresponsible; thus without their fault they were led astray. Does the Lord make no exception in their favor? The Prophet denies this, saying that inasmuch as all those led astray are swallowed up, it is to be understood that none are spared, not even the young men, children and widows. But are not the children required to follow their elders? Are they not innocent then if led into error's ways by them? Ought they not, spite of this, to remain the ornament, the bloom of the nation, and consequently the delight of the Lord? But it shall not be thus. The wish expressed Ps. cxliv. 12 shall not be fulfilled. If the Lord, therefore, takes no more pleasure in the young, He leaves them indifferently to their fate. What it is may be imagined. Widows and orphans, without the guidance of husband and father seem, too, to be innocent and thus deserving of compassion. But no. They are all contaminated and thoroughly penetrated with evil. They are corrupt, atrociously bad, and what they say is insane wickedness. Therefore there can be no sparing. In fact the last degree of their judgment is far from being attained.

3. ISRAEL DEVOURING ITSELF BY THE FLAMES OF DISCORD.

Chapter IX. 18–21 (17–20).

18 (17) For wickedness burneth as the fire:
It shall devour the briers and thorns,
And shall kindle in the thickets of the forest,
And they shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke.
19 (18) Through the wrath of the Lord of hosts is the land [a]darkened,
And the people shall be as the [1]fuel of the fire:
No man shall spare his brother.
20 (19) And he shall [2]snatch on the right hand, and be hungry;
And he shall eat on the left hand, and they shall not be satisfied:
They shall eat every man the flesh of his own arm:
21 (20) Manasseh, Ephraim; and Ephraim, Manasseh;
And they together shall be against Judah.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.

[1] Heb. meat. [2] Heb. cut.
[a] charred.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 17. רִשְׁעָה, in the older writings found only in Deut. ix. 4, 5; xxv. 2; in Isaiah only here; beside this only in post Isaiah writings; so that the expression seems to be a reminiscence of Deuteronomy.—— בערה כאשׁ perhaps a reminiscence of Num. xi. 3.—— The form יצת occurs only once more in Isa. xxxiii. 12, and there it is undoubtedly passive. Consider in addition that here the preposition בְּ occasions surprise if thereby the object of the kindling is expressed (GESEN. would take this בְּ in a partitive sense, Thes., p. 172, sub. A. 2), whereas הִצִּית אֵשׁ בְּ occurs often (Amos i. 14; Jer. xvii. 27; xxi. 14; xliii. 13, etc.) thus it seems to me more probable that תִּצַּת is to be taken as passive of הִצִּית אֵשׁ. As to the form, see EWALD, § 197, a.—— התאבך is ἅπ. λεγ. The root אבך seems related to הפך whereby the meaning is approximated "to turn one's-self, to roll, whirl" (comp. Judg. vii. 13): "they whirled up in height of the smoke." The construction is analogous to עָלָה שָׁמִיר וָשַׁיִת v. 6; xxxiv. 13; Prov. xxiv. 31.——גאות must be regarded as accusative, and of that species that follows verbs of fulness. The expression גאות עשׁן recalls גֵּאוּת הַיָּם Ps. lxxxix. 10.

On ver. 18. נעתם ἅπ. λεγ. "burnt up, charred." חמל often with עַל; Exod. ii. 6; 1 Sam. xv. 3, 9, 15; xxiii. 21, etc. Here עַל stands for אֶל as Jer. l. 14; li. 3.

On ver. 19. גָּזַר means secuit, and is used of cutting through the middle a living body (1 Kings iii. 25 sq.) or a dead one (2 Kings vi. 4), comp. מַגְזֵרָה "a cutting implement," 2 Sam. xii. 31. It is better then to translate it, "to hew," than "to bite."

On ver. 20. The accusatives את־מנשׁה, את־אפרים depend on יאכלו, whereas על־יהודה depends on the notion of the hostile onslaught that lies in ver. 19 a.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This strophe plainly divides into two parts. In the first (vers. 17–18 a.), the dissension is described figuratively. In the following, the Prophet himself explains the figure.

2. For wickedness —— fuel of the fire.—Vers. 18 (17)–19 (18). The כִּי "for" appears to introduce the proof not only for ver. (16 b), but also for (16 a). For the impregnation with badness, that is declared of the whole people, ver. (16), displays itself as real, if its condition may be compared to an all-devouring conflagration. The badness burns like fire; not as a fire that devours only thorns and thistles (comp., on ver. 6) the lowlier products of the open field, but also the thickets (the standing timber, x. 34), of the forests, consequently seizes on the entire vegetation of the land, high and low. The fire of ver. 17 is the fire of sin, consequently a fire hateful to God, and which therefore bears no blessing in it, but a curse. The Prophet therefore can say that the effect of this fire is at the same time an effect of divine wrath. This effect is that the land looks burnt up, charred, while the people dwelling in it are become food of the fire. So far the figure.

4. No man shall spare——stretched out still. — Ver. 19 b (18) - 21 (20). With these words the Prophet explains the figure. It is plain that he means the fire of dissension. This he first characterizes negatively by saying, that one behaves himself pitilessly, unsparingly against the other; then positively by describing how the rough, selfish men direct their attacks now on the right, now on the left. But these attacks do no good: for those attacking get no blessing thereby; they remain hungry after as well as before. They do harm in fact. For it appears that those men of violence have raged against themselves, and (comp. Jer. xix. 9) have, so to speak, devoured their own flesh. In what sense he means this, the Prophet explains ver. 21 (20) a: The tribes of the northern kingdom were divided among themselves, but united for hostility against Judah. It is to be noticed that he does not say; Israel and Judah were mutually hostile; but names only Ephraim and Manasseh as embroiled in mutual strife. Judah, however, appears outside of their communion and the object of their common hatred, while, moreover, there is no reference to a hostility of Judah against Israel. Thus it appears that the Prophet represents the flames of discord as raging only in the bounds of the Ten Tribes. This is another proof that the entire passage, ix. 7—x. 4 is directed only against the northern kingdom. Manasseh and Ephraim are mentioned because these two tribes were descendants of uterine brothers, the sons of Joseph. From of old there was jealousy between these tribes (comp. 1 Sam. x. 27; 2 Sam. xx. 1; 1 Kings xii. 16; xv. 27 sqq.; xvi. 21 sqq.; 2 Kings ix. 14, etc.). From the first the Ten Tribes were little inclined to David's dynasty (2 Sam. ii. 8 sqq.); but their own history is a continued alternation of conspiracy and murder. It may be said that the Israelites did themselves more harm than all foreign foes could ever have done. Thus dissension was the destruction of Israel. And still even this is not the last stage of the divine judgment.

4. INJUSTICE AND VIOLENCE FILL UP THE MEASURE AND PRECIPITATE ISRAEL INTO THE HORRORS OF EXILE.

CHAPTER X. 1–4.

1 WOE unto them that decree unrighteous decrees,
[a]And [1]that write grievousness which they have prescribed;
2 To turn aside the needy from judgment,
And to take away the right from the poor of my people,

That widows may be their prey,
And that they may rob the fatherless!
3 And what will ye do in the day of visitation,
And in the desolation which shall come from far?
To whom will ye flee for help?
And where will ye leave your glory?
4 Without[b] me they shall bow down [c]under the prisoners,
And they shall fall [c]under the slain.
For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still.

[1] Or, to the writers that write grievousness.
[a] And writing evil they write. [b] (Nothing) except to bow among. [c] among.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 1. הוֹי comp. on i. 4. Because of this הוֹי, which seems to correspond to that in ver. 5, this last section has been incorporated in the chap. x.——חָקַק is "to hoe, hoe into, hew into, dig into" (xxx. 8; xlix. 16), then (mediately, through the notion of digging or graving in decrees into the tables of the laws) "to establish, decree" (xxxiii. 22). The participle חֹקֵק occurs again xxii. 16 and Judg. v. 9.——חִקְקֵי (again only Judg. v. 15) means the same as חֻקִּים. As to the form, see EWALD, § 186 sq.——אָוֶן frequent in Isa. i. 13; xxix. 20; xxxi. 2; lviii. 9; lix. 6, 7, etc.——The second clause of ver. 1 can be variously construed: Either, "And writing harm they write," or: "And (woe to) the writers that write harm." I prefer the former [which ABEN EZRA and J. A. ALEXANDER adopt because the accents require עמל to be governed by מכתבים.—TR.] 1) Because the quick return to the temp. finitum is a peculiarity of Hebrew (comp. the second clause of ver. 2 b); 2) because, otherwise, one might expect וְהַמְכַתְּבִים. Moreover, according to this explanation, הוֹי relates equally to the second clause of the verse: only it is to be subordinated to the first. כִּתֵּב Piel, which is found only here, is evidently intensive, meaning an occupation of writing significant for quality as well as quantity. We might conjecture that we have here a trace of mischievous, bureaucratic clerical administration.

On ver. 2. הטות מדין only here; it is commoner to say הַטּוֹת מִשְׁפָּט Exod. xxiii. 6; Deut. xvi. 19, etc., הט׳ אָרְחוֹת מ׳ Prov. xvii. 23 הט׳ צַדִּיק במ׳ Prov. xviii. 5, or simply הט׳ צדיק Amos v. 12; comp. Isa. xxix. 21.——גָּזַל only here in Isaiah.——עֲנִיֵּי עַם again xiv. 32.

On ver. 3. The וְ before מַה has evidently an adversative sense: ye are shrewd and busy in violence and robbery (comp. Piel כִּתֵּב above) but what will ye do, etc.——לְ before יוֹם has more than a temporal sense. The inquiry is evidently what sort of action will they develop to ward off the day of visitation and impending ruin. פְּקֻדָּה found again xv. 7; lx. 17.——שׁוֹאָה is procella, tempestas, and is found again xlvii. 11. The word is usually joined with בּוֹא, Prov. i. 26; iii. 25; Ezek. xxxviii. 9.——עַל־מִי for אֶל־מִי, a usage very frequent in Jeremiah (comp. x. 1) and not unusual in Isa. (comp. ver. 25; xi. 8; xxii. 15; xxiv. 22; xxix. 11, 12; xxxvi. 12).

On ver. 4. בִּלְתִּי (found again xiv. 6; xlviii. 9) after a foregoing negation, which must be supplied here as a negative reply to מה תעשו ver. 3, is equivalent to praeter, nisi, "except" (Gen. xxi. 26; xlvii. 18 Exod. xxii. 19, etc., EWALD, § 356.——כָּרַע impersonal, "one bows himself" (comp. vi. 10).——The phrase נפל תחת הר׳ cannot mean either: "lie among the fallen," nor, "fall under one slain," for the latter is hardly conceivable. It must mean "fall among the slain." One knocked dead may precipitate himself on one still living, and, when this happens wholesale, the situation of those alive under the slain is frightful. In this trait, too, there seems to me presented a contrast with the former glory (ver. 3) and power (vers. 1 and 2) of those addressed.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Woe unto them——the fatherless.—Vers. 1, 2. We might suppose that we have here a trace of mischievous, bureaucratic clerical administration. See above in Text. and Gramm.—Ver. 2. names the object that bureaucratic administration pursues. It is a negative and a positive. First they aim at excluding the lowly from justice as much as possible, or to rob them of the benefits of justice that are their rights. This negative proceeding has the further aim of making themselves possessors of the property of widows and orphans. For substance comp. i. 21 sq.; iii. 13 sq.

2. And what will ye do——stretched out still.—Vers. 3, 4. The storm is described as coming from a distance, because the Prophet, as ver. 4 shows, means by this figure the exile, whose agent will be a people that comes from far (v. 26; vi. 11 sq.; Jer. v. 15, etc.). "To whom will ye flee," is an allusion to the disposition so often reproved by the Prophet to seek aid from foreign nations. כבוד, according to the context, can only mean what those addressed, i. e., the powerful among the people, regard as their "glory," i. e., the ornament and adornment of their life, viz., their treasures, valuables, etc. The description is drastic: the hostile storm bursts, the panic-stricken flee, their valuables they seek to leave behind in a secure place. The reply to the question "what will ye do?" etc. is given ironically in ver. 4. Ye can do nothing, says the Prophet, except, etc. The lot of those addressed here will be worse than that of the other captives and slain. Whether in prison or in the train of those led away, the other captives will tread them under foot. Once they were honorable and powerful. Then they were dreaded (vers. 1, 2). Now the first that comes, in whose way they stand, treads them under foot. Others of them fall in war, and the slain fall on them and cover them with their bodies. Though in some sense the exile is the greatest theocratic punishment, still that catastrophe is in itself not the extreme. For the question arises: how long will the exile last? To Judah restoration is promised after 70 years (Jer. xxv. 11). In the case of Israel there is no certain mention of the sort.

C.—ASSYRIA'S DESTRUCTION THE SALVATION OF ISRAEL.

CHAP. X. 5—XII. 1.

This address is related to the two that precede as bright day to dark night. After Israel is compelled to hear that the same Assyria to which Judah's king had appealed for help shall be the instrument of his severe chastisement, now Assyria must hear that the Lord will destroy His instrument, because it fulfilled its mission, not in the mind of God, but in the sense of its own brutal lusts, and with proud boasting about its own might. Out of the toils of the world-power, whose totality Assyria represents here, shall redeemed Israel return home. Out of the almost dried up root of the race of David shall a sprout grow up that shall set up a kingdom which shall pervade and rule all nations with the spirit of peace.

As regards the time of the composition of this prophecy, it must be noticed, first of all, that x. 5-34 did not originate at the same time with chapters xi. and xii. Concerning x. 5–34, every thing depends on whether the passage x. 9–11 is understood in the sense of an ideal or an actual time past. VITRINGA, CASPARI, DRECHSLER, DELITZSCH take the view that the destruction of Samaria, that took place in the sixth year of Hezekiah, appears as a past event in our passage only in the contemplation of the Prophet. I cannot join in this view. The reasoning of the Prophet must have been without meaning and effect to his hearers if the conquest of the cities Carchemish, Calno, Arpad, Hamath, Damascus and Samaria were not at that time an accomplished fact and well known to all contemporaries. In addition, the messengers of Sennacherib, according to xxxvi. 18 sq.; xxxvii. 11 sq., really boasted thus. Nowhere in chap. x. is Ephraim spoken of as one that is to be conquered. Only the conquest of Jerusalem is lacking in order to let the destroying work of Jehovah on the people of His choice appear complete (x. 12). Of course one may say that our passage then belongs in the neighborhood of chapters xxxvi. and xxxvii. But those chapters, as they stand, are a historical report complete in themselves; whereas an essential piece, forming a consolatory conclusion, is lacking to the cycle of prophecies affecting Assyria, which begins chap. vii., if x. 5 sq. does not belong to it. As long as we have no proof that the passage x. 9–11 is not to be understood of things historically past, I can only assume that the Prophet combined the later address with the earlier, in order to give to that earlier the suitable conclusion. Concerning chap. xi. we have a datum for determining the period of its composition in the short prophecy against Philistia, xiv. 28–32. This short passage lives in the sphere of ideas of chap. xi. In fact, without chap. xi. it is not at all intelligible. On the contrary, we learn from xiv. 28 that Isaiah recognized in Hezekiah in a certain sense "the root" (שֹׁרֶשׁ) or "branch" (נֵצֶר)—through which the kingdom of David was to spring up with new life. The passage xiv. 28–32 was written in the year of Ahaz's death (728). The young king Hezekiah is described there as "the basilisk" (צֶפַע) that shall proceed from "the root of the serpent" (שֹׁרֶשׁ נָחָשׁ). It is known that Messianic hopes were connected with Hezekiah (comp. DELITZSCH on vii. 14 sq. and ix. 6); how far Isaiah shared them we know not. At all events chap. xi. was written after the death of Ahaz, and just as the hopeful Hezekiah ascended the throne (728 B. C.). Chap. xii. is a doxology that certainly belongs to that period in which the whole prophetic cycle, chaps. vii.-xii. were put together.

In accordance with this combination, the discourse plainly subdivides into three principal parts, and each principal part again into three subdivisions, so that three forms the underlying number. In the first part is Assyria, in the second Israel, in the third the Messiah, the chief subject. The chief traits of the discourse may be represented in the following scheme:—

ASSYRIA'S DESTRUCTION THE SALVATION OF ISRAEL (chap. x. 5–xii. 6).

I. Woe against Assyria (x. 5–19).
  1. Woe to the instrument that does not execute the will of God according to the mind of God (x. 5–11).
  2. Woe to the instrument that knew not that it was an instrument (x. 12–15).
  3. The execution of the woe (x. 16–19).

II. Israel's redemption in general (x. 20–34).
  1. The believing remnant of Israel returns out of the shattered world-power (x. 20–23).
  2. The condemned world-power is also not to be feared in the present (x. 24–27).
  3. The impetuous onset of the condemned world-power in the light of its final ruin (x. 28–34).

III. Israel's redemption in relation to the Messiah (xi. 1–xii. 6).
  1. From the apparently dried-up root of the house of David shall go forth a sprout that shall found a kingdom of most glorious peace (xi. 1–9).
  2. The return of Israel takes place only when the Messiah has appeared and the heathen have gathered to Him (xi. 10–16).
  3. Israel's song of praise for the wrath and the grace of his God (xii. 1–6).

I. WOE AGAINST ASSYRIA.

Chapter X. 5–19.

1. WOE TO THE INSTRUMENT THAT DOES NOT EXECUTE THE WILL OF GOD ACCORDING TO THE MIND OF GOD.

Chapter X. 5–11.

5 [1]O [2]Assyrian, the rod of mine anger,
[a]And the staff in their hand is mine indignation.
6 I will send him against an [b]hypocritical nation,
And against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge,
[c]To take the spoil, and to take the prey,
And [4]to tread them down like the mire of the streets.
7 Howbeit he meaneth not so,
Neither doth his heart think so;
But it is in his heart to destroy
And cut off nations not a few.
8 For he saith,
Are not my princes altogether kings?
9 Is not Calno as Carchemish?
Is not Hamath as Arpad?
Is not Samaria as Damascus?
10 As my hand hath found the kingdoms of the idols,
[d]And whose graven images did excel them of Jerusalem and of Samaria;
11 Shall I not, as I have done unto Samaria and her idols,
So do to Jerusalem and her [e]idols?

[1] Or, Woe to the Assyrian.
[2] Heb. Asshur.
[3] Or, though.
[4] Heb. to lay them a treading.
[a] And in whose hand my fury is a staff.
[b] unclean.
[c] To plunder plunder, and to prey prey.
[d] And yet their graven images excelled them, etc.
[e] carved images.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 5. As remarked at ver. 1, this הוֹי occasioned the existing arrangement of the chapter. What we have said concerning the origin of ix. 7—x. 4, and x. 5–xii., shows that this coincidence of the הוֹי is accidental. The expression שֵׁבֶט אַפִּי is clear. It is found only here. Analogous is שֵׁבֶט עֶבְרָתוֹ Prov. xxii. 8; Lam. iii. 1; comp. Prov. xxii. 15; Job ix. 34; xxi. 9.—The second clause is difficult. The translation: "The staff which in their hand, is the staff of my anger" (Gesenius) is grammatically incorrect. For then אֲשֶׁר must not be wanting before הוּא. Quite as grammatically impossible is that of Hendewerk and Knobel, who point מַטֵּה and connect it, across הוּא בְיָדָם as a parenthesis, with זַעְמִי: "and the staff of my anger, it is in their hand." To treat הוּא בְיָדָם as a gloss, like Hitzig, Ewald, I. Edit. and Diestel do, is violence. Only that rendering is grammatically possible that takes זַעְמִי as subject, and what precedes as predicate. Then הוּא only serves to mark מַטֵּה as predicate. For, were it not there, it would not be known which of the two words מַטֵּה and זַעְמִי is subject, and which predicate. Comp. e.g. הַדָּם הוּא הַנָּפֶשׁ Deut. xii. 23.—וַעַם beside here, is found ver. 25; xiii. 5; xxvi. 20; xxx. 27.

On ver. 6. חָנֵף comp. on ix. 16.—צִוָּה like Jer. xiv. 14; xxiii. 32, with אֶל xxvii. 4.

On ver. 7. Piel דִּמָּה is found also xiv. 24; xl. 18, 25; xlvi. 25; but is used in the last three texts in the sense of "to make like, compare," in which sense Hithp. ("to make one's-self like") is used xiv. 14.

On ver. 10. מָצָא with לְ like ver. 14; Ps. xxi. 9; comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 17. פְּסִילִים are "carved images;" comp. xxi. 9; xxx. 22; xlii. 8. Before יְרוּשָׁלִַם is to be supplied מִפְּסִילֵי comp. v. 29; xiii. 4.

On ver. 11. The עֲצַבִּים (in Isaiah again only xlvi. 1) are not essentially different from פְּסִילִים. For as the underlying meaning of פָּסַל is caedere, caedendo fingere (Exod. xxxiv. 1, 4; Deut. x. 1, 3; 1 Kings v. 32), so, too, עָצַב, (kindred to חָצַב, קָצַב) originally meant caedere, secare, "to cut out, to shape by hewing" (Job x. 8; Jer. xliv. 19).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Lord denounces woe against Assyria that is to be the instrument of His judgments (ver. 5). For He sent him against Israel (ver. 6), but Assyria did not execute the mission in the spirit in which he was commissioned, but in the spirit of his brutal and insatiable greed of conquest (ver. 7). This his sentiment appears in the grounds he assigns for his confidence that he will make conquest of Jerusalem: 1) his princes are all of them kings, which gives a measure of the extent of his might; 2) a row of conquests of great cities proves his invincibility. Having conquered kingdoms whose idols excel those of Samaria and Jerusalem, he will be able to treat Jerusalem as Samaria (8–11).

2. Woe unto Assyria ——not a few.—Vers. 5–7. The pivot on which the whole of the following announcement turns, is that the LORD denounces woe against the instrument of His wrath. In ver. 5 (see Text. and Gram.), the Prophet expresses the thought that not only is Assyria the rod of God's anger, but that the anger of God is also the staff, as it were, the magician's staff (comp. vers. 24, 26, where allusion is evidently to the rod of Moses) in the hand of Assyria. This turn of the image need give no surprise in our artistic Prophet. How far Assyria is used as a rod is explained, ver. 6. He is to be commissioned against the impure people, that on account of this impurity are objects of divine wrath, as it were on an official mission, to rob and trample down Israel, that they may become as the mire of the streets (vii. 25), comp. Jer. li. 20 sqq. Assyria will indeed trample down Israel, and as many other nations as possible, but not in order to execute the purpose of Jehovah on them, but only to gratify his own lust for world-conquest.

3. For he said——her idols.—Vers. 8–11. Assyria confides only in his own strength. He has no suspicion that he is Jehovah's instrument, the rod of His anger. Hence he enumerates the facts that justify his hope of easily subduing Israel. First, his princes are kings (comp. 2 Kings xxv. 28). When such have only second rank in the army of the great king of Assyria (xxxvi. 4) how wide must be his dominion. His second ground of confidence is past great successes. Three pairs of conquered cities are named. The conquest of one is premised as an event that made sure that the next one named must in turn succumb. "Is not Calno like Carchemish?" Carchemish was a city on an island in the Euphrates at the mouth of the Chaboras, called by the Romans Circesium, Circessum, Circusium, Jer. xlvi. 2–12; 2 Chr. xxxv. 20, and appears from the text to have been subdued earlier than Calno. The latter is called כַּלְנֵה Gen. x. 10; and כַּלְנוֹ Amos. vi. 2: perhaps the כַּנֵּה of Ezek. xxvii. 23 is the same city. It lay North-east twenty hours from Babylon on the East bank of the Tigris opposite Seleucia, and belonged to Babylon. Rebuilt at a later day by the Persian king Pacorus (90 B. C.), it received the name Ctesiphon. Thus Carchemish and Calno were two cities of Mesopotamia. Did Calno become as Carchemish, it appears that the conquest of the latter was not merely a happy chance, but the proof of the existence of a real power, which in every like case will conquer in like manner. Arpad is mentioned xxxvi. 19; xxxvii. 13; Jer. xlix. 23; 2 Kings xviii. 34; xix. 13. The classics do not mention the city. According to the Arabian geographer MARASSID, (comp. KNOBEL in loc.), an ARPHAD lay in the Pashalik Haleb (Aleppo) North-west from the latter place. According to KIEPERT (D. M. G. XXV. p. 655) Arpad lay 3 German miles north of Haleb on the spot where is found at present the ruins of Tel Erfad. In every passage where Arpad is mentioned, Hamath is found too. But, beside that, Hamath is often mentioned in the Old Testament. According to Num. xxxiv. 8 the northern border of the land to be possessed by the Israelites, was to extend to Hamath, which, according to 2 Kings xiv. 25, 28; comp. 2 Chr. viii. 4, was actually the case at times. Comp., beside Amos, vi. 2, 14. The city lay on the Orontes and was called later Epiphania. Arpad and Hamath were thus Syrian cities lying nearer the Holy Land.

Damascus and Samaria lay still nearer Judah. After naming three pairs of names of conquered cities as proof of the irresistibleness of Assyria, the Prophet could simply proceed; so will Jerusalem, too, be unable to resist. But three thoughts suggest themselves, which he would express before that conclusion. First, that the idols of the conquered heathen cities surpassed the (supposed) idols of Jerusalem and Samaria. Second, the point that Samaria is already conquered; and third, the thought that Samaria and Jerusalem, may just as well be set in a pair as Carchemish and Calno, Arpad and Hamath, Damascus and Samaria. Now the Prophet might, of course, have said: as I have conquered the heathen kingdoms, whose idols surpass those of Samaria and Jerusalem, and as I have subdued Samaria itself, shall I not be able just so to subdue Jerusalem? But then Samaria would belong to the premise, and Jerusalem would alone form the apodosis, and there would be lacking conformity to the pairs before named. Hence he combines Samaria and Jerusalem together in the apodosis, beginning with הֲלֹא "shall I not," ver. 11, but forms again within this apodosis, another protasis and apodosis, whereby, of course, the construction becomes abnormal; but still the thought is expressed that Samaria and Jerusalem should join as a fourth comparison, to the foregoing three. It is to be noticed that our passage assumes the conquest of Samaria, by the Assyrians (722 B. C.). According to 2 Kings xvi. 9, Tiglath-Pileser subdued Damascus. Samaria fell by Shalmaneser, according to 2 Kings xvii. 5 sq., but according to the Assyrian monuments by Sargon, in the third year of the siege. It was long after, that Rabshakeh actually used the language against Judah (xxxvi. 18 sqq.; xxxvii. 10 sqq.), that Isaiah here prophetically puts into the mouth of the Assyrian. Perhaps Isaiah had here in mind, what Amos (vi. 1 sqq.), at an earlier period held up to the people, though it must remain in doubt, whether Isaiah means the same conquest of Hamath and Arpad, that Amos refers to. Moreover, nothing more is known of the conquest of the cities Carchemish, Calno, Hamath and Arpad, by the Assyrians. But comp. on xxxvi. 19. That the Assyrian speaks of ממלכות האליל (אליל as collective in the singular) "the kingdoms of the idols" is a Judaism. The Prophet presents the Assyrian as making a distinction between idolatrous kingdoms and Israel, the monotheistic: whereas, the Assyrian knows nothing of monotheism, and afterwards speaks of the idols and images of Samaria and Jerusalem. Moreover the Prophet describes them as "nothings" (comp. ii. 8, 18, 20; xix. 3; xxxi. 7) whereas the Assyrian by no means regarded them so; for he held them all to be superterrestrial powers; only he maintained a distinction among them in respect to power. Thus we see how Isaiah suffered here some mixing of his point of view with that of the Assyrian.

2. WOE TO THE INSTRUMENT THAT KNEW NOT THAT IT WAS AN INSTRUMENT. Chapter X. 12-15.

12 Wherefore it shall come to pass,
That when the Lord hath performed his whole work
Upon Mount Zion and on Jerusalem,
I will [1]punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria,
And the glory of his high looks.
13 For he saith,
By the strength of my hand I have done it,
And by my wisdom; for I am prudent:
And I have removed the bounds of the people,
And have robbed their treasures,
And I have [a]put down the inhabitants [2]like a valiant man:
14 And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people:
And as one gathereth eggs that are left,
Have I gathered all the earth;
And there is none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped.
15 Shall the ax boast itself against him that heweth therewith?
Or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it?
[3]As if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up,
Or as if the staff should lift up [4]itself, as if it were no wood.

1 Heb. visit upon the fruit of the greatness of the heart.
2 Or, like many people.
3 Or, As if a rod should shake them that lift it up.
4 Or, that which is not wood.
a Have felled those enthroned as a bull.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 12. בַּצַּע is scindere, abscindere; hence "to make an end, complete." It is found once more in Isa. xxxviii. 12, and in the sense abscindere. There is ground for rendering יְבַצַּע as fut. exactum: for אֶפְקֹד, etc. will take place only when Assyria shall have executed his task. There is no doubt but that the Hebrew imperfect can have the meaning of the fut. exact.; comp. e. g. Gen. xliv. 10, 23; 1 Kings viii. 35. But it makes a difference whether the fut. exact. is expressed by the perfect or imperfect. In the latter case the original imperfect meaning will still cling to it. The transaction spoken of will not be represented as real and accomplished, but only as possibly and ideally present. So, too, here. There lies therefore in the imperfect a certain element of comfort, as well becomes this comforting passage. רוּם, comp. ii. 11, 17.

On ver. 13. The imperfects וְאָסִיר, וְאוֹרִיד belong to those isolated cases where the simple Vav. copul. is used with the verbal ending unabbreviated (according to circumstances) as a weakening (of course not normally) of the Vav. consec. with the abbreviated verbal ending. These cases occur especially in poetry, in the 1st pers. sing., and in periods comprising several clauses. Comp. xliii. 28; xliv. 19; xlviii. 3; li. 2; lvii. 17; lxiii. 3-6; Ps. civ. 32; Ewald, 233 a.—K'thibh עתוד paratum, opes paratae, only here; K'ri עתיד Deut. xxxii. 35; Job iii. 8.—שׁוֹשֵׂתִי is the sole example of Poel of a verb לה׳; as regards meaning—שׁוֹסֵתִי xvii. 14; xlii. 22.—כאביר is כְּאַבִּיר, K'ri must be pronounced כַּבִּיר. אַבִּיר is secondary form of אָבִיר "the strong one" (i. 24; xlix. 26; lx. 16); כַּבִּיר also means validus, potens, xvi. 14; xvii. 12; xxviii. 2. There exists here no reason for departing from K'thibh. To construe כאביר as adjunct of the subject is flat, and כְּ then seems strange. To take it as adverbial definition of יושבים (bull-like sitting on thrones, stiergleich Thronende, Delitzsch) gives an extraordinary and displeasing figure. If, with Drechsler, we render יושבים simply "inhabitants," then ואוריד seems strangely used. It seems to me best, therefore, to take כאביר as adjunct to the object: "I cast down the enthroned as the strong one" (i. e., the bull, comp. xxxiv. 7; Ps. xxii. 13; l. 13). Because they are to be cast down they must be sitting high. But they shall be cast down like the bull, i. e., like one lays low a bull by a blow on the forehead. [J. A. Alexander retains the K'thibh, and connects כאביר with the subject meaning "mighty man"—"like a mighty man or hero that I am," and adds: "there is no necessity for departing from the less poetical but more familiar sense, inhabitants, and bringing down, i. e., subduing"].

On ver. 14. תמצא comp. ver. 10.—כַּקֵּן for כְּבַקֵּן a familiar usage. מצפצף see viii. 19.

On ver. 15. התגדל Hithp. only here in Isa.—מַשּׂוֹר "a saw" is ἅπ. λεγ. The plural in מריִמיו is explained by the collective construction of שֵׁבֶט.—הָנִיף comp. xi. 15; xiii. 2; xix. 16; xxx. 32, and x. 32.—לֹא־עֵץ (comp. xxxi. 8; Deut. xxxii. 21) is a bold antiphrase.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Wherefore it shall——high looks.—Ver. 12. In the foregoing strophe the Prophet's view-point was before the execution of judgment on Jerusalem. In this he takes his view-point after it. As before Assyria boasted what he would do, here he boasts what he has done. For what he boastfully promised to do (vers. 8–11) he actually accomplished. But when he has done, then comes his hour. For then will the Lord bring about that fall that is wont to attend a haughty spirit. It is to be noted that what Assyria is to execute on Zion is called the work of Jehovah. But as only that work of which Assyria is the instrument is meant, "all his work" cannot be intended in an absolute sense, as comprehending the work of salvation.—"The fruit of haughtiness of heart" is not so much the boasting and blasphemy, but the works that haughtiness has done. Comp. Dan. iv. 27 (30), "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom?" etc. The destruction of city and kingdom is the destruction of the fruit of the haughtiness of the ruler.

The massing of the nouns admirably paints the spouting, puffed-up nature of haughtiness (comp. xxviii. 1; xxi. 17). "The loftiness of the eyes," i. e., self-complacency, reflected in the eyes, lends a certain refulgence (תפארת) to the manner of a man. But even this illusive gleam will the Lord strip off.

2. For he saith——peeped.—Vers. 13, 14. The Prophet cannot reproduce to his hearers and readers the actual fruits and that proud gleam of haughtiness. But he can let that haughtiness express itself in words by which it may be estimated. These words state that Assyria now maintains that, as he purposed, so he had also actually accomplished all by his own might. He boasts his strength and his prudence. The power of this world is wise. According to Dan. vii. 8, 20; viii. 25 the horn of the fourth beast has eyes like the eyes of a man, the symbol of prudence (Comp. Auberlen, Der Prophet Daniel, 2 Aufl. p. 50). The children of this world are wiser in their way than the children of light (Luke xvi. 8). The borders of the nations he abolished by incorporating all in his kingdom; he robbed their treasures. Ver. 14 portrays the facility with which Assyria does his work. The unskilful and inexperienced find a bird's nest at best by chance. The knowing and experienced, however, find them as easily as surely. But the Assyrian compares his conquests not to the easy work of seeking nests, but to the much easier one of gathering eggs from forsaken nests. He has so gathered everything that came under his hand as he went through the land (Hab. ii. 5). In a nest not forsaken, the little owner makes a defence; he strikes with his wings, he opens his beak and hisses at his assailant. But his enemies had not dared even to make a bird's defence.

3. Shall the axe——no wood.—Ver. 15. To this senseless boasting the Lord replies in words that set the matter in a just light. The answer presents two pairs of parallels that represent a gradation. Without men axe and saw can do nothing. Yet they are indispensable to men, and that may give their self-praise some apparent justification. But that rod or staff should lift those that have hold of them presents the extreme of absurd presumption. Yet this is the extent of Assyria's blind presumption, that he not only conceives that he executed judgment on the nations without the Lord, but that divinity was constrained to serve him. There lies thus in the second pair of comparisons a climax, and כְּ before הָנִיף does not compare this second pair with the first, but with the higher degree of stupid blindness intimated in ver. 14. The staff can lift nothing, neither wood nor not-wood. Of not-wood it cannot even lift what is not man, e. g. a stone. If Isaiah, as the context shows, by not-wood means men, it is on the supposition that the reader of himself will recognize the true contrast (not-wood but much greater) and the (even phonetic) allusion to לֹא־אִישׁ.

3. THE EXECUTION OF THE WOE.

Chapter X. 16–19.

16 Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send Among his fat ones leanness;
And under his glory he shall kindle a burning
Like the burning of a fire.
17 And the light Israel shall be for a fire,
And his Holy One for a flame:
And it shall burn and devour his thorns
And his briers in one day;
18 And shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field,
[1]Both soul and body:
And they shall be as when[a] a standard-bearer fainteth.
19 And the rest of the trees of his forest shall be [2]few,
That a child may write them.

[1] Heb. from the soul, and even to the flesh.

[a] a weakly person pines away.

[2] Heb. number.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 16. הָאָדוֹן comp. ver. 33; i. 24; iii. 1; xix. 4.—אדני צבאות are found thus combined only here. Elsewhere it is always אדני יהוה צבאות, vers. 23, 24; iii. 15; xxii. 5, 12, 14, 15; xxviii. 22; Jer. ii. 19; xlvi. 10; xlix. 5; l. 25, 31.——מִשְׁמַנִּים are properly "the fat parts" (comp. Gen. xxvii. 28, 39), then (abstr. pro concr. Ps. lxxviii. 31); "the fat men," by whom Isaiah understands all that have a share in Assyria's greatness. Comp. xxvii. 4, where alone the word occurs again in Isaiah.——רזון, from רָזָה attenuare, maciare, Niph. contabescere (xvii. 4) occurs only here in Isaiah (comp. רָזִי xxiv. 16). It means macies, tabies, "consumption, phthisis."——יֵקַד verb, comp. xxx. 14; lxv. 5, יְקֹד only here. Note the paronomasia which evidently aims at an artistic sound imitation.

On ver. 17. ביום אחד comp. on ix. 13.——כרמל, "the fruitful, cultivated garden and field," is also elsewhere opposed to forest (xxix. 17), while again in other places יער is mentioned as part of the כרמל (xxxvii. 24; 2 Kings xix. 23). This is no contradiction, the notions of the two words occurring sometimes in a broader, sometimes in a narrower sense.

On ver. 18. נֹסֵס, ἅπ. λεγ. Comp. נָשׁ, Syr. nesiso, νοσεῖν, "to be sick."——מְסֹס infin. from מָסַס xiii. 7; xix. 1; xxxiv. 3, "to pine away."—מספר like Jer. xliv. 28; Ezek. xii. 16, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

2. Therefore——write them.—Vers. 16–19. "Therefore" introduces the consequences that follow the double guilt of Assyria portrayed above. That necessary consequence is punishment. The, not personal, glory of Assyria shall be burnt so as if the LORD kindled a fire under it. The comparison of the consumption which is not meant literally, and the כְּ before יְקֹד show that no real fire is meant. It is the fire of God's holy wrath that is the correlative of His love. The latter is the light of Israel in whom God takes pleasure (2 Sam. xxii. 29; Ps. xxvii. 1; Mic. vii. 8), but a consuming fire for all that is against God and His kingdom (Deut. iv. 24; ix. 3; Isa. xxx. 33; xxxiii. 14). Like ix. 17, thorns and thistles are contrasted with the nobler representatives of vegetation. The comparison does not refer to the army of Assyria with its various grades of rank and file, but to the nation with all its glory. Thorns and thistles mean all lowly and inferior persons, forest and fruitful field those of elevation and splendor.

The expression "from soul to body" (מנפש ועד בשר is found only here). It is to be compared with i. 6, "from the sole of the foot to the head." As the latter signifies the entire outward, visible surface of the body, so the latter the entire organism generally. Not only the outward, but the inward shall be anihilated. "For body and soul are the entire man (Ps. xvi. 9; lxxviii. 26; lxxxiv. 3.")—KNOBEL. I except to this only that the expression is restricted to men. Have not the beast and the plant a soul too? Comp. Gen. ii. 19. And is it not said in our very passage that forest and field shall be anihilated from the soul to the flesh? Thus in some sense soul and flesh, i. e., body are attributed to plants. From his exhaustless store the Prophet produces another figure, and calls Assyria a weakling, who pining dies away.

Yet a remnant shall remain, but a very feeble one. Of the lordly forest there shall be left only a clump that may be counted; so far from numerous that a boy can count and write a list of them. And truly, what was left of Assyria after its destruction may be compared to the little forest or grove of cedars that the traveller now finds on Lebanon. But I mean not merely the overthrow of Sennacherib, but Nineveh's destruction by the Babylonians and Medes. For the Prophet's vision comprehends the whole future both of Israel and of Assyria.

The figure of the boy writing down the trees, seems to me remarkable in respect to the history of culture. We hear in this place of a boy that can write, the like of which we find even Judg. viii. 14, and that counts the trunks of the trees. Is the figure pure invention of the Prophet? or was he brought to use it from observation?

II. ISRAEL'S REDEMPTION IN GENERAL.

CHAPTER X. 20–24.

1. THE BELIEVING REMNANT OF ISRAEL RETURNS OUT OF THE SHATTERED WORLD-POWER. CHAP. X. 20–23.

20 AND it shall come to pass in that day,
That the remnant of Israel,
And such as are escaped of the house of Jacob,
Shall no more again stay upon him that smote them;
But shall stay upon the LORD,
The Holy One of Israel in truth.
21 The remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob, Unto the mighty God.

22 For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea,
Yet a remnant [1]of them shall return:
[3]The consumption decreed shall overflow [2]with righteousness.
23 For the Lord God of hosts shall make a consumption, even determined,
In the midst of all the land.

[1] Heb. in, or among. [2] Or, in.

[3] Destruction is determined, extending wide righteousness.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On vers. 22, 23. בּוֹ after יָשׁוּב is partitive, as is often the case. Comp. vi. 13; Deut. i. 35; Ps. cxxxix. 16, and especially passages where this בְּ stands after words meaning "to remain over," Exod. xiv. 28; Lev. xxvi. 36; 1 Sam. xi. 11. [Like the Engl. "one in ten"].——כִּלָּיוֹן וגו׳. These words are difficult. כִּלָּיוֹן is found again only Dt. xxviii. 65, in the expression כִּלְיוֹן עֵינַיִם, which, after כָּלוּ עֵינַי (Ps. lxix. 4; cxix. 82, 123; Lam. ii. 11) must be rendered oculorum consumtio, "consumption, failure of the power of vision." So we must take it here in the sense of "wearing off, consuming, desolating."——חָרוּץ is part. pass. from חָרַץ, incidere, decidere, definere, decernere (comp. 1 Kings xx. 40). In Isa. it is found again only as a qualifying adjective to the threshing roller (xli. 15) or as name for the roller itself, (xxviii. 27). It is so named because an implement furnished with sharp corners and edges. כליון חרוץ can only mean, therefore: "destruction is limited, determined, concluded."——In שׁטף is easily discerned an antithesis to חרוץ: for as in the latter there is the notion of something sharply marked off, so in the former there is the notion of flooding over (viii. 8; xxviii. 2, 15, 17, 18; xxx. 28; xliii. 2; xlvi. 12). We thus obtain the figure of something determined, sharply defined, but which in a certain sense extends itself, and withal, too, overflowing with a certain effect, as it were, settling it (שׁטף with the accusat. of abundance). That which is fixed, determined, is called כליון, what is widespread is said to be צדקה. According to the foregoing כליון can only designate the fate of those Israelites that do not belong to "the remnant."——But what is צדקה? Many suppose it signifies the righteous state of the whole community, which they have attained to by reason of the judgments (DRECHSLER according to xlviii. 18; Amos v. 24). But the following verse seems to me to conflict with this, which seems to be wholly an explanation of the words כליון ח׳ שׁ׳ צ׳. כָּלָה evidently corresponds to כליון, נחרצה to חרוץ. Therefore כִּי is expletive. The obscure expression ver. 22 b, which is probably a citation, for it contrasts strangely with its surroundings, is used in a form suited to common understanding. Thus the word כָּלָה (in Isa. only again xxviii.22, where the whole style of address recurs; frequent beside in the combination עָשָׂה כָלָה, especially in Jer. iv. 27; v. 10, 18, etc.) — "utter ruin" stands for כליון; נחרצה for חרוץ, the fem. ending being used out of regard for the word-pair. This latter word, too, is found only xxviii. 22, and also in Dan. ix. 27; xi. 36, where the words are repeated out of Isaiah.——But we must take כלה ונח׳ as object of עֹשֶׂה; for עשׂה בקרב כל־ארץ is explanation of שׁטף ו׳. Precisely thereby we see that שׁטף states nothing more than that wide over all the earth shall be known and manifest what כליון חרוץ is, viz., a proof of the righteousness of God. Were צדקה to mean the conformity of human condition to God's righteousness, then this thought could not be rendered by the simple עשׂה בכל הא׳.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

And it shall come to pass —— all the land.—Vers. 20–23. The Prophet turns again to his own nation. Assyria's fall is Israel's salvation. "In that day," i. e., when the destruction of Assyria shall have taken place (vers. 16–19), Israel will indeed still exist, but only as a remnant (שְׁאָר vii. 3; xi. 11, 16; xxviii. 5), and as those escaped (פְּלֵטָה comp. on iv. 2). But this remnant will at last have learned what ministers to their peace. It will no more lean on Assyria as Ahaz has done. It is plainly seen from this, that the present passage was composed at a period when the Assyrian alliance (2 Kings xvi. 7 sqq.), was already an historical fact. By the single word מַכֵּהוּ, which points back to ver. 5, the Prophet indicates how foolish and ruinous that alliance was. Israel's remnant will rather lean on Jehovah, the holy God (comp. on i. 4), who is Israel's מִקְדָּשׁ, rock and refuge (viii. 4). What is meant by בֶּאֱמֶת "in truth" may be best seen from Jer. iv. 1-4, who speaks of sincere, and entire return to Jehovah, of swearing in His name, "in truth, judgment and righteousness," of reformation that "breaks up the fallow ground and does not sow among thorns," of circumcision of the heart, and not of the flesh. So here, leaning on the LORD "in truth," is such wherein the heart is no longer divided between Jehovah and the creature, but belongs to Him wholly and alone. The expression is found again in Isaiah xvi. 5; xxxviii. 3; xlviii. 1; lxi. 8; comp. Jer. xxxii. 40 sq.

That it may not be thought that he has used the expression "remnant of Israel" with no special significance, the Prophet repeats it in ver. 21, with great emphasis, at the same time defining it more exactly. No false support is offered in these words, which would ill-agree with the promise that Israel shall lean on the LORD "in truth." True, the Israel "according to the flesh" fancied that where Abraham's seed was, there salvation and life were guaranteed. But to them apply the words of John Baptist: "Begin not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you, That God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: every tree, therefore, which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire." Luke iii. 8, 9. From this we see that not all that remain after the great judgments belong to "the remnant," but only those that bear genuine fruits of repentance. Paul confirms this Rom. xi. 4 sq., when, to the question "hath God cast away his people?" he replies by referring to the seven thousand that did not bow the knee to Baal (1 Kings xix. 18), and then continues: "even so then at this present time also, there is a remnant according to the election of grace." We may say, therefore; Isaiah's remnant is the "election" (ἐκλογή) of Paul. "The election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded." Rom. xi. 7. This is confirmed, too, by the way that Isaiah defines the aim of the return. Jer. says iv. 1: "If thou wilt return, O Israel, return to me." A false returning, therefore, is possible (vid. my com. on Jer. iv. 1 sqq.). Precisely on this account Isaiah says in our passage the remnant will return to אל גבור, "God Almighty." It is not the fleshly descent from Abraham that is the criterion of belonging to "the remnant," but the return to God Almighty. It is plain that Jehovah the God of Israel is meant. But that Isaiah should call Him here just by this name, arises from this, that the Prophet has in mind his words in ix. 5. The return to El-gibbor-Jehovah will, in its time, be possible only in the form of the return to El-gibbor-Messiah. Therefore Isaiah does not promise an unconditional, universal return of all that may be called Israelite, and that descends from Abraham, but he makes a most displeasing and threatening restriction. And if in the time to which he points, the time when the world-power will be judged, Israel were numerous as the sand by the sea—a condition which is even a fulfilment of promise and a theocratic state of blessedness (comp., on ix. 2; Gen. xxii. 17)—Jehovah still can bring Himself not to make all these Israelites according to the flesh partakers of the promised blessing. This is the thought that Paul carries out in Rom. ix., and in this sense he cites our passage in vers. 27, 28. "They are not all Israel, which are of Israel," he says ver. 6. "Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children: but in Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is: They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted for the seed," vers. 7, 8. Therefore the LORD prepares an election of which the criterion is birth from God, regeneration, faith. As proof the Apostle cites, as already said, our passage among other Old Testament statements.

2. THE CONDEMNED WORLD-POWER IS NOT TO BE FEARED EVEN IN THE PRESENT. CHAPTER X. 24–27.

24 THEREFORE thus saith the [a]Lord God of hosts,
O my people that dwellest in Zion, be not afraid of the Assyrian:
He shall smite thee with a rod,
[1]And shall lift up his staff against thee, after the manner of Egypt.
25 For yet a very little while, and the indignation shall cease,
And mine anger [b]in their destruction.
26 And the LORD of hosts shall stir up a scourge for him
According to the slaughter of Midian at the rock of Oreb:
And as his rod was upon the sea,
So shall he lift it up after the manner of Egypt.
27 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That his burden [2]shall be taken away from off thy shoulder,
And his yoke from off thy neck,
And the yoke shall be [c]destroyed because of the anointing.

[1] Or, But he shall lift up his staff for thee.
[2] Heb. shall remove.
[a] Lord Jehovah of hosts.
[b] (turns) to.
[c] unlaced because of fat.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 25. מִזְעָר another form for מִצְעָר (Gen. xix. 20; Isa. lxiii. 18, etc.)—parvitas, paucitas, beside here is found only xxix. 17; xvi. 14; xxiv. 6. It is thus a word peculiar to the first part of Isaiah.——The expression כלה וזעם occurs only here and Dan. xi. 36, which is taken from our passage. Comp. יַעֲבָר זעם xxvi. 20. It is needless to change the reading ואפי ונו׳. Supply הָיָה after ואפי (comp. e. g. ix. 20) and construe in a pregnant sense—"directs, turns itself."——עַל is employed then just as ver. 3.——תַּכְלִית (from בָּלָה tritum, consumtum esse) is ἅπ. λεγ. It means consumtio, i. e., of the Assyrians. Thus the words form a fitting transition to ver. 26.

On ver. 26. עוֹרֵר used of "wielding" a scourge only here: it is used 2 Sam. xxiii. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 11, 20 of brandishing a spear. Notice the paronomasia עוֹרֵר and עוֹרֵב.——שׁוֹט again in Isaiah only xxviii. 15, K'ri ——ומטהו must be conceived as dependent on עורר.

On ver. 27. The last clause is obscure. It defines the manner of releasing from the yoke. חֻבַּל Pual occurs only here and Job xvii. 1. The original meaning of חָבַל is "to twist" (thence חֶבֶל "a rope") "to bind" ligare, pignore obligare. Piel, cum tormentis eniti, parere, but also "to twist round and round, to turn the bottommost to the topmost" (French bouleverser); xiii. 5; liv. 16; Mic. ii. 10; Song of Sol. ii. 15; Eccl. v. 5. In Isa. xxxii. 7 there seems beside to lie in the word the meaning of "ensnaring." So there seems here, beside the notion of destruction, to be that of a reference to a rope or cord. DELITZSCH represents, on the authority of statements of SCHEGG, that to this day in the Orient the yoke is fastened to the pole by a cord about the neck. Thus the Prophet would evidently say that, because of the fat (מִפְּנֵי causal as it often is, ii. 10; vii. 2, etc.) which grows on the well-fed Israel, the rope breaks, and thus the yoke apparatus falls off. On this account it seems to me probable that חֻבַּל, (though otherwise חֶבֶל comes from חָבַל and not the reverse), is still here to be regarded as a Pual denominativum and privativum coined ad hoc (comp. on סֵעֵף ver. 33).——The figure in יסור סבלו is drawn from beasts of burden. In ix. 3, עֹל סֻבֳּלוֹ the two words are combined; but separated here as xiv. 25.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Therefore thus saith——of the anointing (fat).—Vers. 24–27. If all that is true that the Prophet from ver. 5 on, has said of Assyria as the momentary instrument of God's chastening,—and how shall God's word not be sure?—then Israel need not fear Assyria even in present impending danger. Assyria will, indeed, execute chastisement on Israel, but only a discipline with a staff and rods (ver. 5), not with the sword, i. e. only a transitory one, not such as ends in destruction. The Prophet intimates that the captivity by the northern world-power will be, as it were, a continuation of that suffered from the southern. Assyria therefore will tread in the footsteps of Egypt. He will raise the staff over Israel in the way (ver. 26, Amos iv. 10), i. e. in the manner of Egypt. For as Egypt could not attain his object of extirpating the Israelite by killing the male children that were born and by hard labor, just as little should Assyria succeed. For only a very little, and the wrath would cease. The Prophet, therefore, conceives of the wrath as in progress, but presents its speedy end in prospect. The Lord will brandish the scourge over Assyria as He smote Midian at the rock of Oreb (comp. ix. 3). That was one of the most glorious victories of the Israelites; but the glory of it belonged neither to Gideon nor to his army, but to the Lord (Jud. vii. 2 sqq., 25). The second clause of ver. 26 contains a magnificent figure full of art. First from Assyria's hand is taken the staff that he is to raise over Israel and put into the hand of Jehovah. This appears from the relation of ver. 26 b. to the last clause of ver. 24. Then this staff in the hand of Jehovah is transformed to the likeness of the rod with which Moses in Egypt prepared the Red Sea for a way of escape for Israel (xi. 16). The sea here is that which spreads out before Israel in the distress occasioned by Assyria. The raising up of the rod here (נשׂאו) corresponds to that raising it over Israel (ישׂא, ver. 24) for which Assyria used it. A twofold raising of the rod took place in Egypt: one over Israel, the other over the sea. Both are repeated now. Neither the rod flourished over Israel for chastisement shall be wanting, nor the rod of God, which, as there, shall open a way through the deep sea of trouble. As is familiarly known, the passage through the Red Sea is often mentioned and turned to account in a variety of ways: comp. xliii. 16; l. 2; li. 10; lxiii. 11; Ps. lxvi. 6; lxxiv. 13; lxxvii. 20: lxxvii. 13; cxiv. 3, etc.

At the time referred to Israel shall be freed from the yoke of Assyria (ix. 3; xiv. 25), which is signified first by the figure of the load of a beast of burden, second by that of the yoke.

3. THE IMPETUOUS ONSET OF THE CONDEMNED WORLD-POWER IN THE LIGHT OF ITS FINAL RUIN. CHAP. X. 28–34.

28 HE is come to Aiath, he is passed to Migron;
At Michmash he hath laid up his [a]carriages:
29 They are gone over the passage:
They have taken up their lodging at Geba;
Ramah is afraid;
Gibeah of Saul is fled.
30 [1]Lift up thy voice, O daughter of Gallim:
[b]Cause it to be heard unto Laish,
O poor Anathoth.
31 Madmenah [c]is removed;
The inhabitants of Gebim gather themselves to flee.
32 [d]As yet shall he remain at Nob that day:
He shall shake his hand against the mount of the daughter of Zion,

The hill of Jerusalem.
33 Behold, the Lord, the LORD of hosts,
Shall lop the [e]bough with terror:
And the [f]high ones of stature shall be hewn down,
And the haughty shall be humbled.
34 And he shall cut down the thickets of the forest with iron,
And Lebanon [g]shall fall [2]by a mighty one.

[1] Heb. Cry shrill with thy voice. [2] Or, mightily.

[e] leafy coronal. [f] the giants of the standing wood are felled. [g] he fells.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 28. בָּא with עַל like Jud. xviii. 27, it means "the falling over on."——הִפְקִיד, commisit, mandavit, deposuit, Jer. xxxvi. 20; xl. 7; xl. 10.

On ver. 32. יְנֹפֵף Pilel, only here; Hiph. with similar meaning, xi. 15; xiii. 2; xix. 16; 2 Kings v. 11. The swinging of the hand is the gesture of one threatening. —הַר וגו׳ stands in accus. localis; K'thibh has בֵּית־צִיּוֹן, which is found nowhere else, and probably results from a confounding with הַר בֵּית יהוה.

On ver. 33. סָעֵף (comp. סְעִיף xvii. 6; xxvii. 10), Pi. denominativum and privativum like the German aesten from Ast, Koepfen from Kopf (comp. זִנֵּב "to cut off the tail," Josh. x. 19; שֵׁרֵשׁ "to eradicate," Ps. lii. 7; סִקֵּל "to remove stones," v. 2. [As in English one says "to stone," i. e., take the stones out]. This סעף is ἅπ. λεγ.——פֻּארָה ἅπ. λεγ., as regards meaning is certainly identical with פֹּארָה, Ezek. xvii. 6; xxxi. 5, 6, 8, 12, 13. It appears to be a poetic expression for the grand, luxurious branch and leafy growth of the tree (פאר original meaning splendere, nitere, comp. פֵּאֵר, תִּפְאֶרֶת.——מַעֲרָצָה, ἅπ. λεγ. is "terror" in an active sense—perterrefactio.—קוֹמָה "that which is standing, the trunks, the standing timber" (comp. xxxvii. 24).

On ver. 34. נִקַּף only here in Isaiah may be either Niph. or Piel.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The foregoing disposes the reader to look for an immediate portrayal of the destruction of Assyria. But to his surprise the Prophet translates him back into the commencement of the hostilities of Assyria, against Israel (vers. 28-32). This first onslaught of Assyria was so impetuous, that it seemed as if Jerusalem could not resist. But it only appeared so. How little dangerous that onslaught was appears from the brief description of the inevitable, impending ruin of the world-power, that immediately follows (vers. 33, 34). A contrast is hereby presented that gives a most striking effect, which is still more enhanced by the masterly, dramatic representation of the march of the Assyrians against Jerusalem. So that this little passage proves to be a master-piece of Art, both by its arrangement as a whole and its execution in detail.

2. He comes——the hill of Jerusalem.—Vers. 28–32. These verses describe the last part of the march to Jerusalem. For, no doubt, Aiath is the same as Ai that lay North-east of Jerusalem (עַי or הָעַי "the stone heap," Josh. vii. 2 sqq., עַיָּא Neh. xi. 31, עַיָּה [false reading עַזָּה]; 1 Chr. vii. 28), which is probably identical with עַוִּים (Josh. xviii. 23) comp. FAY in loc.). FINN, VAN DE VELDE, ARNOLD, KNOBEL, identify Aiath in Tell-el-Hadschar that lies less than an hour South-east of Beitin (Bethel). On the other hand DELITZSCH, following SCHEGG who personally investigated the spot, locates Aiath about six hours north of Jerusalem in Tejjibe, that is situated on a hill with an extended prospect, in whose neighborhood there is still found a small village, Churbet Ai. It will perhaps depend on whether the locality of Tejjibe corresponds with Josh. viii. 11, 13, according to which there was a valley North of the city. [Concerning the location of all the places named in the text consult "ROBINSON and SMITH's Bib. Res. in Palestine, Vol. II.].

Migron, which is mentioned beside only 1 Sam. xiv. 2 (but in all probability this passage is corrupt: ARNOLD in HERZ. R. Encycl. XIV. p. 755) appears to have been quite insignificant. DELITZSCH regards it as identical with Burg-Magran, a cluster of ruins eight minutes from Bethel. But, then, would they not have marched backwards? Michmash, a city of Benjamin as all the rest named here, plays an important part in the history of Saul and Jonathan, 1 Sam. xiii., xiv. It still exists as a small deserted village with the name Muchmas one hour North of Geba (now Dscheba), three hours and a half North of Jerusalem (ROBINSON and S. II. comp. RUETSCHI, HERZ. R. Encycl. IX. p. 526). There the Assyrians left their baggage in order to press on quicker. "The passage of Michmash" is mentioned 1 Sam. xiii. and xiv. It is the Wady-es-Suweinit (according to others es-Suweikeh—comp. RUETSCHI, l. c.)—a deep, rough ravine, forty-eight minutes wide, immediately below Michmash. As it runs from East to West, they must cross it obliquely to approach Jerusalem. The ravine is difficult to traverse. It is hardly credible that the proper highway from Shechem or Nablus (comp. ARNOLD in HERZ. R. Encycl. XV. p. 163 sq. Art. "Strassen in Palaestina,") passed through it. The Prophet's description is ideal. He depicts not what is past but what is future, and that, not in the manner of historical accuracy, but as became his prophetic interests. He would depict how the enemy presses forward with utmost speed, by the shortest way, deterred by no obstacles. On the arduous way they cheer one another with the cry: "Geba give us lodging." Thus they promise themselves good quarters in Geba, that lay so charmingly on an elevated plateau (comp. SCHEGG in DELITZSCH). Geba cannot be the same as Gebea of Saul, as appears evident from our text. For if it were the same, why is it mentioned twice with a difference in the form of the name, and with the name of another city coming between? Rama, now er-Ram, the city of Benjamin, made notorious by Saul (1 Sam. i. 19; ii. 11, etc.), seems to have lain aside from their route though near by. For it looks with trembling on the passers by; but Gebea of Saul opposite, lying perhaps still nearer, fled outright. It lay on the summit of Tuleil-el-Tul (the Bean mountain, see ARNOLD, HERZ. Real. Encycl. p. 744) which commands a view of the whole neighborhood. In a direct line the expedition encounters Gallim, (1 Sam. xxv. 44) which VALENTINER (Ztschr. d. D. M. G. XII. p. 169) thinks he has discovered in the hill Chirbet el-Dschir that lies South of the Bean mountain. Because immediately threatened, Gallim shall shriek out (קוֹלֵךְ accus.). Laishah, by no means identical with לַיִשׁ Judg. xviii. 29, cannot be located. But KNOBEL is likely correct in finding evidence of its being a place near Gallim in 1 Sam. xxv. 44, where is mentioned Phaltiel son of Laish from Gallim (comp. 2 Sam. iii. 15). עניה ענתות, "O poor Anathoth," is evidently a play on words. By this and the emotion of the orator is to be explained the order of the words, which is not quite normal (comp. liv. 11). Anathoth, now Anata, is only three-fourths of an hour distant from Jerusalem — Madmenah (Dung-heaps) and Gebim (fountains, Jer. xiv. 3) are not mentioned elsewhere, nor are any traces of the places discovered as yet. Both are directly threatened; so nothing remains but to flee and save their goods. "Saving their goods" seems to be indicated by הֵעִיזוּ (comp. Exod. ix. 19); yet it may very well be construed as synonymous with נָדְדָה according to Jer. iv. 6; vi. 1. "To-day still in Nob, to make a halt," is likewise the enemies' shout to one another. The thing is to pass on to Nob to-day, but there make a preliminary halt in order to make the necessary dispositions for the attack on Jerusalem. Nob (comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 16, 28; Neh. xi. 32) without doubt quite near Jerusalem, is to the present not certainly identified. SCHEGG contends very decidedly that it may be Isawije that lies South-west of Anata fifty-five minutes North of Jerusalem.

3. Behold the Lord——a mighty one.— Vers. 33, 34. The proud expedition of the Assyrian falls like trees felled by the axe. Like the tempest tears away the branches, so the terror that goes forth from Jehovah breaks the power of the Assyrian. "The high ones of stature (of the standing wood)" shall be cut down (ix. 9) the lofty ones must bow. The entire forest thicket (ix. 17) shall be cut down with the iron; but Lebanon (notice how the Prophet before distinguished branches, trunks and thicket, but at last combines all in the common, all comprehending name Lebanon) shall fall by a Mighty One. Who this Mighty One will be the Prophet does not say. That it is the Lord Himself as the remote cause, who xxxiii. 21, comp. Ps. xciii. 4, is called אַדִּיר "glorious, mighty," is of course. But it may convey also an allusion at the same time to that one among the LORD's ministers, that was the principal instrument in annihilating the Assyrian army before Jerusalem (xxxvii. 36). For the ministers of the LORD, too, are called אַדִּירִים "the excellent or mighty," (Ps. xvi. 3).

III. ISRAEL'S REDEMPTION IN RELATION TO THE MESSIAH.[1]

CHAPTER XI. 1—XII. 6.

1. FROM THE APPARENTLY DRIED UP ROOT OF THE HOUSE OF DAVID SHALL GO FORTH A SPROUT THAT SHALL FOUND A KINGDOM OF MOST GLORIOUS PEACE. CHAPTER XI. 1-9.

1 AND there shall come forth a rod out of the [a]stem of Jesse,
And a [b]Branch [c]shall grow out of his roots:
2 And the spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him,
The spirit of wisdom and understanding,
The spirit of counsel and might,
The spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD;
3 [d]And shall make him of [1]quick understanding in the fear of the LORD:
And he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes,
Neither [e]reprove after the hearing of his ears:
4 But with righteousness shall he judge the poor,
And [x]reprove with equity for the meek of earth:
And he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth,
And with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.
5 And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins,
And faithfulness the girdle of his reins.

6 The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb,
And the [g]leopard shall lie down with the kid;
And the calf and the young lion and the fatling together;
And a little child shall lead them.
7 And the cow and the bear shall feed;
Their young ones shall lie down together:
And the lion shall eat [h]straw like the ox.
8 And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp,
And the weaned child shall put his hand on the [3]cockatrice' den.
9 They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain:
For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord,
As the waters cover the sea.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 1. גֶּזַע occurs again only xl. 24; Job xiv. 8. The root גזע is not found. The meaning is that of גָּדַע (x. 33). caedere "to cut down." In the three places that it occurs, גזע is "the hewn, cut up stem that still sticks in the ground." Hence גזע ישׁי and not גזע דוד.——חֹטֶר again only Prov. xiv. 3, meaning: "rod, pliant twig."——נֵצֶר, xiv. 19; lx. 21; Dan. xi. 7 (from נצר unused root, splendere, nitere), "a hardy, fresh young branch."——מִשָּׁרָשָׁיו, though the accents are against it, must be connected with נצר. For what does it mean that the shoot right from the root on shall bear fruit? Is something unnatural and impossible said of this shoot? Or was not Christ a Tree when He bore fruit? The thought is rather that from the extinct trunk and shoot a sprout shall proceed that shall give evidence of adequate vital power, and grow up to be a fruit-bearing tree. Hence it is quite unjustifiable to impose upon the verb יפרה the meaning of יִפְרַח (Hitzig, Umbreit).

On ver. 3. It is natural to regard הריחו as antithesis of the objective communication of the Spirit spoken of, ver. 2. For first, הֵרִיחַ means "smell anything with pleasure" (Lev. xxvi. 31; Amos v. 21). But if ביראת י׳ should be the object of הריחו, then it ceases to be predicate, and then the sentence is without predicate; or if it is construed as predicate, then the emphatic use of בְּ after verbs of sensation cannot be appealed to, because then בְּ no longer depends on the notion of smelling, but on a modification of the notion of being (happens in the fear of Jehovah, is directed to the fear of Jehovah), which must be supplied to accommodate the subject to the predicate. Second: What means the one-sided emphasis of smelling? If smelling may be construed in the wider sense as inhaling and exhaling air through the nose, so that it coincides with breathing, that would suit. I construe it in this wider sense as do others (Clericus, Hendewerk, Ewald, Meier). [See Comment of J. A. Alexander, added, p. 162, top.] Then הריח is to be construed as direct causative Hiphil, in the sense of "to make רוּחַ," as one says הֶאֱזִין "to make ears" — to "hear," הִלְשִׁין "to make a tongue," züngeln, "to blaspheme." רוּחַ then — "breath, life's breath," Gen. vi. 17; vii. 15, 22, etc. But still much depends on whether bodily or spiritual breath is meant. The context decides for the latter. For our הריחו ביראת י׳ stands in evident antithesis to רוח יראת י׳, ver. 2. The latter designates the objective communication of the Spirit, the former the subjective reception.——לְ secundum, comp. לְצֶדֶק xxxii. 1: לָבֶטַח, etc.——הוכיח with לְ like ii. 4.

On ver. 4. מִישׁוֹר comp. xl. 4; xlii. 16.

On ver. 5. Gesenius makes the remark here that the repetition of אֵזוֹר (instead of using once חָגוֹר) can give no surprise in Isaiah, because he often uses the same word in parallel clauses: xiv. 4; xv. 1, 8; xvi. 7; xvii. 12, 13; xix. 7; xxxi. 8; xxxii. 17; xlii. 19; xliv. 3; liv. 13; lv. 4, 13; lix. 10. But in saying this Gesenius, as Drechsler remarks, forgot that he denies Isaiah's authorship of chaps. xl.—lxvi.

On ver. 6. זְאֵב is found in Isaiah only here and lxv. 25, that resembles this.——כֶּבֶשׂ is "the lamb;" comp. l. 11; v. 17. נָמֵר — "the striped" is "the panther" (Jer. v. 6; xiii. 23). Isaiah has it only here.——נהג with בְּ like 1 Chr. xiii. 7; comp. on נֹגֵשׂ בּוֹ ix. 3.

On ver. 7. אריה xxxv. 9.——תֶּבֶן again only lxv. 25.

On ver. 8. שִׁעֲשַׁע Pilpel from שָׁעַע delinire, mulcere, comp. the pass. lxvi. 12.——חֻר xlii. 22—פֶּתֶן only here in Isaiah.——מְאוּרַת is ἅπ. λεγ. מָאוֹר is "light," i. e., "an illuminating body" (Gen. i. 16); מְאוּרָה would then be a "light-opening," and we might understand under that term both the entrance of the cave and the sparkling eye of the animal gleaming like a precious stone (so the Targ., Aben Ezra, Kimchi, etc.). But the parallelism with חֻר prompts the conjecture, that originally מְעוּרָה, which otherwise never occurs,—מְעָרָה "cave," stood in the text (Gesenius). What is correct is hard to make out.——הָדָה doubtless kindred to יָדָה, emmittere is ἅπ. λεγ.——The צִפְעוֹנִי (lix. 5) is likely identical with צֶפַע (xiv. 29). The root צפע means halare, sibilare. Doubtless a very poisonous serpent is meant, perhaps the basilisk, which is said to have been called sibilus. Comp. Gesenius, Thes. p. 1182.

On ver. 9. That the beasts are subject of ירעו (comp. lxv. 25) the context puts beyond doubt.——יָם is here manifestly the sea-bed, the bottom of the sea; (comp. Ps. civ. 6). The prefix לְ before יָם is explained by the causative sense in which Piel is used here, as it is often.——כִּסָּה means "covering," make covering," like הִצִּיל "provide rescue," הוֹכִיחַ "provide justice," הֶאֱרִיךְ "make length," etc., and is accordingly, like the verbs named, construed with the dative. So, too, is כָּסָה עַל "to make a cover, to spread as a cover over something" (Num. xvi. 33; Job xxxvi. 32; Hab. ii. 14, where our text is reproduced.——[J. A. ALEXANDER on verse 3. "And his sense of smelling (i. e., his power of perception, with a seeming reference to the pleasure it affords him) shall be exercised in (or upon) the fear of Jehovah (as an attribute of others"). The only sense of הריחו confirmed by usage is to smell. This, as a figure, comprehends discernment or discrimination between false and true religion, and the act of taking pleasure as the sense does in a grateful odor. In ביראת י׳ the בּ is a connective which the verb הריח commonly takes after it, and adds no more to the meaning of the phrase than the English prepositions when we speak of smelling to or of a thing, instead of simply smelling it."

Ibid. On ver. 9. "They shall not hurt nor destroy," etc. The absence of the copulative shows that this is not so much a direct continuation of the previous description as a summary explanation of it. The true construction, therefore, is indefinite, and the verbs do not agree with the nouns (animals) of ver. 8."]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The destruction of the proud, towering forest, which, meaning primarily Assyria, comprehends also the world-powers generally, is followed by a contrasted picture in the renewed flourishing of the house of David and of his kingdom. That house of David will be reduced to a stunted and inconsiderable root-stock, when the world-power shall be at the summit of its prosperity. But from this root-stock, that is regarded as dead, a sprout shall still go forth (ver. 1). On it the Spirit of the Lord shall rest in the fulness of His manifold powers (ver. 2). This sprout will take delight in the fear of Jehovah; He will practise justice not after the deceptive sight of the eyes (ver. 3); on the contrary He will so do it that the poor and humble shall be helped, but the wicked not merely outwardly, but also inwardly subdued (ver. 4). For He shall stand firm in righteousness and truth (ver. 5). Thus His kingdom shall be one of peace in such a degree that even the impersonal creatures shall be filled with this spirit of peace (vers. 6. 7), 8. For even the wildest beasts shall be no more wild, and no longer do harm on Jehovah's holy mountain. The whole shall be full of the liveliest and deepest knowledge of Jehovah, like the bottom of the sea is covered with water (ver. 9).

2. And there shall come——his roots.—Ver. 1. Without a hint as to the time when, the Prophet announced that a reviviscence of David's house shall be the correlative of destruction of the world-power that was compared to the forest of Lebanon. He says stock of Jesse, not stock of David, for he would intimate that David's stock will be reduced to its rank previous to David, when it was only the stock of the obscure citizen of Bethlehem. This explanation seems to me more correct than the other that understands that by this term is intimated that the Messiah shall be the second David, for He is such not alongside of, but after and out of the first David. The Messiah is in fact the Son of David (2 Sam. vii.). If this stock, dead and mutilated, only exists as a stump, (but we know when and how that happened,) then shall a slender twig emerge from His roots, thus out of that part concealed under ground and still fresh, a hardy shoot that shall not perish, but bear fruit, and therefore (as included in the statement) develop to a new tree.

He is called "branch" iv. 2; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12. At the beginning of liii. (ver. 2) is found a representation of the Messiah closely resembling our verse: "and He raised Himself before Him like the tender plant and like the root out of dry ground." Ezek. too, (xvii. 22–24) speaks of the shoot of the cedar (יוֹנֵק) that the Lord will plant on the high mountain of Israel (Isa. ii.) to show how He is able "to bring down the high tree, exalt the low tree, dry up the green tree, and make flourish the dry tree."

3. And the spirit——fear of the Lord—Ver. 2. The Prophet immediately forsakes the figurative language. He speaks of the sprout as of a person. For on Him shall settle down (vii. 2, 19; Num. xi. 25; 2 Kings ii. 15) the spirit of Jehovah. This is a generic designation. For in what follows a threefold species of this genus is named, each of which is represented in two modifications. The candlestick of the sanctuary has rightly been regarded as symbol of the spirit of Jehovah. The stem corresponds to what we have called the genus, the six branches to what we have called the species (Exod. xxv. 31 sqq.; xxxvii. 17 sqq.). The first species comprehends (חכמה and בינה) "wisdom and understanding." It is not easy to determine wherein consists the difference between these. In not a few passages they are placed opposite to one another in the parallelism of the clauses: Prov. ii. 2 sqq.; iv. 5, 7; ix. 10; Job xxviii. 12, 20, 28; 2 Chr. ii. 12, etc. In all these passages is observed, first of all, a formal distinction, a certain distinction of rank. "Wisdom" is the great all-comprehending chief name of all right knowledge. As the notion wisdom rises to personality, in fact to the dignity of divine personality (Prov. viii. 32 sqq.) the word becomes almost a proper name. "Understanding" (בינה with תְּבוּנָה, דַּעַת, etc.) takes up a subordinate position. It signifies always only an element, although a very essential one of "wisdom" (comp. Prov. viii. 14). Many find in חכמה the fundamental meaning of firmitas solida, of πυκνότης, though the word is rather allied to חָךְ palatum, and thus, as in sapientia, σοφία "sapor" "taste" (comp. טעם) is the fundamental notion. In any case חכמה "wisdom" has more a positive meaning, whereas בינה "understanding" (comp. בֵּין and the meaning of the root-words in the dialects) carries more the negative notion of διάκρισις, the art of distinguishing between true and false, good and bad.—עצה and גבורה "counsel" and "might" (xxxvi. 5) are easily distinguished as proofs of practical wisdom in forming and executing good counsel. A third pair is (דַּעַת, stat. const. and יִרְאַת י׳) "knowledge and fear of the LORD:" for the first two pairs comprise those effects of the spirit that relate to the earthly life. The third pair appear to reach out beyond this earthly life. It names a knowledge and a fear whose object is Jehovah Himself. If the fear of God is named last here, whereas according to Prov. i. 7; ix. 10; Ps. cxi. 10 it is the beginning of all wisdom, that has its reason herein, that what is the deepest foundation may at the same time be designated as the loftiest height, like the great mountains form the inmost nucleus and the highest summits of the earth's body. The entire enumeration progresses therefore from the bottom upwards. Moreover the view of the seven spirits of God, that is found Rev. i. 4; iii. 1; iv. 5; v. 6, rests on our text. On the anointing of the Messiah with the Spirit of God, comp. xlii. 1; lxi. 1; Matth. xii. 18; Luke iv. 18; Jno. iii. 34.

4. And shall make——his reins.—Vers. 3-5. On הריחו see Text. and Gram. He has not only received the spirit from without; He receives it also within Him, so that He continually breathes in this spiritual air of life—this alone and no other. He has received (objectively) the spirit in absolute fulness. There appears to me to lie in these words, too, an allusion to Gen. ii. 7. There it is said that God breathed in men His spirit as the principle of life. But this principle of life performs its functions no matter in what element the man may find himself. Even in the godless it is constantly active. Yet how unsatisfying, how mournful is that breathing of the spirit in a sphere infected by sin. The Messiah lives wholly in "the fear of God." He therefore breathes in an atmosphere homogeneous to Him. He therefore brings into use for mankind the right breathing by bringing them back into the pure element of spirit. He is the second Adam.

As king, the Messiah must display the divinity of His disposition pre-eminently in the perfectly adequate administration of justice. He will therefore never let His judgment depend on outward appearance, never on that which pleases the outward sense, but He will only suffer that to pass for right that is right. He will not, therefore, look on the person, but help the poor and lowly to their rights (comp. i. 26 sqq.; iii. 13 sqq.). But the unjust He will punish. This is the meaning of ver. 4 b. For the earth (ארץ) that He smites with the rod of His mouth, (Rev. i. 16) and that is put parallel with רשע "the wicked" can only be regarded as the territory of the world that is hostile to God. "The wicked" רשע is by the CHALDEE, and since that by many expositors, construed not only as a collective = רשעים, but at the same time, (or even exclusively e. g. DELITZSCH) in the sense of 2 Thess. ii. 8, as designation of an eschatological person, in whom enmity against God shall reach its climax. The staff of His mouth is the word that goes forth out of His mouth, and the breath of His lips is the same. For His word is in fact what His lips (spiritually) breathe out. Thus He proves Himself to be the one that can destroy in the same way as He created. By His word were things made; by His word they pass away. Comp. Ps. civ. 29. In this righteousness, however, consists His proper strength, and the guaranty for the eternal continuance of His kingdom. The powers of the world must pass away on account of unrighteousness (Prov. xiv. 34).

The girdle is the symbol of vigorous, unimpeded development of strength, because the ancients could run, wrestle, and work only when the girdle confined their wide garments (comp. Job xii. 18; xxxviii. 3; xl. 2; Jer. i. 17; Eph. vi. 14; 1 Pet. i. 13). Let the loins be girt with righteousness and truth, and the girded man stands strong and firm in righteousness and truth. He is strong by both. Therefore He does not further His cause by unrighteousness and lies, but by the contrary.

5. The wolf also——the sea.—Vers. 6-9. The Prophet's vision penetrates to the remotest time: he comprises the near and far in one look. The Assyria of the present, with its destruction in the near future, the Messiah in the inception of His appearance, and the latest fruits of His work of peace—all this he sees at once in a grand picture before him. When the Redeemer, as Prince of Peace (ix. 5) shall have done away with all violence, and put justice on the throne, then will peace be in the earth, and that, not only among men, but also among beasts. The Prophet, it is true, does not explain how the beasts are to be made accessible to this peaceful disposition. But it seems to me certain that only stupendous changes in nature, violent revolutions, world-ruin and resurrection, thus the slaying of the old Adam, and the regeneration of nature can bring forth these effects, (Rev. xx. sq.). "Behold I make all things new," (Rev. xxi. 5) says He, that sits upon the throne. But we see from passages like xxxv.; xliii. 18 sqq., that Isaiah himself had a presentiment of this grand, and all-comprehending world-renewal. I do not mean by this to defend a literal fulfilment of the word which the church fathers rejected as Judaizing, but only themselves to fall into the opposite extreme of spiritualizing and allegorizing. (Jerome appeals to Eph. i. 3). The point is to find the happy medium. That, however, is not found by saying that Isaiah meant what he said in a real sense, only he deceived himself, but by recognizing that Isaiah, as organ of the Spirit of God, beheld stupendous, spirit-corporeal reality, but paints this reality with human, earthly, even national and temporal colors. In short there will be "a new creation," (2 Cor. v. 17) and this new creation will be at the same time a restitution of that oldest creation, that original one of Paradise, but on a higher plane. But how in the picture of the Prophet, to draw the boundary between absolute and relative reality, i. e., whether to exclude only single traits as not literal, or whether to divest the whole of its local and temporal construction, is difficult to say. Yet I decide for the latter. For all the traits of the picture painted by Isaiah bear the stamp of the existing earthly corporality. But in this sphere the prophecy cannot be realized. We must suppose a new basis of spiritual, glorified corporality made for this fulfilment. On this basis then the Prophet's word will, mutatis mutandis, certainly be fulfilled.

The young lion (כפיר v. 29) will lie quietly between the calf and the fattened ox, hitherto his favorite food; and a small boy will suffice to keep this entire, extraordinary, mixed up herd. Cow and bear graze, and their young rest by one another, while the old male-lion will devour chopped straw. Poisonous serpents will change their nature; the sucking child will play at the hole (vid. Text. and Gram.) of the adder. The holy mountain of Jehovah (comp. on ii. 2 sqq.), will not indeed physically comprise the earth, but it will rule the earth, and so far the Prophet can say, there shall no more harm be done, nor destruction devised on the holy mountain. The whole earth, in fact, is only the slope of the mount of God. But the reason why there is no more harm, is that the whole earth (notice how in the second clause "earth" is substituted for "holy mountain") will be full of the knowledge of the LORD. No doubt the Prophet means here, not merely a dead knowing, which even the devils have (Jas. ii. 17); he means a living, experimental, practical knowledge of God, as is possible also to the impersonal creature. Therefore the whole earth, not merely man, shall know God living, and thus on the holy mountain shall no harm or destruction be devised. By the glorious picture of that knowledge filling the earth like the water the bottom of the sea, the Prophet signifies that he conceives of all creatures as filled with this living knowledge of God.

2. THE RETURN OF ISRAEL TAKES PLACE ONLY WHEN THE MESSIAH HAS APPEARED AND THE HEATHEN HAVE GATHERED TO HIM.

CHAPTER XI. 10–16.

10 AND in that day there shall be a root of Jesse,
Which shall stand for an ensign of the people;
To it shall the Gentiles seek:
And his rest shall be [1]glorious.
11 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the LORD shall set his hand again the second time
To [a]recover the remnant of his people,
Which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt,
And from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam,
And from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea.
12 And he shall set up an ensign for the nations,
And shall assemble the outcasts of Israel,
And gather together the dispersed of Judah
From the four [2][b]corners of the earth.
13 The envy also [c]of Ephraim shall depart,
And the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off:
Ephraim shall not envy Judah,
And Judah shall not vex Ephraim.
14 But they shall fly upon the shoulders [d]of the Philistines toward the west;
They shall spoil [3]them of the east together:
[4]They shall lay their hand upon Edom and Moab;
[5]And the children of Ammon [e]shall obey them.
15 And the LORD [f]shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea;
And [g]with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river,
And shall smite it [h]in the seven streams,
And make men go over [6]dry-shod.
16 And there shall be an highway for the remnant of his people,
Which shall be left, from Assyria;
Like as it was to Israel
In the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 10. דרשׁ אֶל comp. on viii. 19, but it has more emphasis than there.

On ver. 11. הוסיף יד is only found here. Many would connect יָדוֹ with what follows as accus. instr. But the position conflicts with that. Others supply לִשְׁלֹחַ: but that is not something that may be left to be understood.

It is better with DRECHSLER to take הוסיף יד as an expression equivalent to נָתַן יָד (Exod. vii. 4): manum addere corresponding to manum dare. If the latter means "to lay the hand on one," then our expression means "repeatedly to lay hands on one."

On ver. 12. נדחים and נפוצות, by this simple means the Prophet expresses the thought that the promised gathering shall extend to both sexes, men and women. ארבע כנפות is only found here in Isaiah. The words are taken from Deut. xxii. 12, and are found beside Ezek. vii. 2.

On ver. 14. ועפו בכתף וגו׳. כָּתֵף is without doubt here used in a double sense. Every shoulder-shaped elevation is called כתף. Thus we find כתף ים־כנרף Num. xxxiv. 11; כתף היבוסי Joshua xv. 8; xviii. 16; כי הר־יערים ibid. ver. 10. כי יריחו xviii. 12; כי לוזה xviii. 13. So, too, Josh. xv. 11 speaks of a כֶּתֶף עֶקְרוֹן. Therefore the shoulder-like watershed of the coast of Philistia toward the sea may be called כתף. But from the verb עפו it is seen that the Prophet has in mind at the same time the figure of a bird of prey that flies on a man's shoulder in order to belabor his head. But is כָּתֵף st. const. or absolutus. DELITZSCH is of the opinion that, on account of the following פ in פלשתים, the stat. absol is used in the sense of stat. constructus. It were possible that the Masorets might have punctuated in this way for the reason assigned, yet this kind of punctuation ought to occur oftener. But DELITZSCH can only appeal to the accent not being drawn backwards in חָצֵב בוֹ v. 2, and הִצִּב בוֹ x. 15, where no st. constructus exists. I agree, therefore, with DRECHSLER who takes פלשתים to be in apposition with כתף: "they fly on to the shoulder, the (so named) Philistine land;" יָמָּה, however, refers to the whole, and is contrasted, not with an eastern כתף (כי יריחו Josh. xviii. 12), but with בני קדם.——יבזו comp. x. 2.—משלוח יד. מִשְׁלוֹחַ occurs again only Esth. ix. 19, 22 in the sense of missio (donorum). On the other hand מִשְׁלַח יָד occurs five times in Deut. (xii. 7; xv. 10; xxiii. 21; xxviii. 8, 20) in the sense of "something coming under the hand," which is said of food, business, etc. Here it is what the master, the conqueror, the oppressor lays his hand on in order to hold it down; Ps. xxxii. 4; xxxviii. 8; lv. 21; cvi. 26, 42; cxxxviii. 7, etc. In this the abstract stands for the concrete as in משמעת, which means audientia (audience) both in the sense of confidential hearing, as a title of honor (1 Sam. xxii. 14; 2 Sam. xxiii. 23) and in the sense of obedientia (= obedientes, subditi).

On ver. 15. החרים וגו. There exists no necessity for reading החריב. For, as DELITZSCH remarks, החרים is only a strengthened גָּעַר "to reproach," Ps. cvi. 9; Nah. i. 4.——הניף ידו comp. on x. 32.——עְיָם is ἅπ. λεγ. Expositors differ about it very much. To me it seems best with DELITZSCH to derive the word from עים—חום, חָמַם (from which חום niger, "the burned black," Gen. xxx. 32 sqq.).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet now declares the relation of the last, glorious return of Israel to the appearance of the Messiah. In ver. 10, he puts in front the fact that the heathen will inquire after the root of Jesse, and that in this respect the place where the Messiah rests shall partake of great glory. By this he intimates plainly that the heathen shall turn to the Messiah before Israel, and that therefore the promised return of Israel shall only be afterwards. Then he speaks of this return very fully. As underlying thought, he represents that, as the LORD after the Egyptian bondage would reject His people by a more extended captivity, so He would cause a second return out of this captivity. With this thought begins, and closes the section vers. 11-16. The remnant of the nation shall be gathered out of all lands (vers. 11, 12). The inward dissension between Ephraim, and Judah shall cease (ver. 13). They shall unitedly conquer, and subjugate their enemies of the past, both East and West (ver. 14). The Red sea shall be dried up, the Euphrates shall be divided into seven channels, so that both bodies of water that separated the holy land from the scenes of the first and second captivities may be easily crossed over. (ver. 15). Thus from the second captivity there shall be prepared as glorious a road for the remnant, as there was for the nation to return out of the first bondage. (16).

2. And in that day——glorious.—Ver. 10. We must conceive of the subject matter of this description and of vers. 11-16 as falling between the sections vers. 1-5 and 6-9. For doubtless the human world must be first penetrated by the peace of God. Only after that can peace extend to the inferior creatures (comp. Gen. i. 26 sqq.). But the Prophet has here combined the beginning and the end, because he thought he could characterize the Messianic dominion most clearly, by its consequences. In a similar way Jeremiah (iii. and iv.), proceeds from the description of the (שוב) return in the past to the description of the return in the far future, in order finally to join on after that the summons to return in the present. The Prophet's naming the Messiah Himself "root of Jesse" after calling him, ver. 1, "a shoot out of the root of Jesse," has a double reason. The first seems to me to be the mere formal one, viz.: that for brevity's sake the Prophet would avoid repeating נֵצֶר מִן "a shoot from." But he could justly omit this because the Messiah formed the most prominent ingredient of the root of Jesse. He was in this root like He was in the loins of Abraham (Heb. vii. 10). But for Him, the root of Jesse had been a common root as any other. We have here therefore, not only a formal-rhetorical synecdoche, but also one justified in its substance. For the expression is in any case a synecdoche (comp. the so frequent synecdochical use of the word "seed"). As root he could not be a standard of the heathen. He could be so only as a trunk or stem that has grown out of the root. In this sense he is called "root of David," Rev. v. 5; but with omission of the synecdoche, he is called "root and offspring of David," Rev. xxii. 16. Paul cites our passage Rom. xv. 12 according to the LXX. The Messiah is a standard to the heathen so far as He will be an appearance that will be observable to all, and mightily draw the attention of all to Himself. On the subject matter comp. ii. 2; lxvi. 18 sqq.; Hag. ii. 7;

Zech. ii. 15. The standard "stands" (comp. iii. 13) for it is fastened to an upright pole (Num. xxi. 8, where the pole itself is called נֵס. Comp. Isa. v. 26). But it is not said who has planted the standard. It just stands there (comp. κεῖται, Luke ii. 34). It sets itself by its own inward, divine power. שֹׁרֶשׁ "a root" stands first with emphasis. אֵלָיו "unto Him" resumes the subject. "Unto Him shall seek," conveys the notion of longing desire. It is clear that by "nations" (גּוֹיִם) are meant the heathen. For though גּוֹי "nation," in the singular, is used for Israel (comp. i. 4), it is never so in the plural.

Israel did not receive the LORD when He came to His own (Jno. i. 11). It is the same thought that Paul expresses Rom. x. 20, in words taken from Isa. lxv. 1, 2 (according to LXX.). "I was found of them, that sought me not; I was manifest (נִדְרַשְׁתִּי) unto them that asked not after me." Paul ascribes to partial blindness the exceeding remarkable fact, that after the appearance of the Messiah the heathen entered into the kingdom of God before Israel, (Rom. xi. 25)—מְנוּחָה "a rest," the place of rest where moving herds or caravans settle down, (xxviii. 12; xxxii. 18; lxvi. 1, and Num. x. 33). The place where the Messiah sits down to rest is identical with the place where He reveals the fulness of His might and glory, it is His body, the church (Eph. i. 23). Still at the present time the church is a gentile church, and yet it is a glory (כָּבוֹד abstr. pro concr.), i. e., a realization of the idea of glory, (comp. Ps. xlv. 14) even though only a preliminary and relative glory.

3. And it shall come to pass —— of the earth.—Vers. 11, 12. The Prophet now turns to Israel. Israel must first be broken up, and its separate parts be scattered into all lands, if it is to accept Him that is promised to Israel for salvation. Only out of a state of banishment and dispersion, and only after the heathen have previously joined themselves to Him, does Israel know and lay hold on its Redeemer. But when it shall have known Him, then will the dispersion cease, then shall Israel be gathered and be brought back into its land. The first exile was the Egyptian. Wonderfully was Israel redeemed out of it. A second exile is in prospect. The Prophet assumes it. He has already announced it vi. 11 sqq.; x. 5 sqq. What had already occurred at that time under Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xv. 29) was as much only a faint beginning of the exile, as the return under Zerubbabel and Ezra, was only a faint beginning of the redemption. The Roman exile, which is but a part of the second exile, though the completion of it, must first have accomplished itself, before the second redemption can accomplish itself.

The LORD has acquired Israel (קְנוֹת), He let it cost Him something, He expended great care upon it, therefore the nation is His property (His סְגֻלָּה "peculiar treasure," Exod. xix. 5, etc.). קָנָה "purchased," is found in this sense even in Exod. xv. 16, the song of triumph of Moses, to which Isaiah seems here to allude.

The Prophet does not say בְּאַשּׁוּר, etc., "in Assyria," but "from A," etc., (vid. Exod. x. 5), for he would not so much intimate the locality where the banished are found, as rather designate a remnant, not yet quite exterminated by the nation in the midst of which they are found. He then names eight nations, Assyria in advance, for that is the world power that he sees immediately before him, and that represents all following powers, i. e., the world-power in general. Next he names Egypt, for this is not only to be the actual scene of future exile, but is also a prototype of such exile. Then follow two names that belong to Egypt, then three that belong to Assyria, finally a name belonging to a region more distant still,

Pathros (Egyptian Pather-res, i. e., the southern Pather in distinction from other places sacred to Hathor, of this name. vid. EBER'S, Egypt. und die Bücher Mose's, I. p. 115 sqq. On its relation to מִצְרַיִם comp. the remarks at chap. xix. 1), is Upper-Egypt (Jer. xliv. 15); "Cush" (Ethiopia) is a name "that acquired an extension from the south of India to the interior of Africa" (PRESSEL). Elam (Elymais xxi. 2; xxii. 6) is southern Media; Shinar, southern Mesopotamia (Gen. x. 10); on Hamath comp. on x. 9; the islands of the sea are the western islands and coasts of the Mediterranean sea (xxiv. 15; xl. 15; xli. 1, 5, etc.). When it is said that the LORD will raise a standard to the nations, it is not meant that this signal shall concern the heathen nations, for ver. 10 spoke of the calling of the Gentiles; but in the direction of these various abodes of the nations, the sign shall be given to the Israelites.

4. The envy also —— land of Egypt.—Vers. 13–16. It might be supposed that, having told of the gathering of the remnant, the Prophet would proceed at once to describe the return. But he does this only at vers. 15, 16. First, the idea of gathering and re-union brings up that of inward unity. He announces that the old enmity between Judah and Ephraim will cease, and that henceforth, both, strong from unity, shall conquer their outward foes. Are "the enemies of Judah" the Ephraimites (the Prophet would say, did the oppressors of Judah appear even among Ephraim, they would be exterminated) then the "envy of Ephraim," is not the jealousy that Ephraim has, but that of which it is the object. But as the Prophet ascribes to Judah oppression in the second half, after referring to him in the first half as the one oppressed, so in the second half he ascribes envy to Ephraim, after having in the first part described him as the object of envy. There is therefore, an artistic crossing of notions. Israel, harmonious at last, shall at once be superior in strength to all its neighbors. It is very evident here, how the Prophet paints the remotest future with the colors of the present. Still in the period of the reign of peace (comp. too, ii. 4) he makes Israel take vengeance on his enemies, and subdue them quite in the fashion that, in the Prophet's time, would be the heart's desire of a true Theocrat.

The "tongue of the Egyptian sea," is the Arabian gulf or Reed-gulf, יַם־סוּף (Exod. x. 19, etc.). "Tongue" לָשׁוֹן of an arm of the sea, like Josh. xv. 2, 5; xviii. 19. The Euphrates in the second return is to correspond to the Jordan which was so miraculously crossed in the journey out of Egypt (Josh. iii.). The LORD shall wave His hand against it, as it were, adjuring it, and at the same time smite it with the breath of His mouth as with a glowing hot wind, that will dry it up, so that it will separate into seven shallow brooklets, which Israel may walk through in sandals. Thereby, a "fenced way," (via munita מְסִלָּה xix. 23; xl. 3; lxii. 10, etc., comp. vii. 3) will be prepared for the remnant of Israel out of the Assyrian exile, that will be as glorious as the מסלה on which Israel returned out of Egypt. As for "the remnant," it must be understood with the same restriction explained x. 21 sqq.

[J. A. ALEXANDER, on ver. 13. A consideration of the history of the enmity of Ephraim against Judah, of the nature of the schism they wrought and maintained in Israel, "explains why the Prophet lays so much more stress upon the envy of Ephraim than upon the enmity of Judah, viz.: because the latter was only the indulgence of an unhallowed feeling, to which, in the other case was superadded open rebellion and apostacy from God. Hence, the first three members of the verse before us speak of Ephraim's enmity to Judah, and only the fourth of Judah's enmity to Ephraim; as if it occurred to the Prophet that, although it was Ephraim whose disposition needed chiefly to be changed, yet Judah also had a change to undergo, which is therefore intimated in the last clause, as a kind of after-thought. The envy of Ephraim against Judah shall depart—the enemies of Judah (in the kingdom of the ten tribes) shall be cut off—Ephraim shall no more envy Judah—yes, and Judah in its turn shall cease to vex Ephraim.

Ibid. On ver. 16. מסלה is a highway as explained by JUNIUS (agger) and HEND. (causey), an artificial road formed by casting up the earth, (from סָלַל to raise) and thus distinguished from a path worn by the feet (דֶּרֶךְ or נְתִיבָה)].

8. ISRAEL'S SONG OF PRAISE FOR THE WRATH AND GRACE OF HIS GOD.

CHAPTER XII. 1-6.

1 AND in that day thou shalt say,
O LORD, I will praise thee:
[a]Though thou was angry with me, [b]thine anger is turned away,
And thou comfortedst me.
2 Behold, God is my salvation;
I will trust, and not be afraid:
For the LORD JEHOVAH is my strength and my song;
He also is become my salvation.
3, 4 Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation. And in that day shall ye say,
Praise the LORD,
[1]Call upon his name,
Declare his doings among the people,
Make mention that his name is exalted.
5 Sing unto the LORD; for he hath done excellent things:
This is known in all the earth.
6 Cry out and shout, thou [2]inhabitant of Zion:
For great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee.

[1] Or, Proclaim his name.

[2] Heb. inhabitress.

[a] That.

[b] let thine anger, etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 1. יָשֹׁב וגו. I do not think that this period can be construed paratactically; for then it must read וַתָּשָׁב וַתְּנַחֲמֵנִי.—Isaiah never uses אָנַף. This word is probably an allusion to 1 Kings viii. 46, where Solomon in his prayer of dedication says: "If they sin against thee, and thou be angry with them, וְאָנַפְתָּ בָם." Comp. Ps. lx. 3.

On ver. 2. יְשׁוּעָתִי is very frequent both in Isa. (xxv. 9; xxvi. 1; xxxiii. 2; xlix. 6; li. 6, 8; lvi. 1, etc.), and in the Psalms (lxii. 2; lxxxviii. 2; lxxxix. 27, etc. It occurs three times in our chapter, ver. 2, bis, and ver. 3.—אבטח and אפחד form a paronomasia.—לא אפחד recalls Ps. xxvii. 1 (יי מָעוֹז־חַיַּי מִמִּי אֶפְחָד). The entire second clause of ver. 2 is borrowed from the triumphal song of Moses, of which we were reminded before by קָנוֹת xi. 1. Comp. Ps. cxviii. 14. Only it may be noticed that in our passage, as if to excel the original (DELITZSCH), the two divine names יה יהוה stand in the form of a climax ascendens.—יָהּ is an abbreviation of יהוה peculiar to poetry. It occurs first Exod. xv. 2; xvii. 16. Beside the text, it occurs Isa. xxvi. 4, as here joined with יהוה and xxxviii. 11, where יה is put double. Beside these instances the word is found only in the Psalms and in Song of Sol. viii. 6.—זִמְרָת abbreviated instead of וְזִמְרָתִי would not be Hebrew. The suffix in עָזִּי applies also to וְזִמְרָת; both appear thereby as one notion. Comp. Ewald, § 339 b.

On ver. 3. שָׂשׂוֹן xxii. 13; xxxv. 10; li. 3, 11; lxi. 1.—מַעַיְנוֹת xli. 18.

On ver. 4. The words הוֹדוּ to עֲלִילֹתָיו occur word for word, Ps. cv. 1; 1 Chr. xvi. 8.——נִשְׂגָּב שְׁמוֹ. Comp. Ps. cxlviii. 13: כִּי נִשְׂגָּב שְׁמוֹ לְבַדּוֹ which words appear to have arisen from a combination of our passage and ii. 11, 17.

On ver. 5. זַמְּרוּ, too, is an expression borrowed from the poetry of the Pss. where alone it occurs sometimes with לְ sometimes as here with the accus.; Ps. xlvii. 7; lxviii. 5, 33. גֵּאוּת is an expression of Isaiah; comp. ix. 17.——K'thibh מְיֻדַּעַת, K'ri מוּדַעַת. The Pual participle is found only in the plural with suffixes, meaning: "acquaintance," amicus (Ps. lv. 14; lxxxviii. 9, 19; xxxi. 12; Job xix. 14; 2 Kings x. 11). As our chapter evinces so much borrowing from the language of the Psalms, I prefer K'thibh. In respect to sense, there is no difference. תְּהִי is a verb easily supplied after מְיֻדַּעַת. The feminine may refer to גֵּאוּת or be construed neuter, and so more generally. The latter is perhaps the better.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet concludes his grand prophecy against Assyria with a short doxology. It has two subdivisions, both of which begin with the words: "and thou shalt (ver. 4: ye shall) say in that day." Both are joined by a brief prophetic middle term (ver. 3). The first comprises six, the second seven members. In the first part Israel speaks in the singular (corresponding to "thou wilt say"), "I will thank the Lord," etc. (ver. 12). After this expression of a proper sentiment, and, as it were, in response to the hope expressed in ver. 2, the promise of ver. 3 is given. After this interpretation comes the second summons, expressed in the plural. Corresponding to this Israel speaks in the plural, manifesting not merely its subjective disposition, but summoning to a general participation in it. Hence follow only imperatives, seven members, in elevated strain. And this little passage, so full of sentiment and art, according to Ewald, cannot be Isaiah's genuine writing! Fortunately he is quite alone in the opinion.

2. And in that day——my salvation.—Vers. 1, 2. "In that day" points to the future—when all that has been foretold shall have been fulfilled (comp. xi. 10, 11). Then shall Israel say "I will praise thee" (יי׳ אוֹדְךָ) that is an original expression of David's, and thereafter of frequent occurrence in the Psalms; 2 Sam. xxii. 50; Ps. xviii. 50; xxx. 13; xxxv. 18; xliii. 4; lii. 11, etc. But the first thing for which Israel is to return thanks is that the Lord was angry with him—that He has punished him.—[See on the construction Text. and Gram. J. A. Alexander remarks here: "The apparent incongruity of thanking God because He was angry is removed by considering that the subject of the thanksgiving is the whole complex idea expressed in the remainder of the verse, of which God's being angry is only one element. It was not simply because God was angry that the people praise Him, but because He was angry and His anger ceased. The same mode of expression is used by Paul in Greek, when he says (Rom. v. 17): "But God be thanked that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have from the heart obeyed," etc. The particle but seems to be necessary to rendering our text into English.—Tr.] The holy anger of God is but a manifestation of His love, and he is as much to be thanked for His anger as for His love.

When, too, the turning of this wrath takes place, Israel may pray for the lasting continuance of favor and grace. That the Masorets also construed as we do (vid Text. and Gram.) appears from the Athnach.

3. Therefore ye shall——of salvation.—Ver. 3. These words appear to be a response to the expression of believing trust that we find in ver. 2. That is, richly and endlessly ye shall partake of salvation. At the Feast of the Tabernacles water was drawn from the fountain of Siloam for a drink-offering. From the priest that so brought it with solemnity into the temple, another took it, and, while doing so, used the words of our text. Comp. in a Bib. Dict. art. Feast of Tabernacles. [This ceremony originated at a period long after Isaiah's time.—Tr.]

4. And in that day——midst of thee.—Vers. 4–6. The second stage of the song. "Ye shall draw" leads the Prophet to proceed in the plural number. Excepting the change of number the words are the same as ver. 1. Thus, too, the verbs of the following two verses are in the plural. Notice, at the same time, that they are imperatives. From this it is seen that Israel no longer makes a subjective confession like ver. 1, but demands a participation in his faith: Jehovah shall be proclaimed to all the world.

The last ver. (6) is distinguished from the foregoing by the verbs being no longer in the plural, but "the returned" of Israel are addressed in the singular. This, too, doubtless, is no accident. In vers. 4 and 5 the word goes out to the wide world: all nations must be taught; the majestic deeds of Jehovah must be made known to the whole earth. It seems to me that the Prophet would wish not to conclude with this look into the measureless expanse, but would rather fix his eyes, to conclude, on the beloved form of the inhabitant [fem. Germ. Bürgerin] of Zion (the expression only here in Isaiah).

All honor and all salvation of Zion rest in this, that it has the Lord in the midst of it as its living and personal shield and fountain of life.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On vii. 1. "Hierosolyma oppugnatur, etc. Jerusalem is assaulted but not conquered. The church is pressed but not oppressed."—Foerster.

2. On vii. 2. "Quando ecclesia, etc. When the Church is assaulted and Christ crucified over again in His elect, Rezin and Pekah, Herod and Pilate are wont to form alliance and enter into friendly relations. There are, so to speak, the foxes of Samson, joined indeed by the tails, but their heads are disconnected."—Foerster.—

"He that believes flees not (Isa. xxviii. 16). 'The righteous is bold as a lion' (Prov. xxviii. 1). Hypocrites and those that trust in works (work-saints) have neither reason nor faith. Therefore they cannot by any means quiet their heart. In prosperity they are, indeed, overweening, but in adversity they fall away (Jer. xvii. 9)." CRAMER.

3. On vii. 9. ("If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established.") "Insignis sententia, etc. A striking sentiment that may be adapted generally to all temptation, because all earnest endeavor after anything, as you know, beguiles us in temptation. But only faith in the word of promise makes us abide and makes sure whatever we would execute. He warns Ahaz, therefore, as if he said: I now promise you by the word, it shall be that those two kings shall not hurt you. Believe this word! For if you do not, whatever you afterwards devise will deceive you: because all confidence is vain which is not supported by the word of God."—LUTHER.

4. On vii. 10-12. "Wicked Ahaz pretends to great sanctity in abstaining from asking a sign through fear of God. Thus hypocrites are most conscientious where there is no need for it: on the other hand, when they ought to be humble, they are the most insolent. But where God commands to be bold, one must be bold. For to be obedient to the word is not tempting God. That is rather tempting God when one proposes something without having the word for it. It is, indeed, the greatest virtue to rest only in the word, and desire nothing more. But where God would add something more than the word, then it must not be thought a virtue to reject it as superfluous. We must therefore exercise such a faith in the word of God that we will not despise the helps that are given in addition to it as aids to faith. For example the Lord offers us in the gospel all that is necessary to salvation. Why then Baptism and the LORD's Supper? Are they to be treated as superfluous? By no means. For if one believes the word he will at the same time exhibit an entire obedience toward God. We ought therefore to learn to join the sign with the word, for no man has the power to sever the two.

But do you ask: is it permitted to ask God for a sign? We have an example of this in Gideon. Answer: Although Gideon was not told of God to ask a sign, yet he did it by the impulse of the Holy Spirit, and not according to his own fancy. We must not therefore abuse his example, and must be content with the sign that is offered by the LORD. But there are extraordinary signs or miracles, like that of the text, and ordinary ones like Baptism and the LORD's Supper. Yet both have the same object and use. For as Gideon was strengthened by that miraculous event, so, too, are we strengthened by Baptism and the Lord's Supper, although no miracle appears before our eyes." HEIM and HOFFMANN after LUTHER. Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, also asked the Lord to show him the right wife for Isaac by means of a sign of His own choosing, (Gen. xxiv. 14).

It ought to be said that this asking a sign (opening the Bible at a venture, or any other book) does not suit Christian perfection (Heb. vi. 1). A Christian ought to be inwardly sensible of the divine will. He ought to content himself with the guarantees that God Himself offers. Only one must have open eyes and ears for them. This thing of demanding a sign, if it is not directly an effect of superstition (Matt. xii. 39; xvi. 4; 1 Cor. i. 22), is certainly childish, and, because it easily leads to superstitious abuses, it is dangerous.

5. On vii. 13. "Non caret, etc. That the Prophet calls God his God is not without a peculiar emphasis. In Zech. ii. 12 it is said, that whoever touches the servants of God touches the pupil of God's eye. Whoever opposes teacher and preacher will have to deal with God in heaven or with the Lord who has put them into office."—FOERSTER.

6. On vii. 14. "The name Immanuel is one of the most beautiful and richest in contents of all the Holy Scripture. 'God with us' comprises God's entire plan of salvation with sinful humanity. In a narrower sense it means 'God-man' (Matth. i. 23), and points to the personal union of divinity and humanity, in the double nature of the Son of God become man. Jesus Christ was a God-with-us, however, in this, that for about 33 years He dwelt among us sinners (Jno. i. 11, 14). In a deeper and wider sense still He was such by the Immanuel's work of the atonement (2 Cor. v. 19; 1 Tim. ii. 3). He will also be such to every one that believes on Him by the work of regeneration and sanctification and the daily renewal of His holy and divine communion of the Spirit (Jno. xvii. 23, 26; xiv. 19, 20, 21, 23). He is such now by His high-priestly and royal administration and government for His whole Church (Matth. xxviii. 20; Heb. vii. 25). He will be such in the present time of the Church in a still more glorious fashion (Jno. x. 16). The entire and complete meaning of the name Immanuel, however, will only come to light in the new earth, and in the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 3, 23; xxii. 5)."—WILH. FRIED. ROOS.

CHAP. VIII.—7. On ver. 5 sqq. "Like boastful swimmers despise small and quiet waters, and on the other hand, for the better display of their skill, boast of the great sea and master it, but often are lost in it,—thus, too, did the hypocrites that despised the small kingdom of Judah, and bragged much and great things of the power and splendor of the kingdom of Israel and of the Syrians; such hypocrites are still to be found now-a-days—such that bear in their eye the admiranda Romae, the splendor, riches, power, ceremonies and pomp of the Romish church, and thereupon 'set their bushel by the bigger-heap.' It is but the devil's temptation over again: 'I will give all this to thee.'"—CRAMER.—"Fons Siloa," etc. "The fountain of Siloam, near the temple, daily reminded the Jews that Christ was coming."—CALVIN on Jno. ix. 7.

8. On viii. 10. "When the great Superlatives sit in their council chambers and have determined everything, how it ought to be, and especially how they will extinguish the gospel, then God sends the angel Gabriel to them, who must look through the window and say: nothing will come of it."—LUTHER.—"Christ, who is our Immanuel, is with us by His becoming man, for us by His office of Mediator, in us by the work of His sanctification, by us by His personal, gracious presence."—CRAMER.

9. On viii. 14, 15. Christ alone is set by God to be a stone by which we are raised up. That He is, however, an occasion of offence to many is because of their purpose, petulance and contempt (1 Pet. ii. 8). Therefore we ought to fear lest we take offence at Him. For whoever falls on this stone will shatter to pieces (Matth. xxi. 44)." CRAMER.

10. On viii. 16 sqq. He warns His disciples against heathenish superstition, and exhorts them to show respect themselves always to law and testimony. "They must not think that God must answer them by visions and signs, therefore He refers them to the written word, that they may not become altogether too spiritual, like those now-a-days who cry: spirit! spirit! . . . Christ says, Luke xvi.: They have Moses and the prophets, and again Jno. v. 39: Search the Scriptures. So Paul says, 2 Tim. iii. 16: The Scripture is profitable for doctrine. So says Peter, 2 Pet. i. 9: We have a sure word of prophecy. It is the word that changes hearts and moves them. But revelations puff people up and make them insolent." HEIM and HOFFMANN after LUTHER.

CHAP. IX.—11. On ver. 1 sqq. (2). "Postrema pars, etc. The latter part of chap. viii. was νομικὴ καὶ ἀπειλητική (legal and threatening) so, on the other hand, the first and best part of chap. ix. is εὐαγγελικὴ καὶ παραμυθητική, (evangelical and comforting). Thus must ever law and gospel, preaching wrath and grace, words of reproof and words of comfort, a voice of alarm and a voice of peace follow one another in the church." FOERSTER.

12. On ix. 1 (2). Both in the Old Testament and New Testament Christ is often called light. Thus Isaiah calls Him "a light to the gentiles," xlii. 6; xlix. 6. The same Prophet says: "Arise, shine (make thyself light), for thy light is come," lx. 1. And again ver. 19: "The Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light." In the New Testament it is principally John that makes use of this expression: "The life was the light of men," i. 4, "and the light shined in the darkness," ver. 5. John was not that light, but bore testimony to the light, ver. 8. "That was the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," ver. 9. And further: "And this is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light," iii. 19. "I am the light of the world," (viii. 12; ix. 5; comp. xii. 35; xxxvi. 46).

13. On ix. 1 (2). The people that sit in darkness may be understood to comprise three grades. First, the inhabitants of Zebulon and Naphtali are called so (viii. 23), for the Prophet's gaze is fixed first on that region lying in the extreme end of Palestine, which was neighbor to the heathen and mixed with them, and on this account was held in low esteem by the dwellers in Judah. The night that spreads over Israel in general is darkest there. But all Israel partakes of this night, therefore all Israel, too, may be understood as among the people sitting in darkness. Finally, no one can deny that this night extends over the borders of Israel to the whole human race. For far as men dwell extends the night which Christ, as light of the world, came to dispel, Luke i. 76 sqq.

14. On ix. 5 (6). Many lay stress on the notion "child," inasmuch as they see in that the reason for the reign of peace spoken of afterwards. It is not said a man, a king, a giant is given to us. But this is erroneous. For the child does not remain a child. He becomes a man: and the six names that are ascribed to Him and also the things predicted of His kingdom apply to Him, not as a child, but as a man. That His birth as a child is made prominent, has its reason in this, that thereby His relation to human kind should be designated as an organic one. He does not enter into humanity as a man, i. e. as one whose origin was outside of it, but He was born from it, and especially from the race of David. He is Son of man and Son of David. He is a natural offshoot, but also the crowning bloom of both. Precisely because He was to be conceived, carried and born of a human mother, and indeed of a virgin, this prophecy belongs here as the completion and definition of the two prophetic pictures vii. 10 sqq.; viii. 1 sqq.—"He came down from heaven for the sake of us men, and for our bliss (1 Tim. i. 15; Luke ii. 7). For our advantage: for He undertook not for the seed of angels, but for the seed of Abraham (Heb. ii. 16). Not sold to us by God out of great love, but given (Rom. v. 15; Jno. iii. 16). Therefore every one ought to make an application of the word 'to us' to himself, and to learn to say: this child was given to me, conceived for me, born to me."—CRAMER.—"Cur oportuit, etc. Why did it become the Redeemer of human kind to be not merely man, nor merely God, but God and man conjoined or θεάνθρωπον? Anselm replies briefly, indeed, but pithily: Deum qui posset, hominem, qui deberet." FOERSTER.

15. On ix. 5 (6). "You must not suppose here that He is to be named and called according to His person, as one usually calls another by his name; but these are names that one must preach, praise and celebrate on account of His act, works and office." LUTHER.

16. On ix. 6. "Verba pauca, etc. A few words, but to be esteemed great, not for their number but for their weight." Augustine. "Admirabilis in, etc. Wonderful in birth, counsellor in what He preaches, God in working, strong in suffering, father of the world to come in resurrection, Prince of peace in bliss perpetual." BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. In reference to "a child is born," and "a son is given," JOH. COCCEIUS remarks in his Heb. Lex. s. v. יָלַד: "respectu, etc., in respect to His human nature He is said to be born, and in respect to His divine nature and eternal generation not indeed born, but given, as, Joh. iii. 16, it reads God gave His only begotten Son."

"In the application of this language all depends on the words is born to us, is given to us." The angels are, in this matter, far from being as blessed as we are. They do not say: To us a Saviour is born this day, but; to you. As long as we do not regard Christ as ours, so long we shall have little joy in Him. But when we know Him as our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption, as a gift that our heavenly Father designed for us, we will appropriate Him to ourselves in humble faith, and take possession of all His redeeming effects that He has acquired. For giving and taking go together. The Son is given to us; we must in faith receive Him." J. J. RAMBACH, Betracht. über das Ev. Esaj., Halle, 1724.

On ix. 6 (7). "The government is on His shoulders." "It is further shown how Christ differs in this respect from worldly kings. They remove from themselves the burden of government and lay it on the shoulders of the privy counsellors. But He does not lay His dominion as a burden on any other; He needs no prime minister and vicegerent to help Him bear the burden of administration, but He bears all by the word of His power as He to whom all things are given of the Father. Therefore He says to the house of Jacob (xlvi. 3 sq.): Hearken unto me ye who were laid on my shoulders from your mothers' womb. I will carry you to old age. I will do it, I will lift, and carry and deliver,—on the contrary the heathen must bear and lift up their idols, (xlvi. 1, 7)."—RAMBACH. "In the first place we must keep in mind His first name: He is called Wonderful. This name affects all the following." "All is wonderful that belongs to this king: wonderfully does He counsel and comfort; wonderfully He helps to acquire and conquer, and all this in suffering and want of strength. (LUTHER, Jen. germ. Tom. III. Fol. 184 b.)" "He uses weakness as a means of subduing all things to Himself. A wretched reed, a crown of thorns and an infamous cross, are the weapons of this almighty God, by means of which He achieves such great things. In the second place, He was a hero and conqueror in that just by death, He robbed him of his might who had the power of death, i. e., the devil (Heb. ii. 14); in that He, like Samson, buried His enemies with Himself, yea, became poison to death itself, and a plague to hell (Hos. xiii. 14) and more gloriously resumed His life so freely laid down, which none of the greatest heroes can emulate." —RAMBACH.

17. On ix. 18 (19) sqq. True friendship can never exist among the wicked. For every one loves only himself. Therefore they are enemies one of another; and they are in any case friends to each other, only as long as it concerns making war on a third party.

CHAP. X.—18. On ver. 4. (Comp. the same expression in chap. ix.). God's quiver is well filled. If one arrow does not attain His object, He takes another, and so on, until the rights of God, and justice have conquered.

19. On x. 5-7. "God works through men in a threefold way. First, we all live, move and have our being in Him, in that all activity is an outflow of His power. Then, He uses the services of the wicked so that they mutually destroy each other, or He chastises His people by their hand. Of this sort the Prophet speaks here. In the third place, by governing His people by the Spirit of sanctification: and this takes place only in the elect."—HEIM AND HOFFMANN.

20. On x. 5 sqq. "Ad hunc, etc. Such places are to be turned to uses of comfort. Although the objects of temptation vary and enemies differ, yet the effects are the same, and the same spirit works in the pious. We are therefore to learn not to regard the power of the enemy nor our own weakness, but to look steadily and simply into the word, that will assuredly establish our minds that they despair not, but expect help of God. For God will not subdue our enemies, either spiritual or corporal, by might and power, but by weakness, as says the text: my strength is made perfect in weakness." (2 Cor. xii. 9).—LUTHER.

21. On x. 15. "Efficacia agendi penes Deum est, homines ministerium tantum praebent. Quare nunc sibilo suo se illos evocaturum minabatur (cap. v. 26; vii. 18); nunc instar sagenae sibi fore ad irretiendos, nunc mallei instar ad feriendos Israelitas. Sed praecipue tum declaravit, quod non sit otiosus in illis, dum Sennacherib securim vocat, quae ad secandum manu sua et destinata fuit et impacta. Non male alicubi Augustinus ita definit, quod ipsi peccant, eorum esse; quod peccando hoc vel illud agant, ex virtute Dei esse, tenebras prout visum est dividentis (De praedest Sanctt.)."—CALVIN Inst. II. 4, 4.

22. On x. 20-27. "In time of need one ought to look back to the earlier great deliverances of the children of God, as to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, or later, from the hand of the Midianites. Israel shall again grow out of the yoke."—DIEDRICH.

CHAP. XI.—23. On ver. 4. "The staff of His mouth." "Evidence that the kingdom of Christ will not be like an earthly kingdom, but consist in the power of the word and of the sacraments; not in leathern, golden or silver girdles, but in girdles of righteousness and faith."—CRAMER.

24. On xi. 10 sqq. If the Prophet honors the heathen in saying that they will come to Christ before Israel, he may be the more readily believed, when ver. 11 sqq., he gives the assurance that the return out of the first, the Egyptian exile, shall be succeeded by a return out of the second, the Assyrian exile, (taking this word in the wider sense of Isaiah). It is manifest that the return that took place under Zerubbabel and Ezra was only an imperfect beginning of that promised return. For according to our passage this second return can only take place after the Messiah has appeared. Farthermore, all Israelites that belong to "the remnant of Israel," in whatever land they may dwell, shall take part in it. It will be, therefore, a universal, not a partial return. If now the Prophet paints this return too with the colors of the present (ver. 13 sqq.), still that is no reason for questioning the reality of the matter. Israel will certainly not disappear, but arise to view in the church of the new covenant. But if the nation is to be known among the nations as a whole, though no more as a hostile contrast, but in fraternal harmony, why then shall not the land, too, assume a like position among the lands? But the nation can neither assume its place among nations, nor the land its place among lands, if they are not both united: the people Israel in the land of their fathers.

25. On Chap. XI. "We may here recall briefly the older, so-called spiritual interpretation. Vers. 1-5 were understood of Christ's prophetic office that He exercised in the days of His flesh, then of the overthrow of the Roman Empire and of Antichrist, who was taken to be the Pope. But the most thorough-going of those old expositors must acknowledge, at ver. 4, that the Antichrist is not yet enough overthrown, and must be yet more overthrown. If such is the state of the case, then this interpretation is certainly false, for ver. 4 describes not a gradual judgment, but one accomplished at once. There have been many Antichrists, and among the Popes too, but the genuine Antichrist described 2 Thess. ii., is yet to be expected, and also the fulfillment of ver. 4 of our chapter. Thereby is proved at the same time that the peaceful state of things in the brute world and the return of the Jews to their native land are still things of the future, for they must happen in that period when the Antichristian world, and its head shall be judged by Christ. But then, too, the dwelling together of tame and wild beasts is not the entrance of the heathen into the church, to which they were heretofore hostile, and the return of the Jews is not the conversion of a small part of Israel that took place at Pentecost and after. The miracles and signs too, contained in vers. 15, 16 did not take place then. We see just here how one must do violence to the word if he will not take it as it stands. But if we take it as we have done, then the whole chapter belongs to the doctrine of hope (Hoffnungslehre) of the Scripture, and constitutes an important member of it. The LORD procures right and room for His church. He overthrows the world-kingdom together with Antichrist. He makes of the remnant of Israel a congregation of believers filled with the Spirit, to whom He is near in an unusual way, and from it causes His knowledge to go out into all the world. He creates peace in the restless creatures, and shows us here in advance what more glorious things we may look for in the new earth. He presents to the world a church which, united in itself, unmolested by neighbors, stands under God's mighty protection. All these facts are parts of a chain of hope that must be valuable and dear to our hearts. The light of this future illumines the obscurity of the present; the comfort of that day makes the heart fresh." WEBER, der Prophet Jesaja, 1875.

CHAP. XII.—26. On ver. 4 sq. "These will not be the works of the New Testament: sacrificing and slaying, and make pilgrimage to Jerusalem and to the Holy Sepulchre, but praising God and giving thanks, preaching and hearing, believing with the heart and confessing with the mouth. For to praise our God is good; such praise is pleasant and lovely" (Psalm cxlvii. 1). CRAMER.

27. On Chap. XII. "With these words conclude the prophetic discourses on Immanuel. Through what obscurity of history have we not had to go, until we came to the bright light of the kingdom of Christ! How Israel and the nations had to pass through the fire of judgment before the sun arises in Israel and the entire gentile world is illumined! It is the same way that every Christian has to travel. In and through the fire we become blessed. Much must be burnt up in us, before we press to the full knowledge of God and of His Son, before we become entirely one with Him, entirely glad and joyful in Him. Israel was brought up and is still brought up for glory, and we too. O that our end too were such a psalm of praise as this psalm!" WEBER, Der Pr. Jes. 1875.

SECOND SUBDIVISION.

THE PROPHECIES AGAINST FOREIGN NATIONS.

CHAPTERS XIII.—XXVII.

A.—THE DISCOURSES AGAINST INDIVIDUAL NATIONS.

CHAP. XIII.—XXIII.

The people of God do not stand insulated and historically severed from the rest of the human race, but form an integral part of it, and contribute to the great web of the history of humanity. Therefore the Prophet of the LORD must necessarily direct his gaze to the Gentile world, and, as historiographer, set forth their relations to the Kingdom of God, whether hostile or friendly. It is true that, in those prophecies that deal with the theocracy as a whole, or with individual theocratic relations or persons, the prophet has always to set their relations to the outward world in the light of God's word. But he has often occasion to make some heathen nation or other the primary subject of direct prophecy. Isaiah, too, has such occasion: and his prophecies that come under this category we now find collected here.

Amos, also, put together his utterances against foreign nations (chap. i.). But this grouping is so interwoven in the plan of his work, that, like an eagle first circles around his prey, and then swoops down on it, so he first passes through the nations dwelling around the Holy Land, then settles down on the chief nation, Israel, dwelling in the middle. Isaiah has brought the independent prophecies against foreign nations into a less intimate connection with his utterances that relate directly to the theocracy, by incorporating them into his book as a special סֵפֶר (or volume). Zephaniah has joined Isaiah in this as to material and form; except that the latter appears less marked because of the smallness of his book (ch. ii.). But Jeremiah (chap. xlvi.–li.) and Ezekiel (chap. xxv.-xxxii.) have, just like Isaiah, devoted independent divisions of their books to the utterances against foreign nations. The order in which Isaiah gives his prophecies against the heathen nations is not arbitrary. It makes four subdivisions. First, in chaps. xiii., xiv., comes a prophecy against Babylon. It stands here for a double reason: 1) because it begins with a general contemplation of the day of Jehovah, which evidently is meant for a foundation for all the following denunciations of judgment; 2) because Isaiah, after he had lived to see the judgment of God on Assyria under the walls of Jerusalem, knows well that the world-power culminates, not in Assyria, but in Babylon, and that not Assyria but Babylon is to execute the judgment of God on the centre of the theocracy.

But it is quite natural that Assyria should not be unrepresented in the list of the nations against which the Prophet turns his direct utterances. This is the less allowable because the following utterances have all of them for subject the relations to Assyria of the nations mentioned. For all that the Prophet has to say from chap. xiv. 28–xx. 6, and then again in chap. xxi. (from ver. 11 on), xxii. and xxiii. stands in relations more or less near to the great Assyrian deluge that Isaiah saw was breaking in on Palestine and the neighboring lands. Thus the second division begins with the brief word against Assyria, chap. xiv. 24-27. To this are joined prophecies against Philistia, Moab, Syria, Ephraim, Cush and Egypt. The third division forms a singular little סֵפֶר— It might be named libellus emblematicus. For it contains a second prophecy against Babylon, then a similar one against Syria, against the Arabians, and against Jerusalem, the last with a supplement directed against the steward Shebna. These four prophecies in chap. xxi. and xxii. stand together because they all of them have emblematical superscriptions. Out of regard to this the prophecy against Babylon (chap. xxi. 1-10) stands here, although in respect to its contents it belongs rather to xiii. and xiv. Even the prophecy against "the valley of vision" with its supplement stands here out of regard to its superscription, although it is directed against no heathen nation, but against Jerusalem; so that we must say that chaps. xiii.–xxiii. contain prophecies against the heathen nations, not exclusively, but with one exception that has its special reasons.

Chap. xxiii. forms the fourth division. It contains a prophecy against Tyre, which, indeed, presupposes the Assyrian invasion, but expressly names the Chaldeans as executors of the judgment on Tyre. On account of this remarkable, and, in a certain respect, solitary instance of such a sight of things distant, this prophecy is put alone and at the end.

Thus the chapters xiii.—xxiii. are divided as follows:—

I. The first prophecy against Babylon, xiii. 1—xiv. 23.

II. Prophecies relating to Assyria, and the nations threatened by Assyria, Philistia, Moab, Syria, Ephraim, Cush, Egypt. xiv. 24—xx. 26.

III. The libellus emblematicus, containing prophecies against Babylon, Edom, Arabia and Jerusalem, the last with a supplement directed against the steward Shebnah. xxi., xxii.

IV. Prophecy against Tyre. xxiii.

I.—THE FIRST PROPHECY AGAINST BABYLON.

Chapter XIII. 1—XIV. 23.

There yawns a tremendous chasm between the preceding prophecies that originated in the time of Ahaz and the present. We at once recognize Isaiah again in xiii., xiv. It is his spirit, his power, his poetry, his wit. They are his fundamental views, but it is no longer the old form. His way of speaking is quieter, softer, clearer; he no longer bursts on us like a roaring mountain stream. He is grown older. But he has progressed, too, in his prophetic knowledge. Now he knows that it is not Assyria that is the theocracy's most dangerous enemy. For him Assyria is a thing of the past. In proportion as it came to the front before, it now and henceforth retires. Isaiah had seen Assyria's humiliating overthrow before the gates of Jerusalem. Now he knows that another power, that Babylon shall destroy the theocracy and stand as the sole governing world-power. But he knows, too, that Babylon's day will come as well as Nineveh's. For how could Jehovah's Prophet ever doubt that his Lord and his nation will triumph, and that the world-power will be overthrown? But the judgment of Babylon is for him only a part of the great judgment of the world, of that "day of the Lord," that does not come on one day, but realizes itself in many successive stages. He sees in Babylon the summit of the world-power, by whose disintegration Israel must be made free. Therefore he makes the great day of Jehovah's judgment break before our eyes (xiii. 1-13), but describes immediately only the judgment upon Babylon. On both these accounts this prophecy stands at the head of all Isaiah's prophecies against the nations. For it seemed fitting to put in the front a general and comprehensive word about the great judgment day which immediately introduced the denunciation of judgment against the head of all the nations of the world-power. Some have maintained that it was impossible that Isaiah could have recognized Babylon as the enemy of the theocracy: and that it was still more impossible that he could have predicted the deliverance of Israel out of the captivity of Babylon. But both these chapters are Isaiah's, both in form and contents, as we have declared above and shall prove in detail below. Beside, there is the consideration that our chapter has undoubtedly been used by Jeremiah (l., li.), by Ezekiel in various passages (vii. 17, comp.

Isa. xiii. 7;—vii. 29, comp. Isa. xiii. 11;—xix. 11, comp. Isa. xiv. 5;—xxxviii. 6, 15—xxxix. 2, comp. Isa. xiv. 13), and by Zephaniah (iii. 11, comp. Isa. xiii. 3), as shall be shown when dealing with the passages concerned. Therefore it seems to me to be beyond doubt that Isaiah wrote our chapters. But how Isaiah could know all that is here given to the world under his name (xiii. 1) as prophecy, that is certainly a problem. That is the problem that science should propose to itself for solution. It ought not to deny accredited facts in order not to be compelled to recognize prophecy as a problem, i. e. as possible. For to deny premises in order to avoid a conclusion that one will not draw, is just as unscientific as it is to invent premises in order to gain a conclusion that one wants to draw.

The discourse divides into a general part and a particular. The former (xiii. 1–13) is, as has been said, at the same time the introduction to the totality of the prophecies against the heathen nations. The particular part again presents two halves: the first (xiii. 14–22) portrays the judgment on Babylon, the second, after a short reference to the redemption and return home of Israel (xiv. 1, 2) contains a satirical song on the ruler of Babylon conceived in abstracto (xiv. 3–23).

a) The preface: introduction in general to the prophecies of the day of the Lord.

CHAPTER XIII. 1–13.

1 THE [a]BURDEN OF BABYLON, WHICH ISAIAH THE SON OF AMOZ DID SEE.
2 Lift ye up a banner upon [b]the high mountain,
Exalt the voice unto them, shake the hand,
That they may go into the gates of the nobles.
3 I have commanded my sanctified ones,
I have also called my mighty ones for mine anger,
Even them that rejoice in my highness.
4 The noise of a multitude in the mountains, [1]like as of a great people:
A tumultuous noise of the kingdoms of nations gathered together:
The LORD of hosts mustereth the host of the battle.
5 They come from a far country,
From the end of heaven,
Even the LORD, and the weapons of his indignation,
To destroy the whole land.
6 Howl ye; for the day of the LORD is at hand;
It shall come as a destruction from the Almighty.
7 Therefore shall all hands [a]be faint,
And every man's heart shall melt:
8 And they shall be afraid:
Pangs and sorrows shall take hold of them;
They [c]shall be in pain as a woman that travaileth:
They shall [a]be amazed one at another;
Their faces shall be as [4]flames.
9 Behold, the day of the LORD cometh,
Cruel both with wrath and fierce anger,
To lay the land desolate:
And he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it.
10 For the stars of heaven and [d]the constellations thereof
Shall not give their light:
The sun shall be darkened in his going forth,
And the moon shall not cause her light to shine.
11 And I [e]will punish the world for their evil,
And the wicked for their iniquity;
And I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease,
And will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible.
12 I will make a man more precious than fine gold;
Even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir.
13 Therefore I will shake the heavens,
And the earth shall [f]remove out of her place,

In the wrath of the LORD of hosts,
And in the day of his fierce anger.

[1] Heb. the likeness of.
[2] Or, fall down.
[3] Heb. wonder every man at his neighbor.
[4] Heb. faces of the flames.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 1. מַשָּׂא from נָשָׂא is elatum, "something borne, that which is proposed," therefore as much onus as effatum. On account of this ambiguity it is almost exclusively used of such divine utterances as impose on men the burden of judicial visitation. From Jer. xxiii. 33 sqq., we learn that the word, being abused by mockers on account of this ambiguity, was prohibited by Jehovah as designation of prophetic utterances. In Isaiah the word occurs twelve times in the sense of "judicial sentence;" and, excepting xxxvi. 6, it so occurs only in chapters xiii.—xxiii., and here again, with the exception of xxii. 1 (for the particular reasons see the comment in loc.), solely in utterances against foreign nations. This last circumstance is easily to be explained by the unfavorable meaning that underlies the word, which was pressed by the mockers, Jer. xxiii. 33 sqq. A מַשָּׂא simply and only is never directed against the theocracy. But it cannot be inferred from the absence of this in passages that relate to the theocracy that the word is foreign to Isaiah (KNOBEL).

On ver. 2. נִשְׁפֶּה occurs only here; comp. שְׁפִי xli. 18; Jer. iii. 2, etc.——נָשָׂא נֵס is an expression peculiar to Isaiah. Comp. v. 26; xi. 12; xviii. 3.——לָהֶם after קוֹל is to be referred to the nations called.——פִּתְחֵי נְדִיבִים designates the goal of the movement to which the nations are summoned. Both words belong to Isa.: iii. 26; xxxii. 5, 8.——נָדִיב is "the free, the noble" (comp. at xxxii. 5; and Prov. xix. 6; xxv. 7, etc.).

On ver. 3. עַלִּיזֵי גַּאֲוָתִי are "Those rejoicing at my highness" (gen. obj.). Both words are entirely characteristic of Isaiah. The עַלִּיז is found only xxii. 2; xxiii. 7; xxiv. 8; xxxii. 13, and in the borrowed passage Zeph. iii. 11. Hence it is incomprehensible how the passage last named can be explained to be the original. Moreover Isaiah is almost the only one of the prophets that uses גַּאֲוָה. For beside ix. 8; xiii. 11; xvi. 6; xxv. 11, and the borrowed passage Zeph. iii. 11, it occurs only Jer. xlviii. 29, where Jeremiah, for the sake of a play on words, heaps together all substantive derivatives from גאה.

On ver. 4. דְּמוּת occurs again in Isaiah only xl. 18. It is found oftenest in Ezekiel, and in an adverbial sense as here—כִּדְמוּת (Ezek. xxiii. 15). Also שָׁאוֹן is a word of Isaiah's. It occurs only seventeen times in the Old Testament; of these, eight times in Isaiah: v. 14; xiii. 4; xvii. 12; (bis), 13; xxiv. 8; xxv. 5; lxvi. 6. The expression צְבָא מִלְחָמָה, beside the present, occurs only Num. xxxi. 14, and 1 Chr. vii. 4; xii. 37. There is evidently a contrast intended between צָבָא and צְבָאוֹת: the LORD of the heavenly hosts now musters His army hordes on earth.

On ver. 5. Shall we regard בָּאִים at the beginning of the verse as dependent on מְפַקֵּד, ver. 4, and as apposition with צְבָא מִלְחָמָה? It is against this that the second half of ver. 5 must then be construed as a rhetorical exclamation, which in this connection and form seems strange. It is in favor of this that otherwise בָּאִים must be construed as predicate. But then it would be said of Jehovah that He comes from a far country. But may not this be said in the present connection? It has just been said that Jehovah summons the war hordes and musters them. He is therefore their leader. Need it seem strange then that He is described as approaching at their head? Therefore בָּאִים is the predicate of ver. 5 b, placed at the beginning. מֵאֶרֶץ מֶרְחָק occurs again only xlvi. 11; other turns of expression viii. 9; x. 3; xvii. 13; xxx. 27; xxxiii. 17. כְּלֵי זַעְמוֹ occurs again only Jer. l. 25; on זַעַם comp. on x. 5. חַבֵּל comp. on x. 27; xxxii. 7; liv. 16.

On ver. 6. כְּשֹׁד, note the play on words; כְּ is the so-called Kaph veritatis. Isaiah often uses שֹׁד, xvi. 4; xxii. 4; li. 19, etc.; שַׁדַּי he uses only this once.

On ver. 7. כָּל־יָדַיִם תִּרְפֶּינָה, the expression occurs in Isaiah only here, and is borrowed by Ezek. vii. 17 from this place.

On ver. 8. נִבְהֲלוּ in Isaiah again only xxi. 3 in a similar connection.——צִירִים occurs again only xxi. 3 (bis) in the sense of constrictiones, cruciatus, cramps.—חֲבָלִים Isaiah uses (v. 18; xxxiii. 20, 23) in the sense of "cords," and in the kindred "cries of a woman in travail" (xxvi. 17; lxvi. 7).——חִיל used not seldom of a travailing woman, and as a figure of feeling terror; xxiii. 4, 5; xxvi. 17, 18; xlv. 10; liv. 1; lxvi. 7, 8.——תָּמַהּ stupere occurs again only xxix. 9. Note the constructio praegnans.

On ver. 9. אַכְזָרִי only here in Isaiah: it is adjective. The two substantives are, co-ordinate with אַכְזָרִי, apposition with יוֹם, doubtless because adjectives cannot be formed from these substantive notions, as can be done from אַכְזָר. Therefore, according to frequent usage, we are to construe עֶבְרָה and חֲרוֹן אַף as abstract nouns used in a concrete sense. עֶבְרָה frequent in Isa. ix. 18; x. 6; xiii. 13; xiv. 6; xvi. 6. חֲרוֹן אַף excepting ver. 13 does not occur again in Isaiah. The expression is frequent in the Pentateuch: Exod. xxxii. 12; Num. xxv. 4; xxxii. 14; Deut. xiii. 18.——By the words לָשׂוּם וגו׳ the Prophet designates the object of the day of judgment.——The expression שׂוּם לְשַׁמָּה only here in Isaiah. Perhaps it is borrowed from Joel i. 7. הָיָה לְשַׁמָּה Isa. v. 9. שַׁמָּה alone xxiv. 12.——That הָאָרֶץ means "the earth," see "Exeget. and Crit." on ver. 5.——הִשְׁמִיד x. 7; xiv. 23; xxvi. 14.——חַטָּאִים i. 28; xxxiii. 14.

On ver. 10. כִּי is not causative, but explicative. That the day of the LORD is dreadful, and nothing but burning wrath will be evident in that the stars become dark.——If כּוֹכָבִים and כְּסִילִים are distinguished, the explanation cannot be that the latter are not also כּוֹכָבִים, but that they are only a pre-eminent species of stars. The Vav, is therefore the Vav augmentative: "the stars of heaven and even its Orions." The latter are the most luminous stars, whose brightness, because of the first magnitude, more easily than all others penetrates whatever hinderances there may be. The plural of כְּסִיל is, any way, a generalizing one, i. e., that elevates the individual to the rank of a species. Otherwise we know of only one כְּסִיל as a star. But as 1 Sam. xvii. 43, Goliath says to David: "thou comest to me with the staves," although David had only one staff; or as Jer. xxviii. 12, after telling of the breaking of one yoke, continues: "wooden yokes hast thou broken," therefore here as elsewhere the plural of the individual is conceived as equivalent to the genus. Compare Cicerones, Scipiones, les Voltaire, les Mirabeau; and perhaps כּוֹכְבֵי בֹקֶר Job xxxviii. 7 belongs to the same category.——הֵהֵל, Hiph from הלל, a verb that elsewhere expresses clearness of sound, occurs only Job xxxi. 26; xli. 10, and in both places in connection with אוֹר.——On חשך השמש comp. v. 30.——Of נגה there is only one other form in Isaiah, and that Kal. in just one passage, ix. 1.

On ver. 11. הארץ is more expressly defined as תֵּבֵל. This word is very frequent in the first part of Isa. xiv. 17, 21; xviii. 3; xxiv. 4; xxvi. 9, 18; xxvii. 6; xxxiv. 1. It never means a single land, but is always either the οἰκουμένη as terra fertilis contrasted with the desert (xiv. 17) or the οἰκουμένη as a whole contrasted with the single parts. Delitzsch well remarks that it never has the article, and thus in a measure appears as a proper noun.——פקד with עַל of the person and accusative of the thing like Jer. xxiii. 2; xxv. 12; Hos. i. 4. גָּאוֹן a frequent word in Isa. ii. 10, 19, 21; iv. 2, etc.; ix. 15; Ezek. vii. 24 seems to have had in mind our passage.——זֵדִים only here in Isaiah, whereas גאוה (comp. at ver. 3) and עָרִיץ (xxv. 3, 4, 5; xxix. 5, 20; xlix. 25) occur not seldom.

On ver. 12. אוֹקִיר which makes a paronomasia with אוֹפִיר (a genuine Isaianic word) occurs only here (Kal. xliii. 4).——On אֱנוֹשׁ and אדם comp. on viii. 1.——פָּז (only here in Isaiah; comp. Ps. xix. 11; xxi. 4) is purified gold; כֶּתֶם is absconditum, jewel, ornament generally: not found again in Isaiah.——כתם אופיר is found again Ps. xlv. 10; Job xxviii. 16.

On ver. 13. עַל־כֵּן cannot be construed "for this reason." For it cannot be said that the Lord will shake heaven and earth because He punishes the earth and makes men scarce on it. Rather the reverse of this must be assumed: God shakes heaven and earth in order to punish men. Thus עַל־כֵּן = "therefore, hence," but in the sense of intention (to this end, Job xxxiv. 27). Here, too, there evidently floats before the mind of the Prophet a passage from Job ix. 6, where it reads: הַמַּרְגִּיז אֶרֶץ מִמְּקוֹמָהּ. The thought that the earth shall be crowded out of its place, which is peculiar to both of these passages, is something so specific, added to which the juxtaposition of הִרְגִּיז and הארץ מִמְּקוֹמָהּ is so striking, that it is impossible to regard this relation of the two passages as accidental. If we ask where the words are original, we must decide in favor of Job, because there the thought is founded in the context. For in ver. 5 it is said: "which removeth the mountains, and they know not; which overturneth them in his anger." On this follows naturally: "Which shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble."——רעשׁ in Isaiah again xxiv. 18; xiv. 16. Comp. moreover 2 Sam. xxii. 8 (Ps. xviii. 8); Joel iv. 16.——The words בעברת to אפו are the Prophet's. בְּ is taken by some as determining the time (Knobel), by others as assigning a reason (Delitzsch). But both may be combined: the revelation of the divine wrath coincides with the day of His anger, and so much so that יום, the day, may be taken as concrete for the abstract notion of the manifestation, coming to the light. Comp. x. 3; xvii. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet opens his prophecy against the nations with a denunciation of judgment against Babylon. This prophecy must have originated at a period when the Prophet had come to the knowledge that Babylon was the real centre of the world-power, and Assyria only a front step. But Isaiah opens his prophecy against Babylon with an introduction from which we learn that he regards the judgment against Babylon as the germ-like beginning of "the day of the Lord" in general. First, by means of a banner planted on a high mountain, visible far and wide, there goes forth a summons to order men of war to an expedition against a city (ver. 2). Then (ver. 3) the Lord says, more plainly, Himself taking up the word, that it is He that assembles the men of war and that He assembles them for a holy war. The command gathers in vast numbers and Jehovah musters them (ver. 4). They come then from the ends of the earth, as it were led by Jehovah, brought together in order to accomplish the work of destruction (ver. 5). Now those threatened hear proclaimed: the day of the Lord is here (ver. 6). Thereupon all are in fear and terror (vers. 7, 8). And in fact the day of the Lord draws near (ver. 9). The stars turn dark (ver. 10). The Lord Himself declares that the object of His coming is to lay low everything in the world that lifts itself up proudly (ver. 11), so that men shall become scarce as fine gold (ver. 12). By this manifestation of divine wrath, however, heaven and earth must be shaken (ver. 13).

2. The burden—did see.—Ver. 1. One sees a sentence of judgment when, by means of prophetic gaze, one learns to know its contents, which may be presented to the spiritual eye by visible images (comp. on i. 1). That Isaiah is named here, and by his entire name, son of Amoz, is doubtless to be explained in that this superscription, which corresponds to the prophecy xiii. 1–xiv. 23, was at the same time regarded as superscription of the entire cycle xiii. to xxiii. and that this cycle, as an independent whole, was incorporated in the entire collection.

3. Lift ye up a banner——my highness.—Vers. 2, 3.—Verse 2 speaks in general. Without saying to whom the summons is directed or from whom it proceeds; there is only a summons to raise the standard of war for the purpose of assembling warriors. On a bare mountain, devoid of forest, shall the signal be raised, that it may be clearly seen on all sides. But with the voice, too, (xxxvii. 23, xl. 9, lviii. 1) and with hand-beckoning (x. 32, xi. 15) shall the nations be called to march forth. The gates of the nobles can only mean the main gates of the hostile city, which alone (in contrast with the small side gates, figuratively called "needle-eyes" Matt. xix. 24) serve for the entree of princes in pomp, in the present case for the victors. Still the expression occasions surprise. Ought we perhaps to read פִּתְחֵי: "that they come willingly into my gates?" I do not venture to decide.

Ver. 3 makes us know who is the origin of the summons. It is the LORD who calls His warriors who are consecrated to Him and joyfully obey Him. The warriors are called consecrated, holy, because the war is a holy one. Comp. Joel iv. 9, Jer. vi. 4, xxii. 7, li. 27. Precisely for this the Prophet immediately after uses the bold expression: "I have called them for mine anger," i. e. that they may be executors of my purpose of wrath (comp. x. 5).

4. The noise of a multitude——the whole land.—Vers. 4, 5. Those summoned heard the call. They are heard approaching in troops. The interjection קוֹל ["hark" NAEGELSB.] is frequent in the second half of Isaiah: xl. 3, 6, lii. 3, lxvi. 6. Jeremiah, too, imitates the language: xlviii. 8, l. 22, 28, li. 54. The expression קוֹל הָמוֹן ["Hark, a tumultuous noise," NAEGELSB.] "noise of a multitude," occurs 1 Sam. iv. 14, 1 Kings xviii. 41, xx. 13, 28. In Isaiah again xxxiii. 3. Then in Ezek. xxiii. 42, Dan. x. 6. I do not believe that by "the mountains" is meant the Zagros mountains that separated Media from Babylon. [Zagrus mons, now represented by the middle and southern portion of the mountains of Kurdistan.—TR.]. For here the prophecy bears still quite a general character. Only by degrees does the special judgment upon Babylon appear out of the cloud of the universal judgment. The enemies, according to ver. 5, come "from a far country, from the end of heaven." Did the Prophet mean particularly the Zagros, why did he not designate it more distinctly? The mountains are, doubtless, no certain, concrete mountains, but ideal mountains, a poetic embellishment. Added to this, it is likely Joel ii. is in the Prophet's mind. There, too, as here (vers. 6, 9) the day of the LORD is at hand. But there the grasshoppers are the enemies to be expected. These, too, come like chariots, that leap upon the mountains like the blush of dawn spread upon the mountains. Especially the order of the words בֶּהָרִים דְּמוּת עַם־רָב "in the mountains like as of a great people," seems to me to recall Joel ii. 2 עַל־הֶהָרִים עַם רַב "upon the mountains a great people," a form of expression that in Joel, too, belongs to the poetic drapery. That Isaiah had in mind the words of Joel is the more probable, in as much as the expression עַם רַב is used by him only here, and beside Joel ii. 2, is found only in Ezek. xvii. 9, 15, xxvi. 7.

The army, then, which Jehovah musters, consists of people that have come from a far land, and from the end of heaven, i. e. from the place where the heavenly expanse is bounded by the earth. The expression "from the end of heaven" is characteristic of Deuteronomy. For, except the present passage, it occurs only Deut. iv. 32 (bis), xxx. 4 (with the borrowed expression Neh. i. 9), and Ps. xix. 7. That Isaiah by these expressions would designate the Medes is quite improbable. As in their cities, according to 2 Kings xvii. 6, Israelite exiles dwelt at that time, how could he locate them in the uttermost borders of the earth's surface, where otherwise he locates, say, Ophir (ver. 12) or Sinim (xlix. 12)? The undefined, universal, and if I may so say, the superlative mode of expression, proves that it is to be taken in an ideal sense. The end that the LORD will accomplish by means of "the weapons of His indignation" is: to overturn the whole earth. "The whole earth!" For this judgment on Babylon belongs to "the day of the Lord." It is thus an integral part of the world's judgment. Just as Isaiah, so Ezekiel uses traits of Joel's prophecy of the world's judgment in order to let the judgment that he had to announce to Egypt, appear as a part of the world's judgment (xxx. 2 sqq.).

5. Howl ye——their faces as flames.—Vers. 6-8. Here it is seen plainly how the Prophet would represent the judgment on Babylon as a part of the world's judgment. For the traits that now follow are entirely taken from the descriptions of the world's judgments as we meet them already in the older Prophets, and as, on the other hand, the later New Testament descriptions of the great day of judgment connect with our present one. Especially Isaiah has Joel in his mind. "Howl ye," is taken from הֵילִילוּ Joel i. 5, 11, 13. Ezek. too, uses the word xxx. 2, and Matt. xxiv. 30, in the eschatological discourse of Christ. The words: "for the day of the LORD is at hand," are taken word for word from Joel i. 15. From קָרוֹב "at hand," it is seen that the Prophet would portray here the impression that the approach of the day will make on men; for, as is known, the moments that precede any great catastrophe have terrors quite peculiarly their own. In ver. 9, he describes the judgment as taking place. When men notice that the destruction comes from God Almighty, they abandon all opposition as useless. The sign of this is that they let their hands fall limp, and that their hearts become like water (comp. Deut. xx. 8; Josh. vii. 5; Isa. xix. 1).

For the image of the travailing woman, and of the terror depicted in the countenances, the Prophet is indebted to Joel ii. 6. That terror and anguish not only make one pale, but also agitate the blood, and thereby produce heat and sweat is well known. Only the latter does the Prophet make prominent. He was likely moved to this because in Joel (i. 19, ii. 3, 5), which is in his thought, the expression להב, "a flame," occurs thrice.

6. Behold the day——light to shine.—Vers. 9, 10. The day is not only near; it is here. (Comp. under Text. and Gram. above). What constellation is meant by the name כְּסִיל is not settled. The LXX., here and Job xxxviii. 31 translate ὁ Ὠρίων. Likewise the VULG. Amos v. 8 and Job ix. 9. Others (SAADIA, ABULWALID, etc.), take it to be Canopus, the Antarctic Polar star in the southern steering-oar of Argo. NIEBUHR (Beschr. v. Arabien, p. 113), following the Jews of Sana, supposes it is Sirius. But the passage in Job xxxviii. 31 ("or wilt thou loose the bands" [DILLMANN: traces] of כסיל?) corresponds very well to the representation that Orion (Syr. gaboro, Arab. gebbar) is the giant chained to the sky. Comp. HERZOG, Real-Encycl. Art. Gestirnkunde, von LEYRER, XIX. p. 565. [According to HITZIG and KNOBEL, the darkening of the stars is mentioned first, because the Hebrews reckoned the day from sunset.—J. A. A.].

When the rising sun is without rays, and moon and stars lose their shining, then both day and night are robbed of their lights. The language of the Prophet seems not only to be drawn from Job, but also from Joel iii. 4, and Amos v. 8, as on the other hand Christ's discourse, Matt. xxiv. 29, borrows from our passage.

7. And I will punish —— his fierce anger.—Vers. 11-13. The Prophet lets the LORD speak here, partly, to confirm what the Prophet had said, partly to set it forth more exactly. But unmarked, the subject of the discourse changes again (ver. 13 b) by the Prophet resuming and continuing the discourse of the LORD. What was said, ver. 9, in brief words; "and He shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it," is in ver. 11, more distinctly expressed by the LORD. The LORD says, then, that He will punish the whole earth for their wickedness, and the wicked (according to his righteousness) for their guilt. The means by which men incur guilt is their injustice in the sense of violent oppression, according to the view common to the Old Testament in general, and to Isaiah in particular (comp. on i. 17, 21 sqq.). Therefore the Almighty Judge announces here that a time shall come when He will take in hand the mighty of the earth who abuse their power, and will humble them. The thought of this verse recalls ii. 10 sqq.

In consequence of this visitation, human kind shall become rare in the earth as the noblest gold. From this passage it appears that the Prophet, though he speaks of a judgment on the whole habitable world (οἰκουμένη, תֵּבֵל), has still by no means the idea of its total destruction, say, by fire (2 Pet. iii. 7, 10). The locality of Ophir is still an open question. The other instances of its occurrence in Scripture are Gen. x. 29 (1 Chr. i. 23), 1 Kings ix. 28; x. 11; xxii. 49; 1 Chr. xxix. 4; 2 Chr. viii. 18, ix. 10; Job xxii. 24. Four places are proposed; South Arabia, East Africa, Abhira between the Indus Delta and the Gulf of Cambay, and southern lands in general, for which Ophir may be only a collective name. The best authorities, as LASSEN, RITTER (Erdkunde XIV. p. 348 sqq.), DELITZSCH, decide in favor of East India. But CRAWFORD, "hardly less learned regarding India than LASSEN," in his "Descriptive Dictionary of the Indian Islands," asserts, on the contrary, "that there is not a shadow of possibility for locating Ophir in any part of India."

The African traveller CARL MAUCH gives considerable weight to the scale in favor of East Africa; he thinks that he has discovered the ancient Ophir in the port Sofala or Sofara on the East coast of South Africa in latitude 20° 14′.

b) The particular part: The prophecy against Babylon.

CHAPTER XIII. 14.—XIV. 23.

1. THE JUDGMENT ON THE CITY AND STATE OF BABYLON.

CHAPTER XIII. 14-22.

14 And it shall be as the chased roe,
And as [a]a sheep that no man taketh up:
They shall every man turn to his own people,
And flee every one into his own land.
15 Every one that is found shall be thrust through;
And every one that is [b]joined unto them shall fall by the sword
16 Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes;
Their houses shall be spoiled and their wives ravished.
17 Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them,
Which shall not regard silver;
And as for gold, they shall not delight in it.
18 Their bows also shall dash the young men to pieces;
And they shall have no pity on the fruit of the womb;
Their eye shall not spare children,
19 And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms,
The beauty of the Chaldees' excellency,
Shall be as [1]when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.
20 It shall never be inhabited,
Neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation:
Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there;
Neither shall the shepherds make their fold there.

21 But [2]wild beasts of the desert shall lie there;
And their houses shall be full of [3] [c]doleful creatures;
And [4] [5]owls shall dwell there,
And satyrs shall dance there.
22 And [6]the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their [7]desolate houses,
And dragons in their pleasant palaces:
And her time is near to come,
And her days shall not be prolonged.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

On ver. 14. והיה is to be construed neuter — "it shall be, it turns out, such are the circumstances." The Hoph. particip. מֻדָּח only here; beside this in Isaiah the Niph. and Pual participles, viii. 22; xvi. 3, 4.——צְבִי with the meaning "gazelle," occurs only here in Isaiah. It seems that the Prophet by והיה כצבי here and והיתה בבל צבי וגו ver. 19, intended a contrast. Babylon צבי in the sense of decus, is at the same time צבי in the sense of dorcas.——ואין מקבץ occurs again Nah. iii. 18; Jer. xlix. 5.

On ver. 15. נמצא comp. xxii. 3; xxxvii. 4. דקר only here in Isaiah. נספה from ספה "to snatch, seize." Ver. 16. רטש that occurs only in Piel and Pual, is used exclusively of dashing to pieces human bodies: Hos. x. 14; xiv. 1; Nah. iii. 10; 2 Kings viii. 12; in Isa. the word occurs only here and ver. 18. שׁסס (kindred to שׁסה, שׁשׂה x. 13; xvii. 14; xlii. 22) only here in Isa. Comp. Zech. xiv. 2.——Niph. נשגל (Kal. Deut. xxviii. 30; Pual Jer. iii. 2) occurs only here and Zech. xiv.

On ver. 19. צבי comp. on iv. 2, where also Isaiah has גאון and תפארת though not in a genitive relation, a combination that occurs in no other place.——כמהפכת comp. on i. 7. The original passage is Deut. xxix. 22. The substantive like infinitives has retained the verbal force.

On ver. 20. The intransitive use of ישב and שכן (= "to be a habitation") occurs first in Joel iv. 20. It does not occur later in Isaiah; whereas in Jeremiah it is frequent (xvii. 6, 25; xxx. 18; xlvi. 26; l. 13, 39): in Ezek. xxix. 11 also, and in Zech. ii. 8; ix. 5. The expression עד דור ודור, occurs only here in Isaiah. דור occurs in various connections, xxxiv. 10, 17; li. 8; lviii. 12; lx. 15; lxi. 4.——עֲרָבִי. So still Jer. iii. 2; comp. xxv. 24, otherwise in later books עַרְבִי 2 Chr. xxi. 16; xxii. 1; Neh. ii. 19; iv. 1; vi. 1. Because of the following רֹעִים, this cannot be understood to mean nomadic shepherds in general. But the word signifies the Arabian proper, because in fact "Babylon lay near enough to Arabia for Arabians proper to come thither with their flocks" (Gesenius).——יַהֵל for יַאֲהֵל, like מַלְּפֵנוּ Job xxxv. 11, for מְאַלְּפֵנוּ. The form occurs only here The verb אָהַל (Kal. Gen. xiii. 12, 18) is denominativum.——הִרְבִּיץ is to make רָבַץ: thus it is direct causative. Hiph. (liv. 11).

On ver. 21. צִיִּים (from צִי unused, from which צִיָּה terra arida) are dwellers in the desert; whether men or beasts is undetermined. Yet analogy favors the latter; for in what follows only beasts are mentioned. The word occurs in Isaiah again xxiii. 13; xxxiv. 14; comp. Jer. l. 39. Ewald, (Lehrb. § 146, g. Anm.) derives ציים, and איים with the meaning "criers, howlers," from Arabic roots, as it seems to me, without necessity.——אֹחִים ἅπαξ λεγ. The LXX., evidently following a kindred sound, translate καὶ πλησθήσονται οἰκίαι ἤχου. But the parallelism demands rather some species of beast. Jerome translates dracones. Aurivillius proposed first ulula, "owls," "horn owls."——בַּת יַעֲנָה (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15) is "the ostrich." The masculine form יְעֵנִים found only Lam. iv. 3. According to some, the name means "the mourning daughter of the desert," (Meier, Wurzelw. p. 49); according to others, the word is related to the Syr. jasno, "greedy, ravenous." The feminine designation has essentially a poetic reason, comp. בַּת גְּדוּד Mic. iv. 14 with בְּנֵי גְדוּד 2 Chr. xxv. 13. בַּת־אֲשֻׁרִים ,בַּת־עַיִן (Ezek. xxvii. 6). The word occurs in Isaiah again xxxiv. 13; xliii. 20; comp. Jer. l. 39; Mic. i. 8; Job xxx. 29.——שְׂעִירִים are hirsuti, pilosi, "goats," i. e., goat-shaped demons.——רִקֵּד Piel only here in Isaiah; comp. Job xxi. 11; Joel ii. 5; Nah. iii. 2. Ver. 22. אִיִּים are "jackals." The singular אִי seems abbreviated from אֱוִי from an unused אָוָה, ululavit. In Arabic the jackal still is called ibn-awa. The word is found only here and xxxiv. 14, and Jer. l. 39.——אלמנות only here for ארמנות (perhaps with reference to their widowhood). Comp. xxiii. 13; xxv. 2; xxxii. 14; xxxiv. 13.——תַּנִּים are also "jackals" (comp. Gesen. Thesaur. p. 39, 1457; 1511). The word in Isaiah again xxxiv. 13; xxxv. 7; xliii. 20.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet turns from the universal judgment that comprehends all the several acts of judgment against the world-power from first to last, to portray the special judgment to be accomplished on Babylon as the climax of the world-power in its first stage, or as the head of the first world-monarchy. He begins by describing the flight out of the world's metropolis of men that had flowed thither out of all lands (ver. 14). This flight has sufficient cause—for whoever is taken perishes (ver. 15). Children are dashed in pieces, houses plundered, women ravished (ver. 16). The LORD particularly names the people charged with executing the judgment: they are the Medes, a people that do not regard silver and gold (ver. 17), but also as little the children, and even the fruit of the womb (ver. 18). Then shall Babylon, hitherto the ornament and crown of the Chaldean kingdom, be overthrown like Sodom and Gomorrah (ver. 19). It will come to be a dwelling-place for men (ver. 20). Only beasts of the desert and dismal hobgoblins shall revel in the spots where once luxury reigned,—and in fact the time of the judgment is near, and a respite not to be hoped for.

2. And it shall be—ravished.—Vers. 14–16. It is said that rats forsake a vessel that is going to be shipwrecked. When ruin impends over a community, whoever is not bound to it by ties of piety or of possession flees out of it. Thus first of all the foreigners flee. The crowd of such in Babylon will scatter like scared gazelles, like a herd panic-stricken. Babylon was the world's capital, and consequently a resort for people of all nations. All these, therefore, will seek safety in flight. The words: "every man—own land" are found word for word in Jer. l. 16 (comp. Jer. xlvi. 16; li. 9, 44). A comparison with the context proves that these words are original with Isaiah. With Isaiah the thought is the natural consequence of the preceding image of the frightened gazelles and sheep. In Jeremiah we read: "Cut off the sower from Babylon, and him that handleth the sickle in the time of harvest." To these words the thought: "they shall turn every one to his people," would be joined on without natural connection, did not the inserted: "for fear of the oppressing sword," (artfully) bridge over the gap.

3. Behold, I will stir up—not spare children.—Vers. 17, 18. The Prophet proceeds artistically from the general to the particular. First he describes quite in general the vast, I might say the cosmical, apparatus of war that the LORD sets in motion. To ver. 14 the earth in general seems to be the objective point of this military expedition. And it is, too, only not all at once. For, from the description immediately following, taken with the totality of eschatological imagery that prophecy offers, it appears that that general prophecy is realized only by degrees. From ver. 14 on we notice that a great centre of the world-power is the object of the execution. At ver. 17 we are made aware who are to be the executors, but still are in ignorance against whom they are to turn. Not till ver. 19 is Babylon named. Of course the superscription, ver. 1, is not to be urged against this statement of the order of thought.

The Medes are first named Gen. x. 2; but after that the present is the next mention; afterwards xxi. 2; Jer. xxv. 25; li. 11, 28; 2 Kings xvii. 6; xviii. 11. Not till the books of Daniel and Ezra are they mentioned often. In Gen. x. 2 they are named as descendants of Japheth. This corresponds accurately with their Arian derivation. HERODOTUS (vii. 62), who unhistorically derives the name Μῆδοι from Medea, says that from ancient times they were named generally Arians. Medea was bounded on the East by Parthia and Hyrcania, on the South by Susiana and Persis, on the West by Armenia and Assyria, and on the North by the Caspian Sea. Comp. LASSEN and SPIEGEL, Keilinschriften; ARNOLD in HERZOG's Real-Encycl. IX. 231 sq. It must be particularly noted here that Isaiah makes the Medes and not the Persians the executors of judgment on Babylon. Jeremiah also, who relies on Isaiah's prophecies against Babylon, does this (li. 11, 28). In my work: "The Prophet Jeremiah and Babylon" I have pointed out what a strong proof lies in this fact against the view that the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah against Babylon were composed during the exile. Verily, in the time of the exile, and after the event, no one forging a prophecy against Babylon that would pretend to credibility, would have named the Medes as its destroyer. Any forger must have named the Persians. But if, about the time when the Medes in a mighty uprising freed themselves from the bondage of five centuries to the Assyrians, the Prophet of Jehovah sees in this nation instantly the future conquerors of Babylon, there is a prophetic look which, justified by the present, loses none of its correctness, because, in fact, not the Medes alone, but the Medo-Persians, accomplished the deed that was predicted. When Isa. xxi. 2 names the Elamites along with the Medes, it does not militate against what has just been said. For the Elamites are not identical with the Persians. See on xxi. 2. And when, too, in Greek writers, the Persians often appear under the name "Medes" (comp. πόλεμος μηδικός, στράτευμα μηδικόν, μηδίζειν, VITRINGA in loc.), still it does not happen exclusively, but so that the Persians are named along with them, and for a special reason, viz., because the Medes were recognized as the ἀρχηγέται by the Greeks. In short, with the Greeks that designation proceeds from exact knowledge. In Isaiah and Jeremiah, the way in which the Medes are mentioned makes the impression that of the Persians they knew nothing, and of the Medes not much.

By saying that the Medes regard not silver and gold, the Prophet would intimate that they are impelled by higher motives than common love of booty. What those higher motives may be, he does not say. They might have their reason in a thirst for revenge (DELITZSCH); but they might also have their source in an impulse to fulfil some mission of which they were unconscious. At all events, it is strange that Jer. li. 11, 28 sq., where he mentions the Medes, gives prominence both times to this thought. For he says there: "The LORD hath raised up (הֵעִיר as in our ver. מֵעִיר) the spirits of the kings of the Medes; for his device is against Babylon to destroy it; because it is the vengeance of the LORD, the vengeance of His temple." And thus, too, ver. 29: "for every purpose of the LORD shall be performed against Babylon." Bows shall dash the young men to pieces (ver. 18)!—An extraordinary expression. One might suppose that רטשׁ means here simply to cast down, to strike to the ground, were it not (comp. on ver. 16 Text. and Gram.) that Piel and Pual of רטשׁ are constantly used of dashing to pieces human bodies. But in view of this, and moreover that bows and not the bowmen are named, one must understand an effect of crowds is meant, and an indirect dashing to pieces by precipitating those struck, say from the walls. Besides the Medes, Elamites, Persians, and later the Parthians, were celebrated in all antiquity as bowmen. Comp. xxii. 6; Jer. xlix. 35; HEROD. 7, 61 sq; Cyrop. II. 1, 6 sq. The fruit of the womb being named along with children, makes it likely that children unborn are meant. Comp. 2 Kings viii. 12; xv. 16; Hos. xiv. 1; Amos i. 13. Their eye shall not spare.—By synecdoche the eye that expresses pity is taken for the efficient source. The expression is from the Pentateuch (Gen. xlv. 20; Deut. vii. 16; xix. 13, 21 and often; Ezra v. 11 and often).

4. And Babylon—not be prolonged.—Vers. 19-22. The entire first half of ver. 20 occurs as a quotation, Jer. l. 39. Babylon shall be uninhabited forever. It shall not even be used as a temporary stopping place. Not even the nomadic Arabian, nor a wandering shepherd of another race, shall camp there and rest his flocks. Goats ="satyrs." Perhaps here is the source of that representation of the devil as a being furnished with horns and goat's feet. Comp. GESENIUS in loc.

When the Prophet at the last declares the judgment on Babylon to be near, that is only in consequence of his having said generally (vers. 6, 9) that the day of the LORD is at hand. Moreover the notion "near" is a relative one. Here also from the Prophetic view-point that is represented as near, which, according to common human reckoning, is still far off. As regards the fulfilment of this prophecy, it is sufficiently proved that it has been accomplished, not at once, but gradually in the course of the centuries. We have thus here again an example of that prophetic gaze which, as it were, sees in one plain what in reality is extended through many successive stages of time. Comp. what VITRINGA has compiled on this subject with great learning, under the title, "Implementum prophetiae literale;" GESENIUS and DELITZSCH in their commentaries; my work: "Der Prophet Jeremia und Babylon," p. 135 sq.; and especially RITTER, Erdkunde XI. p. 865 sq.; "Die Ruinengruppe des alten Babylon." RITTER describes the impression made by the vast extent of Babylon's ruins: "When one mounts one of these elevations, he beholds in the external, solemn stillness of this world of ruins the bright mirror of the Euphrates flowing far away, that wanders full of majesty through that solitude like a royal pilgrim roaming amid the silent ruins of his desolated kingdom."

[J. A. ALEXANDER on vers. 20, 21. "The endless discussions as to the identity of the species of animals here named, however laudable as tending to promote exact lexicography and natural history, have little or no bearing on the interpretation of the passage. Nothing more will be here attempted than to settle one or two points of comparative importance. Many interpreters regard the whole verse as an enumeration of particular animals. This has arisen from the assumption of a perfect parallelism in the clause. It is altogether natural, however, to suppose that the writer would first make use of general expressions, and afterwards descend to particulars. This supposition is confirmed by the etymology and usage of צִיִּים, both which determine it to mean those belonging to or dwelling in the desert. In this sense it is sometimes applied to men (Ps. lxxii. 9; lxxiv. 14), but as these are here excluded by the preceding verse, nothing more was needed to restrict it to wild animals, to which it is also applied in xxxiv. 14 and Jer. l. 39. This is now commonly agreed to be the meaning, even by those who give to אֹחִים a specific sense. The same writers admit that אֹחִים properly denotes the howls or cries of certain animals, and only make it mean the animals themselves, because such are mentioned in the other clauses. But if צִיִּים has the generic sense which all now give it, the very parallelism of the clauses favors the explanation of אֹחִים in its original and proper sense of howls or yells, viz., those uttered by the צִיִּים.—The history of the interpretation שְׂעִירִים is so curious as to justify more fulness of detail than usual. It has never been disputed that its original and proper sense is hairy, and its usual specific sense he-goats. In two places (Lev. xvii. 7; 2 Chron. xi. 15) it is used to denote objects of idolatrous worship, probably images of goats, which, according to HERODOTUS, were worshipped in Egypt. In these places the LXX. render it ματαίοις, vain things, i. e., false gods. But the TARGUM on Leviticus explains it to mean demons (שֵׁדִין), and the same interpretation is given in the case before us by the LXX. (δαιμόνια), TARGUM and PESHITO. The VULG. in Lev. translates the word daemonibus, but here pilosi. The interpretation given by the other three versions is adopted also by the Rabbins, ABEN EZRA, JARCHI, KIMCHI, etc. It appears likewise in the TALMUD and early Jewish books. From this traditional interpretation of שְׂעִירִים here and xxxiv. 14 appears to have arisen, at an early period, a popular belief among the Jews that demons or evil spirits were accustomed to haunt desert places in the shape of goats or other animals. And this belief is said to be actually cherished by the natives near the site of Babylon at the present day. Let us now compare this Jewish exposition of the passage with its treatment among Christians. To JEROME the combination of the two meanings—goats and demons—seems to have suggested the Pans, Fauns and Satyrs of the classical mythology, imaginary beings represented as a mixture of the human form with that of goats, and supposed to frequent forests and other lonely places. This idea is carried out by CALVIN, who adopts the word satyri in his version, and explains the passage as relating to actual appearances of Satan under such disguises. LUTHER, in like manner, renders it Feldgeister. VITRINGA takes another step, and understands the language as a mere concession or allusion to the popular belief, equivalent to saying, the solitude of Babylon shall be as awful as if occupied by Fauns and Satyrs—there if anywhere such beings may be looked for. FORERIUS and J. D. MICHAELIS understand the animals themselves to be here meant. The latter uses in his version the word Waldteufel (wood-devils, forest-demons), but is careful to apprise the reader in a note that it is the German name for a species of ape or monkey, and that the Hebrew contains no allusion to the devil. The same word is used by GESENIUS and others in its proper sense. SAADIAS, COCCEIUS, CLERICUS and HENDERSON return to the original meaning of the Hebrew word—viz.: wild goats. But the great majority of modern writers tenaciously adhere to the old tradition. This is done, not only by the German neologists, who lose no opportunity of finding a mythology in Scripture, but by LOWTH, BARNES, and STUART in his exposition of Rev. xi. 12 and his Excursus on the Angelology of Scripture (Apocal. II. 403).

The result apppears to be, that if the question is determined by tradition and authority, שְׂעִירִים denotes demons; if by the context and the usage of the word, it signifies wild goats, or more generically hairy, shaggy animals. According to the principles of modern exegesis, the latter is clearly entitled to the preference. But even if the former be adopted, the language of the text should be regarded, not as 'a touch from the popular pneumatology' (as Rev. xviii. 2 is described by STUART in loc.), but as the prediction of a real fact, which, though it should not be assumed without necessity, is altogether possible, and therefore, if alleged in Scripture, altogether credible."

Ib. Ver. 22. As אִיִּים, according to its etymology, denotes an animal remarkable for its cry, it might be rendered hyenas, thereby avoiding the improbable assumption that precisely the same animal is mentioned in both clauses.]

2. THE DELIVERANCE OF ISRAEL.

CHAPTER XIV. 1, 2.

1 FOR the LORD will have mercy on Jacob,
And will yet choose Israel,
And set them in their own land:
And the strangers shall be joined with them,
And they shall cleave to the house of Jacob.
2 And [a]the people shall take them, and bring them to their place:
And the house of Israel shall possess them in the land of the LORD
For servants and handmaids:
And [b]they shall take them captives, [1]whose captives they were;
And they shall rule over their oppressors.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The reason for the destruction of Babylon described in xiii. 14-22 is here indicated by the Prophet to be the intention of Jehovah to have mercy again on His people, and bring them back into their land. That shall take place by the glad consent and even active co-operation of the heathen nations. These will join themselves to Israel—in fact lead Israel into their own land (ver. 1). Israel will then have them for servants and maids, and will hold those in prison who before devoted them to such a fate (ver. 2).

2. For the Lord——their oppressors.—Vers. 1, 2. Though Israel's deliverance is not the sole motive of the Lord in destroying Babylon, it is yet a chief motive. Isaiah in the second part, and Jeremiah in the denunciations of judgments (Jer. l., li.) that connect so closely with the present and the later prophecies of Isaiah on this subject, frequently declare that Babylon's fall is to be Israel's deliverance (e. g., Jer. l. 4 sqq., 8 sqq., 28; li. 6, 36 sqq., 45 sqq., 49 sqq.). The adhesion of strangers, who would be witnesses of the mighty deeds of Jehovah in judging and delivering, is a trait that the second return from bondage will have in common with the first (Exod. xii. 19, 38; Num. xi. 4, etc.). And the people shall take them, etc.—It is more exactly explained that this adhesion of strangers will not be to seek protection, but to form an honorable and serviceable attendance as friends and admirers. This is a thought that often recurs in the second part of Isaiah: xliv. 5; xlix. 22 sq.; lv. 5; lx. 4-9 sq., This notion that strangers should amicably attend Israel and then be enslaved for it occasions offence. But the heathen will only display this friendliness constrained thereto by the mighty deeds of Jehovah. And even if the Old Testament knows of a conversion of the heathen to Jehovah (Hos. ii. 23; Isa. lxv. 1; comp. Rom. ix. 24 sqq.; x. 18 sqq.)—yet, from the Old Testament view-point, there remains ever such a chasm between Israel and even the converted heathen that for the latter no other position was conceivable than that of those strangers who went along to Canaan out of Egypt or the desert, or of the Canaanites that remained (1 Kings ix. 20 sq). This is a consequence of that fleshly consciousness of nobility of which Israel was full. Only by Christ could that chasm be bridged over, in whom there is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision (Gal. v. 6; iii. 28; Rom. x. 12). ["The simple meaning of this promise seems to be that the church or chosen people and the other nations should change places, the oppressed becoming the oppressor, and the slave the master. This of course admits both an external and internal fulfilment. In a lower sense and on a smaller scale it was accomplished in the restoration of the Jews from exile; but its full accomplishment is yet to come, not with respect to the Jews as a people, for their pre-eminence has ceased forever, but with respect to the church, including Jews and Gentiles, which has succeeded to the rights and privileges, promises and actual possessions of God's ancient people. The true principle of exposition is adopted even by the Rabbins. JARCHI refers the promise to the future, to the period of complete redemption. KIMCHI more explicitly declares that its fulfilment is to be sought partly in the restoration from Babylon, and partly in the days of the Messiah." J. A. ALEX. in loc.]

3. THE JUDGMENT ON THE KING OF BABYLON.

CHAPTER XIV. 3–23.

3 AND it shall come to pass in the day that the LORD shall give thee rest
From thy [a]sorrow, and from thy [b]fear,
And from the hard bondage
[c]Wherein thou wast made to serve,
4 That thou shalt [d]take up this [1]proverb [e]against the king of Babylon, and say,
How hath the oppressor ceased!
The [2]golden city ceased!
5 The LORD hath broken the staff of the wicked,
And the sceptre of the rulers.
6 He who smote the people in wrath
With [3]a continual stroke,
He that [4]ruled the nations in anger,
[5]Is persecuted, and none hindereth.
7 The whole earth is at rest, and is quiet:
They break forth into singing.
8 Yea, the fir trees rejoice at thee,
And the cedars of Lebanon, saying,
Since thou art laid down,
No feller is come up against us.
9 [f]Hell from beneath is moved for thee
To meet thee at thy coming:
It stirreth up the [g]dead for thee,
Even all[6] [h]the chief ones of the earth;
It hath raised up from their thrones
All the kings of the nations.
10 All they shall [i]speak and say unto thee,
[k]Art thou also become weak as we?
[k]Art thou become like unto us?
11 Thy pomp is brought down to the grave,
And the noise of thy viols:
The worm is spread under thee, and the worms [l]cover thee.
12 How art thou fallen from heaven,
[7]O Lucifer, son of the morning!
How art thou cut down to the ground,
Which didst [m]weaken the nations!
13 [n]For thou [o]hast said in thine heart,
I will ascend into heaven,
I will exalt my throne above the stars of God.
I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north:

14 I will ascend above the heights of the clouds;
I will be like the Most High.
15 [p]Yet thou [q]shalt be brought down to hell,
To the [r]sides of the pit.
16 They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying,
Is this the man that made the earth to tremble,
That did shake kingdoms;
17 That made the world as a wilderness,
And destroyed the cities thereof;
That [8]opened not the house of his prisoners?
18 All the kings of the nations, even all of them,
Lie in [s]glory, every one in his own house.
19 But thou art cast out of thy grave
Like an [t]abominable branch,
And as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword,
That go down to the stones of the pit;
As a carcase trodden under feet.
20 Thou shalt not be joined with them in burial,
Because thou hast destroyed thy land,
And slain thy people:
The seed of evil doers shall never be [u]renowned.
21 Prepare slaughter for his children
For the iniquity of their fathers;
That they do not rise, nor possess the land,
Nor fill the face of the world with cities.
22 [v]For I will rise up against them,
Saith the LORD of hosts,
And cut off from Babylon the name and remnant,
And [w]son, and nephew, saith the LORD.
23 I will also make it a possession for the [x]bittern, and pools of water:
And I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the LORD of hosts.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3. ביום הניח וגו calls to mind Deut. xxv. 19.—עֹצֶב in the sense of dolor, labor, only here in Isaiah. It is not to be confounded with עֹצֶב idolum (xlviii. 5).——Also רֹגֶז, which often occurs in Job, does not again occur in Isaiah.——אשר עבד does not stand for 'א עֻבְּדָה as GESENIUS supposes. And אֲשֶׁר is not to be rendered by the ablative, but it is accusative according to the well-known construction of the Passive with the accusative of the nearer object (comp. xxi. 2; Gen. xxxv. 26).——Ver. 4. Whatever may be the fundamental meaning of מָשַׁל, and whether מָשַׁל, to rule, and מָשַׁל, to compare, come from one or from two roots (GESEN. WINER, DELITZSCH assume constitit erectus as the common radical meaning; comp. DEL. Commentary and Zur Geschichte d. jud. Poesie, p 196), the word any way signifies a dictum in terse language, distinguished from a merely prosaic statement, let the dictum be fable, parable, allegory, aphorism, proverb, riddle, didactic poem, or satire. It is here used in the last named sense, i. e., sarcastic address, as in Hab. ii. 6; Mic. ii. 4; comp. Deut. xxviii. 37; Jer. xxiv. 9; Ps. lxix. 12; 1 Kings ix. 7. [" Its most general sense seems to be that of tropical or figurative language. Here it may have a special reference to the bold poetic fiction following."—J. A. A.]. The word does not again occur in Isaiah.——מדהבה is ἅπ. λεγ. The LXX., translates ἐπισπουδαστής, which means the driver, inciter. It is thus synonymous with נֹגֵשׂ. VULG. tributum, according to which the word is derived either from דְּהַב = זָהָב, gold, or from רָהַב insistere, opprimere, so that the notion oppress would be taken in the sense of collecting tribute. In the latter sense the meaning as regards etymology would coincide with the Greek ἐπισπουδαστής. For, according to the sense, the Greek translation seems to signify rather the driver who urges prisoners or slaves to make haste. The PESCHITO also, which translates operis exactor, and the TARG. JONATHAN which translates fortitudo peccatoris appear to have read מַרְהֵבָה. So, too, perhaps SAADIA (timiditas). As AQUILA translates λιμός, he must either have taken מַרְהֵבָה — מַרְעֵבָה, or מַדְהֵבָה — מַדְאֵבָה, from דָּאַב, languere. DELITZSCH sides with the last meaning, construing מ as Mem loci, and translates, place of torture. Yet it seems to me that locus languendi, even if one overlooks the permutation of א and ה, is still a vocabulum satis languidum for place of torture. I would like therefore, with J. D. MICHAELIS, GESENIUS, KNOBEL, MEIER and others, to assume that מדהבה is an error of transcribing for מרהבה, as also an old edition (Thessalon, 1,600) actually reads. It favors this, too, that רָהַב (superbire, opprimire) and נָגַשׂ also correspond in parallelism, iii. 5.——Ver. 5. שֵׁבֶט מֹשְׁלִים (comp. Ezek. xix. 11), as epexegesis of מַטֵּה רְשָׁעִים is any way to be understood as a tyrant's sceptre. This is confirmed by the statement of ver. 6.——Ver. 6. The expression בִּלְתִּי סָרָה occurs only here: סָרָה in Isa. i. 5; xxxi. 6; lix. 13, in the sense of revolt. On בִּלְתִּי see at x. 4. The conjecture of DOEDERLEIN, that instead of מֻרְדָּף we should read מִרְדַּת has, according to the analogy of מַכַּת, much plausibility. The confounding of ף and ת might easily happen in the unpointed text. Neither מִרְדָּה nor מֻרְדָּף occur elsewhere. מֻרְדָּף is nom. passivum: the being pursued, being hounded on, like מֻנָּד being scared off, cast away, 2 Sam. xxiii. 6. מֻצָּב stations, Isa. xxix. 3. מֻרְבֶּכֶת, stirred in, Lev. vi. 14, etc.——חָשַׂךְ occurs again liv. 2; lviii. 1.——בְּלִי kindred to בִּלְתִּי (comp. EWALD, 322, a.), is poetic negation. It occurs in Isaiah, again only xxxii. 10. See on בַּל ver. 21.

Ver. 7. פָּצְחוּ רִנָּה is an expression peculiar to the second part of Isa. (xliv. 23; xlix. 13; lii. 9; liv. 1; lv. 12) and does not occur elsewhere.——Ver. 8. שָׂמַח with לְ involves the notion of rejoicing at misfortune: Ps. xxx. 2; xxxv. 19, 24; xxxviii. 17; Mic. vii. 8; Obad. 12.——Ver. 9. לְךָ after רָגְזָה is constructio praegnans (comp. Mic. vii. 14), לִקְרַאת בּוֹאֶךָ however is the nearer qualification of the לְךָ: hell gets into uproar toward thee, that is in order to welcome thee as an arrival.——עוֹרֵר x. 26; xxiii. 13.——שְׁאוֹל is, in the first half of the verse, like v. 14, construed as feminine. But when the discourse continues with the masculine form עוֹרֵר, the reason can hardly be because שְׁאוֹל elsewhere (Job xxvi. 6) is used as masculine. For the question still arises, why does the Prophet vary the gender? I think the Prophet in the first clause has the totality in mind, whereas in עוֹרֵר וגו' he means that special dominant will that he ascribes to Sheol as to a person. The former, as with all collectives, he conceives as feminine: but this person, as a ruler he conceives of as masculine. ["HITZIG explains this on the ground that in the first clause Sheol is passive, in the second active: MAURER, with more success, upon the ground that the nearest verb takes the feminine or proper gender of the noun, while the more remote one, by a common license, retains the masculine or radical form, as in xxxiii. 9, (see GESENIUS, § 141, Rem. 1)."—J. A. A.]

Ver. 10. יַעֲנוּ is employed according to well-known usage, whereby, not only the discourse responsive to other discourse, but discourse responsive to action is designated as answer (xxi. 9; Deut. xxi. 7; xxvi. 5; Job iii. 2; Mat. xi. 25; xxii. 1, etc.).——The Pual חֻלֵּיתָ only here. Comp. passages like liii. 10; lvii. 10; Gen. xlviii. 1, etc.; Deut. xxix. 21, etc., and the meaning cannot be ambiguous: tu quoque debilitatus es. Also אֵלֵינוּ נִמְשָׁלְתָּ is a pregnant phrase: thou art made like us and brought to us. [Of this constr. praegn. J. A. A., says: "this supposition is entirely gratuitous."]

Ver. 11. הֶמְיַת from הָמָה strepere, synonymous with הָמוֹן (xiii. 4), is ἅπ. λεγ. Concerning נֵבֶל comp. at v. 12.——רִמָּה only here in Isaiah.——תּוֹלֵעָה, xli. 14; lxvi. 24.——Ver. 12. הֵילֵל is by some expositors (JEROME, AQUILA, ROSENMUELLER, GESENIUS) taken as imperative from הֵילִיל — howl, in which sense, in fact, the word occurs Ezek. xxi. 17; Zech. xi. 2. But this meaning is forced and mars the context. Only that meaning will correspond with the context which takes this word in the sense of bright star, from הָלַל, to shine (Job xxix. 3, etc.). The form הֵילֵל can be formed after analogy of הֵידָד, שֵׁילָל (Mic. i. 8 K'thibh). It is, however, possible, too, that הֵילֵל is derived from הָלַל, although there is no analogy for this, for מֵאַן, אֵשֶׁת are not analogous, and i before strong consonants always lengthens to ī as substitute for doubling (EWALD, § 84 a.). It must only be that at the same time a sort of attraction took place, and thus the Tsere of the final syllable conformed to the vowel of the preceding syllable. Then helel could be identical with the name Hillel (Jud. xii. 13, 15); to which the remark may be added, that Rabbi HILLEL the younger (in the 4th Cent., after Christ) is named 'Ελλήλ by EPIPHANIUS (Adv. Haer. II. p. 127. Ed. Paris.). Also BUXTORF (Lex. Chald. talm. et Rabb. p. 617) writes: הֵילֵל Hillel, olim Hellel ut Emmanuel et Immanuel, de qua scriptione vide Drus. Observ. L. IX. c. 1." That this bright star is the morning star appears from the addition בֶּן־שָׁחַר.——חֹלֵשׁ with Accus. Exod. xvii. 13: with עַל only in this place, which seems to depend on the latent notion of lording it, like רָדַף, חָבַשׁ, רָפָא, are construed with the Accus., and לְ.——Ver. 15. The adversative thought is introduced by אַךְ. The restrictive fundamental meaning ("only," which receives adversative force in such a connection — nisi rectius dixeris i. e. sed. comp. Jer. v. 5) seems to involve here a certain irony: but pity, that thou must down to Orkus.——יַרְכְּתֵי בוֹר stands opposed to יַ׳ צָפוֹן. The deepest corner of the deep grave. בּוֹר properly, pit, grave, but the underworld, is, so to speak, the deepening and extending of the grave xxxviii. 18 and often.——The imperf. תּוּרַד, according to DELITZSCH, comes unsuitably both from the mouth of the dwellers in Hades, and from Israel that sings this Maschal; it is therefore to be construed as resumption of the discourse by the Prophet, who has before his mind as future, what the Maschal recites as past (comp. הוּרַד ver. 11). But this departure from the role is improbable. Moreover it is grammatically unnecessary to take תּוּרַד as future. It is present. It describes the descent into Hades as something now taking place, a movement not yet concluded. Thus Joshua (ix. 8) questions the emissaries of the Gibeonites מֵאַיִן תָּבֹאוּ; but Joseph his brethren (Gen. xlii. 7) מֵאַיִן בָּאתֶם. The former regarded those questioned as arrivals, as it were still in the act of coming; the latter as ones who had arrived.——Ver. 16. שָׁגַח (only here in Isaiah; beside this in Ps. xxxiii. 14; Song of S. ii. 9), with אֶל in connection with רֹאִים evidently means attentively gazing. The same thought is still more strongly emphasized by יִתְבּוֹנָנוּ. The word occurs in Isaiah again i. 3; xliii. 18; lii. 15. With אֶל or עַל it signifies an eager, scrutinizing contemplation (1 Kings iii. 21; Ps. xxxvii. 10; Job xxxi. 1).——מַרְגִּיז

comp. on xiii. 18, where it is associated with רעש.—Ver. 17. The masculine suffixes in עריו and אסיריו refer to a latent masculine notion in תבל, probably to ארץ, which Isaiah is wont to use as parallel with תבל (xviii. 3; xxvi. 18), and uses as masculine oftener than all other Old Testament writers (ix. 18; xviii. 2; xxvi. 18; lxvi. 8, beside these only Gen. xiii. 6). This is favored, also, by אסיריו, for there is no אסירי תבל, but אסירי ארץ occurs (Lam. iii 34). ["The anomaly of gender may be done away by referring both the pronouns to the King himself, who might just as well be said to have destroyed his own cities, as his own land and his own people (ver. 20), the rather as his sway is supposed to have been universal.—J. A A.].——Concerning the pregnant construction פתח ביתה comp. Jer. l. 33.——Ver. 19. נצר is an exclusively Isaianic word. It occurs, beside the present, only xi. 1, lx. 21, except where Dan. xi. 7 quotes xi. 1.——נתעב, in Isaiah only here, is probably chosen for the sake of the alliteration.——לבוּשׁ in Isaiah again lxiii. 12.——מטען only here.—כְּ in כפגר is Kaph veritatis (comp. on xiii. 6) and what has been said figuratively is now said without figure.——פֶּגֶר occurs again xxxiv. 3; xxxvii. 36; lxvi. 24. Part. מוּבָס only here; other forms from בוס ver. 25; lxiii. 6, 18.——Ver. 20. תחד from יחד only here in Isaiah. Comp. Gen. xix. 6. Ver. 21. בַּל poetic — אַל; occurs again xxvi. 10, 11, 14, 18; xxxiii. 20, 21, 23, 24; xxxv. 9; xl. 24; xliii. 17; xliv. 8, 9; comp. on xxvi. 8.——Ver. 22. Of the pairs of alliterated words שאר is a current word with Isaiah (comp. at vii. 13; x. 19), נין ונכר stand together in the three passages where they recur: Gen. xxi. 23; Job xviii. 19 and here.

["The specific meaning son and nephew (i. e., nepos, grandson), given in the Engl. Version, and most of the early writers, and retained by Umbreit, is derived from the Chaldee Paraphrase (בר ובר בר). Aben Ezra makes the language still more definite by explaining שם to be a man himself, שאר a father, נין a son, and נכר a grandson.——But the more general meaning of the terms now held to be correct, is given in the LXX. (ὄνομα καὶ κατάλειμμα καὶ σπέρμα) and the Vulgate (nomen et reliquias et germen et progeniem.)"—J. A. A.]

Ver. 23. טֵאטֵאתִי is Pilp., of a root טֵא (טוּא) pellere, protrudere, that occurs only here, from which also the substantive מַטְאֲטֵא is formed. Some have justly found in this word a reference to טִיט clay, out of which the brick-builded Babylon emerged. But the broom, of which Jehovah makes use, is הַשְׁמֵד (infin. nomin.), destruction.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In that day wherein the Lord will grant Israel the deliverance described in vers. 1, 2, Israel shall sing a song of derision about the king of Babylon (vers. 3, 4 a). The Prophet has no particular king in mind, but the king of Babylon in abstracto. With wonderful poetic vigor and beauty he shows how the proud possessor of the world-power, who in titanic arrogance would mount to equality with the very Godhead, shall be cast down to the lowest degradation and wretchedness by the omnipotence of the true God. He begins with a joyful exclamation that the scourge of the nations is broken (vers. 4 b–6). The earth now has rest; the very cypresses and cedars rejoice that they are no more felled (vers. 7, 8). On the other hand, the under-world, the kingdom of the dead, rises in commotion at the new arrival. Spectres hurry to meet him—the princes under them rise off their seats (ver. 9). "Thou, too, comest to us," they call to him (ver. 10). Then the Prophet takes up the discourse again, personating Israel, into whose mouth he puts the words, and brings out the contrast in the history of the Babylonian: Thy pomp is cast down to hell, the sound of revel in thy palaces is hushed, and thy body moulders in the grave, a star cast down from heaven (vers. 10–12). Thou wouldst raise thyself to the level of the Godhead, and now descendest into the deepest depth of the lower world (vers. 13–15). Also the subjects of the dead king express their thoughts at the spectacle of the unburied, cast-away corpse, seeing in this present wretchedness the punishment of past wrong-doing: Is this the man that shook and desolated the earth (vers. 16, 17)? While the bodies of other kings lie quiet in their graves, his corpse, without a grave, is cast away as a despised and trampled carcase (vers. 18, 19). This is the punishment for his having ruined land and nation. Therefore shall his generation be exterminated (vers. 20, 21). Finally Jehovah Himself confirms the announcement of destruction, extending the warning of punishment to Babylon entire, and presents to it the prospect of desolation in the same manner as occurs chap. xiii. ver. 21 sq. (vers. 22, 23).

2. And it shall come to pass——hindereth.—Vers. 3, 6. A song of derision about the representative of the Babylonish world-power cannot be appropriate while one is in its power. When one is out of reach of his arm, then the long pent-up resentment may find expression. The service (עֲבֹדָה, comp. xxviii. 21; xxxii. 17) is also called "hard" (קָשָׁה, Exod. i. 6; vi. 9; Deut. xxvi. 6) in the description of the Egyptian bondage. Thus we have a reminder of the resemblance between the first and the second exile.

3. The whole earth——against us.—Vers. 7, 8. But not merely the world of mankind, the impersonal creatures were disquieted by this world-despot, who knew no law but his own passions, and they, too, rejoice, jubilant at the repose. Representative of all others, the elevated giants of the forest high up on Lebanon speak, to utter their joy that, since the end of the tyrant, they are no more felled. Cypress (xxxvii. 24; xli. 19; lv. 13; lx. 13), a hard and lasting wood, was used, not only for house and ship-building (1 Kings v. 8, 10; Ezek. xxvii. 5), but also in the manufacture of lances (Nah. ii. 4) and musical instruments (2 Sam. vi. 5; comp. Isa. xiv. 11). ["According to J. D. Michaelis, Antilibanus is clothed with firs as Libanus or Lebanon proper is with cedars, and both are here introduced as joining in the general triumph. J. A. A.]

4. Hell from beneath——like unto us.—Vers. 9, 10. On Sheol see ver. 14. ["The English word Hell, though now appropriated to the condition or place of future torments, corresponds in etymology and early usage to the Hebrew word in question. GESENIUS derives it, with the German Hölle, from Höhle, "hollow;" but the English etymologists from the Anglo-Saxon helan, "to cover," which amounts to the same thing,—the ideas of a hollow and a covered place being equally appropriate. As Sheol, retained by HENDERSON, and the Greek word Hades, introduced by LOWTH and BARNES, require explanation also, the strong and homely Saxon form will be preferred by every unsophisticated taste. EWALD and UMBREIT [and NAEGELSBACH] have the good taste to restore the old word Hölle in their versions. J. A. A.] As the Prophet has before personified the trees of Lebanon, so here he personifies the world of the dead. He presents it as governed by a common will. This will, so to speak, the will of the ruler, roused by the appearance of the king of Babylon, electrifies the entire kingdom, so that it gets into unusual commotion and turns to the approaching king in wonder (comp. ver. 16). Especially the kings already there in the kingdom of the dead, the colleagues of the Babylonian, are in commotion. רפאים (xxvi. 14, 19) are the lax, nerveless, powerless, who have no body, and thus no life-power more, who are only outlines, shades. The word is without article, likely because not all רפאים, but only a part of them, i. e., all עתודים (the strong ones, or he-goats) shall be made to rise. These are called he-goats (i. 11; xxxiv. 6), not only because on earth they were the leader-goats of the nation-flocks (Zech. x. 3; Ps. lxviii. 31; Jer. l. 8), but because they are still such. It seems to me that there underlies here the representation of Ps. xlix. (14) 15: "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall pasture them" [feed on them, Eng. Version.]. Therefore, perhaps it reads ארץ, earth, and not the earth, for the latter would be the earth as abode of the living. In the kingdom of the dead the dead are like a great flock—death pastures them: but those that were he-goats on earth are such also in the under-world. For the latter has no independent life. It only reflects in outline what life accomplished in complete, corporeal existence. Only to the end of ver. 10 do the words of the shades extend. For, on the one hand, much discourse does not become them (KNOBEL), and, on the other, much of what follows does not become the mouths of shades, viz.: the derision of the Babylonian that would retort on themselves, and because vers. 16 a and 20 a they would speak of themselves in the third person. Therefore from ver. 11 on the author of the Maschal again speaks. ["The ancient versions and all the early writers understand רפאים to mean giants. Its application to the dead admits of several explanations equally plausible with that of GESENIUS (who in the earlier editions of his Lexicon and in his Commentary on Isaiah derives it from רפא, but in the last edition of his Lexicon derives it from רפה, to be still or quiet, a supposititious meaning founded on an Arabic analogy), and entitled to the preference according to the modern laws of lexicography, because instead of multiplying, they reduce the number of distinct significations. The shades or spectres of the dead might naturally be conceived as actually larger than the living man, since that which is shadowy and indistinct is commonly exaggerated by the fancy. Or there may be an allusion to the Canaanitish giants who were exterminated by divine command, and might be chosen to represent the whole class of departed sinners. Or, in this case, we may suppose the kings and great ones of the earth to be distinguished from the vulgar dead as giants or gigantic forms. Either of these hypotheses precludes the necessity of finding a new root for a common word, or of denying its plain use elsewhere. As to mere poetical effect, so often made a test of truth, there can be no comparison between the description of the dead as weak or quiet ones, and the sublime conception of gigantic shades or phantoms." Some comment on the text as if it were "not a mere prosopopœia or poetical creation of the highest order, but a chapter from the popular belief of the Jews as to the locality, contents and transactions of the unseen world. Thus GESENIUS, in his Lexicon and Commentary, gives a minute topographical description of Sheol, as the Hebrews believed it to exist. With equal truth a diligent compiler might construct a map of hell, as conceived by the English Puritans, from the descriptive portions of Paradise Lost. This kind of exposition is chargeable with a rhetorical incongruity in lauding the creative genius of the poet, and yet making all his grand creations commonplace articles of popular belief. The true view of the matter, as determined both by piety and taste, appears to be that the passage now before us comprehends two elements, and only two: religious verities or certain facts, and poetical embellishments. It may not be easy to distinguish clearly between these—but it is only between these that we are able or have any occasion to distinguish. The admission of a tertium quid in the shape of superstitious fables is as false in rhetoric as in theology." J. A. A.]

5. Thy pomp——of the pit.—Vers. 11-15. The contrasts between what the Babylonian would be and what he now is are here set forth. The pomp he prepared for his eyes to see, and the glorious sounds he let his ears hear are swallowed up by hell. His body, once so dearly cared for and couched, has now maggots for a couch and worms for a covering. Passages from Job (vii. 5; xxi. 26) seem here to present themselves to the Prophet's mind. Shining and high was he once, like the morning star; now he is fallen from heaven. הֵילֵל, shining star, is called "son of the morning," because it seems to emerge out of the morning dawn (comes et alumnus aurorae). "In the southern heavens, when mirrored in the waves of the sea, this planet has a brighter gleam than with us" (LEYRER in HERZ. R. Encycl. XIX. p. 563). TERTULLIAN, GREGORY THE GREAT, and latterly STIER, with reference to Luke x. 18, have taken the star fallen from heaven for Satan. Hence originates the name Lucifer (VULGATE—although מַזָּרוֹת, Job xxxviii. 32, is also so rendered), ἑωσφόρος (LXX.). Once he was mighty over the nations—but now he is himself broken and cast to the earth (xxii. 25).

The following And thou hast said, etc. (ver. 13) seems at first sight to stand in antithesis to what precedes (ver. 12). But examination shows that vers. 13-15 belong together. For the תורד, "thou art brought down," ver. 15, corresponds to the אעלה, "I will ascend," of vers. 13 and 14, and ver. 12 is complete in itself, each clause of it containing a complete antithesis; the lofty star is fallen, the conqueror lies prostrate on the ground. Thus the וְ before אַתָּה is not adversative, but simply the copulative: and thou who thoughtst to mount to the heavens must go down to hell. The world-power is by its very nature inimical to God: its aim is to supplant God and put itself in His place. This tendency is indwelling in the world-power derived from its transcendental author, Satan, and is realized in every particular representative. Thus, then, here the Babylonian expresses his purpose of assuming the highest place, not simply on earth among the lords of the world, but in heaven itself, and that above the stars, which seem here to be conceived of as the residences of the spirits of God, the צבאות, Job xxxviii. 7, and the spheres of their manifestation, according to heathen notions, which very well suit in the mouth of the Babylonian. Let him be enthroned above the stars, and he, too, is "god of hosts." Let the throne of the potentate be above the stars; then he shall stand on the pinnacle of the sacred mountain of the gods, about which the constellations circle, and which the heathen notions of the Orient represent as in the North. This mountain is variously named by the different nations. It is called Meru (Kailasa, in the direction beyond the Himalaia) by those in India, Alburg by the others; nor does the Olympus of the Greeks stand wholly disconnected herewith. Comp. RHODE, Heil. Saga des Zendvolkes, p. 229 sq.; GESENIUS, Jes. II. p. 516 sqq.; LASSEN, Ind. Alterthumskunde I. p. 34 sq.; MOVERS, Phön. II. 1, p. 414; KOHUT, Jüd. Angelol. u. Daemonol. in den Abhh. f. d. Kunde des Morgenl., 1866, p. 57.

Many expositors down to FUERST (Conc. p. 501) and SHEGG [J. A. A. states both views without deciding; so also substantially BIRKS] have been led by the expression הַר מוֹעֵד to hold that the mountain meant in the text is Zion, as the gathering place of the Israelites, for which they appeal especially to Ps. xlviii. 3. But Zion lay neither to the north of Palestine nor to the north of Jerusalem, nor does the mention of Zion in this sense become the lips of the possessor of the world-power. יַרְכְּתֵי (remotest corners, ENG. VERS. sides), are the thighs, which (considered from within outwardly), form the extremest boundaries, as well as (regarded in their junction), the extremest points. Thus the word stands for the inmost corner (e. g., of a cave, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4) as well as for the extremest boundary of a land. Thus Jer. vi. 22; xxv. 32 says ירכתי ארץ (sides, coasts of the earth); and here Isa. (and after him Ezek. xxxviii. 6, 15; xxxix. 2) says י׳ צפון (extremest, highest North). The expressions "above the stars of God" and "mount of the congregation" signify the loftiest height intensively, "the heights of the clouds" (במותי עב—an expression found only here), in an extensive sense. For as far as the clouds extend (Ps. xxxv. 6; lvii. 11; cviii. 5) the dominion of the true God reaches, and everywhere the clouds are His air chariots and air thrones (xix. 1; Ps. xcvii. 2; civ. 3; Dan. vii. 13). If, then, the Babylonian reigns in the loftiest heights and every where, he has become like the highest God. But thereby he has supplanted the highest God: for two cannot at once occupy the highest place. And this, as remarked above, is the aim of Satan and of his earthly sphere of power, the world-power, which culminates in Antichrist (Dan. xi. 36; 2 Thess. ii. 3 sq.). This tendency of the world-power explains how, not only heathen, but now and then also Jewish and Christian princes, have laid claim to divine honors, or at least have suffered such to be paid them. CURTIUS (VIII. 5) praises the Persians because: non pie solum, sed etiam prudenter reges suos inter Deos colunt. In inscriptions Persian kings are explicitly called ἔκγονοι θεῶν, ἐκ γένους θεῶν, and even θεοί. Comp. HENGSTENBERG, Introd. to the O. Test. I. [p. 124 sqq. of the German Ed.]. This is well known in regard to the Roman Emperors. Such deification had its extremest illustration in the case of Diocletian, who made himself an object of divine worship as a representative of the highest God. Comp. ALB. VOGEL, Prof., Der Kaiser Diocletian, ein Vortrag, Gotha, 1857. Herod let himself be called God, and had to suffer dearly for that assumption of honor such as belongs to God alone (Acts xii. 21 sqq.). In Christian Europe, too, there have not been wanting instances of such heathenish adulation of princes. See under Doctrinal and Ethical remarks below.

Ver. 15 expresses, in contrast with the pretensions of the Babylonian, what his actual fate shall be. [See above in Text. and Gram.]

6. They that see——with cities.—Vers. 16–21. "They that see" are not the denizens of hell, for they have before them the dead as an unburied corpse. The underlying thought of the passage is, however, that the sins of the deceased are enumerated (vers. 16, 17), and his fate is designated as their merited punishment. Thus it says, "they that see thee," i. e. they that see thee lying an unburied corpse look upon thee. Because he destroyed the rest of countries, he himself now finds no rest in the grave. Because he made a desert of the fruitful land (תבל to be taken in this sense here in contrast with מדבר, comp. on xiii. 11), he lies himself a deserted carcase; because he showed no pity to prisoners, he is himself pitilessly dealt with.

I do not think it probable that the following words are to be ascribed to others than the ראיך, those seeing thee, ver. 16, e. g. to the Prophet. The internal connection with vers. 16, 17 is too close. "Is this the man," says ver. 16? What kind of man? Why just that one who, according to ver. 19, lies as a trampled carcase. Then ver. 22, what the Prophet says in the name of the LORD, comes in all the more emphatically as confirming this. It is then the subjects of the king that remark, that whereas all other kings lie in state in the tombs of their ancestors (comp. 2 Kings xxi. 18, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 20) their king is cast away far from his grave (מִן=procul, Jer. xlviii. 45; Lam. iv. 9).

But he is cast away as a despised branch. When trees are felled, or pruned, many a small branch, which compared to the whole tree is worthless, is cast aside and trampled in the mud.

Most expositors in explaining the following words take לְבֻשׁ as part. pass. But it seems to me that then the two following participles appear very superfluous. For what does it amount to to describe the Chaldean as covered with the slain that are thrust through and carried down to the pit? It is otherwise if, with AQU., THEOD., LUTHER, FUERST (conc.), and others, we take לְבֻשׁ as substantive. Then it is said that the corpse of the Chaldean is cast away, not only as a despised branch, but also as the garment of the slain who were thrust through with the sword and buried. For were they thrust through with a sword, then, too, the garment would be cut into holes, and at least spotted with blood, and if they are buried, it is explained how their garment comes into the hands of others. When the dead are buried on the field of battle, their clothes are taken off them, but those that are torn and cut in holes and smeared with blood, are cast away, while those unharmed are retained as valuable booty. "The stones of the pit" cannot be the stones of a grave on the top of the earth. For neither the rock-hewn grave, nor a walled-up tomb, nor a grave covered with stones to avoid the trouble of shoveling up a mound, has any meaning in this connection; though it may be said by the way, that heaping up stones is no less troublesome than shoveling up a mound. Buried in general is the chief thing. But there is only one בּוֹר. pit, that has stones under all circumstances. It is the widening and deepening of the grave (שְׁאוֹל see ver. 15), that is on the surface. This is in the interior of the earth. This interior is any way closed about by the עַמּוּדִים, pillars, (Job ix. 6), מְכוֹנִים foundations, (Ps. civ. 5) of the earth; but these are the mountains (comp. Prov. vii. 25) which are thence called "strong foundations of the earth" Mic. vi. 2. But that the foundations or the roots of the earth consist of rock was known to the ancients as well as to us. The king, as an unburied, thrown away corpse, shall not be reunited in the grave with those other dead which, according to ver. 19, are buried.—The king destroyed his land by despotism and wars, and sacrificed his subjects in masses. Thus, not only himself, but his entire dynasty shall be destroyed. The name of his race shall become extinct as godless. To this end his seed must be slain. The people themselves demand it. They resolve that this generation shall not be raised up to possess the land and fill it with cities. Building cities contributes to security, the establishment of dominion, the interests of trade, and the cultivation of the ground. A builder of cities must ever be a mighty man. There is no need, therefore, to change עָרִים, as some would do, to עָרִצִים (EWALD), עִיִּים (HITZIG), עָרִים (MEIER). On the other hand one must be careful not to press all the particular traits of this prophecy. What we said above concerning the ideal coloring of prophecy is appropriate also here.

7. For I will——saith the LORD of hosts.—Vers. 22, 23. These are words of the Prophet which he speaks in the name of Jehovah. Therefore the word of God constitutes the formal conclusion of the prophecy, the Prophet resuming the thread of discourse and keeping it to the end. He confirms thereby the words of the people by giving them a general and more comprehensive direction. What they had said only against the royal race is changed to a denunciation of punishment against the kingdom of Babylon in general. Its cities shall become the possession (Job xvii. 11; Obad. 17) of the porcupine (xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14), and, (in consequence of the ruin of the embankments of the Euphrates), swampy marshes (xxxv. 7; xli. 18; xlii. 15). By the porcupine appears to be meant the echinus aquatica, which was found of unusual size (according to STRABO, xvi. 1) on the islands of the Euphrates. Comp. BOCHART, Hieroz. II., p. 454 sqq.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xiii. 2–13. The prophecy concerning the day of the LORD has its history. It appears first in the form of the announcement of a scourge of locusts (Joel); then it becomes an announcement of human war-expeditions and sieges of cities. Finally it becomes a message that proclaims the destruction of the earth and of its companions in space. But from the first onward, the last particular is not wanting: only at first it appears faintly. In Joel ii. 10, one does not know whether the discourse is concerning an obscuration of the heavenly bodies occasioned only by the grasshoppers or by higher powers. But soon (Joel iii. 4, 20) this particular comes out more definitely. In the present passage of Isaiah it presses to the foreground. In the New Testament (Matth. xxiv. 29; Mar. xiii. 24 sq.; Luke xxi. 25) it takes the first and central place. We observe clearly that the judgment on the world is accomplished in many acts, and is yet one whole; and as on the other hand nature, too, is itself one whole, so, according to the saying: "whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it" (1 Cor. xii. 26), the catastrophes on earth have their echo in the regions above earth.

2. On xiii. 4 sqq. "God cannot do otherwise than punish accumulated wickedness. But He overthrows violence and crime, and metes out to tyrants the measure they have given to others, for He gives to them a master that the heathen shall know that they too are men (Ps. ix. 21; xi. 5)."—CRAMER.

[On xiii. ver. 3. "It cannot be supposed that the Medes and Persians really exulted, or rejoiced in God or in His plans.—But they would exult as if it were their own plan, though it would be really the glorious plan of God. Wicked men often exult in their success: they glory in the execution of their purposes; but they are really accomplishing the plans of God, and executing His great designs."—BARNES.]

[On ver. 9. "The moral causes of the ruin threatened are significantly intimated by the Prophet's calling the people of the earth or land its sinners. As the national offences here referred to, VITRINGA enumerates pride (ver. 11: xiv. 11, xlvii. 7, 8), idolatry (Jer. l. 38), tyranny in general (xiv. 12, 17), and oppression of God's people in particular (xlvii. 6)."—J. A. ALEXANDER.]

3. On xiii. 19 sqq. Imperiti animi, etc. "Unlearned minds when they happen on allegories, can hold no certain sense of Scripture. And unless this Papal business had kept me to the simple text of the Bible, I had become an idle trifler in allegories like Jerome and Origen. For that figurative speech has certain allurements by which minds seek to dispose of difficulties. . . . The true allegory of this passage is concerning the victory of conscience over death. For, the law is Cyrus, the Turk, the cruel and mighty enemy that rises up against the proud conscience of justitiaries who confide in their own merits. These are the real Babylon, and this is the glory of Babylon, that it walks in the confidence of its own works. When, therefore, the law comes and occupies the heart with its terrors, it condemns all our works in which we have trusted, as polluted and very dung. Once the law has laid bare this filthiness of our hearts and works, there follows confusion, writhing, and pains of parturition; men become ashamed, and that confidence of works ceases and they do those things which we see now-a-days: he that heretofore has lived by confidence of righteousness in a monastery, deserts the monkish life, casts away to ashes all glory of works, and looks to the gratuitous righteousness and merit of Christ, and that is the desolation of Babylon. The ostriches and hairy creatures that remain are ECK, COCHLEUS and others, who do not pertain to that part of law. They screech, they do not speak with human voice, they are unable to arouse and console any afflicted conscience with their doctrine. My allegories, which I approve, are of this sort, viz., which shadow forth the nature of law and gospel." LUTHER.

4. On xiii. 21 sqq. "There the Holy Spirit paints for thee the house of thy heart as a deserted, desolate Babylon, as a loathsome cesspool, and devil's hole, full of thorns, nettles, thistles, dragons, spukes, kobolds, maggots, owls, porcupines, etc., all of which is nothing else than the thousandfold devastation of thy nature, in as much as into every heart the kingdom of Satan, and all his properties have pressed in, and all and every sin, as a fascinating serpent-brood, have been sown and sunk into each one, although not all sins together become evident and actual in every one's outward life."—JOH. ARNDT'S Informatorium biblicum, § 7.

5. On xiv. 1, 2. "Although it seems to me to be just impossible that I could be delivered from death or sin, yet it will come to pass through Christ. For God here gives us an example; He will not forsake His saints though they were in the midst of Babylon."—HEIM and HOFFMANN after LUTHER.

6. On xiv. 4 sqq. "Magna imperia fere nihil sunt quam magnae injuriae.

Ad generum Cereris sine caede et sanguine pauci Descendunt reges et sicca mente tyranni.—LUTHER.

Impune quidvis facere id est regem esse."—SALLUST.

Among the Dialogi mortuorum of LUCIAN OF SAMOSATA the thirteenth is between Diogenes and Alexander the Great. This dialogue begins with the words: "Τί τοῦτο, ὦ Ἀλέξανδρε, τέθνηκας καὶ σὺ, ὥσπερ ἡμεῖς ἅπαντες;" thereupon the contrast is ironically set forth between what Alexander was, as one given out to be a son of the gods, and so recognized by men, and possessor of all highest human glories, and what he is at present. It is, as is well known, doubtful whether LUCIAN really was acquainted with the Scriptures. See PLANCK, Lucian and Christianity in Stud. u. Krit., 1851, IV. p. 826 sqq. Comp. also SCHRADER, die Höllenfahrt der Istar., 1874.

7. On xiv. 4 sqq. "Omni genera figurarum utitur ad confirmandos et consolandos suos, ut simul sit conjuncta summa theologia cum summa rhetorica."—LUTHER.

8. On xiv. 12 sqq. As early as the LXX. this passage seems to have been understood of Satan. It points that way that they change the second person into the third; πῶς ἐξέπεσεν, etc. At least they were so understood. See JEROME, who thereby makes the fine remark: "Unde ille cecidit per superbiam, vos ascendatis per humilitatem." But LUTHER says: "Debet nobis insignis error totius papatus, qui hunc textum de casu angelorum accepit, studia literarum et artium decendi commendare tamquam res theologo maxime necessarias ad tractationem sacrarum literarum."

9. On xiv. 13, 14. "The Assyrian monarch was a thorough Eastern despot . . . rather adored as a god than feared as a man." "In the heathen period the pre-eminence of the German kings depended on their descent from the gods, as among the Greeks" (GERVINUS, Einleit. in d. Gesch. d. 19 Iahrh., 1853, p. 14). CHRISTIAN THOMASIUS, in his Instit. jurispr. divinae, dissert. procemialis, p. 16, calls the princes "the Gods on earth." In a letter from Luxemburg, after the departure of the Emperor Joseph II., it is said (in a description of the journey, of which a sheet lies before me): "we have had the good fortune to see our earthly god." BELANI, Russian Court Narratives, New Series, III. Vol., p. 125: "The Russian historian KORAMPZIN says in the section where he describes the Russian self-rule: "The Autocrat became an earthly god for the Russians, who set the whole world in astonishment by a submissiveness to the will of their monarch which transcends all bounds."

II. PROPHECIES RELATING TO ASSYRIA AND TO THE NATIONS THREATENED BY ASSYRIA, PHILISTIA, MOAB, SYRIA, AND ARAM-EPHRAIM, ETHIOPIA AND EGYPT.

CHAPTER XIV. 24—XX. 6.

a) Prophecy against Assyria. CHAPTER XIV. 24-27.

We have explained above why the prophecy against Assyria occupies the second place and after the one against Babylon. A prophecy against Assyria could not be omitted. It was necessary as a background to the prophecies that follow. But it needed only to be a short one. For the Prophet is sensible that the power of Assyria is shattered by the overthrow of Sennacherib—therefore that, in a prophetic sense, it is in principle a thing done away. But to Assyria and the other nations named in the superscription above, the Prophet does not proclaim merely temporal destruction. He sets before all more or less plainly the prospect of partaking of the Messianic salvation of the future.

24 The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying,
Surely as I have thought, so [a]shall it come to pass;
And as I have purposed, so shall it stand:
25 [b]That I will break the Assyrian in my land,
And upon my mountains tread him under foot:
Then shall his yoke depart from off them,
And his burden depart from off their shoulders.
26 This is the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth:
And this is the hand that is stretched out upon all the nations.
27 For the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it?
[c]And his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?

[a] it has come to pass. [b] To break. [c] And his is the hand that is stretched out.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 24. דִּמָּה in the sense of animo componere, "to dispose in thought," only again x. 7; moreover the Prophet seems to have had in mind in this place, Num. xxxiii. 56.——The Perfect הָיָתָה expresses the coincidence of the realisation with the thought. No sooner said than done, i. e., as God conceives a thought, it is also (as to principle) realized. The following imperf. תקום has then the meaning that what is, as to principle, realized, must arise, set up as actual, outward circumstance. Before תקום the כן is not repeated, but היא is used, evidently for the sake of variety. The thought is essentially the same. It is a sort of Anacoluthon——היה and קום are used as in vii. 7; viii. 10.

Ver. 25. The infin. לשבר depends on the oath-clause ver. 24 b; what is determined shall be fulfilled frangendo Assyrios, etc. לשבר is therefore inf. modalis or gerundivus.——With אבוסנו (comp. ver. 19; lxiii. 6, 18) the language returns from the infinitive construction to the verbum fin., according to a frequent Hebrew usage.——The suffixes in מעליהם and שכמו have nothing to which they can relate in the words of vers. 24, 25.—Moreover from ver. 4 onwards, Israel is not referred to. True, in vers. 1, 2, Israel is likewise spoken of in the third person, and with quite similar suffixes (עליהם ver. 1, נגשיהם, שביהם ver. 2); but then ver. 3 intervenes, in which Israel is spoken of in the second person. It must, therefore, be assumed that the suffixes ver. 25 refer back, not only over the entire Maschal (4-23), but also away over ver. 3 to vers. 1, 2, and that these verses originated, not at the same time with the rest of the prophecy against Babylon, but much earlier. All this is very improbable. I cannot therefore agree with Vitringa and Drechsler, but must side with the view, that the present verses are a fragment of a greater prophecy for Israel of a comforting nature, which, however, cannot be identical with vii.–xii. because in these Assyria is regarded in a totally different light from that which appears in the present verses.

Ver. 27. יָפֵר comp. viii. 10. ["This has been variously translated "scatter" (LXX.), "weaken" (Vulg.), "avert" (Luth.), "dissolve" (Calvin), "change" (J. D. Michaelis), "hinder" (Gesen.), break (Ewald [Naegelsb.]); but its true sense is that given in the Eng. Version and by De Wette (vereiteln) [see Fuerst Lex.]. The meaning of the last clause is not simply that his hand is stretched out, as most writers give it, but that the hand stretched out is his, as appears from the article prefixed to the participle הנטויה. (See Gesen. § 108, 2. Ewald, § 560.—J. A. A.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Whoever reads the prophecies of Isaiah against the heathen nations with attention, must feel surprise that in them, there is relatively little more said about Assyria. After occupying in vii.—xii. the foreground, it retreats in xiii. and onward into the background. On the other hand Babylon now stands front and the Prophet recognizes in it the representative of the perfectly developed world-power that has attained to the exclusive possession of dominion. Now the question arises: how are Assyria and Babylon related? What becomes of Assyria if now Babylon is called the world-power? How is it to be explained that according to x. 24–27 Israel at the end of days is delivered out of bondage to Assyria, if at that end-period not Assyria but Babylon stands at the summit of the world-power? These questions are solved by the short section before us, vers. 24–27. It appears therein that in the immediate future Assyria must be destroyed, that, therefore, Israel may expect deliverance from the yoke of Assyria in a brief season, but that therewith Israel is neither delivered forever, nor is the world-power for ever broken up. But Babylon walks in the footsteps of Assyria; and if in vii.—xii. the world-power appeared solely under the name of Assyria, it happened only because the Prophet could not then distinguish that which followed Assyria from Assyria itself, and therefore comprehended it under one name.

2. The Lord of hosts——turn it back.—Vers. 24–27. Drechsler attaches great weight to the fact that the phrase "the LORD of hosts hath sworn," is preceded by a thrice repeated "saith the LORD of hosts," vers. 22, 23. He says the former is only a climax of these latter. He lays stress, too, on the fact that the thrice repeated "LORD of hosts" of vers. 22, 23 has its correlative in the double use of the same in vers. 24, 27, and that the same words which in ver. 23 "conclude the proper body of the discourse, in ver. 24 begin the appendix." He, therefore, regards vers. 24–27 as an integral part of the discourse that extends through xiii. 1—xiv. 27, and therefore as having originated at the same time. But that is impossible. The words vers. 24-27 must be older than the catastrophe of Sennacherib before Jerusalem, for they foretell it. But the prophecy against Babylon xiii. 1—xiv. 23 must be much more recent, for it is the product of a much higher and, therefore, of a much later prophetic knowledge [? TR.]. If, too, in the points named there appears a certain correspondence, yet it remains very much a question whether that is intentional. The expressions in question, so far as they correspond, occur exceedingly often in all sorts of connections.

The expression "the LORD hath sworn" is especially frequent in Deuteronomy, but always with the Dative of the person whom the oath concerns (Deut. i. 8; ii. 14; iv. 31, etc.). In Isaiah it occurs again, xlv. 23; liv. 9; lxii. 8.—The contents of the oath is: "as I have thought . . . so shall it stand."

["From the distant view of the destruction of Babylon, the Prophet suddenly reverts to that of the Assyrian host, either for the purpose of making one of these events accredit the prediction of the other, or for the purpose of assuring true believers, that while God had decreed the deliverance of the people from remoter dangers, He would also protect them from those at hand.—On the formula of swearing vide supra, v. 9.—KIMCHI explains היתה to be a preterite used for a future, and this construction is adopted in most versions, ancient and modern. It is, however, altogether arbitrary and in violation of the only safe rule as to the use of tenses, viz., that they should have their proper and distinctive force, unless forbidden by the context, or the nature of the subject; which is very far from being the case here. — The true force of the preterite and future forms, as here employed, is recognized by ABEN EZRA, who explains the clause to mean that according to God's purpose, it has come to pass and will come to pass hereafter. The antithesis is rendered still more prominent by JARCHI, by whom this verse is paraphrased as follows —'Thou hast seen, oh Nebuchadnezzar, how the words of the prophets of Israel have been fulfilled in Sennacherib, to break Assyria in my land, and by this thou mayest know that what I have purposed against thee shall also come to pass' (comp. Ezek. xxxi. 3-18).—The only objection to this view is that the next verse goes on to speak of the Assyrian overthrow, which would seem to imply that the last clause of this verse (24) as well as the first relates to that event. Another method of expounding the verse, therefore, is to apply היתה and תקום to the same events, but in a somewhat different sense,—'As I intended it has come to pass, and as I purposed, it shall continue.' The Assyrian power is already broken, and shall never be restored. This strict interpretation of the preterite does not necessarily imply that the prophecy was actually uttered after the destruction of Sennacherib's army. Such would indeed be the natural inference from this verse alone: but for reasons which will be explained below, [viz., in comment on ver. 26.—TR.] it is more probable that the Prophet merely takes his stand in vision at a point of time between the two events of which he speaks, so that both verbs are really prophetic, the one of a remote the other of a proximate futurity, but for that very reason their distinctive forms should be retained and recognized. Yet the only modern writers who appear to do so in translation are CALVIN and COCCEIUS, who have factum est, and J. D. MICHAELIS, who has ist geschehen.—J. J. A. So also substantially BARNES.]

In my land and on my mountain the LORD says. Therefore not in his own land or some other land, but in Palestine the annihilating blow shall fall on Assyria. This evidently points to the overthrow of Sennacherib before Jerusalem (2 Kings xix. 35; Isa. xxxvii. 36). Though even after this overthrow Assyria's power did not at once appear broken, still it was such inwardly and in principle. As much as Nebuchadnezzar after his victory at Carchemish was ruler of the world, though outwardly he had not that appearance (Jer. xxv.), so Assyria, after the LORD had smitten him in his territory, from the view-point of God, and according to inward and divine reality, was broken to pieces and trodden down.—The consequence of that overthrow of Assyria is that Israel shall be freed from his dominion.

The words his yoke shall depart, etc. sound essentially the same as x. 27. Other resemblances are of ver. 24 to vii. 5, 7; viii. 10; x. 7; ver. 25 to ix. 3; x. 27; ver. 26 to ix. 11, 16, 20; x. 4; xi. 11; ver. 27 to viii. 10. But much as vers. 24–27 remind one of chapts. vii.—xii., there is still this essential difference, that in the last named chapters there is no where a prophecy of an overthrow of Assyria in the holy land itself. In general the gaze of the Prophet in those chapters is directed to a much more remote distance. There he looks on Assyria still as representative of the world-power generally, and thus, too, Assyria's overthrow coincides for him with the overthrow of the world-power in general by the Messiah. Here we encounter a look into the immediate future. It must belong to the time before the defeat of Sennacherib. Therefore our verses cannot belong originally to the prophecy against Babylon. [See above in Text. and Gram.].

When the Prophet (ver. 26) declares that the catastrophe predicted for Assyria is significant for the whole earth, and for all nations, he does it by reason of the connection that exists between all acts of the Godhead. That defeat of Sennacherib, too, is an integral moment of the decree that the LORD has determined concerning the whole earth, and all nations. This counsel of God stands so firm that no power of the world can hinder its execution; the hand which the LORD has stretched out to do this execution nothing can turn aside from its doing.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. How grand is the Prophet's contemplation of history! How the mighty Assyria shrivels up, which in chapters vii.-xii., played so great a part! Only a line or so is devoted to it here, "Das macht, es ist gericht, ein Wörtlein kann es fällen." The Prophet knows that Sennacherib's defeat before Jerusalem is at once the overthrow of the Assyrian world-power, and the deliverance of Israel from his yoke, although Assyria stood yet a hundred years and did harm enough to Judah still (2 Chr. xxxiii. 11). But God always sees the essence of things. What He wills, comes to pass; and when it has happened, perhaps no one knows what that which has come to pass means: only the future makes it plain. The fruit germ frosted in the blossom, may remain green for days. Only by degrees it becomes yellow, then black, and evidently dead.

["By this assurance (vers. 24–27) God designed to comfort His people, when they should be in Babylon in a long and dreary captivity. Comp. Ps. cxxxvii. And by the same consideration His people may be comforted in all times. His plans shall stand. None can disannul them. No arm has power to resist Him. None of the schemes formed against Him shall ever prosper. Whatever ills, therefore, may befall His people; however thick, gloomy, and sad their calamities may be; and however dark His dispensations may appear, yet they may have the assurance that all His plans are wise, and that they all shall stand."—BARNES].

b) Prophecies relating to the nations threatened by Assyria, viz.: Philistia, Moab, Syria and Ephraim, Ethiopia and Egypt.

CHAPTER XIV. 28—XX. 6.

1. AGAINST PHILISTIA. CHAP. XIV. 28–32.

This short piece was occasioned by an embassy that the Philistines sent to Jerusalem in hypocritical courtesy, after the death of king Ahaz. It contains the most manifold correspondences to chap. xi., so that there can be no doubt about its having a contemporaneous origin. Yet chap. xi., originated before this piece, for the latter evidently leans on the former. It is seen that the young king Hezekiah, immediately on ascending the throne awakened great expectations. That the present piece comes just here, has, may be, its explanation in this, that Isaiah would begin with these western neighbors as the least dangerous. He then passes on to the East to the mightier Moabites, from them he ascends north to the still mightier Syro-Ephraimites, to conclude with the mightiest of all, the Egyptians and Ethiopians of the South. Jeremiah, chap. xlvii., goes from the Philistines to the Moabites, and then by a round-about to Damascus.

28 IN THE YEAR THAT KING AHAZ DIED WAS THIS BURDEN.
29 Rejoice not thou, [a]whole Palestina,
Because [b]the rod of him that smote thee is broken:
For out of the serpent's root shall come forth a [1c]cockatrice,
And his fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent.
30 And the first born of the poor shall feed,
And the needy shall lie down in safety:
And I will kill thy root with famine,
And he shall slay thy remnant.
31 Howl, O gate; cry, O city;
Thou, [a]whole Palestina, art dissolved:
For there [d]shall come from the north a smoke,
And [2e]none shall be alone in his [3]appointed times.
32 What shall one then answer the messengers of the nation?
That the LORD hath founded Zion,
And the poor of His people shall [4]trust in it.

[1] Or, adder. [2] Or, he shall not be alone. [3] Or, assemblies.
[4] Or, betake themselves unto it.
[a] all Philistia. [b] the rod that smote. [c] basilisk.
[d] comes. [e] no straggler in his armies.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 28. מַשָּׂא see xiii. 1.

Ver. 30. בכורי דלים is, so to speak, a superlative of בְּנֵי ד — those on whom the essence of poverty and lowliness is impressed in full, unmitigated power.—To take the basilisk as the subject of יהרג (DELITZSCH) does too much violence. I [thus, too, J. A. A.] take simply רעב, which is gen. masc., as subject.

Ver. 31. שַׁעַר metonymy for those assembled in the gates, the יֹשְׁבֵי שַׁעַר Ps. lxix. 13; hence the feminine construction: comp. יוֹדֵעַ כָּל־שַׁעַר עַמִּי Ruth iii. 11.—Niph. נִמּוֹג occurs in Isaiah only here. The form is to be regarded here as Inf. absol. Regarding the form comp. lix. 13; Ewald, § 240, c.——מוֹעָד, (the hordes united at their rendezvous, מוֹעֵד Joel viii. 14) is ἅπ. λεγ.——בּוֹדֵד in Isaiah only here; comp. Hos. viii 8; Ps. cii. 8.

Ver. 32. עָנָה is according to rule construed with a double Accusative (comp. 1 Sam. xx. 10; Mic. vi. 5; Jer. xxiii. 37, etc.). The third pers. sing. stands impersonally as is often the case (comp. vi. 10; vii. 24; viii. 4; x. 4, etc.).——חסה stands often with בְּ of the place whither one flees for refuge (xxx. 2; Ps. xxxvi. 8; Jud. ix. 15, etc.).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Philistia is warned against rejoicing at the death of Ahaz. If Ahaz was a serpent, then out of his root (xi. 1—notice the Messianic reference!) shall proceed a basilisk and flying dragon (ver. 29). Israel shall pasture in peace; Philistia perish by poverty and care (ver. 30). From the northern quarter the enemy shall invade the land, scathing and burning (ver. 31). But to the embassy, in regard to the matters they sought to spy out, the short, haughty answer shall be given: Zion is Jehovah's foundation, and in this the needy of His people find a sure refuge (ver. 32).

2. In the year——thy remnant.—Vers. 28–30. The year of Ahaz's death is 728 B. C. The Philistines, according to 2 Chron. xxviii. 18, had possessed themselves of territory belonging to Israel. They had made a conquest in the low country (שְׁפֵלָה) and in the south-land (נֶגֶב) of the cities Bethshemesh, Ajalon, Gederoth, Shocho, Timna and Gimzo, and dwelt in them. But of Hezekiah it is related (2 Kings xviii. 8): "He smote the Philistines, even unto Gaza, and the borders thereof, from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city." He had, therefore, at last conquered back the lost territory. This is all that the historical books offer to us concerning the times of Ahaz and Hezekiah.

From ver. 32 it is seen that after the death of Ahaz the Philistines sent ambassadors to Jerusalem. Perhaps the ostensible object of this embassage was neighborly consideration: they would offer condolence. But in reality they were to sound the state of affairs. [See below comment of J. A. A., etc., at ver. 32.—Tr.] Isaiah knows this very well, and gives them an answer that, on the one hand, befitted their perfidy, and, on the other, the standpoint of a genuine representative of the Theocracy. That is not saying that Isaiah gave this answer in the name of the government. He gave it as Prophet, i. e., he uttered it like he published his other prophecies; whether publicly or to the ears of the embassy, or before a few witnesses, is a matter of indifference. His words concern primarily the rulers themselves. He says to them how, as the representatives of the people of God, they ought to reply. At any rate, he knew that his words would go to the right address, i. e., as well to the government in Jerusalem as to the Philistine ambassadors.

The introductory words (ver. 28) are the same as vi. 1. In our passage they have evidently the sense that Ahaz had already died. This appears from what follows. Rejoice not etc.—These words recall 2 Sam. i. 20, the lament of David over the death of Saul and his sons. For there it reads: "Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph" (comp. Mic. i. 10). Ahaz was as little as Saul a king after God's heart. That did not hinder the Philistines from rejoicing at the death of either of their kings. To either event that occasioned sorrow to Israel there was attached joyful hope for them. Though so far as we know, Ahaz did them no harm, but was rather conquered by them; yet they might hope that under his young successor their interests would be still more fostered. Therefore Isaiah warns them against overflowing with too much joy—joy that would fill all Philistia. He describes the subject of the joy to be: because the rod of him that smote thee is broken.—As Ahaz did not smite the Philistines, but was much more smitten by them, we must not regard him as the rod that smote, but the kingdom of Judah in general. David broke their power (2 Sam. v. 17 sqq.; viii. 1; xxi. 15 sqq.). Although from that period they were still dangerous enemies, yet the time of their superiority was past. It is related of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 21) and of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 11) that the Philistines were tributary to them. Uzziah leveled the walls of Gath, Jabneh and Ashdod (2 Chron. xxvi. 6). The government of Ahaz was weak even toward the Philistines. Might they not hope that one still weaker would succeed Ahaz, and that thus the staff that had once smitten them would be entirely broken? For this reason we take שבט מכך (comp. ix. 12; x. 20) to be rather: "the staff that smote thee" than "the staff of him that smote thee." Ahaz, though having no staff that smote, was, as king of Judah, a part of that staff that had smitten them.

But the Prophet destroys the hope of the Philistines. He says in advance, that out of the root of the serpent shall proceed a basilisk and a conquering dragon. The expression שׁרשׁ, root, applied to the serpent is strange. But it is to be explained as an allusion to the "root of Jesse" (xi. 1, 10). Perhaps there lies in the נָחָשׁ even an allusion to the name אחז, and at the same time a reminder of the serpent that Dan was to be, according to Gen. xlix. 17, and whose realization we find in Samson. צֶפַע, basilisk (which occurs only here) evidently means the same as צִפְעֹנִי which Isa. xi. 8, uses in the same discourse of which the expression "root" has reminded us. The expression must any way be meant as something stronger compared with "serpent," as, on the other hand, שׂרף מעופף "flying dragon" (found again only xxx. 6; comp. Herod. ii. 75; iii. 109 and Gesen. in loc.) is meant to express something stronger than צֶפַע. By the "basilisk," the Prophet any way means Hezekiah; very likely by the "flying dragon," he means the Messiah. For what is said ver. 30 of the happy circumstances of Israel, plainly recalls the representation of the Messianic salvation xi. 4 sqq.——But if the Prophet compares the typical and anti-typical king of Judah to serpents, we must consider that they must be serpents only for the hated enemies. God says of Himself that He will be the plague and destruction of death (Hos. xiii. 14).

First-born of the lowly it says ver. 30; not the first-born." I do not think that the בכרי דלים here are the Jews. The Prophet lives quite in the sphere of the ideas of chap. xi. There it is said (ver. 4 sqq.), that the Messiah shall judge the lowly (דלים) with righteousness, and that wild and tame beasts shall pasture peacefully together. In our passage the Prophet unites both these thoughts, in that he draws from the one his subject and from the other his predicate. But, according to xi. 4, he means the lowly and poor in an individual sense. He is not thinking of political lowliness of the nation. It shall be a sign of the glory and blessedness of His kingdom, that people, that otherwise were poor and wretched, shall move in rich pasture and rest there securely. He means of course Jewish poor, but not the Jews as the poorest people. It appears to me, moreover, that Isaiah has before his mind a passage from Job (xviii. 12, 13) where it says: "Be hunger his power, and destruction stand ready at his side; devour the members of his skin, devour his members the first-born of death."

In contrast with the rich pasture that the poor of Israel shall find under their king, the Messiah, and in contrast with the glorious fruit that the root of the royal house of David shall produce, the Philistines shall be destroyed to the root of their existence by hunger and want, yea, the last remnant of them shall be strangled by this grim enemy.

3. Howl, O gate——trust in it.—Vers. 31, 32. The Prophet describes in ver. 31, how Philistia will suffer and feel the destruction, which, according to 29 b and 30 b, is in prospect. The gates shall howl (comp. xiii. 6; Jer. xlviii. 20) and the entire population of the cities shall cry (comp. Ezek. xxi. 17) the whole land shall dissolve in anguish and fear, i. e., shall be without courage, counsel, defence (comp. Exod. xv. 15; Josh. ii. 9, 24, and כְּמַס x. 18; xiii. 7). The reason for these utterances is assigned: for there shall come from the north a smoke.—It is plain enough that neither clouds of dust nor fire borne in advance of troops can be intended here. For neither of these would occasion terror like the smoke of towns already set on fire. Most expositors understand the Assyrian to be meant by the approaching enemy. But that is much too narrow a construction. According to ver. 29 b, and 30 b. the Lord announces Himself, and His anointed as the enemy that will destroy Philistia. And if ver. 30 a Messianic salvation is proclaimed to Israel, then the reverse of this for the Philistines is naturally Messianic destruction. But Philistia will have, too, its part to endure in the great judgments that the Lord will bring on the world of nations, and by which He will redeem His people. In chap. xi. 14, which is so nearly allied to our passage, the Philistines are, in fact, expressly named among the nations out of whose power the Lord will deliver His people. Therefore, the Prophet means here the final judgment on Philistia, though, of course, this does not exclude that this final judgment has its preliminary stages, and that one of these, too, may be an Assyrian invasion, to which, in fact, "from the north" refers. The army of the enemy will be a compact and powerful body—no one runs away, no one strays off (comp. v. 27).

The Prophet having said to the Philistines in general, what the reality of the future will be in contrast with the hopes of their malicious rejoicing, comes at last (ver. 32) to speak of the special fact that prompted him to this prophetic declaration. Ambassadors had come who ostensibly would manifest friendly sympathy, but, in fact, spy out how matters stood in Jerusalem. The Prophet knows that. It is important to give them an answer that is worthy of the Theocracy. Whether or not the powers that were were competent and willing to do this we know not. Any way the Prophet of Jehovah considered it as belonging to his office to express what, from the genuine theocratic point of view, ought to be said to these ambassadors.—מלאכי גוי, messengers of a nation, stands significantly without article. גוי, nation, designates here very expressly a heathen people. He says therefore: what sort of answer have messengers of a heathen people to get, who come with such a purpose as these Philistines now do? None other than the curt: Jehovah founded Zion, (xxviii. 16) and therefore the wretched of His people (x. 2) can hide themselves with confidence in this divine foundation. ["The very absence of the article (i. e., with גוי) implies that the expression ("messengers of a nation") is indefinite, and that the whole sense meant to be conveyed is this, that such may be the answer given to the inquiries made from any quarter."—J. A. A. This judicious remark may suffice to call attention to the very slender foundation there is for the conjecture which yet gives much of the coloring to the foregoing comment. If no special Philistine delegation is meant by Isaiah, then all that is said about pretended condolence, malicious satisfaction, spying, etc., is misplaced fancy. Much as we may desire to detect the historic facts connected with prophecy, we must be content without them if they are not supplied. The tendency of modern exposition is as much to license in conjecturing the historical basis of prophecy, as formerly it was to license in detecting the fulfilment of it. On ver. 29, J. A. A., comments: "All interpreters agree that the Philistines are here spoken of, as having recently escaped from the ascendancy of some superior power, but at the same time threatened with a more complete subjection." Everything historically specific, beyond this obviously sure statement, is conjecture with no broader foundation than that pointed out above. Another commentater (Dr. B. Neteler, Das Buch Isaias—mit Berücksichtigung—der auf seinen Inhalt sich bezieenden assyrischen Inschriften erklärt, Münster, 1876), who reads the text in the light of recent interpretations of Assyrian inscriptions identifies the reference of the symbols as follows: "The staff that repeatedly smote the Philistines very seriously was Sargon. The basilisk proceeding out of the root of the serpent is Sennacherib, who, in his third expedition, conquered various Philistine cities. The flying dragon is Esarhaddon, who, in the beginning of his reign, undertook an expedition toward the sea coasts, and whose war against Egypt was doubtless a considerable burden for Philistia." "The messengers of the nation (ver. 32) that came on like a devastating fire, and overcame the nation of Philistines with little trouble, must acknowledge that worldly-power comes to grief against Zion. Sargon and Sennacherib had that experience." BIRKS makes the rod = the serpent = Tiglath-Pileser, etc.—TR.].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xiv. 32. It is to be remarked here that Isaiah holds out as a shield, the truth that the LORD has founded Zion. But when the Jews founded on this truth a wicked hope, in that they saw therein a passport for every sort of godlessness, then it is said: "Trust ye not in lying words, saying, The temple of the LORD, are these." Jer. vii. 4.

2. AGAINST MOAB. CHAPTERS XV., XVI.

Concerning the relation of Moab to the Israelites, comp. the remarks prefixed to Jer. xlviii. The present prophecy is a double address. For it consists of an older discourse (xv. 1—xvi. 12), which, as appears, was not published immediately on its origination, but was given publicity by Isaiah only when he could announce definitely that the beginning of its fulfilment would occur after three years. Some have therefore conceived the notion that the older address is not Isaianic. KOPPE, AUGUSTI, BAUER, BERTHOLD, have regarded Jeremiah as the Author, which is quite impossible. HITZIG (comp. his Des Propheten Jonas Orakel über Moab, Heidelberg, 1831,) even holds that Jonah is the author, and has found followers (KNOBEL, MAURER, etc.,) in this singular view, whereas HENDEWERK decidedly controverts him. It is regarded as decisive for the view that this is not Isaianic, that it betrays a tender-hearted sympathy for an otherwise hated foreign nation. But this sympathy is not as tender-hearted as it appears. It rather serves as a measure by which to estimate the fearfulness of the judgment. Further appeal is made to a number of "peculiar, and in a measure, singular thoughts and turns." Some of these are that mourning garments are put on in the street (xv. 3)—yet Hezekiah went into the temple clothed in sackcloth, and a deputation from him to Isaiah went in sackcloth (2 Kings xix. 1, 2)—; further that crying encircled the land (comp. my comment), Sibma's vine spread itself over whole regions—only a bold figure worthy of Isaiah (see the comment)—; its branches make drunk, (which the Prophet does not say, see the comment on xvi. 8), the heart cries for Moab and sounds like a harp, the tears of the writer bedew Heshbon (also figures quite agreeing with Isaiah's style). Moreover a number of unexampled phrases are pointed to with doubtful suspicion: ירד בבכי, "to weep bitterly" (but the expression means something quite different), מים משמות, "waters are deserts," (it means rather: places of springs are loca arida), שית צל "to set shadows," (it means rather to make the shadow like the night), etc.; further appeal is made to words, forms, meanings, and references that are peculiar to the author of this passage.

All these things rest on misunderstandings; partly they are ἅπαξ λεγόμενα, the like of which are to be found in nearly every chapter of Isaiah; partly the Prophet intentionally imitates Moabite forms of speech. At all events, the little peculiarities, which in no case witness directly against Isaiah, and which are natural to such originality as his, are not to be considered in comparison with the great mass of decidedly Isaianic modes of expression which we shall prove in particular below. I therefore hold decidedly that Isaiah is the author.

As regards the time of the composition of xv. 1—xvi. 12, the text seems to me to present two points of limitation. According to these chapters not only Dibon, but also Jahas, Heshbon, Elealeh, Sibmah, Medeba are in the hand of the Moabites. But according to 2 Kings xv. 29; 1 Chr. v. 26, these regions were only depopulated by Tiglath-Pileser, and thus only afterward occupied by the Moabites. That expedition of Tiglath-Pileser, according to universal opinion, occurred in the year 741, thus in the third year of the reign of Ahaz. From xvi. 1 it further appears that at that time the Edomites were still subject to the Jews. This relation was changed under Ahaz. For, according to 2 Chr. xxviii. 17, the Edomites during his reign made an incursion into Judah. It is not conceivable that after this time Isaiah gave the Moabites counsel to send tribute from Seba to Jerusalem. For the Edomites would not allow that, and the Moabites who looked for refuge to Edom would never have dared to do so. Unfortunately we are not informed as to the time when that incursion of the Edomites took place. But it occurred in the time of Ahaz, and thus this prophecy xv. 1—xvi. 12 must be referred to the period of this king's reign, and that between the two events 2 Kings xv. 29 (1 Chr. v. 26) and 2 Chr. xxviii. 17. Unfortunately we do not know which Assyrian king accomplished (or began to accomplish) Isaiah's prophecy to the Moabites. Therefore we cannot know when he subjoined the two concluding verses and published the entire oracle.

The prophecy evidently subdivides into four parts. Thus the old, first prophecy easily subdivides into three sections, of which the first (xv. 1-9) announces Moab's terror and flight, the second (xvi. 1-5) the condition of deliverance, the third (xvi. 6-12) Moab's haughty refusal to fulfil these conditions and his consequent entire ruin. Finally, the later supplement determines definitely the beginning period of the fulfilment (xvi. 13, 14).

a) Moab's Terror and Flight.

CHAPTER XV. 1-9.

1 THE BURDEN OF MOAB.
Because in the night Ar of Moab is laid waste, and [1]brought to silence;
Because in the night Kir of Moab is laid waste, and [1]brought to silence;
2 [a]He is gone up to Bajith, and to Dibon, the high places, to weep.
[b]Moab shall howl over Nebo, and over Medeba:
On all their heads shall be baldness,
And every beard cut off.
3 [c]In their streets they shall gird themselves with sackcloth:
On the tops of their houses, and [d]in their streets, every one shall howl,
[2]Weeping abundantly.
4 And Heshbon [e]shall cry, and Elealeh:
Their voice shall be heard even unto Jahaz:
Therefore the armed soldiers of Moab shall cry out;
His [f]life shall be grievous unto him.
5 My heart [e]shall cry out for Moab;
[3]His fugitives shall flee unto Zoar, an heifer of three years old:
For by the mounting up of Luhith with weeping shall they go it up;
For in the way of Horonaim they [g]shall raise up a cry of [4]destruction.
6 For the waters of Nimrim shall be [5]desolate:
For the [h]hay is withered away, the [i]grass faileth,
There is no green thing.
7 Therefore the abundance they have gotten, and that which they have laid up,
[j]Shall they carry away to the [6]brook of the willows.
8 For the cry is gone around about the borders of Moab;
The howling thereof unto Eglaim,
And the howling thereof unto Beer-elim.
9 For the waters of Dimon shall be full of blood:
For I will bring [7]more upon Dimon,
Lions upon him that escapeth of Moab,
[k]And upon the remnant of the land.

[1] Or, cut off.
[2] Heb. Descending into weeping, or, coming down with weeping.
[3] Or, To the borders thereof, even as an heifer.
[4] Heb. breaking.
[5] Heb. desolations.
[6] Or, valley of the Arabians.
[7] Heb. additions.

[a] They go up to the house.
[b] they howl on Nebo and Medeba-Moab.
[c] In his streets they gird.
[d] their (public) squares.
[f] soul.
[g] raise.
[h] grass.
[i] the sward gone.
[j] omit shall.
[k] And to the remnant the ground.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. כִּי may of course be made to relate to מַשָּׂא מ׳, and one may find in the latter phrase the sense that is elsewhere expressed by הוֹי or אוֹי (comp. vi. 5). But this does not suffice. For מַשָּׂא מ׳ is everywhere else nothing but superscription, and is nowhere connected with the beginning of the discourse. As in chaps. xv., xvi. there is made a surprisingly frequent use of the particle כִּי—it occurs nine times in xv., and five times in xvi.—so, too, the כִּי of ver. 1 is surely to be interpreted according to this usage. No where else is Isa. wont to multiply this particle in a surprising way. It seems to me that he had here a particular aim. Perhaps he imitates Moabite language. The same is the case with לֵיל. It must occasion surprise that of the five times that Isaiah uses לֵיל (except these he uses לַיְלָה) three belong to the chapters on Moab (comp. xvi. 3). In xxi. 11 לֵיל occurs, and probably for the sake of variety in the parallelism, perhaps, too, as mimicking the dialect of Edom and as reminiscence of Exod. xii. 42. But xxx. 29, the form לֵיל occurs as st. constr., and also with allusion to Exod. xii. 42. On the monument of king Mesa, in line 15, the night is actually called לֵלָה (comp. SCHLOTTM. in Stud. and Krit. 1871, Heft. IV., p. 596) from which it appears that the pronunciation with e is Moabitic. It is needless, with DRECHSLER and others, to take לֵיל here as st. constr. This, as DELITZSCH says, would give an illogical thought, "in as much as שֻׁדַּד and נִדְמָה, comp. Jer. xlvii. 5, nearly coincide as to meaning."—שֻׁדַּד, Pual, occurs again xxiii. 1, 14 (comp. xvi. 4; xxi. 2; xxxiii. 1).—עָר is without doubt the Moabitic word for עִיר (comp. SCHLOTTMANN, l. c., p. 607). For it is used only of the capital of Moab and of the territory immediately belonging to it. It is, indeed, used in the latter sense alone (Num. xxi. 15; Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29, comp. SCHLOTT., p. 608); but in the former sense in the connection עָר מוֹאָב (Num. xxi. 8 and here).——נִדְמָה is subjoined ἀσυνδέτως, with an emphasis that makes an impression of shuddering, (comp. xxxiii. 9; Jer. ix. 9; l. 3). The word occurs in Isaiah again vi. 5. The repetition, too, of the phrase in the second clause (anadiplosis) is a rhetorical device that serves to make the impression stronger. Isaiah often resorts to this: ver. 8; viii. 9; xvii. 12 sq.; xxi. 11. Comp. on xl. 1.——קִיר means in Hebrew "the wall" (xxii. 5; Ps. lxii. 4; Ezek. xiii. 12 sqq., and oft). But in Moabitic it stands for קִרְיָה. In the inscription of Mesa קר occurs four times in the sense of "city": Line 11, 12, 24 bis.—עָר מ׳ and קִיר מ׳ although names of cities, are construed as masculines. The reason of this appears to me to be, that in the Prophet's representation the notion Moab predominated, and the names of nations are prevalently used as masculine.

Ver. 2. עָלָה is used impersonally, "there goes up," or "one goes up" (comp. xiv. 30, 32).——מֵידְבָא after כּוֹאָב is genitive to the latter, and not nom. to יְיֵלִיל. Medba-Moab is a combination that does not occur elsewhere, but which the Prophet perhaps made because he thought he saw in מֵידְבָא, Moabitic מהדבא, a kindred notion to מוֹאָב (מֵי אָב), and an allusion to the origin of the nation (Gen. xix. 30 sqq.).——יְיֵלִיל, comp. ver. 3; lii. 5; lxv. 14.——The words בכל־ראשיו קרחה are quoted from Amos viii. 10, where we read עַל־כָּל־רֹאשׁ קָרְחָה (comp. Jer. xlviii. 37; Ezek. vii. 18; xxix. 18). The pointing רֹאשָׁיו instead of רָאשָׁיו, for which some Codices read ראשׁו, ראשׁו, רָאשֵׁם, is found only here. It is possible that in the mind of the Prophet, citing from memory, the o sound, which the word has in the original passage, had its effect.——קָרְחָה, does not elsewhere occur as the name of a city. Isaiah uses it again as appellative, iii. 24; xxii. 12. There lies in it an allusion which the inscription of Mesa suggests to us. For, according to lines 21—26, this one built Korcha (קָרְחָה) i. e., "a cleared place at or in Dibon (according to line 24) that had as yet no wall" (DIESTEL, Die Moabitische Gedenktafel, Iahrb. f. deutsche Theol., 1871, Heft. II. p. 237), and transferred thither the royal residence (line 23).—By quoting the words of Amos, the Prophet seems to intend derision: if all heads are bald, then, of course, baldness (קָרְחָה) reigns over Moab.——גרועה comp. ix. 9; x. 33; xiv. 12; xxii. 25; xlv. 2.——Jer. xlviii 37 has גְּרוּעָה, as, according to GESENIUS and DELITZSCH, the MASORA and many Codd. and older editions read in the present passage, whereas in Jeremiah only 10 Codd. have גְּרוּעָה.——גָּרַע designates regular shearing, גדע irregular hewing or cutting off in haste (clipping). The difference in the reading corresponds to the character of both prophets, whence in neither of the two passages perhaps, is the received reading to be altered.

Ver. 3. Notice here the interchange of gender and number according as Moab comes before the Prophet's mind as a nation or land, as a whole, or as a totality of individuals.——כֻּלֹּה, which occurs again in Isa. only xvi. 7, seems likewise to be a mimicry of Moabitic form of speech. For in the inscription of Mesa is found the suffix form הּ exclusively (about 12 times). The name Nebo also is written נבה, not as in Hebrew נְבוֹ.——יֹרֵד בַּבֶּכִי in the sense of "flowing down, dissolving in tears" would be, as KNOBEL, too, confesses, without example in the Old Testament. The simple Accusative would be required for that as Jer. ix. 17; xiii. 17; Lam. i. 16; iii. 48, and often.

Ver. 4. יָרְעוּ comp. xlii. 13; xliv. 23.——The Praet. יָרַע occurs only here. Many expositors (GESEN., KNOBEL, DELITZSCH), on account of the word יְרִיעָה, tremulum, "curtain," take this word to mean "to tremble, shake." But it is not to be overlooked why the Perfect should not be taken here in the same sense in which otherwise the Imperfect is used, i. e., in the sense of malum., miserum., afflictum esse. The Prophet intends a play on the word יריעו, therefore he employs the otherwise unused perfect, without meaning to use it in any other sense than that in which imperfect occurs, which has besides passed over to the service of the kindred root רעע. Therefore נפשו ירעה לו has the same meaning as יֵרַע לְבָבֵךְ 1 Sam. i. 8; Deut. xv. 10; compare וַיֵּרַע לְמֹשֶׁה Ps. cvi. 32.

Ver. 5. עֶגְלַת שְׁלִשִׁיָּה is construed like שְׁנַת הָרְבִיעִית Jer. xlvi. 2; li. 59, i. e., annus quarti scil. numeri; כְּשֶׁבֶט אֶחָד Lev. xxiv. 22, אֲרוֹן אֶחָד 2 Kings xii. 10. But is it designative of a locality or appositive to such? MAURER, EWALD, KNOBEL, DRECHSLER, DIETRICH (Zur bibl. Geogr. in Merx' Archiv I., p. 342 sqq.) see in it a "third Egla," in proof of whose existence they appeal to JOSEPHUS Ant. XIV. 1, 4, where, beside Zoar, Oronai and other places, an Ἄγαλλα is mentioned. But how uncertain is this assumption of a "third Egla," since we do not otherwise hear of a single one, not to speak of three, for that Ἄγαλλα of JOSEPHUS can just as well be אֶגְלַיִם (ver. 8)! DOEDERLEIN and KOSTER (Stud. and Krit. 1862 I., p. 113 sqq.) take Zoar, Horonaim and Egla to have been a Tripolis whose chief name was Egla. But of such a city, which must, too, have had a considerable circumference, there is to be found no trace. We must therefore take עֶג׳ שׁ׳ as appositive. It cannot be referred to Moab on account of its position in the sentence. It must then be referred to צֹעַר, and that in a sense in which it may be joined also to the city Horonaim as predicate, as is done Jer. xlviii. 34. But we must take עֶג׳ שׁ׳ as having the same meaning with עֶגְלָה מְשֻׁלֶּשֶׁת Gen. xv. 9, along with which are named a עֵז מְשֻׁלֶּשֶׁת and a אַיִל מְשֻׁלָּשׁ. Now these, as is acknowledged, are three years old, as it were beasts raised to the third degree, viz., degree of years.——דרך is acc. loci — "on the road."—יְעֹעֵרוּ is Pilpel contracted from יְעַרְעֵרוּ, like כּוֹכָב from כַּבְכָּב. The expression זעקת־שבר only here.

Ver. 6. מַשַּׁמּוֹת only here in Isaiah. The כִּי here, as in ver. 8 sq. (comp. on ver. 1), makes the impression of being an intentional redundancy.

Ver. 7. עָשָׂה represents an impersonal relative phrase — "what are made, acquired," unless we assume a very abrupt change of person in the following ישׂאו פקדתם. The impersonal construction is comparatively frequent in our passage (vers. 2, 5).——עֲרָבִים can mean only "Arabians" or "willows." It cannot mean "deserts," which is עֲרָבוֹת (Jer. v. 6). As only the situation of the brook, not the meaning of its name, is of importance here, it is no matter which one prefers. Still, as in the Old Testament, the word in the plural, עֲרָבִים, never occurs meaning Arabians, whereas it is often used to mean "willows" (xliv. 4; Lev. xxiii. 40; Job xl. 22; Ps. cxxxvii. 2), I prefer the meaning "willow-brook," leaving undetermined whether or not נחל הערבה, Amos vi. 14 is identical with this. Comp. HERZOG'S R. Encycl. XI. p. 14.

Ver. 8. הִקִּיפָה does not mean here "outwardly encircled;" but it is — "make the round," as in Lev. xix. 27; Job i. 5, where there is a difference as to form, but an essential analogy.——יְלָלָה occurs only here in Isa.: elsewhere Jer. xxv. 36; Zeph. i. 10; Zech. xi. 3.

Ver. 9. In the first clause of this verse the Prophet accumulates the sound of m; hence Dimon for Dibon, which change might happen the more easily as JEROME informs us that "usque hodie indifferenter et Dimon et Dibon hoc oppidum dicitur."——So far as I can see, all expositors refer כִּי אָשִׁית וגו׳ to what follows, which they think justified especially by נוספות additamenta. But in that case וְ and not כִּי must stand before אשׁית. By כִּי the phrase is connected with the foregoing. שׁית with עַל like Ruth iii. 15; Exod. xxi. 22; Num. xii. 11. ——נוספות occurs only here in this sense.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet portrays the desolation of the territory of Moab, pointing out the fate of many particular localities, and what the inhabitants experience, say and do (vers. 1–4). Therewith he does not conceal his own sympathy (ver. 5 a), and signifies that the Moabites shall be driven out of their land, and be crowded out over their borders on every side (vers. 5 b–8). But alas, flight will not help them much, for a mournful fate will overtake also those that escape, who will either become a prey to wild beasts, or lie unburied on the bare ground (ver. 9).

2. The burden —— silence.—Ver. 1. The superscription is like xiii. 1, which see. In the night: i. e., at an unfavorable hour. For night adds increased terrors to the storming of a city. The city Ar-Moab, according to most recent investigations (comp. SCHLOTTMANN, l. c. p. 608 and DIETRICH in MERX' Archiv. III. 320 sqq.), lay close by, indeed (according to Num. xxii. 36; Jos. xiii. 9, 16) partly in Arnon. In the last named passages it is also by the Hebrew writers called עִיר, "a city." From the Moabitic Ar comes the Greek name Ἀρεόπολις (JEROME, in loc., in the L. V. p. 184 sq. Ed. Vallars.). The name Rabbat-Moab does not occur in the Old Testament. It may be that this designation, which was not a name but an official title, was transferred to the later Rabbah, which lies several [German] miles south of Arnon, and was a bishop's residence in the 5th and 6th centuries (comp. RITTER, Erdk. XIV. p. 115 sq.; XV. p. 1210 sqq.) ——Kir-Moab (to distinguish it from the Assyrian Kir, xxii. 6) is mentioned by Isaiah under this name only here. Yet Kir-Haresh or Kir-Haresheth (xvi. 11, 7) are identical with it. The place was a strong fortress, on a high, steep mountain, visible from Jerusalem. It lay about three hours south of Rabbat-Moab, and about the same distance from the Dead sea. In the Chaldee it is called כְּרַכָּא דְמוֹאָב, i. e., "castle, wall of Moab." The Greeks called the city Χαράξ (so probably 2 Macc. xii. 17), Χαράκωμα (PTOL. v. 17, 5), Χαρακμῶβα, Χαραχμῶβα (STEPH., BYZ., and THEODORET in loc., who moreover appears to identify Ar-Moab and Kir-Moab). The name is preserved in the form Kerek until the present day.

3. He is gone up——grievous unto him. —Vers. 2–4. In ver. 1 Moab entire is indicated in its two halves, represented by a northern and a southern city. From ver. 2 on follow specifications. For on the desolation of Moab, the great theme, are rung manifold changes: by most numerous facts the truth of it is exhibited. In Jos. xiii. 17 Dibon and Bamoth-Baal (בָּמוֹת בַּעַל, the high places of Baal) are mentioned together, and the latter is mentioned Num. xxii. 41. Jer. xlviii. 35 speaks of מַעֲלֶה בָמָה, "the ascent of the elevation;" and in the inscription of Mesa, line 27, it reads: אנכי בנתי בת במת כי הרס הא. [I built Beth-Bamath (a house on high) because it was elevated.]. Therefore Dibon and another locality, which in full was called Beth-Bamoth-Baal, appear to have been elevated places of worship. Dibon lay to the north of Arnon and not very far distant. It was king Mesa's birth-place, for he calls himself in his inscription הַדִּיבֹנִי, the Dibonite. The city is elsewhere mentioned Num. xxi. 30; xxxii. 2, 34; Jos. xiii. 9, 17; Jer. xlviii. 18, 22; Neh. xi. 25.——לְבֶכִי "for to weep," in order to lament to the gods with tears the distress of the land (xxii. 12).——עַל before Nebo and Medeba is to be construed locally, for before and after there is only the description how each place gives expression to its grief. Moreover Nebo and Medeba are elevated spots. Of Nebo this is in itself probable. For if it even does not mean the mountain, it does the city that was situated on top of, or on that mountain: as in Num. xxxii. 3, 38; Jer. xlviii. 1, and in the inscription of Mesa line 14. That Medeba was situated on a hill is testified by the site of ruins which BURKHARDT (ii. 625) found a little distance southeast of Heshbon. Medeba is also mentioned in the inscription of Mesa, line 8, under the name מה דבא, Mo-Debah, as a city conquered by Omri.

Ver. 3. Wearing sacks or sackcloth as a badge of mourning and distress is often mentioned by Isa. iii. 24; xx. 2; xxii. 12; xxxvii. 1 sq.; l. 3; lviii. 5. It has been overlooked that ירד בבכי, descending with weeping [see in Text. and Gram.] should form an antithesis to עלה לבכי, "goeth up to weep," ver. 2. They went up on the high places at Dibon and Beth-Bamoth to weep; they howled on the high places of Nebo and Medebah; but they came down also from these high places with weeping; they weep because imploring the gods with tears availed nothing. [See Margin of Eng. Bib.: Also J. A. A., has the same rendering as DR. N.]. This construction is the more necessary because immediately after, ver. 5, "בִּבְכִי," is undoubtedly used in the sense: "with weeping."

Ver. 4. And Heshbon, etc. Ar-Moab and Kir-Moab are chief city, and chief fortress; Dibon and Beth-Bamoth are especially holy places of worship, Nebo and Medebah, too, belong to the latter, for there also the weeping was meant to propitiate the gods. Now that the centres of the power and of the national religion are shaken to pieces, and men flee from these in despair, so, naturally, dreadful terror seizes on the cities of inferior rank. Thus Heshbon (Num. xxi. 23 sqq.), cries, and Elealeh (Num. xxxii. 37; Jer. xlviii. 34), the two sister cities, the second of which is never mentioned without the first. They lay only a Roman mile distant from one another on limestone elevations in a fruitful plain. Their united cry of woe is heard as far as Jahaz. This fact is not opposed to the assumption that Jahaz is identical with יָהְצָה (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Jud. xi. 2 in pausa), יַהְצָה (Josh. xiii. 18 out of pause), (HITZIG, KEIL). For Jahaz need not on this account, like Elealeh, have lain in the closest neighborhood. But the ancient rampart that lay on the east border toward the desert, where of old Sihon, king of the Amorites, opposed Israel, is named for this reason because the Prophet would indicate that the terrific intelligence shook the very bulwarks of the kingdom. If now all the strong cities of Moab so raise the cry of despair, how shall the men at arms of the nation not chime in? The choice of the expression חלצי מ׳, "armed men of Moab," seems to me to be explained by the idea that the information concerning the occupation of the land east of Jordan (Num. xxxii. and Deut. iii. 16 sqq.), comes before the Prophet. For in these chapters just cited, the expression חלוץ occurs relatively the oftenest in the entire Old Testament, i. e., six times: Num. xxxii. 21, 27, 29, 30, 32; Deut. iii. 18.

4. My heart——no green thing.—Vers. 4–6. The Prophet hitherto had in mind northern Moab, the territory that the Amorites took from the Moabites, then the Israelites from the Moabites, and finally the Moabites from the Israelites, after the inhabitants had been carried into Assyrian captivity (2 Kings xv. 29). Almost all the cities that have been named in the foregoing passages were, according to Num. xxxii. 34 sqq., built by the Gadites and Reubenites, or at least rebuilt with a change of name (ver. 38). In what follows the Prophet turns his regards chiefly to the south. But in making this turn, he feels the need of giving expression to the impression made. The cry he has heard, though that of an enemy, has found in his heart an echo of compassion. Therefore he cries out from his innermost bosom (לִבִּי) and turning himself toward Moab (xvi. 11; xiv. 8, 9). Thus "shall cry" of ver. 5, corresponds to "shall cry" ver. 4. But his cry of terror is at the same time a watchman's alarm to southern Moab. We see this in the anxious flight in which southern Moab is represented to be by the following context. בריחה is taken by most expositors to be the same as בָּרִיחֶהָ "fugitives" (xliii. 14, comp. xxvii. 1; Job xxvi. 13). DELITZSCH alone decides in favor of vectes, bars. But the thought that the bars, i. e., the fortresses of the land extend to Zoar finds nothing in the context to suggest it: whereas the thought that the Moabites flee from the enemy advancing from the north till they find shelter in a strong fortress, corresponds very well with the context.

A heifer of three years, (see in Text. and Gram.), is one not yet brought under the yoke, whose strength is still entirely intact. GESENIUS cites PLINY, viii. 4, 5: domitura bonum in trimatu, postea sera, antea praematura. Columella de re rest. vii. 2. It is therefore "a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke." עֵגֶל לֹא לֻמָּד Jer. xxxi. 18, the contrary of which is עֶגְלָה מְלֻמָּדָה "a heifer that is taught" Hos. x. 11. Comp. Isa. x. 11; Jer. xlvi. 20; l. 11. Now Zoar was a fortified place. JEROME says: "praesidium in ea positum est militum romanorum." EUSEBIUS calls it a φρούριον στρατιωτῶν, STEPH. BYZANTINUS a κώμη μεγάλη ἢ φρούριον. It was perhaps, in Isaiah's time a city that had never been captured, what we call eine jungfräuliche Festung (a virgin fortress), and if in שלישיה the notion of indomitum, jugo non assuetum esse prevails, then this would explain why Zoar is so named, and why the flight of the Moabites tends thither. They thought themselves secure in the strong fortress that had never been taken. [For an extensive comparison of views on the foregoing point see J. A. A., in loc.]. That Zoar is the point to which men flee is evident because the ways leading thither are full of fugitives. Regarding the site of Zoar opinions differ, varying between the southern point of the Dead sea to the mouthing of the Wadi Kerek on the east side. But wherever it was, Luhith and Horonaim were certainly localities that lay in the road that led from the north thither. Luhith (from לוּחַ "tablet, board,") which according to EUSEBIUS and JEROME, lay between Ar-Moab and Zoar, is mentioned only here, and Jer. xlviii. 5. מַעֲלֵה, "a stair, declivity of a mountain which the road traverses," is found in connection with many names: Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. x. 10; xviii. 7; Judg. i. 36; 2 Sam. xv. 30, etc.——Horonaim is mentioned only here and Jer. xlviii. 3, 5, 34. In Josh. x. 10, we read "the LORD—chased them along the way that goeth up to Bethhoron." Did this passage perhaps come into the Prophet's mind? A third matter that explains the flight of the Moabites, the Prophet makes to be the stopping up and drying up of the waters of Nimri. It is to be noticed that stopping up the fountains is described (2 Kings iii. 19, 25) as a form of hostility practised by the Israelites against Moab. If by "the waters of Nimrim" we understand that Bet-Nimra, that is mentioned (Num. xxxii. 3, 36; Josh. xiii. 27) as a Gadite locality with a brook emptying into the Jordan, then the Prophet would suddenly transport us out of the south into the extremest north.

Therefore KNOBEL very fittingly has called attention to the fact that the more recent travelers, BURKHARDT, DE SAULCY, SEETZEN, mention a Wadi Nemeyra, and a spring brook Mojet Nimmery (i. e. little waters of Nimri) near the southern border of Moab, and that the ONOMASTICON names under Νεβηρίμ a place Βηνναμαρήμ, Benamerium, north of Zoar. This locality suits our context very well. In three short sentences the Prophet sets forth why he calls the waters of Nimrim desolations. חָצִיר is grass proper; דֶּשֶׁא sward in general; יֶרֶק all green things. The discourse thus contains a climax, it proceeds from what withers most easily (Ps. xc. 5; ciii. 15) to the totality of all vegetation.

5. Therefore —— of the land.—Vers. 7–9. The fugitives of Moab have concentrated in the south of the land. But there, too, they do not feel safe: for the enemy presses incontinently after. Therefore they flee with their valuables across the Willow-brook that formed the boundary between Moab and Edom into the latter country. יִתְרָה, which occurs only here and in Jer. xlviii. 36 that borrows from this, is "provision on hand not yet used up" (Ps. xvii. 14). פְּקֻדָּה is more: it is the costly possession that is cherished as the treasure of the house: the word occurs only here in this sense. The thought of the Prophet is evidently, that Moab, when no longer safe in its extreme southern strongholds, flees across the border. It is therefore certainly more agreeable to the context to understand the stream referred to by נחל הערבים to mean the southernmost boundary brook of Moab, rather than some stream farther north. DELITZSCH understands the Willow-brook to be the northern branch of the Seil-el-Kerek, that actually bears the name of Wadi Safsâf, i. e. Willow-brook. But that does not hinder that in Isaiah's time the southern boundary brook was also called Willow-brook, especially since among its various names (Wâdi el-Karâhi, el-Achri, el-Hössa, el-Hossan, likely Sared too), is found the name es-Sâfijeh. (See under Text. and Gram.).

In ver. 8 the need of fleeing over the border is renewedly set forth by the statement that the cry (ver. 4 sqq.) has gone about on the entire border of Moab. Eglaim is likely identical with the En-eglaim, Eze. xlvii. 10, which according to JEROME, lay "in principio maris mortui," i. e. at the south end of the Dead Sea. It is doubtful if it be the same with 'Αγαλλείμ (Αἰγαλείμ) which EUSEBIUS describes as πρὸς Νότον 'Αρεοπόλεως διαστῶσα σημείοις η', i. e. eight Roman miles, somewhat more than three hours. Comp. HERZ. R. Encycl. XIV., p. 741.—If Beerelim is the same fountain mentioned, Num. xxi. 16–18, that the princes opened up, and that thereafter was called Heroes' fountain (for so, or Terebinth fountain the word may be translated), then the locality lay in the northeast of Moab, and thus directly opposite to the southwestern Eglaim (comp. Num. xxi. 13 sqq.). Accordingly the cry is gone around, etc., would express that the cry went out on all sides along the borders of Moab, because the inhabitants fled on all sides. If they dispersed on every side to the periphery of their land, that sufficiently indicates that the centre had suffered a heavy blow. Such a centre was Dibon, moreover, it is represented as a city in ver. 2 and in the inscription of Mesa, as being at that time a city of importance. The waters of Dibon are full of blood, therefore there is fearful, murderous work there.—As Dibon lies not far from Arnon, "the waters of Dibon" can, of course, indirectly mean the Arnon, like "the waters of Megiddo," Judg. v. 19, mean the Kishon (ROSENMUELLER, HENDEWERK), but directly must still be meant the tributaries that lead out from Dibon to Arnon; for otherwise the latter could not receive blood shed in Dibon. The fearful blood-bath at Dibon shows that it is fated to receive full measure, poured, shaken down and running over. Perhaps the Prophet has in mind God's threat in Lev. xxvi. 18, 21, that if the first chastisement failed of its effect on Israel He would add to it "seven times more for their sins." Moab's great and repeated transgression had also such additions as its consequence. If we are not referred by the second clause of ver. 9 a to what follows, then we are not necessitated to regard what is contained in 9 b, as the aggravation indicated by נוספות= additamenta, "things superadded" (See Text. and Gram.). Then ver. 9 b has reference to a part of Moab not coincident with that before mentioned. It is fugitives that succeeded in escaping the sword of the enemy. Shall these be rescued? No. These escaped ones shall become a prey to lions, and as many as escape these shall at last have nothing more than the bare ground, whereon to leave their unburied bodies. The thought is therefore similar to xxiv. 18, comp. Amos v. 19. And how should the remnant of the nation be called שארית אדמה? The expression is unexampled. We would look for שְׁאֵרִית הָעָם, or at least הָאָרֶץ.

β) THE CONDITIONS OF DELIVERANCE.

CHAPTER XVI. 1–5.

1 SEND ye [a]the lamb to the ruler of the land
From[1] [2]Sela to the wilderness,
Unto the mount of the daughter of Zion.
2 For it shall be, that, as a wandering bird
[2]Cast out of the nest,
So the daughters of Moab shall be
At [b]the fords of Arnon.

3 [4]Take counsel, execute judgment;
Make thy shadow as the night in the midst of the noon day;
Hide the outcasts;
Bewray not him that wandereth.
4 Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab;
Be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler;
For the [5]extortioner is at an end,
[c]The spoiler ceaseth,
[6]The oppressors are consumed out of the land.
5 And in mercy shall [b]the throne be [7]established:
And [d]he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David,
Judging, and seeking judgment, and [e]hasting righteousness.

[1] Or, Petra. [2] Heb. a rock. [3] Or, a nest forsaken. [4] Heb. Bring.
[5] Heb. wringer. [6] Heb. the treaders down. [7] Or, prepared.

[a] tribute lamb. [b] omit the. [c] Oppression. [d] one sits. [e] prompt in equity.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. כַּר is "the fat lamb." It never occurs in the stat. absol. sing.; it is found only here in the stat. constr. sing.; and occurs again in Isaiah in the plural only xxxiv. 6. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 14.——The expression הַר בַּת צ׳ occurs again only x. 32 K'ri.

Ver. 2. On עוֹף־נוֹדֵד comp. x. 14; Prov. xxvii. 8.——מְשֻׁלָּח comp. xxvii. 10.——מַעְבְּרוֹת, wherever the word occurs (Josh. ii. 7; 1 Sam. xiv. 4; Judg. iii. 28; xii. 5 sq.; Jer. li. 32) are "the fords." The word stands here as the accus. localis. Moreover, according to rule the expression means "fords of the Arnon," not, the "fords of the Arnon."

Vers. 3 and 4 a. The expression הביאו עצה occurs only here. It reminds one of הָבוּ עֵצָה 2 Sam. xvi. 20. The alteration of הביאו and עשׂו to הביאי and עשׂי which the K'ri offers for the sake of conformity with the following verbal forms, is unnecessary. פְּלִילָה, judicium, occurs only here: פְּלִילִיָּה xxviii. 7.——נִדָּחִים (xxvii. 13), נוֹדֵד (x. 14; xxi. 14), גּוּר (xi. 6; xxiii. 7; xxxiii. 14), שׁוֹדֵד (xxi. 2; xxxiii. 1), סֵתֶר (xxviii. 17; xxxii. 2) are Isaianic expressions.——מוֹאָב, ver. 4 a, ought, according to the accents, to be connected with what follows. And nothing stands in the way of this. DELITZSCH, who construes ver. 3 sq. as the language of Moab to Israel must take מואב ver. 4 as casus absolutus, which is harsh. The form הֱוִי (comp. הֱיִי Gen. xxiv. 60) occurs only here. It, too, is perhaps Moabitic. But the inscription of Mesa offers no analogy for it.——מֵּץ "the presser" (from מוּץ like מֵת, לֵץ, זֵד; comp. מִיץ Prov. xxx. 33, "the pressing out") is ἅπ. λεγ. אָפֵס is an Isaianic word, as the entire thought is also Isaianic; comp. xxix. 20.——שֹׁד comp. on xiii. 6.——רֹמֵס only here; but other forms of the verb are frequent in Isa.: i. 12; xxvi. 6; xxviii. 3; xli. 25; lxiii. 3.

Ver. 5. הֻכַן "to make firm," stabilire, 1 Sam. xiii. 13; 2 Sam. v. 12; Isa. xxx. 33.——חֶסֶד is not "grace," which is not the opposite of מֵּץ, שֹׁד and מִרְמָס (x. 6) but "gentleness," clementia. Comp. מַלְכֵי חֶסֶד 1 Kings xx. 31, and Prov. xx. 28.——אֹהֶל דּוִד, comp. סֻכַּת דויד Amos ix. 11, and as contrast אֹהֶל יוֹסֵף Ps. lxxviii. 67.—It is an expression of modesty, comp. the contrast between בַּיִת and אֹהֶל 2 Sam. vii. 6.——The expression דרשׁ משׁפט is wholly Isaianic. It occurs only i. 17 and here. מהיר צדק (comp. Ps. xlv. 2; Prov. xxii. 29) occurs only here.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. These words connect closely with what precedes, in that they assume that the fugitives of Moab that fled over the border (xv. 7) have arrived in Sela, the chief city of Edom ("from Sela," ver. 1). The chief thought is that Moab is counselled to seek help and protection from Judah (vers. 1, 2), and therefore eventually itself to afford protection and help to Judah (vers. 3, 4 a). When then the time comes wherein all unrighteousness on earth shall have an end (ver. 4 b), and the righteous ruler shall sit on the throne of David (ver. 5), then—this is the necessary consequence—Moab, too, shall share this salvation.

2. Send ye——Arnon.—Vers. 1, 2. No one but the Prophet can speak these words, as well as all that follows, because he only was able to give the prophecy contained in vers. 4 b, 5. In the summons to send lambs to Jerusalem there is evidently an allusion to the fact that the Moabite king Mesa, according to 2 Kings iii. 4, was obliged to send the wool of 100,000 lambs (כָּרִים) and of 100,000 rams (אֵילִים) as tribute to the king of Israel. "The lambs of the ruler" is evidently the tribute of lambs that belongs to the ruler of the land. But the king of Judah is called מושל ארץ "ruler of the land," in distinction from the מלך מואב, "the king of Moab," who was tributary to the former. They are to send the tribute to Jerusalem from Sela, the capital city of Edom (called Petra by the Romans; its ruins were discovered by BURKHARDT in Wadi Musa, comp. xlii. 11). We account for this by representing to ourselves that according to xv. 7 the Moabites have arrived in Sela as fugitives. Unto the wilderness—which is more exactly defined by "unto the mount of the daughter of Zion"—corresponds exactly to the description that STRABO gives of the region of Petra. He says: χώρα ἐρημος ἡ πλείστη καὶ μάλιστα ἡ πρὸς Ἰουδαίαν (KNO-BEL). On the subject matter comp. xviii. 7. But the fugitives are not in Sela only. According to xv. 8, they dispersed on every side. Therefore fleeing crowds appear also at Arnon, the northern border river of Moab. These are called "daughters of Moab." Does not the feminine stamp the timid fugitives as those that have turned into women and lost all masculine courage? Comp. e. g. iii. 1.

3. Take counsel——the spoiler.—Vers. 3, 4 a. These are not the words of the Moabites, but of the Prophet, who directs this petition to the Moabites in the name of his people. They are not only to put themselves in subjection to Judah, and purchase protection for themselves by tribute, but they are also on their part to afford protection. By the likeness of their contents, vers. 3, 4 a belong together. The Prophet hereby assumes that there shall come upon Judah also such a visitation as xv., xvi. he proclaims to Moab. This was fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar, and in Jer. xl. 11 Moab is expressly named among the lands into which scattered Judah (נִדָּחַי, Jer. xl. 12) had fled. —The Prophet cannot mean that the Moabites shall bring about justice between the Israelites and their oppressors, for they lack power and force to do this. But they are to do what is right in that they receive to their protection those oppressed and driven out. This demand for protecting shelter is expressed by means of an admirable figure of speech. Moab shall make its shadow at clear midday dark as at midnight, so that he who is concealed in this shadow shall be hid as completely as if the darkness of night enclosed him.

4. For the extortioner——righteousness. —Vers. 4 b, 5. The Prophet now gives the reasons why Moab should seek shelter from Judah and likewise afford shelter to the fugitives of Judea. This reason is one eminently prophetic. That is to say, Isaiah sees in spirit the end of the world-power, therefore the cessation of all violent oppression and the dominion of the kingdom of God under a great one of the line of David. Would Moab share in this glory of the people of God, then it must now display such conduct as the Prophet imputes to it, vers. 1–4 a. This is the same thought, the correlative of which is expressed lx. 12 (comp. Zech. xiv. 16 sqq.) in the words: "For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish."—הָאָרֶץ, "the land," according to the context, signifies the whole earth. For the world-power that is characterized in the preceding words dominates not a single land, but the whole earth. In contrast with the violent, unjust world-power another throne shall be set up by mildness (חֶסֶד, see Text. and Gram.). On this throne, which stands in the tabernacle of David (an expression of modesty, see Text. and Gram.), shall one sit in truth, i. e., one who is truthful and reliable, and he will do nothing arbitrarily; but he will keep to the forms of law (שֹׁפֵט). But not only this—he will also interest himself to find out the (substantial) right (דֹּרֵשׁ מִשְׁפָּט)—and when he has found it, he will promptly execute it (מְהִיר צֶדֶק). That the Prophet has in mind here the great Son of David, whose friendliness and righteousness he had already celebrated, ix. 5 sq.; xi. 1 sq., cannot be doubted. Where ceasing from violence and injustice and a kingdom of righteousness and of loving mildness are spoken of, the Messianic kingdom is meant.

γ) MOAB'S PRIDE AND RUIN.

Chapter XVI. 6–12.

6 We have heard of the pride of Moab; [a]he is very proud:
[b]Even of his haughtiness, and his pride, and his wrath;
[c]But his lies shall not be so.
7 Therefore shall Moab howl [d]for Moab,
Every one shall howl;
For the [e]foundations of Kir-hareseth shall ye [1][f]mourn;
[g]Surely they are stricken.
8 For the fields of Heshbon [h]languish,
And the vine of Sibmah: [i]the lords of the heathen have broken down the [j]principal plants thereof,
They [k]are come even unto Jazer, they wandered [l]through the wilderness:
Her branches are [2]stretched out, they are gone over the sea.
9 Therefore I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer the vine of Sibmah:
I will [m]water thee with my tears, O, Heshbon, and Elealeh:
For [3]the [n]shouting for thy summer fruits and for thy harvest is fallen.
10 And gladness is taken away, and joy out of the plentiful field;
And in the vineyards there shall be no singing, neither shall there be shouting:
The treaders [o]shall tread out no wine in their presses;
I have made their vintage shouting to cease.
11 Wherefore my bowels shall sound like an harp for Moab,
And mine inward parts for Kir-haresh.

12 And it shall come to pass, when [p]it is seen
That Moab is weary on the high place,
That he shall come to his sanctuary to pray;
[q]But he shall not prevail.

[1] Or, mutter. [2] Or, plucked up. [3] Or, the alarm is fallen upon, etc.

[a] as very proud. [b] omit even of. [c] the vanity of his pretension. [d] to.
[e] grape cakes. [f] sigh. [g] wholly stricken. [h] are withered.
[m] vintage shout is fallen on, etc. [o] shall not tread wine. [p] when Moab appears, when it afflicts itself on, etc., when it comes to, etc.
[n] moisten. [q] so he shall not.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 6. The plural שמענו intimates that this haughtiness of Moab is generally known.——גֵּא, contracted from גֵּאֶה (ii. 12) occurs only here; (comp. Ew. § 155 e). Regarding the construction, it belongs to גאון and not to מואב, for the Prophet had not experienced that the very proud Moab is proud, but that the pride of Moab is very intense, or that his pride mounts up very high.——גָּאוֹן (comp. ii. 10; iv. 2; xiii. 11, 19; and often) and גַּאֲוָה (ix. 8; xiii. 3, 11; xxv. 11) are Isaianic words. עֶבְרָה is "excess," and in this sense is more frequently used of wrath, but is used also of overweening pride (comp. עֶבְרַת זָדוֹן Prov. xxi. 24). In Isaiah the word occurs in the latter sense only here; in the former he uses it often: ix. 18; x. 6; xiii. 9, 13; xiv. 6.——In the expression לֹא־כֵן = "the not right, incorrect, wrong," the two elements are fused into a unity of notion (comp. לֹא־עֵץ x. 15). It is used adverbially (2 Sam. xviii. 14) as well as substantively (2 Kings vii. 9; xvii. 9; Prov. xv. 7; Jer. viii. 6; xxiii. 10; xlviii. 30, bis).——בַּדִּים from בָּדָא = בָּדַד (comp. בָּטָא and בָּטָה "inconsiderate speaking," Lev. v. 4; Num. xxx. 7, 9) "to invent, think out" = commenticia, ficticia, "conceited, vain babbling" (Job xi. 3; Jer. xlviii. 30); personally "a braggart, fop" (xliv. 25; Jer. l. 36).

Ver. 7. אֲשִׁישָׁה, "cakes," 2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Chron. xvi. 3; plural אֲשִׁישׁוֹת Song of Sol. ii. 5, and אֲשִׁישִׁים Hos. iii. 1, where it speaks of אֲשִׁישֵׁי עֲנָבִים.——אַךְ־נְכָאִים is in apposition with the subject of תֶּהְגּוּ.——אַךְ = "only;" "who is only troubled, nothing but troubled."——נְכָא is ἅπ. λεγ.; comp. נָכֶה lxvi. 2 and נָכָא Prov. xv. 13.

Ver. 8. שְׁדֵמָה xxxvii. 27, plural שְׁדֵמוֹת Hab. iii. 17, st. constr., שַׁדְמוֹת Deut. xxxii. 32; 2 Kings xxiii. 4.——Isaiah uses not unfrequently forms of אֻמְלַל, xix. 8; xxiv. 4, 7; xxxiii. 9.——הָלַם is tundere, percutere, "to smite." It occurs again xxviii. 1, where, to be sure, it speaks of הֲלוּמֵי יָיִן.——The plural of שֹׂרֵק, meaning the same as שֹׂרֵק, v. 2, occurs only here.——נָטַשׁ Niph. xxxiii. 23, "spread themselves."——שְׁלֻחוֹת ἅπ. λεγ., "the sprouts" of the vine.

Ver. 9. אֲרַיָּוֶךְ Piel of רָוָה, with the second and third radicals transposed, xxxiv. 5, 7.——הֵידָד is the shout with which the torcularii cheered their labor, and probably beat time, ver. 10; Jer. xxv. 30; li. 14; הֵידָד לֹא הֵידָד Jer. xlviii. 33.——It is certain that the Prophet for the sake of similarity in sound wrote קְצִירֵךְ instead of בְּצִירֵךְ, the latter means the grape harvest. But קָצִיר must not be taken as = בָּצִיר. For why should not the grain harvest also have suffered under the trampling feet of the warrior wine treaders?

Ver. 10. שִׂמְחָה וָגִיל from Joel i. 16.——כַּרְמֶל a very frequent word with Isaiah, x. 18; xxix. 17; xxxii. 15 sq.; xxxv. 2; xxxvii. 24. Here, too, כרמל and כרמים are distinguished, a proof that we may take קָצִיר in its proper sense.—רנן and רעע are also associated on account of the similarity of sound. The former occurs, beside passages like xxiv. 14; xxvi. 19; xxxv. 2; xlii. 11, etc., also in xii. 6; the latter xv. 4. Neither occurs again in the Passive conjugation used here.

Ver. 11. Mark the assonance in קִרְבִּי and קִיר חָרֶשׂ. Likely it is purely out of regard for such assonance that the name of this single city is here repeated. This passage generally, especially from ver. 6 on, is extraordinarily rich in such assonances.

Ver. 12. On הבמה comp. on הַבַּיִת xv. 2, and מַעֲלֶה בָּמָה Jer. xlviii. 35.——נִלְאָה i. 14; xlvii. 13.——הִתְפַּלֵּל occurs not seldom in Isaiah: xxxvii. 15, 21; xxxviii. 2; xliv. 17; xlv. 14, 20.——יָכֹל without expressed object, with the meaning "to put through, accomplish," occurs only here in Isaiah. Of another sort are the instances i. 13; vii. 1; xxix. 11, and often. On the contrary this usage is frequent in Jer.: iii. 5; v. 22; xx. 7. Comp. 1 Kings xxii. 22.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. By the words vers. 1–5 the Prophet had indicated to Moab the way by which it might escape destruction. Unhappily he must verify that Moab has no mind to follow this way of deliverance. It is much too proud for that: its old haughtiness is exhibited in a ruinous manner (ver. 6). Therefore the judgments run their course: lamentation fills the whole land. But three localities become especially prominent in the general chorus of those that lament, which hitherto had been just the places of most joyous pleasure: Kir-hareseth with its grape confections (ver. 7), Heshbon with its fruitful meadows, Sibma with its vine culture (ver. 8). The misery is so great that the Prophet, as feeling the contagion, must not only outwardly join in the lament of the places named (vers. 9, 10), but also feels himself moved in his inmost by the universal distress (ver. 11). And though now Moab turns to his idols with fervent entreaty, yet, of course, that is of no avail (ver. 12).

2. We have heard——not be so.—Ver. 6.

What the Prophet urged vers. 1-5, is made nugatory by the pride of Moab. Jer. xlviii. 11 compares Moab to wine not drawn off from vessel to vessel, but ever settled on its lees. That means: Moab has always remained in his land: never gone into exile. Thereby has been developed in him a strong sense of strength and security (comp. xxv. 11; Jer. xlviii. 14, 17, 18, 25, 26, 29; Zeph. ii. 8, 10).

3. Therefore——the sea.—Vers. 7, 8. The Prophet now describes the consequences of this haughtiness. Moab must then howl for it. Moab howls to Moab, i. e. as the Prophet (xv. 3, "all of it shall howl,") himself declares every thing howls, and thus the cry of lament from one locality meets that of the next. For not for its neighbor does each locality lament, but for itself; but this howling is heard from one place to the other. ["It is better to adhere to the common interpretation of למואב as denoting the subject or occasion of the lamentation:—the simplest supposition is that Moab for Moab means Moab for itself.—J. A. A.].

In what follows, several localities present themselves to the view of the Prophet elevated above the general level of universal lament, and these are such localities that hitherto had produced the most precious gifts of field or vineyard, and thus had been the places of most joyous pleasures. Kir-hareseth, (comp. ver. 11, Jer. xlviii. 11, 31, 36; 2 Kings iii. 25), since VITRINGA, has been recognized as identical with Kir-Moab xvi. 1, and perhaps so named on account of its brick walls. It sighs for its grape cakes; and as a further reason for the mourning it is said that the meadows of Heshbon (xv. 4) are withered and dry. The Essebonitis (JOSEPHUS Antiq. xii. 4, 11) was very fruitful. Thence came the celebrated grain of Minnith, Ezek. xxvii. 17. "The traveller LEGH brought so-called Heshbon wheat to England with stalks 5′ 1″ long and having 84 grains in the ear, which weighed four times as much as an English ear of wheat (LEYRER in HERZ. R. Encycl. VI., p. 21).—Sibmah (Num. xxxii. 3 שְׂבָם, comp. ver. 38; Josh. xiii. 19) according to JEROME on Jer. xlviii. 32, say only 500 paces from Heshbon. The vines of Sibmah are cut down by the lords of the nations, i. e. the leaders of the heathen host. If these words were understood to mean that the vines by the power of their wine overcame the lords of the nations, then nothing would be said of the calamity that overtook the vines themselves. [Of the exposition here objected to, J. A. A. says: "This ingenious exposition (scil. of COCCEIUS) is adopted by VITRINGA, LOWTH, HITZIG, MAURER, HENDEWERK, DE WETTE, KNOBEL, on the ground of its agreement with the subsequent praises of the vine of Sibmah. GESENIUS objects that there is then no mention of the wasting of the vineyards by the enemy unless this can be supposed to be included in אמלל "languish." Besides GESENIUS, ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, UMBREIT, and most of the older writers make שרוקיה the object of the verb הלמו instead of its subject." See Text. and Gram.]. In order to make a due impression of the damage done by cutting down the vines of Sibmah, the Prophet presents a picture of the extent of their culture. It reached to Jazer northward, and eastward to the desert they wandered, i. e. the vines extended in wild growth. Jazer (Num. xxxii. 1, 3, 35; Josh. xiii. 25, and often) now a cluster of ruins of Siev, according to the ONOMASTICON, lay 15 Roman miles north of Heshbon. The vigorous growth of the vine is, even in our colder climate, something extraordinary. It is quite possible that in that warm and fruitful land the vine, by root-sprouts, spread itself, extending beyond the limits of cultivation, till it was stopped by the sand of the desert. But to the sea also it spread. What sea is this? Jer. (xlviii. 32) understands thereby "the sea of Jazer." That can be nothing but a pool or basin (comp. "the sea," in the temple, 1 Kings vii. 23 sqq.). But our context demands that we look rather for a sea lying to the south or west; for the extension of the vines northward and eastward has already been mentioned. If it is to be described as an extension on every side, there is only wanting the southern and western direction, or, as combining both, the south-western. Southwest of Sibmah lay the Dead Sea. This the Prophet means (comp. 2 Chr. xx. 2). But I would not, with DELITZSCH, take עָבְרוּ, "they passed over," as a hyperbolical expression for "extended close to it." We may without ado understand the expression in its full and proper sense. Did not Engedi, celebrated for its vine culture (Song of Solomon i. 14), lie on the west shore of the Dead Sea in a corner, splendidly watered by a spring? And there, only a few hours further westward, lay Hebron, also renowned for its wine (Num. xiii. 24, HERZ. R. Encycl. XVII., p. 611). It is only a bold poetic view when the Prophet treats the vines that grow on the western shore of the Dead Sea as runners from those that grow so gloriously on the east shore in Moab.

4. Therefore I will——shouting to cease.—Vers. 9, 10. The Prophet cannot restrain himself from joining in the heart-rending lament that he hears proceeding from Moab. One may know by that how fearful it must be. For if even the enemy feels compassion the misery must have reached the acme. ["The emphasis does not lie merely in the Prophet's feeling for a foreign nation, but in his feeling for a guilty race, on whom he was inspired to denounce the wrath of God."—J. A. A.]. בִּבְכִי is not = כִּבְכִי; and therefore the Prophet does not say that he weeps "as bitterly as Jazer," but that among the voices of the people of Jazer, his too is to be heard. He mingles with those who are most troubled about the ruin of the vines of Sibmah because they are most particularly affected by it. For neither the desert, whither the vines "wander," nor the region west of the Dead Sea can be so concerned about the destruction of the grape culture in the central point Sibmah, as the neighboring Jazer. The Prophet will moisten with his tears the fields of Heshbon and Elealeh (xv. 4). These withered fields (ver. 8) may well stand in need of such moistening, for on the fruit and grain harvests there has fallen the shout (see Text. and Gram.) of the harvesters or rather of the wine-treaders, an expression that can only be chosen in bitter irony. For it is the devastating feet of the enemy that have so trampled the fruitful meadows and pressed the sap out of every living plant, so that they now lie there withered. In consequence of this wine treading, joy and jubilee are (thus and together) wrested away from the cultivated fields.

5. Wherefore——not prevail.—Vers. 11, 12. The "therefore" of ver. 11, stands parallel with the "therefore" of ver. 9. Moab's misery described vers. 7, 8, has a double effect on the Prophet: first it constrains him to outward expression of sympathy, to weep along with them: he feels, so to speak, the contagion of the universal weeping: second, he feels himself really moved inwardly. He feels this emotion in his bowels, for the motions of the affection find their echo in the noble organs of the body. The expression הָמָה "to sound," is often used of the bowels; indeed in relation to God Himself: lxiii. 15; Jer. xxxi. 20; comp. Lam. i. 20; ii. 11; Jer. iv. 19. But the greatest misfortune of all in the whole affair is that Moab does not know the true source of all consolation. Would it only know that, then would its sorrow and the sorrow on account of Moab not be so great. But Moab appears on the high place consecrated to his god Chemosh, and torments himself to weariness. Examples of such self-tormenting, and sore sacrifices for the sake of obtaining what is prayed for, are presented by every sort of false religion, comp. 1 Kings xviii. 28, and by Moabite history itself in the offering of his own son by Mesa (Mesha) 2 Kings iii. 27.—But all that shall be of nc avail.

Chapter XVI. 13, 14.

13 This is the word that the Lord hath spoken concerning Moab [a]since that time.
14 [b]But now the Lord hath spoken, saying,
Within three years, as the years of an hireling,
And the glory of Moab shall be contemned,
With all that great multitude;
And the remnant shall be very small and [1]feeble.

[1] Or, not many.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 14. בְּ before כל המון הרב is construed by some as designative of the part in which Moab suffers diminution, by others as the בְּ of association. The former construction does not answer because it restricts the diminution of Moab to a falling off of the dense population solely. Therefore I prefer with Delitzsch the second explanation according to which it is affirmed that Moab's glory, i. e., power and riches tog·ther with the crowded population shall be destroyed.——הָמוֹן, comp. xiii. 4; xvii. 12; xxix. 5, and often.——מְעַט מִזְעָר stand together as in x. 25. The expression כַּבִּיר occurs only in Job and Isaiah, comp. x. 13; xvii. 12; xxviii. 2. It seems as if in this place the Prophet has in mind Jcb xxxvi. 5, where it reads: הֶן־אֵל כַּבִּיר וְלֹא יִמְאָס.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1. Isaiah felt himself moved to repeat a prophecy against Moab, which was imparted to him at an earlier period, and to fix accurately the term of its fulfilment. For in precisely three years it will be all over with the glory of Moab, and only an inferior remnant of it will be left.

2. This is the word——feeble.—Vers. 13, 14. There are instances elsewhere of a Prophet, receiving command not to publish a prophecy at once, but to treasure it up with a view to later publication (comp. viii. 1 sqq., xxx. 8; li. 60 sqq.) Here we have the reverse of this procedure. Isa., receives command now to publish a revelation that was imparted to him at an earlier date, with more particular designation of the term of its fulfilment that was before left undetermined. If the prophecy was not imparted to him but to another, why should he not name this other? Would Isaiah deck himself in the plumage of another? No one needed this less than he. Nor was it unnecessary to mention the name. For a nameless prophecy lacks all authority. At most it could be said Isaiah recognized the word as genuine word of prophecy, and published it under the seal of his name and authority, like ii. 2–4, he takes a prophecy of Micah for a foundation. But against this is the fact that this passage bears on the face of it too undeniably the stamp of the spirit, and language of Isaiah. Therefore, מֵאָז, "aforetime," must only mean that some time before he had received this revelation. By מֵאָז is not indicated a definite measure of time. It is also elsewhere found opposed to the עַתָּה, "now:" xlviii. 7.——Why the Prophet chose just that season for publishing designated by "now," and what season this might be, we have not the means of knowing. In no case was the prophecy fulfilled in one act. Here too, as so often, the fulfilment is dispersed through many stages, which the Prophet himself does not distinguish. The end of the three years needed only to coincide with a fact which bore with it in principle the fall of Moab, to assure the relative fulfilment of the prophecy, for to the absolute fulfilment belongs of course the entire time following. It is quite possible that the Prophet received the prompting to the first prophecy against Moab (xv. 1–xvi. 12) from the event of the Moabites occupying the east Jordan territory of Gad and Reuben which was depopulated by Pul and Tiglath-Pileser (1 Chr. v. 6, 26; 2 Kings xv. 29), although in our chapters there occurs no express reference to such an act of enmity against Israel (comp. VAIHINGER in HERZ. R. Encycl. IX. p. 662). Isaiah published this prophecy later when the first act of the judgment was in prospect, that was to make a definitive end of the state of Moab. But we are not able to say wherein this first act consisted. Yet that it was only a first act, appears from the fact that more than a hundred years later, Jeremiah once again prophesied the judgment of destruction against Moab (Jer. xlviii.).——In three years, that should be reckoned like the years of an hireling, i. e., close, without abbreviation to his advantage, and without extension to his hurt (the expression occurs again xxi. 16), in three years, therefore, Moab's glory was to be made insignificant (iii. 5).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xv. 1. "Although the Prophets belonged to the Jewish people, and were sent especially for the sake of the Jewish people, yet as God would that all men should come to repentance and the knowledge of the truth, therefore at times also the Prophets were called on to go out of these limits, and preach to other nations for a sign against them, that they might have nothing whereby to excuse themselves."—CRAMER.

2. On xv. 2 sqq. "Against the wrath of God, neither much money and land, nor a well equipped nation, nor great and strong cities, nor flight from one place to another avail anything, but true repentance (Ps. xxxiii. 16 sq.). Whoever forsakes God in good days, He will forsake again in misfortune, and then they can find nowhere rest or refuge (Prov. i. 24 sqq.).—STARKE.

3. On xv. 7. "What a man unjustly makes, that another unjustly takes."—STARKE.

4. On xv. 8 sq. "God is wont, in His judgments, to proceed by degrees, to begin with lesser punishments, and proceed to the sorer (Lev. xxvi. 18, 21, 24, 28). Although the godless escape one misfortune yet they soon fall into another."—STARKE.

5. On xvi. 1 sqq. "God can quickly bring it about that the people that once gave us sheltering entertainment must in turn, look to us for entertainment and a lurking place. For in the famine, Naomi and her husband and sons were pilgrims in the land of Moab (Ruth i. 1). David procured a refuge for his parents among the Moabites (1 Sam. xxii. 3). Now their affairs are in so bad a case that they, who were able to afford shelter to others, must themselves go wandering among others; for human fortune is unstable."—CRAMER.

6. On xvi. 4. "God therefore threatens the Moabites, at the same time winning them to repentance, for He seeks not the death of the sinner (Ezek. xviii. 32). Thus it was still a season for repentance. For had the Moabites once again used hospitality, then again had mercy been extended to them."—CRAMER.

7. On xvi. 5. "Light arises to the pious in the darkness from the Gracious, Merciful and Just One. His heart is of good courage and fears not, till he sees his desire on his enemies (Ps. cxii. 4, 8). And as it went well with Jerusalem, while it went ill with the Moabites, thus shall Christ's kingdom stand, and the enemies go down. For it is an everlasting kingdom, and the set up tabernacle of David shall surely remain (Am. ix. 11.)"—CRAMER.

8. On xvi. 6 sqq. "Moab was a haughty nation, for it was rich and had everything abundant. For it commonly goes thus, that where one is full, there the heart is lifted up, and the legs must be strong that can bear good days."—CRAMER.

9. On xvi. 9 sqq. "Such must be the disposition of teachers and preachers, that for the sake of their office, they should and must castigate injustice for God's sake, but with those that suffer the punishment they must be pitiful in heart. And therefore they must be the sin's enemy, and the persons' friend. Example: Micah announces the punishment to Jerusalem yet howls over it, testifies also his innermost condolence by change of clothing (Mic. i. 8). Samuel announces destruction to Saul and has sorrow for him (1 Sam. xv. 26; xvi. 1). Likewise Christ announces every sort of evil to the Jews, and yet weeps bitterly (Luke xix. 41). Paul preaches the frightful rejection of the Jews, and yet wishes it were possible to purchase their salvation by His eternal hurt (Rom. ix. 3)."—CRAMER.

10. On xvi. 14. "Exceeding, and very great is the grace and friendliness of God, that in the midst of the punishments that He directs against the Moabites, He yet thinks on His mercy. For the LORD is good unto all and has compassion on all His works (Ps. cxlv. 9)."—CRAMER.

11. On xvi. 12. Hypocritae, ubi, etc. "Hypocrites, whose souls are filled with impious notions of God, are much more vehement in their exercises than the truly pious in the true worship of God. And this is the first retribution of the impious, that they are wasted by their own labor which they undertake of their own accord. Another is that those exercises are vain in time of need and profit nothing. Therefore their evils are born with the greatest uneasiness, nor do they see any hope of aid. On the contrary true piety, because it knows that it is the servant of Christ, suffers indeed externally, yet conquers the cross by the confidence which it has in Christ."—LUTHER.

12. On xvi. GENUINENESS. [BARNES in loc. forcibly presents the argument for the genuineness of these prophecies afforded by the numerous mention of localities and the prediction of the desolations that would overtake them. In doing so he quotes also the language of Prof. SHEDD (Bib. Repos. Vol. VII., pp. 108 sq.). BARNES says: "That evidence is found in the particularity with which places are mentioned; and in the fact that impostors would not specify places, any further than was unavoidable. Mistakes, we all know, are liable to be made by those who attempt to describe the geography of places which they have not seen. Yet here is a description of a land and its numerous towns, made nearly three thousand years ago, and in its particulars it is sustained by all the travellers of modern times. The ruins of the same towns are still seen; their places in general can be designated; and there is a moral certainty, therefore, that this prophecy was made by one who knew the locality of those places, and that, therefore, the prophecy is ancient and genuine."—"Every successive traveller who visits Moab, Idumea or Palestine, does something to confirm the accuracy of Isaiah. Towns bearing the same name, or the ruins of towns, are located in the same relative position in which he said they were, and the ruins of once splendid cities, broken columns, dilapidated walls, trodden down vineyards, and half demolished temples proclaim to the world that those cities are what he said they would be, and that he was under the inspiration of God." See KEITH on Prophecy, whose whole book is but the amplification of this argument. The modern traveller, who explores those regions with Isaiah in one hand and ROBINSON'S Researches or MURRAY'S Guide in the other, has a demonstration that Isaiah was as surely written with the accurate knowledge of those regions in their day of prosperity and populous cities, as that the accounts of ROBINSON, TRISTRAM or MURRAY'S Guide were written by those who only had a knowledge of their ruins and desolations.—TR.].

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xvi. 5. This text can be used on the Reformation Feast, at Synods, Missionary Anniversaries and similar occasions. THE THRONE OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST. I. Its Foundation: Grace. II. The Substance of which it is made: Truth. III. The Place where it stands: The Tabernacle of David. IV. The Object, for whose attainment it is set up: Justice and Righteousness.

2. On xvi. 6-14. Righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is the people's destruction (Prov. xiv. 34). Therefore the salvation of a people rests on their knowing and serving the LORD. The example of Moab proves this. We learn from it: WHAT A PEOPLE MUST SHUN AND DO THAT SALVATION MAY BE ITS PORTION. I. It must shun. a) pride (ver. 6); b) false and external worship (ver. 12). II. It must serve the LORD, who is a) a true, b) an almighty, c) a holy and just God.

3. AGAINST SYRIA-EPHRAIM AND ETHIOPIA-EGYPT.

CHAPTERS XVII.—XX.

The prophecies contained in xvii.—xx. have this much in common, that they are directed against two double nations. For as here Syria and Ephraim belong together, so there Ethiopia and Egypt. Thus in the north and south the gaze of the Prophet falls on a double nation, and in each case the remoter nation is the more heterogeneous. Then all these prophecies point to the future of Assyria. But they do so in a very different sense. In xvii. Assyria appears as instrument for accomplishing the judgment on the neighboring enemy of Judah, Syria and Israel. But immediately thereafter (xvii. 12-14) destruction is announced against Assyria itself, so that xvii. can conclude with the words: "This is the portion of them that spoil us and the lot of them that rob us." But Assyria threatened not merely Judah and its next neighbors. The terror of it went further: it extended into distant lands. To these belonged also Ethiopia. Therefore on this account the Prophet announces to Ethiopia, too, the impending danger proceeding from Assyria. And this announcement could so much the more find a place here as the Prophet at the same time had to announce the putting aside of this danger by the same overthrow of the Assyrians that (xvii. 12-14) he holds up to view as the delivering event for Judah. Thus the Prophet in so far points away to a future of Assyria which is to it fatal, and on that account for Judah full of comfort. Hence these chapters involve the warning to fear neither Syria-Ephraim nor Assyria. We can say, therefore, that the contents of xvii. correspond to the contents of the first and third part of the prophetic-cycle vii.—xii. For we find here everything that is set forth in extenso vii. 1—ix. 6, and then again x. 5—xi. 16, given compactly in the brief space of one chapter. Regarding the period of their composition, we must ascribe xvii. and xviii. to the same time. For in both Assyria is spoken of in the same sense, i. e., the overthrow of Assyria is held up to view in both, and not the victory as in xix. and xx. But then in both passages this overthrow is spoken of in such a way that one sees the lines of perspective of both pictures of the future meet in the historical event that is described xxxvii. 36 sqq. To this is added what DRECHSLER calls attention to, that chapter xviii. has no superscription, but appears with its הוֹי, "woe," to join on to the "woe" of xvii. 12. DRECHSLER, indeed, urges the unity too strongly (in his Commentary, and Stud. u. Krit., 1847, p. 857 sqq.). Yet one don't see why the Prophet should have set just Ethiopia parallel with Judah. This is only conceivable if chapter xviii. was not conceived ad hoc, but was put here only as a parallel actually existing and, according to the reference of vers. 5, 6, a fitting parallel. But, as already said, the two passages, as regards their origin, belong to one period. And inasmuch as, according to xvii. 1-3, Damascus and Ephraim still stood intact, we must ascribe both chapters xvii. xviii., to the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, the time to which chapters vii. 1—ix. 6 owe their origin. We would then have in our chapters a proof that Isaiah, at that time not only foresaw the significance of Assyria as an instrument of punishment, but also its destruction.

Chapters xix. and xx., also treat of the future of Assyria, but in the opposite sense: for chapter xix., holds up to the view of Egypt its destruction. Who will be the instrument of this destruction is not said. It is known only from vers. 16, 17 that it is the God of Israel that causes the ruin to fall on Egypt. But when, now, ver. 23 sqq., the view is displayed in the still more remote future of the most intimate friendship between Egypt and Assyria, and great salvation for both, so it results, by force of the contrast implied, that Assyria must previously have been the enemy and destroyer of Egypt. And this, then, is said in express words in chapter xx., which is related to chapter xix., as an explanatory sequel. Evidently, therefore, chapters xix. xx., involve for Judah the warning that confederacy with Egypt is of no avail against Assyria. The LORD has given Egypt inevitably into the hand of Assyria in the immediate future. From this we recognize that these chapters must have been written at a time when Judah needed such a warning against false reliance on the protection of Egypt against the danger that threatened on the side of Assyria. Such was the case in the time of Hezekiah. We learn from xxviii.—xxxii., that an "Egyptian policy" was the great theocratic error of the reign of Hezekiah. Moreover the date given xx. 1 (see comment in loc.), according to the Assyrian monuments, refers us to the year 711, the 17th year of Hezekiah, for the beginning, and xx. 3 to the year 708, as the period of the conclusion, and of the prophetic indication of that typical transaction. According to that, chapter xx. cannot have been written before the year 708 B. C., and the words, "and fought against Ashdod and took it," ver. 1 b are, relatively, indeed, but not absolutely considered, an historical anticipation.

But our chapters have still a further peculiarity in common. That is to say, with exception of chapter xx., they are all of them comprehensive surveys, while chapter xx., as already said, only more nearly determines a chief point left indistinct in chapter xix. For the Prophet comprehends here, as in one look, the entire future of all the nations mentioned in these chapters, down into the remotest Messianic time, where all shall belong to the kingdom of peace that the Messiah shall found. Israel (and by implication Syria, comp. on "as the glory," etc. xvii. 3, and "a man," ver. 7), Judah, Ethiopia, Egypt, Assyria, all of them shall with one accord serve the LORD, and in equal measure enjoy His blessing. Connected therewith is the fact that these chapters (xx. excepted, for the reason given) form a total by themselves, in that they sketch, prophetic fashion, in grand brevity, a panorama of the future history of the nations in question. But as regards the relation of this second element, the Messianic to the first, the Assyrian, it must be observed that the former in chapters xviii. xix., forms quite normally the conclusion. But in xvii., the Assyrian element forms the conclusion, and indeed it is joined on in a loose and unconnected way. In xvii. 9–11, the cause of the fall described vers. 4-6 is assigned in only an incidental way, so that the Messianic element (vers. 7, 8) has, so to speak, a subsequent endorser in this reason assigned. Yet this style of adding the reason after describing the event has many examples. But the words xvii. 12–14 certainly give the impression of being a later addition, yet one that in any case proceeds from the Prophet himself. Without this addition there would be wanting to xvii., one of the two elements that characterize chapters xvii.—xx. With it, chapter xvii. not only becomes homogeneous with the following chapters, but also it becomes complete in itself (comp. ver. 14 b), and receives a bridge that unites it with chap. xviii.

We may group the four chapters in the following fashion:—

a) Prophecies that give warning not to be afraid either of Syria-Ephraim, or Assyria (xvii., xviii.).
 α. Damascus and Ephraim now and in time to come (xviii.).
 β. Ethiopia now and in time to come (xviii.).

b) Prophecies that give warning not to trust to false help against Assyria (xix., xx.).
 α. Egypt now and in time to come (xix.).
 β. The Assyrian captivity of Egypt (xx.).

CHAPTERS XVII., XVIII.

α) DAMASCUS AND EPHRAIM NOW AND IN TIME TO COME.

CHAPTER XVII.

ℵ) The destruction of Damascus and Ephraim.

CHAPTER XVII. 1-3.

1 THE BURDEN OF DAMASCUS.
Behold, Damascus is taken away from being a city,
And it shall be a ruinous heap.
2 The cities of Aroer are forsaken:
They shall be for flocks,
Which shall lie down and none shall make them afraid.

3 The fortress also shall cease from Ephraim,
And the kingdom from Damascus, and the remnant of Syria:
They shall be as the glory of the children of Israel,
Saith the LORD of hosts.

ª And they shall lie down and there shall be no one making them afraid.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. In this verse the m sound predominates in a way not to be mistaken.——The participle מוּסָר occurs again 1 Sam. xxi. 7.——The construction with מִן as e. g. וַיִּמְאָסְךָ מִמֶּלֶךְ 1 Sam. xv. 23.——מֵעִי is chosen for the sake of the paronomasia with מֵעִיר. It stands only here for the elsewhere usual עִי. [Imitated in NAEGELSBACH's translation by: "verworfen als Stadt und wird eine Trummerstatt.-TR.].—— Also מַפָּלָה (of the same meaning as מַפֵּלָה xxiii. 13; xxv. 2; and partly מַפֶּלֶת Ezek. xxvi. 15, 18, and often) occurs only here.

Ver. 2. In this verse there occurs no m sound excepting מ in the last word. On the other hand the r, hissing and dental sounds predominate.——It is debatable whether עָרֵי ע׳ is equivalent to בְּנוֹת ע׳ (compare עָרֵי חֶשְׁבּוֹן Josh. xiii. 17) or is to be construed as appositional genitive. I would not against the former of these explanations oppose what GESENIUS (Thes. pag. 1074, comp. 1005) cites against himself, that Aroer was no metropolis. For even if it were not the capital of a land, it might still be the central point of a number of smaller cities or villages.——עזבות is = derelictae, desertae (ver. 9; vi. 12; Jer. iv. 29).——רבץ ואין מחריד is a form of speech borrowed from Job (xi. 19) and reproduced later by Zephaniah (iii. 13).

Ver. 3. Notice the alliteration of the first half of the verse. As שְׁאָר is not ceteri, but reliqui, I regard it as more accurate to connect ושאר ארם with what follows than with what precedes.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet makes the Syrian capital his starting point, announcing to it first that it will be reduced to a place of ruin (ver. 1). From there he turns to the territory of Israel, and traverses first east Jordan Israel to its extremest point (ver. 2), then passes over to west Jordan, and thence returns back to Damascus (ver. 3). Thus he describes a circuit, carries the destruction over Gilead to Ephraim and thence back to Damascus, so that thus Ephraim becomes as Damascus and Damascus as Ephraim; thus both, as they are politically closely united, appear joined in a common ruin.

2. The burden of Damascus——heap.—Ver. 1. מַשָּׂא דמשׂק, "Burden of Damascus," is in so far an inexact expression as chap. xvii. does not merely treat of a judgment against Damascus, but of a judgment upon Ephraim and Assyria. But the expression seems to be chosen for the sake of conformity with the other sections of the collection, chapters xiii.—xxiii. But it must not here be construed in the sense of giving the contents; it is a simple nota, a mere designation to distinguish and mark a beginning. As regards the fulfilment, we see from viii. 4 that Isaiah sees the time near at hand when the plunder of Damascus shall be carried before the king of Assyria, and according to x. 9 this capture has already resulted. SCHRADER (Die Keilinschriften und das A. T., p. 150 sq. u. 152 sq.) imparts from LAYARD's inscriptions (London, 1851, Fol.), an inscription that is unfortunately somewhat obliterated, but is still plain enough to make known that Tiglath-Pileser, by means of an expedition lasting two years (according to SCHRADER, they were the years 733 and 732 B. C.; according to the list of regents, the thirteenth and fourteenth year of this king), destroyed the kingdom of Damascus. The inscription reads: " . . . . whose number cannot be numbered . . . . I caused to be beheaded; . . . . of (Bin) hadar, the palace of the father of Rezin (Ra-sun-ni, Ra-sun-nu) of Damascus, (situated on) inaccessible mountains . . . . I besieged, captured; 8000 inhabitants together with their property; Mitinti of Ascalon . . . . I led forth into captivity; five hundred (and eighteen, according to SMITH) cities from sixteen districts of the Damascus land I desolated like a heap of rubbish." But it is of course to be noticed that this catastrophe was only a temporary one. For Jer. xlix. 23-27 and Ezek. xxvii. 18 knew Damascus again as a city existing in their time. On the whole Damascus is almost the only one of all the cities of biblical antiquity that flourishes still down to the present day.

3. The cities of Aroer——afraid.—Ver. 2. Three cities of Old Testament mention are called by the name Aroer: 1) a city in Judah (1 Sam. xxx. 28) which cannot by any means be meant here; 2) a city in the tribe of Gad, which according to Josh. xiii. 25 (comp. Jud. xi. 33) lay "before Rabbah; 3) a city in the tribe of Reuben, situated on the north bank of the Arnon (Deut. ii. 36; Josh. xii. 2; xiii. 9, 16; Judg. xi. 26; 2 Kings x. 33, and often). But if the Prophet meant only one of the two Aroers, then we miss an element that is of importance in the connection of thought of our passage. Are both Aroers meant, then the Southern one, on the bank of Arnon, must be one of them. But in that case the words "cities of Arnon" involve the sense: the entire east Jordan territory. But also the etymological primary sense (עַרְעָר=nudus, "bare," עֲרִירִי inops, "poor") recommended the mention of the name of these cities. So that it thus seems to have been chosen for a threefold reason (see Text. and Gram.). From Damascus the judgment of God moves southward like a tempest or a hail cloud through Gilead to rebound from the mountain chain of Abarim and be deflected thereby westward across the Jordan into the territory of Ephraim. Thus all Gilead becomes unfitted for human habitation. Only herds of animals stop there, that can repose without fear of disturbance.—The occupation of a region by herds is also in other places named as the sign of a desert condition: xvii. 10; Zeph. ii. 14, and often.

[In regard to "cities of Aroer," J. A. A. says: "It is now commonly agreed that the place meant is the northern Aroer, east of Jordan, and that its cities are the towns around it, and perhaps dependent on it."]

4. The fortress——of hosts.—Ver. 3. The Prophet now takes Ephraim and Syria together. Of the former shall be done away all מִבְצָר (collective, "all defense"). Thereby the cities of Ephraim also cease to be cities (ver. 1). For in that no longer patriarchal but warlike time and region, whatever was without wall was a village. Comp. עָרֵי מִבְצָר "fenced cities," opposed to כָּפָר or כֹּפֶר "hamlet, village," 1 Sam. vi. 18, and often. As, therefore, "The fortress ceases from Ephraim," (נִשְׁבַּת מִ׳ מֵא׳, recalls מוּסָר מֵעִיר "rejected as city," ver. 1), the end returns to the beginning, and with the following words "the kingdom of Damascus," the Prophet actually arrives back in Damascus, whence he started out, so that he has thus described a circuit. With what art the Prophet intimates that not only Ephraim becomes as Damascus (by the נִשְׁבַּת מִבְצָר), but also Damascus as Ephraim! Are the cities of Ephraim and Damascus become villages, then Damascus can neither maintain its ancient rank as a royal city, nor the cities of Ephraim their ancient glory. Both must fall and go to ruin. "As the glory of the children of Israel" must, of course, be intended in the first place ironically. Ephraim had joined itself closely with Syria to the great terror of Judah (vii. 2; viii. 12). Isaiah shows here how this close political coalition will turn to their destruction, engulfing them in one common ruin. But when ver. 4 sqq. it is seen what will be the fate of the glory of Jacob, viz.: that it will return from the fallen estate of remoteness from God to the glory of nearness to God, then it will not appear an error if in "the remnant of Syria" is seen an allusion to "the remnant of Israel," and in the likeness of name an intimation of a likeness of destiny that is to be hoped for: Comp. on אָדָם "a man," ver. 7.

[In regard to the ironical and sarcastic meaning attached to the expression "the glory of Israel," a notion as old as JEROME, J. A. A. says "it seems to mean simply what is left of their former glory."]

ג) Ephraim (and Damascus) small and again great.

CHAPTER XVII. 4-8.

4 AND in that day it shall come to pass, that the glory of Jacob shall [a]be made thin,
And the fatness of his flesh shall wax lean.
5 And it shall be [b]as when the harvestman gathereth the corn,
And reapeth the ears with his arm;
And it shall be [c]as he that gathereth ears in the valley of Rephaim.
6 [d]Yet gleaning grapes shall be left in it, as the shaking of an olive tree,
Two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough,
Four or five [e]in the outmost fruitful branches thereof,
Saith the LORD God of Israel.
7 At that day shall [f]a man look to his Maker,
And his eyes shall [g]have respect to the Holy One of Israel.
8 And he shall not [h]look to the altars, the work of his hands,
Neither shall [i]respect that which his fingers have made,
Either the [j]groves, or the [1]images.

[1] Or, sun images.

[a] be reduced.
[b] as one in harvest gathereth corn, and his arm reapeth the ears.
[c] as one gleaning ears.
[d] And gleanings shall, etc.
[e] in its, the fruit tree's boughs.
[f] the man turn.
[h] turn to.
[i] look to what his.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 4. מִשְׁמַן again only x. 16.——רזה Niph. emaciari only here; comp. x. 18.

Ver. 5. קָמָה xxxvii. 27.——וְהָיָה "and it goes," comp. xiii. 14.——קָצִיר is difficult. The connection leads us first to expect the meaning "reaper," and many take it so, letting קָצִיר be said metonymically for קוֹצֵר or אַנְשֵׁי קָצִיר (GESEN.). Others take קָמָה in apposition with קָצִיר, or קָצִיר = "harvest time" (when the harvest time takes away the stalks. EWALD). קָצִיר may also be treated as accusative of time: "As one gathers stalks of grain in the harvest." All of these explanations have a certain harshness. Against DELITZSCH, who makes קוֹצֵר=קָצִיר it may be objected: why does Isaiah use this very common word in a sense that it never has elsewhere, and for which sense there offered another word (קֹוצֵר Ps. xxix. 7; Amos ix. 13; Jer. ix. 21, and often) equally current? The same may bo objected also to GESENIUS and EWALD. To take קָמָה as apposition is harsh for the reason that then one of the two words would be superfluous. I therefore prefer to take קָצִיר as accusative of time, and to regard the word as a substantive treated adverbially like other marks of time (בֹּקֶר, לַיְלָה, יוֹם, etc., comp. EWALD, § 204 b).——Then the suffix of זְרֹעוֹ relates to the notion of reaper ideally present in קָצִיר.

Ver 6. נֹקֶף again only xiv. 13.——גַּרְגֵּר is ἅπ. λεγ.——אָמִיר only here and ver. 9.——סְעִיף "branch," again only xxvii. 10. The suffix in סְעִפֶיהָ relates to זַיִת; פֹּרִיָּה is in apposition with the suffix (in ramus ejus fecundas) with the signification of an adversative clause.

Ver. 8. The אֲשֵׁרִים (אֲשֵׁרוֹת only in Judg. iii. 7; 2 Chron. xix. 3; xxxiii. 3) are in any case the images or symbols of Astarte, of the female principle, which had the form of στῆλαι, pillars set upright (from אָשַׁר rectum, erectum esse, according to MOVERS; perhaps, according to a statement of HERODOTUS II. 106, γυναικὸς αἰδοῖα were visible).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Like one ties two threads into one knot, so the Prophet, ver. 3, has entwined in one another the destiny of Damascus and Ephraim. It is true that in what follows there is nothing more said of Syria. But when it was said, ver. 3, that "the remnant of Syria" shall be like "the glory of Jacob," and if now, vers. 4–8, the course of development of "the glory of Jacob" is portrayed as a prospective sinking to a minimum and then again as a mounting up to the most glorious nearness to God, is not the same course of life by implication prophesied of Syria? Therefore, Ephraim shall be reduced to almost nothing. The Prophet declares this in a threefold image. First he compares the destruction of Israel to the growing leanness of a fat man (ver. 4), second to the grain harvest, where the reaper with full arm, cuts and gathers the ears (ver. 5); third to the olive harvest where the fruits are beaten off the trees. But with this third figure he lets appear already in perspective a better time. The Prophet only indirectly intimates that the tree will be robbed of the chief part of its fruits. He lays the chief stress here on the gleaning: there remain hanging in the top and on the boughs some scattered fruit, that shall be beaten off by subsequent effort (ver. 6). Thus a remnant is left to Israel, and this remnant shall be converted: Shear-Jashub (x. 20 sqq.). Notice with what art this address also is arranged. There is a crescendo and decrescendo of shadow, which gradually merges into light. In the first figure (ver. 4) the shadow still appears faint; in the second (ver. 5) it reaches its full extent; in the third (ver. 6) it yields unnoticed to the light. This light the Prophet depicts here in the first place from its subjective side, as a turning of the heart to God (ver. 7) and a turning away from idols (ver. 8). The objective salvation first appears in the fourth turn of his discourse (vers. 12–14).

2. And in that day——God of Israel.—Vers. 4–6. "In that day" ver. 4, here refers to the time of judgment announced in vers. 2, 3. "The glory of Jacob," also refers back to ver. 3, where the same expression is employed with only the difference of Israel for Jacob, which seems to have a rhetorical reason (comp. ix. 7). Moreover the Prophet speaks here of Israel-Ephraim in a sense that declares what it has in common with Judah. For the grand outlines of that picture of the future that Isaiah draws here, comprehend equally the history of Judah and Ephraim. Moreover it must not be supposed that Isaiah has in mind only the political ruin that ensued, say after the shining reign of Jeroboam II. This growing lean embraces the entire time in which the Ten Tribes exist as a remnant. It therefore lasts still at the present time.

The second figure describes the same matter only in greater extent. It is presented in a measure as having three degrees. First, is called to mind how the reaper gathers the standing grain stalks; second, how then the other arm cuts off the ears; third, how the ears are gathered, and that in the valley of Rephaim, the fruitful plain that extends in a south-west direction from Jerusalem. Such a rich harvest shall the enemies hold in Ephraim; so thoroughly, therefore, shall Ephraim be emptied out, plundered. The "gathering of ears" mentioned in the second half of ver. 5, may mean the gathering proper for binding into sheaves (Gen. xxxvii. 7); but it could mean, too, the gleaning of the ears left lying, as by the poor (Ruth ii. 2 sqq.). The former better suits the context, in as much as the latter notion appears in the following verse. In ver. 5 the whole work of the enemies is described, and that in two stages, that are indicated by the "and it shall be" prefixed, just as the battle and the booty form the two sharply distinguished occupations of the warrior.——The valley of Rephaim is mentioned in the Old Testament, Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. xv. 18, 22; xxiii. 13. Most persons conclude from our present passage that it was fruitful. Only EWALD [and ABEN EZRA, J. A. A.], finds in the passage the notion of a "dry valley," as he also takes מלקט in the sense of gleaning. At present, indeed, the valley is desert (comp. KNOBEL in loc.). Further statements see in ARNOLD's article "Thäler in Palästina," HERZ. R. Encycl. XV. p. 614. ["Robinson speaks of it en passant, as the cultivated valley or plain of Rephaim (Palestine I. 323)." J. A. A.].—But (ver. 6) there is left on him, i. e., on Jacob (we would say "of him," comp. x. 22) a gleaning secundum percussionem or ad similitudinem percussionis oleae, that is two or three berries in the highest top. Four or five are beaten off with a stick from the branches, because they had not been brought down by the shaking. In the boughs, of course, more remain hanging, because they have greater extent than the tree-top. That is, it is declared, that although the tree is fruitful, yet only a few berries hang on it. Spite of its fruitfulness, it is now so empty that only a little is left for the gleaner. Thus, too, Israel, though now richly blessed, will be reduced to a minimum.

3. At that day——the images.—Vers. 7, 8). The little gleaning is the small remnant of Israel that plays so great a part in the divine economy of salvation, vi. 13; x. 21; Rom. ix. 27; xi. 4 sq. In that day, i. e., when Israel shall be reduced to the small remnant, will the man look (xxii. 4; xxxi. 1) to his Maker, the Holy One of Israel (comp. on i. 4), but he will cast not one more look of fear and trust toward the idols. At last he sees that they are only the work of his own, of human hands (xliv. 9 sqq.).——הָאָדָם "the man," is never anywhere else specially used of Israel. The general expression is doubtless chosen because the Prophet declares what concerns not Israel alone, but essentially all mankind, and what especially is applicable to Syria, too, which all along is conceived of as united with Israel.

Two idols are mentioned by name, as those that were particularly worshipped by the idolatrous Israelites: אשרים and חמנים. (xxvii. 9). ["groves" and "images" ENG. BIB. TR.].—Regarding the latter it has been ascertained, that thereby are meant the images of בַּעַל חַמָּן Baal-Hamon Song of S. viii. 11, the Sun-god, the superior male god of the Phœnicians. The word, beside the present text, and xxvii. 9, occurs Lev. xxvi. 30; Ezek. vi. 4, 6; 2 Chr. xiv. 4; xxxiv. 4, 7. See further under Text. and Gram.——It is only doubtful whether אשרה signifies only the Astarte pillars, or the goddess herself, and the groves consecrated to her (Deut. xvi. 21, comp. GESENIUS, Thes. pag. 162 with OTTO STRAUSS, Nahumi de Nin. vat. Prolegg. pag. XXIV.). Moreover it is undecided whether Astarte (אַשְׁתֹּרֶת kindred to אֶסְתֵּר, ἀστήρ, "star") signifies only the moon, or Vinus, the star of good fortune, or the entire heaven of night as distinguished from the domain of Baal, the heaven of day (comp. P. CASSEL on Judg. ii. 13; "Moon and stars, the luminaries of the heavens by night, are mingled in Astaroth; they are the sum total of the entire host of heaven.")

3) The Cause of Ephraim's Destruction.

CHAPTER XVII. 9–11.

9 In that day shall his strong cities be [a]as a forsaken bough,
And an uppermost branch,
Which they left because of the children of Israel:
And there shall be desolation.
10 Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation,
And hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength,
Therefore [b]shalt thou plant pleasant plants,
And shalt set it with strange slips:
11 [c]In the day shalt thou make thy plant to grow,
And in the morning shalt thou make thy seed to flourish:
[d]But the harvest shall be [1]a heap in the day of grief
And of desperate sorrow.

[1] Or, removed in the day of inheritance, and there shall be deadly sorrow.

[a] like forsaken places in the forests and summits. [b] thou plantest pleasant gardens and sowest them with foreign seed. [c] In the day of thy planting thou settest a fence. [d] But there is a heaped-up harvest in the day, etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 9. עזובה comp. vi. 12.—חֹרֶשׁ is saltus, "forest." David dwelt בַּחֹרְשָׁה 1 Sam. xxiii. 15, 16, 18. Jotham, according to 2 Chr. xxvii. 4, built castles and towers בַּחֳרָשִׁים. Comp. Ezek. xxxi. 3.——אָמִיר, beside the present and ver. 6, does not occur again. The employment of this rare and ancient word here must be explained partly by the fact of its previous use, ver. 6, partly by the fact that in old times not only the tops of trees, but probably also the tops of mountains were so called. For the conjecture of SIMON, sanctioned by GESENIUS, that the Amorites were named the montani, from an old אֵמֶר mons (comp. הִתְאַמֵּר se efferre Ps. xciv. 4) has certainly much in its favor. The LXX. also found in אמיר the name of that ancient race, and hence translated οἱ Ἀμοῤῥαῖοι καὶ οἱ Εὑαῖοι.—The subject of והיתה is any way the ideal notion אֶרֶץ contained in what precedes. This notion is likely the occasion also of the change in gender that we observe in what follows (comp. שכחת, ישעך, etc., with מעזו, ver. 9). That a land may be personified, i. e., identified with the nation is proved by passages like Jer. vi. 19; xxii. 29, etc.

Ver. 10. יֶשַׁע occurs only here in the first part of Isa.; on the other hand four times in the second part: xlv. 8; li. 5; lxi. 10; lxii. 11. The expression אלהי ישעי "God of my salvation," is frequent in the Psalms: xviii. 47; xxv. 5; xxvii. 9; lxii. 8; lxv. 6, etc., comp. Mic. vii. 7; Hab. iii. 18.——צור מָעוֹז Ps. xxxi. 3, comp. Ps. lxii. 8.——נְעִים – נעמן occurs only here.——זמרה only here in Isaiah. The suffix ־ֵנּוּ relates to the ideal unity ascribed in thought to the garden arrangements.

Ver. 11. שִׂגְשֵׂג, Pilp, from שׂוּג (comp. סוּג, שׂוּךְ, מְשׂוּכָּה v. 5) sepire, "to fence in," occurs only here.——Hiph. of פרח occurs in Isaiah only here; Kal. often: xxvii. 6; xxxv. 1, 2; lxvi. 14.——The words נד קציר ונו are difficult. True, it is clear in general that the Prophet contrasts the notions of planting, sowing, fencing round, bringing to bloom and that of the harvest. But the question is, does he speak of a disappearance of the hoped-for harvest, or of the approach of a harvest not hoped for, and unwelcome. The former is maintained by those that take נֵד — נָד in the sense of effugit. But the verb נוּד no where in its inflection has Zere as vowel of the second root syllable. Moreover נָד would not be the right word for the notion of vanishing. One would expect אָבַד or a similar word. For נוּד is moveri, agitari, vagari, errare; it designates, therefore, the state of instability, fluctuation, but not that of non-existence. We stand, therefore, by the usual meaning of נֵד, acervus, cumulus: "as a heap, heaped up is the harvest in the day of grief."——נַחֲלָה cannot be understood of taking possession, for the word means possession. Moreover, since several Codices and ancient translations read נַחְלָה the latter is to be retained. נַחְלָה, indeed, occurs elsewhere only in connection with מַכָּה (Jer. x. 19; xiv. 17; xxx. 12; Neh. iii. 19) or in the sense of aegrotus (Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 21); but the day of the sick (Fem. to correspond to the preceding suffixes) is the day of being sick, as e.g., the time of the one leading is the time of leading (Jer. ii. 17).——כְּאֵב, "pain," again only lxv. 14.——אָנוּשׁ occurs in Isaiah only here: often in Jer.: xvii. 16; xxx. 12, 15, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This strophe is distinguished from the preceding in this, that it assigns the reason for the destruction threatened against Ephraim. Therefore, after words that refer to both the strophes that precede, and that describe the impending ruin (ver. 9), the cause of the same is now named. It consists in this, that Israel has forsaken the God of its salvation. This has its consequence that it cherishes with delight untheocratic, idolatrous existence, like one lays out a pleasure garden and adorns it with exotics (ver. 10). Measures are not wanting which should surround that garden as a protecting hedge, and speedily bring it to a certain bloom; but the harvest? True enough there will be harvest in heaps; but not a day of joy. This harvest will be a day of deepest sorrow (ver. 11).

2. In that day——desolation.—Ver. 9. "In that day" refers back to ver. 4; "his strong cities" to "the cities Aroer," ver. 2, and "the fortress," ver. 3; כַּעֲזוּבַת, "like forsaken places," to "forsaken," ver. 2; הָאָמִיר, "the summits," to אָמִיר "the summits (of the olive trees)," ver. 6. By these correspondences the Prophet gives us to understand that he speaks of the same subject as above. But he modifies his manner in two respects. First, he does not speak of the subject in figurative language as vers. 4–6, but boldly; second, he proves that the judgment was made necessary by the conduct of Israel. In as much as, therefore, "in that day" refers to ver. 4 (not to ver. 7, as the contents plainly show), the Prophet explains the figures used there by a reference to a fact well known to all Israel. In the forests and on elevated spots they had all seen the ruins of very ancient strong buildings that were evidence of the presence of a power long since overcome and vanished away. They were the ruins of castles which the Canaanites forsook, voluntarily or by compulsion, when the Israelites conquered the land (comp. Knobel, in loc.). A time will come when "the strong cities" of Israel shall lie like these castles. It is plain that this reference to that evidence of fact, besides the figurative language of vers. 4–6, was fitted to produce a deep impression.

3. Because thou hast——sorrow.—Vers. 10, 11. The evil conduct of Israel that was the cause of that judgment was twofold: 1) the negative reason was the not regarding, forgetting Jehovah: 2) the positive reason was the inclination to an idolatrous existence. In regard to the positive reason, I understand the Prophet to mean not merely the worship of strange gods, but also the political union with foreign powers that was most intimately connected with it, and the inclination to foreign ways in general (comp. ii. 6 sqq.). This culture of idolatry is compared to the culture of charming gardens (literally, plantations of lovely things). Israel itself, according to v. 1 sqq. 7, was for Jehovah נְטַע שַׁעֲשׁוּעָיו, "his pleasant plant." But the recreant nation, instead of cultivating the service of Jehovah, set up other enclosures that appealed more to their fleshly inclinations, which they sowed with foreign grape vines (properly grape vines of the foreigner), i. e. in which they cultivated foreign grape vines (comp. Jer. ii. 12) from seed. By these foreign vines must be understood everything untheocratic, all that was connected with heathen life to whose culture Israel devoted itself. The Imperfects express the continuance of the present. For at the time that the Prophet wrote this under Ahaz, this tendency to idolatrous living continued operative. The people provided also a protecting fence (comp. v. 5). By the fencing the Prophet seems to me to understand everything that was undertaken for the purpose of giving security to the idolatrous efforts. That may have been partly positive measures (efforts in favor of idolatry of every sort), and partly negative protection against whatever was done on the part of true Israelites against the worship of idols, persecution of such, comp. e. g. 1 Kings xviii. 4, 19. The pains of planting and fencing were quickly rewarded: the heathen life bloomed only too soon. The whole history preceding the exile furnishes the proof of this. "In the morning" means the very next morning after the planting; therefore very quickly. We adhere to the usual meaning of נֵד acervus, cumulus: "as a heap, heaped up is a harvest in the day of grief." See Text. and Gram. For I would not construe it, with Delitzsch, in the sense: "a harvest heap unto the day of judgment," after Rom. ii. 5. For it does not read לְיוֹם, "to the day," and in fact the day of the harvest is not distinguished from the day of judgment, which must be assumed by those that explain that the product of the harvesting heaps up for the day of judgment. But the Prophet says: in the day of judgment (ביום "in the day," refers back to ביום in the first member of the verse), which is itself just at the same time the day of harvest, the produce of harvest is there in heaps. But this harvest day is "a day of grief and of desperate sorrow." Being such, the harvest is a bad one, and the heaps signify heaped up misfortune. Therefore the Prophet says that the fruit of that planting shall be a harvest that shall come in on the day of grief and incurable pain, thus itself shall have the form of grief and incurable pain.

ד) The World-Power (Assyria) Rises and Falls.

Chapter XVII. 12–14.

12 [a]Woe to the [1]multitude of many people,
Which make a noise like the noise of the seas;
[b]And to the rushing of nations,
That make a rushing like the rushing of [2]mighty waters!
13 [c]The nations shall rush like the rushing of mighty waters:
[d]But God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee far off,
And shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind,
And like [3]a[e] rolling thing before the whirlwind.
14 [f]And behold at eveningtide trouble;
And before the morning he is not.
This is the portion of them that spoil us,
And the lot of them that rob us.

[1] Or, noise. [2] Or, many. [3] Or, thistle-down.

[a] Woe! a tumult of many nations! they make, etc.
[b] And a rushing of peoples! they are rushing like, etc.
[c] Peoples are rushing like, etc.
[d] But he rebukes it, and it flees, etc., and is chased, etc.
[e] whirling dust before the storm.
[f] At evening time behold horror.

All expositors notice how suitably the Prophet here fits the sound to the subject. "And it waves and seethes and roars and hisses,"—one not only sees, one hears, too, the nation-waves rolling in.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet sees and hears in spirit the tumult of approaching nations, which he compares to the roar of mighty waters. But at the chiding of the Lord they vanish like chaff or whirlwinds of dust before the wind (vers. 12, 13). The evening when that tumult approaches is one of terror; but only the next morning and all has vanished without a trace left. This, he says, shall be the lot of those that come to rob us (ver. 14).

2. Woe —— rob us.—Vers. 12–14. הוי (comp. on i. 4), "woe," need not be taken in any other sense than the usual one. For the crowding on of countless hordes of nations might well, in the first moment, occasion a cry of woe, even if it is afterwards changed into a cry of joy. It is evident that the Prophet by this swelling billow of nations means the nations led by the Assyrian world-power.——The expression "the chaff before the wind" recalls Ps. xxxv. 5.——But the phrase "chaff of the mountains," is not found elsewhere. The chaff which is blown away from an elevation exposed to the wind (threshing floors were made on elevations for the sake of the stronger breeze: comp. Herz. R. Encycl. III p. 504 sq.). גלגל is not merely a wheel (ver. 28), or the whirlwind, but also that which is whirled upwards by the wind (Ps. lxxxiii. 14). At evening time, as night comes on, the invasion of the enemy is more dangerous and terrible than by day. But the evening of terror is quickly changed into a morning of joy. That became literally true by the sudden destruction of the power of Sennacherib in one night, 2 Kings xix. 35.

In conclusion the Prophet generalizes the thought just expressed: finally it ever happens so to the enemies of the Lord and of His people.

It cannot be doubted that "our plunderers" and "our spoilers" include also the Syrians and Ephraimites. We learn from this, from what point of view we must contemplate the connection of vers. 12–14 with what precedes. The Prophet would show that all enemies of the kingdom of God must finally succumb, that there is therefore no reason to fear them.

The verses 12–14 stand in no clearly marked connection with what precedes, and the verses 1-11 form in themselves a disconnected whole, like the following prophecies, xviii. 1–7 and xix. 1–25. Thus the conjecture presents itself that these verses, 12–14, are a supplement added later that has the double object: 1) to make chapter xvii. conform to the two following by the mention of Assyria; 2) to restore a closer connection with chapter xviii. and to prepare for the understanding of the passage xviii. 5, 6. For without these verses xviii. 6 would apparently connect with nothing. At the same time—and this is an additional gain, accompanying the two main objects—chapter xvii. is completed by the mention of Assyria. For Syria, Ephraim, Assyria were then the chief enemies of Judah. Only the mention of Assyria made it possible for the Prophet to conclude with the generalization of ver. 14 b.

β) ETHIOPIA NOW AND IN TIME TO COME.

Chapter XVIII.

א) The danger that threatens in the present.

Chapter XVIII. 1–3.

1 Woe to the land [a]shadowing with wings,
Which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia:
2 That sendeth ambassadors by the sea,
[b]Even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters,
Saying, Go, ye swift messengers, to a nation [1c]scattered and peeled,
To a people [d]terrible from their beginning hitherto;
[e]A nation[2] [3]meted out and trodden down,
[4]Whose land the rivers have spoiled!
3 All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the [f]earth,
See ye, when [g]he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains;
And when [h]he bloweth a trumpet, hear ye.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. הוֹי like xvii. 12.—צְלָצַל occurs only here in Isaiah. Beside this: in Deut. xxviii. 42, with the meaning "cricket, cicada;" Job xl. 31 meaning "harpoon" (so called from the clinking); 2 Sam. vi. 5 and Ps. cl. 5, we find the plural meaning "cymbals." Older expositors have taken the word in the sense of the simple צֵל "shadow," or also, because of the reduplication — "double shadow," with supposed reference to the double shadow of the tropics (ἀμφίσκιος, Strabo). Both are impossible. The word can only mean "stridor, clinking, whizzing, buzz," because this is the underlying sense of every shade of its use.——But what are the כְּנָפַיִם? Some have thought of the wings of an army, referring for proof to viii. 8. But what would this afford as a characteristic? The same objection lies against the construction "grasshopper wings," or "sails" (LXX.). It is a hardy conjecture to refer this to the wings of the sun, Mal. iii. 20 (iv. 2) comp. Tac. Germ. 45; Juven. Sat. 14, 279; the Egyptian Sistrum [a kind of cymbal] with two rims or wings, is too insignificant as a characteristic, and cannot be shown to belong to Ethiopia. On the other hand it is quite suitable to call a land that is warm and that abounds with water and rushes, and hence also with winged insects, the land "of the whirring wings." The conjecture is very enticing, that the expression צלצל כנפים is chosen with reference to the Tsaltsala, or Tsetse-fly, which was first described by the Englishman Francis Galton ("Exploring expedition in tropical South-Africa, London, Murray, 1854). It is "a little fly, in size and form nearly like our house fly, but somewhat lighter colored, of which the natives say that a single bite is sufficient to kill a horse, an ox or a dog; whereas asses and goats suffer no harm from it." But it is not satisfactorily made out whether this resemblance is to be traced to a radical relation or whether it is only an accidental similarity in sound. Comp. in the Ausland 1868, No. 8, p. 192.

Ver. 2. השלח is to be referred to ארץ. The masculine is explained in that while ver. 1 ארץ means the land proper, in ver. 2 it represents more particularly the notion of people: for the messengers are sent by men. Comp. on xv. 1.——יָם like xix. 5; xxvii. 1; Nah. iii. 8.—צִיר, in the sense of "messenger," again in Isa. lvii. 9.——מְמֻשָּׁךְ part. Pual from מָשַׁךְ trahere, protrahere, extrahere, used again only Prov. xiii. 12, of the תּוֹחֶלֶת מְמֻשָּׁכָה, "the long-drawn out expectation." Therefore the word here, too, can mean nothing but "long-drawn, long-stretched, procerus, slanck." The Sabeans, too, are called, xlv. 14, אַנְשֵׁי מִדָּה ["men of extension." Eng. Bib. "men of stature"].——מֹרָט is "to make smooth, bright." It is used of the sword that is not only sharpened, but polished till it flashes (Ezek. xxi. 14-16, 33); also of pulling out the hair till the crown is smooth and shining (Lev. xiii. 40 sq.). Comp. moreover 1 Kings vii. 45; Ezek. xxix. 18. In Isaiah the word occurs only once more, l. 6, of the pulling out of the hair. The form מוֹרָט stands for מְמוֹרָט, comp. Ezek. xxi. 15 sq.——נוֹרָא מִן־הוּא וָהָלְאָה; the construction is the same as מֵעַתָּה וְעַד עוֹלָם 1 Sam. xx. 22; x. 3, and כְּסֵף וָהָלְאָה, כְּקָטֹן וְעַד־גָּדוֹל. Only we are surprised that it does not read כְּמֵנּוּ. But the pron. sep. is used for the sake of emphasis (comp. Gen. xxvii. 34; 1 Sam xix. 23, etc.). And wherefore may it not stand instead of the suffix? The Prophet wishes to mark the point of departure and support of the Ethiopian power, thus he does not write כְּמֵנּוּ. Analogous is מִימֵי הִיא Nah. ii. 9 (8) (a closed up water pool was Nineveh since its existence; but now the pool runs out, the people of Nineveh flee on all sides). There, too, מִימֶיהָ might have been used. When STADE remarks that it must properly read here מֵאֲשֶׁר הוּא, he is correct. But מִן הוּא can be used also. On the other hand, according to his explanation, i. e., if הוּא should be referred to Israel, it must of necessity read מִמֶּנּוּ. Or if מִן הוּא is to be understood of time, who in the world would know that הוּא should point to the period of time, "quo Aethiopes Aegyptiorum jugo excusso aliis populis et imprimis Aegyptiis bella inferre coeperunt?"——מִן הוּא, in a temporal sense, could only mean: ex quo est. But in order to express this Isaiah would likely have written מִימֵי הוּא, not to mention that it is not credible that the Ethiopians were a widely feared people from the moment of their existence onwards. It is my opinion therefore that מִן הוּא stands in a local sense, brief and pregnant for מִן אֲשֶׁר הוּא or מִן אֲשֶׁר הוּא שָׁם.——The meaning of קַו־קָו must be measured by xxviii. 10, 13, for no other passage exists so nearly like this text. There, too, the word appears repeated, קַו לָקָו. It means originally "measuring line," and occurs in Isaiah, beside the above mentioned places, xxviii. 17; xxxiv. 11, 17; xliv. 13. From the meaning "measuring line" is developed "norm, prescription, rule," xxviii. 10, 13. So we must take it here; and the choice of the short, abruptly spoken word, which moreover is repeated, is not to be regarded as accidental and undesigned. For this reason (see also Exeget. Comm. below) we take קַו־קָו = "command, command." There was much commanding, but short and sharp.—מְבוּסָה (again only ver. 7, and xxii. 5) is "conculcatio, treading down," comp. אִישׁ תּוֹכָחוֹת Prov. xxix. 1; בִּן־הַכּוֹת Deut. xxv. 2.—בָּזָא—בָּזָז, like שָׁסָה—שָׁסַס, שָׁאַס—שָׁסַס (EWALD, § 112 g; 114 b; 151 b).

Ver. 3. שֹׁכְנֵי אֶרֶץ only here.——כְּ designates the coincidence, as in cases of time when. We have here the Inf. Constr. after a Prepos. forming a phrase with the subject latent.——הָרִים is accusative of place.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet sends a cry of alarm to the remote Ethiopians, because they too are threatened by the Assyrians. He characterizes the land by the use of predicates suggested by the abundance of its insects, and its situation on great rivers (ver. 1). In this land the messengers fly away in swift skiffs over the waters. Therefore the Prophet summons these swift messengers to command the people, at the same time describing them as a people of lofty stature, and shining color of skin, as a nation dreaded far beyond its borders, as a nation among whom reigns strict command and ruthless use of power, that is yet exposed to the power of mighty streams that carry off its land (ver. 2). This nation is commanded: it will arm itself for this strife. Between it and the Assyrian there shall come to pass a terrible collision. When it is announced by visible and audible signals, all nations must give good heed: for all are in the highest degree interested in it.

2. Woe——hear ye.—Vers. 1-3. Cush is Ethiopia, the land that bounds Egypt on the south, which began at Syene below the first cataract of the Nile (comp. Ezek. xxix. 10; xxx. 6), and had Meroe for its capital (HEROD. ii. 29). The Egyptians, also, call Ethiopia Kus' or Kes' (comp. EBER's Egypten und die Bucher Mosis, I. p. 57; LEPSIUS in HERZ. R. Encycl. I., p. 148). I do not believe, as STADE maintains (De Is. vatt. aeth., p. 16), that the assumption of Mesopotamian Cushites rests merely on the erroneous identifying of the κίσσιοι (HER. III. 91) or κοσσαῖοι (STRABO XI. p. 524, XIV. 744) with the biblical Cushites. The streams of Ethiopia are the White Nile (Bahr-el-Abjad) and its tributaries, the Atbara, the Blue Nile (Bahr-el-Asrak), the Sobat, the Bahr-el-Ghasal, etc. In describing the land of whirring-wings as beyond the rivers of Ethiopia (comp. Zeph. iii. 10), this form of expression arises from the mighty waters occupying the foreground in the mental vision of the Prophet, thus the land lies for him beyond them.—גֹּמֶא (xxxv. 7; Exod. ii. 3) is the papyrus-reed. Light and fleet boats were made of it, as is abundantly testified by the ancients and by the monuments (comp. GESEN. in loc., WILKINSON, The ancient Egyptians, V., p. 119). Papyrus, once very abundant in Egypt, is no longer found there; but is found in Abyssinia (comp. CHAMPOLLION-FIGEAC, L'Egypte ancienne, p. 24, sq. 195) and Sicily (HERZ. R. Encycl. I., p. 140 sq.).

Go ye swift messengers, to a nation, etc., is understood by most expositors as if the Prophet sent the messengers home, because Jehovah Himself would undertake Himself the destruction of the enemy. But then the Prophet would not have used לְכוּ, but rather שׁוּבוּ. Besides one can't understand why, if the Ethiopians were not to fight, their warlike qualities are depicted in such strong colors. I therefore take לְכוּ in its proper sense; "go ye." The Ethiopians are to be bidden to the contest, and actually to fight; but they must know that it is the LORD that gives them the victory.

To a nation grown high: see under Text. and Gram. It is, moreover, not impossible that, as JOS. FRIEDR. SCHELLING conjectured, there lies in the expression an allusion to the longevity of the Ethiopians which was an accepted notion of the ancients. The Ethiopians are called smooth and shining, not, we may suppose, because they deprived the body of hair, but because they had a way of making the skin smooth and shining. This is known from what HERODOTUS relates of the scouts of Cambyses (chap. iii. 23). When these wondered at the long life of the Ethiopians, they were led to a spring: "by washing in which they became very shining as if it were of oil." By the constant use of this spring, the Ethiopians became, it was said, μακρόβιοι, "long-lived." It is seen from this that to the Ethiopians was ascribed a skin shining as if oiled. In general the Ethiopians, according to HERODOTUS, were accounted "the largest and comeliest of all men." On the upper Nile there yet live men whom this description suits. For example the Schilluks, that were reached by the British Consul, JOHN PETHERICK, after eight days' journey on the White Nile, from Chartum, are described by him as "a large, powerful, finely formed race, with countenances of noble mould" (Ausland, 1861, No. 24). Comp. ERNST MORNO (in PETERMAN'S Geogr. Mitheilungen, 1872, 12 Heft., p. 452 sqq.) on the ethnological relations in Upper-Sennar, and especially on the Hammedach and their neighbors. That is dreaded far away; so the Prophet names the people because they are feared from their borders and far away. See Text. and Gram. We know with certainty, at least with reference to Egypt, that Ethiopia at that time had dominion beyond its own territory. The Ethiopian dynasty seems to have put an end to a condition of great disorder in Egypt. The first king of it, Sabakon, must have been a powerful and wise regent. CHAMPOLLION-FIGEAC, l. c., p. 363, says of him: "The internal disorders involved the ruin of the public establishments, and when order was revived by the presence of a wise and prudent monarch, his first thought ought to be to repair them. After his invasion of Egypt this duty devolved on the conqueror, and Sabakon did not neglect it." To the third king, Tirhaka, are ascribed great military expeditions—as far as the Pillars of Hercules,—and conquests (ibid., p. 364). One may well suppose that the strict discipline and order, which naturally at times ran to the excess of ruthless oppression, was a characteristic peculiarity of those Ethiopic princes. We therefore take קו־קו = "command, command:" there was much commanding, but short and sharp. The meaning "power, strength," which some assume only for our text, after Arabian analogy, is not satisfactorily established. We do perfectly well with the meaning nearest at hand. Egypt, as is well known, is a gift of the Nile (comp. EBER'S Egypten u. d. Bücher Mosis, I. p. 21. FRAAS, Aus dem Orient, geologische Beobachtungen am Nil, auf der Sinai-Halbinsel u. in Syrien, 1867, p. 207). But what the Nile gives to Egypt it has stolen in Ethiopia. Therefore the expression "whose land rivers carry away" corresponds exactly with the fact. It appears in a measure as a Nemesis accomplished by nature that Ethiopia, in return for "the down treading" practised by it, should succumb to the spoiling done by the rivers flowing through it. The nation of Ethiopia therefore is summoned to the strife. A collision impends. It must be attended with important consequences. All inhabitants of the world (comp. xxvi. 9, 18), especially the dwellers of the territory concerned, must be on the look-out when the signals for the combat are given; for something of moment will happen.

CHAPTER XVIII. 4–6.

4 FOR so the LORD said unto me, [a]I will take my rest,
And I will [1b]consider in my dwelling-place
Like a clear heat [2c]upon herbs,
And like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest.
5 For afore the harvest, when the [d]bud is perfect,
[e]And the sour grape is ripening in the flower,
[f]He shall both cut off the sprigs with pruning hooks,
And take away and cut down the branches.
6 They shall be left together unto the fowls of the mountains,
And to the beasts of the earth,
And the fowls shall summer upon them,
And all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them.

[1] Or, regard my set dwelling. [2] Or, after rain.

[a] I will rest or be quiet. [b] look on. [c] by daylight.
[d] the bloom. [e] And the flower becomes a ripening grape. [f] One.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 4. According to K'thibh אֶשְׁקוֹטָה is to be read; according to K'ri אֶשְׁקְטָה (comp. אֶשְׁקוֹלָה Ezra viii. 25. EWALD, § 40 b; 41 c; 68 b). The form written plene with the accent drawn back, is of course not normal. Precisely for this reason the Masorets chose the other. But HITZIG may not be wrong when he says, that the double checking of the voice with twice raising it between depressions fittingly depicts the agreeable repose in equipoise. שָׁקַט xiv. 7; lxii. 1.——מָכוֹן principally used of the divine throne, comp. on iv. 5; Ps. xxxiii. 13.——I take כְּ before חֹם in the sense of comparison, and not in that of coincidence as in vers. 3, 5; see under Exegetical. For what "clear heat," etc., and "a dew-cloud" is for harvest, such is Jehovah's quiet waiting for the Assyrian.—חֹם is "warmth, heat;" only here in Isaiah.——צַח (comp. xxxii. 4) is "bright, clear." עֲלֵי אוֹר is = "by daylight" (comp. Am. viii. 9; Hab. iii. 4, etc.). עַל is taken here in the cumulative sense, which it often has (Gen. xxxii. 12; Exod. xxxv. 22; 1 Sam. xiv. 32, etc.). Thus it is properly: "heat added to daylight;" for it can be cold during daylight.—עָב טַל "dew-cloud," is the light cloud that at night dissolves in dew (comp. עָב מַלְקוֹשׁ Prov xvi. 15, whereas עָב Exod. xix. 9 = עֲבִי).

Ver. 5. כְּתָם־פֶּרַח (כְּ like ver. 3, פרח v. 24) is followed by a phrase in which, Hebrew fashion, the discourse relapses into the verb. finit.——בֹּסֶר (only here in Isaiah; comp. Jer. xxxi. 29 sq.; Ezek. xviii. 2) is the unripe grape.——גָּמַל, which elsewhere means "disaccustom, wean," (xi. 8; xxviii. 9) is used here in a sense derived from that. The mother, that weans her child, has brought it to a certain degree of maturity. But, beside the present, the word occurs in the sense of "ripeness" only Num. xvii. 23; it must be noted beside that גָּמַל is to be taken in a transitive sense. For in Num. xvii. 23 this is undoubtedly the case, and Gen. xl. 10 it reads in the same sense הִבְשִׁילוּ אַשְׁכְּלֹתֶיהָ עֲנָבִים, "their grape-stalks cooked grapes;" בֹּסֶר is accordingly meant for a degree of development of the vine that produces ripe grapes.——It appears as if the Prophet had in mind Gen. xl. 10; for both כְּפֹרַחַת and נִצָּה and the words already quoted recall our passage.——נִצָּה "the flower, blossom," occurs only here in Isaiah; beside this, Job xv. 33. נִצָּה, moreover, is subject; thus the predicate is put emphatically in advance.—With וְכָרַת begins the apodosis. Jehovah need not be taken as subject, and therewith the substitution of the Prophet as speaker. The subject is indefinite. We express it by "one" (vi. 10; x. 4; xiv. 32).——זלזלים (ἅπ. λεγ.) are "the branches" of the vine; נטישות "the shoots, sprouts" that develop from it (only here in Isaiah, Jer. v. 10; xlviii. 32).——הֵתַז, ἅπ. λεγ.

Ver. 6. עָיִט, beside here, only xlvi. 11.——קָץ, "summering," and יֶחֱרָף, "wintering," are both denominatives from קַיִץ and חֹרֶף, and are ἅπαξ λεγόμενα.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet has intimated that something great impends (ver. 3)—he now declares wherein it consists. He can say it because Jehovah revealed it to him. That is the LORD has announced to him, that He would keep altogether quiet as a mere observer. Like warmth and dew ripen the harvest, so, by the favor of His non-intervention, the power of the Assyrians will be brought almost to the greatest prosperity (ver. 4). Almost! For before this highest point is attained, the Assyrian power shall be destroyed, like one destroys a vine, by cutting off, not merely the grapes, but the grape branches and the sprouts (ver. 5). So terrible will this overthrow be, that the beasts of prey shall all through summer and winter find abundant to devour on the field of battle (ver. 6).

2. For so——winter upon them.—Vers. 4–6. The LORD purposely abstains from interfering. He quietly allows matters to take their own course, He waits patiently till His time comes. This quiet, observant waiting the Prophet compares to that weather which is most favorable for maturing the harvest: warm days and dewy nights. The ancients conceived of the dew as originating like the rain. This appears, e. g., from Job xxxviii. 28, where the אֶגְלֵי טָל "drops of dew," are the receptacula roris (COD. ALEX. συνοχαὶ δρόσου. The summer heat, the nightly dew, is an extraordinary benefit to vegetation. Therefore dew is so often used as the figure for blessing: Gen. xxvii. 28; Deut. xxxiii. 13, 28; Hos. xiv. 6; Mic. v. 6; Prov. xix. 12. The causal כִּי, "for," at the beginning of ver. 5 connects two thoughts that are impliedly contained in vers. 4 and 5: the LORD observes this expectant conduct, because only immediately before maturity of events will He interfere. "Harvest" is evidently to be taken in the wide sense that includes also the wine harvest. By an emphatic asyndeton wherein the second word (התז, "to cut down") explains the first (הסיר, "to take away"), it is now affirmed that the enemy, that is, Assyria, shall be thoroughly destroyed. For there will not be merely a gleaning of grapes (comp. lxiii. 1 sqq.), but from the vine shall be cut off the very branches that yield fruit. The meaning of what has been said, becomes evident from the literal language of ver. 6. It means a terrible overthrow of the Assyrian army. Its dead bodies lie in such vast numbers that birds and beasts of prey for a summer and a winter, shall find abundance of food on the field of battle. "Beasts of the earth," comp. Deut. xxviii. 26, of which passage, moreover, our whole verse serves to remind one.

CHAPTER XVIII. 7.

7 In that time shall [a]the present be brought unto the LORD of hosts
[b]Of a people [1][c]scattered and peeled,
And from a people terrible [d]from their beginning hitherto;

A nation [e]meted out and trodden under foot,
Whose land the rivers have spoiled,
To the place of the name of the LORD of hosts, the mount Zion.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Only עַם and מֵעַם present difficulty.——It is ungrammatical to supply the preposition before עַם from מֵעַם. To amend the text by prefixing the מ is needless violence.——הוּבַל in Isaiah again liii. 7; lv. 12.——שַׁי, of uncertain derivation, is found again only Ps. lxviii. 30; lxxvi. 12.—The expression מְקוֹם שֵׁם ^ occurs only here: yet comp. Lev. xiv. 13; Isa. lx. 13; lxvi. 1.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The gaze of the Prophet embraces the immediate and the most remote future, while he overleaps all time spaces that lie between as unessential. The consequence of that mighty overthrow will be this, that Ethiopia presents itself as a sacrificial gift to the LORD, and that out of this people will be sent sacrificial gifts to the spot where men call on the name of the LORD.

2. In that time——mount Zion.—Ver. 7. By the "in that time" the Prophet joins what follows close on to what precedes. Although what ver. 7 affirms belongs to the remote future, yet the Prophet sees it as the great chief effect immediately after the cause, vers. 5 and 6.——By עַם and מֵעַם the Prophet would say that the entire nation shall be brought to the LORD as present, tribute, or sacrificial gift; that is it will bring itself—a thought, that is familiar: lxvi. 20; Ps. lxviii. 32,—that also, in consequence thereof, presents out of the nation will be brought to the place of the worship of Jehovah. For that is two different things; in order to bring itself, the nation does not need to leave its own place; but in order to bring presents to the sanctuary of the LORD, there must be a motion from one place to another. Therefore a double definition appears, for "there shall be brought a present:" 1) "to the LORD of hosts a people," 2) "from the people dreaded," etc. "to the place," etc.——The passage Zeph. iii. 10 is a reminiscence of our text.

CHAPTER XIX. XX.

a) EGYPT NOW AND IN TIME TO COME.

CHAPTER XIX.

Various expositors from EICHHORN to HITZIG have attacked the genuineness of this chapter in whole or in part. But one may judge in advance how little valid the alleged reasons for this are, by the fact that KNOBEL rejects them all, and is decided in his recognition of Isaiah, as its author. We may therefore spare ourselves the investigation of these doubts, and so much the more as in our exposition of particulars, it will appear how very much the thoughts and expressions correspond to Isaiah's way of thinking and speaking. The chapter is very artistically arranged. It evidently divides into three parts of which the first (vers. 1–15) shows how the LORD by His judgments reveals His arm to the Egyptians (lii. 10; liii. 1); the second (vers. 16–17), as a transition, sets forth how Egypt fears before Jehovah; finally the third (vers. 18–25) presents the prospect that Egypt will fear the LORD as third in the confederation with Assyria and Israel.

א) How the LORD reveals His arm to the Egyptians by severe judgments.

CHAPTERS XIX. 1–15.

1 THE BURDEN OF EGYPT.
Behold, the LORD rideth upon a swift cloud,
And [a]shall come into Egypt:
And the idols of Egypt [b]shall be moved at his presence,
And the heart of Egypt [c]shall melt in the midst of it.
2 And I will [1] set [d]the Egyptians against the Egyptians:
And they shall fight every one against his brother,
And every one against his [e]neighbor;

City against city,
And kingdom against kingdom.
3 And the spirit of Egypt [2]shall fail in the midst thereof;
And I will [3]destroy the counsel thereof:
And they shall seek to the idols, and to the [f]charmers,
And to [g]them that have familiar spirits, and to the wizzards.
4 And [h]the Egyptians will I [4]give over into the hand of a [i]cruel lord;
And a [j]fierce king shall rule over them,
Saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts.
5 And the waters shall fail from the sea,
And the river shall be wasted and dried up.
6 And [k]they shall turn the rivers far away;
And the brooks of [l]defence shall be emptied and dried up:
[m]The reeds and flags shall wither.
7 The [n]paper reeds by the brooks, [o]by the mouth of the brooks,
And [p]everything sown by the brooks,
Shall wither, be driven away, [5]and be no more.
8 The fishers also shall mourn,
And all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament,
And they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish.
9 Moreover they that work in fine flax,
And they that weave [6]networks, shall be confounded.
10 And [q]they shall be broken in the [7]purposes thereof:
All that make sluices and ponds [8]for fish.
11 [r]Surely the princes of Zoan are fools,
[s]The counsel of the wise counsellors of Pharaoh is become brutish:
How say ye unto Pharaoh,
I am the son of the wise,
The son of ancient kings?
12 Where are they? where are thy wise men?
And let them tell thee now, and let them know
What the LORD of hosts hath purposed upon Egypt.
13 The princes of Zoan are [t]become fools,
The princes of Noph are deceived;
[u]They have also seduced Egypt, even they that are[9] [10]the stay of the tribes thereof.
14 The LORD hath mingled [11]a perverse spirit in the midst thereof:
And they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof,
As a drunken man staggereth in his vomit.
15 Neither shall there be any work for Egypt,
Which the head or tail, branch or rush may do.

Ver. 1. נוע is one of the words that occur only in the first part of Isaiah: vi. 4; vii. 2; xxiv. 20; xxxvii. 22.—קֶרֶב, in some sense as the enclosure that contains the לֵב or רוּחַ, frequent: xxvi. 9; lxiii. 11; Ps. xxxix. 4; li. 12; lv. 5, etc.——אלילים, see on ii. 8.——ולב מ׳ יכם, see on xiii. 7.

Ver. 2. On סִכְסַךְ comp. at ix. 10.

Ver. 3. נבקה comp. GREEN Gr., § 141, 1; Isa. xxiv. 1, 3.——אִטִּים, ἅπ. λεγ., probably kindred to לְאַט, which is used of the soft murmuring of a brook, viii. 6, and of soft, slow, gentle stepping or acting, Gen. xxxiii. 14; 2 Sam. xviii. 5, etc.——אבות and יִדְּעֹנִים, compare on viii. 19.

Ver. 4. אֲדֹנִים, Plural, with the abstract notion of dominion, comp. Gen. xxxix. 20; xliii. 30, 33; in Isa. again only xxvi. 13.——עָז xxv. 8; xliii. 16; lvi. 11.——סכר, properly "to shut up," only here in Isaiah.

Ver. 5. The form נִשְּׁתוּ, as also נִשְּׁתָה xli. 17, and נִשְּׁתָה Jer. li. 30 can be referred to שָׁתָת (comp. Ps. lxxiii. 9; lxxxviii. 7), as is done by Hitzig, if the meaning "to seat oneself," desidere suited our passage and xli. 17. But in both places (also xix. 5 on account of the מִן before הַיָּם) it is too evident that the meaning "exaruit, to become dry," is demanded by the context. Moreover the whole of verse 5 is with little alteration taken from Job xiv. 11. For there it reads:— אָזְלוּ מַיִם מִנִּי־יָם וְנָהָר יֶחֱרַב וְיָבֵשׁ. It is seen that the expressions differ somewhat in the first clause, while in the second clause they are literally alike. Job employs the language as the figure for growing old and dying off, without any reference to the Nile. Isaiah applies it to the Nile particularly, and hence exchanges אזלו (diffluunt) for נשתו.

Ver. 6. There is no substantive אָזְנָח; so הֶאֱזְנִיחוּ may not be taken as denominativum, though even Ewald (§ 126 b) adopts the view. Olshausen (§ 255 b) explains the form as simply a blunder; הִזְנִיחוּ is to be restored. The meaning must be "to produce, to spread a stench."——The plural נהרות occurs only here in the first part of Isaiah; in the second part: xli. 18; xliii. 15; xliii. 2, 19, 20; xliv. 27; xlvii. 2; l. 2. נהרים xviii. 1, 2, 7; xxxiii. 21.——דָּלַל comp. xxxviii. 14; xvii. 4.——On מָצוֹר see Exeg. Com. on ver. 1.——יְאוֹר is an Egyptian word. According to Ebers (l. c. I. p. 338) the sacred name of the Nile in the hieroglyphic text is Hapi, the profane name, on the other hand, Aur. Along with the latter name often stands aa, i. e., "great," therefore, Aur-aa—great river. The ancient hieratic form Aur became, in the mouth of the people, iar or ial (r and l are exchanged according to fancy in Egyptian, Ebers, p. 96). From Aur-aa came iaro. So the word sounds also in Koptic. The plural יארים occurs xxxiii. 21, of water ditches, used for defence; Job xxviii. 1 of the shafts that the miner digs. Otherwise the word is used only of the canals of the Nile: Exod. vii. 19; viii. 1, etc. Comp. vii. 18; xxxvii. 25; 2 Kings xix. 24.——קָנֶה "cane," hence κανών, canalis, xxxv. 7; xxxvi. 6; xlii. 3; xliii. 24; xlvi. 6.——סוּף "a reed," Exod. ii. 3, 5; only here in Isaiah. קָמַל (קָמֵל) kindred to אָמַל "marcescere, to languish," occurs again only xxxiii. 9.

Ver. 7. עָרוֹת (from עָרָה, nudum esse, loca nuda), occurs only in this place. These ערות evidently correspond to the Egyptian אָחוּ (Gen. xli. 2; Job viii. 11), the Nile, or reed, or rush-meadow on the bank of the Nile. Comp. Ebers l. c. p. 338.—— פִּי יְאוֹר can hardly signify "the mouthing." For wherefore should only the meadows at the mouthing of the Nile wither? Rather (comp. Ps. cxxxiii. 2) the mouth of the Nile here is the same as the lips of the Nile elsewhere (שְׂפַת הַיְאֹר Gen. xli. 3, hieroglyphic sept., Ebers, l. c. p. 339.——מִזְרָע, ἅπ. λεγ. can mean here only "the place of sowing, the sowed field" (comp. זֶרַע שִׁחֹר xxiii. 3).——נדף, dispellere, dissipare, occurs again only xli. 2.——וְאָנוּ a form of expression that occurs relatively the oftenest in Job: iii. 21; xxiii. 8; xxiv. 24; xxvii. 19. Comp. beside Psalms xxxvii. 10; ciii. 16; Prov. xxiii. 5, etc.

Ver. 8. אָנוּ comp. iii. 26.——חַכָּה and מכמרת are found only here in Isaiah; on the former compare Job xl. 25; on the latter, Hab. i. 15.——אֻמְלָלוּ comp. on xvi. 8.

Ver. 9. פשתים שריקות are lina pectinata, i. e., linen stuff made of hackeled, pure, fine flax. שריקות ἅπ. λεγ.; so also is חוֹרִי. The root of the latter חָוַר (xxix. 22) means candidum, then nobilem, splendidum esse. We encounter this meaning again in חֹר nobilis, חֹרִי "fine, white bread," (Gen. xl. 16), probably, too, in the proper names חוּרָם (ingenuus) חִירָה (nobilitas). Accordingly חֹרִי would be "a fine white garment." Whether the stuff was linen or cotton is not to be determined from the word itself. The distinction from פִּשְׁתִּים rather favors the opinion that it was cotton. The ending ַי is an old singular ending; comp. Ewald, § 164, c; 177 a.

Ver. 10. The word שָׁתוֹת occurs again only Ps. xi. 3; and there means undoubtedly "pillars, posts." This meaning suits perfectly in this place also. Only verse 10 is not to be connected with what precedes, but is to be construed as the theme for what follows, yet in the sense that the following verses specify exclusively the notion שתות. Only at the end of ver. 15 the underlying thought of ver. 10 recurs. For "head and tail, palm branch and rush" is only another expression for that which is called "foundation pillars and hired laborers."——שֶׂכֶר (compare שָׂכִיר, mercenarius) means "merces, pay," and occurs again only Prov. xi. 18. They are, therefore, "quæstum facientes, hired laborers;" a comprehensive designation of the lower classes.——The expression אַגְמֵי נפש recalls אַגְמֵי מַיִם xiv. 23. The meaning "troubled," which some give to אגמי in our text, would form a solitary instance. Everywhere else the word means "stagnum, palus" (xxxv. 7; xli. 18; xlii. 15), or "arundinetum" (Jer. li. 32). The word is used for the pools, puddles, swamps made by the Nile (Exod. vii. 19; viii. 1).

Ver. 11. בִּעֵר is verb. denom. from בַּעַר, brutus, stolidus. The Niph. only here in Isaiah; comp. Jer. x. 14, 21.——אֲנִי, this is said because the prophet has in mind a single priest: he thinks, perhaps, of the ἀρχιερεύς, "the chief of the entire priesthood," (Ebers, l. c. p. 344).

Ver. 13. נוֹאֲלוּ, "infatuated," only here in Isa; comp. Num. xii. 11; Jer. v. 4; l. 36.——נִשְּׁאוּ, "betrayed;" Niph. only here; Hiph. xxxvi. 14; xxxvii. 10.——נֹף = מֹף Memphis (comp. Delitzsch and Brugsch Hist. d'Egypte).——פִּנָּה "the corner;" then by metonymy for (אֶבֶן פ׳ "the corner-stone," Job xxxviii. 6; comp. Isa. xxviii. 16; Jer. li. 26; Ps. cxviii. 22.

Ver. 14. עִוְעִים, "perverseness," ἅπ. λεγ., compare רוּחַ שֶׁקֶר 1 Kings xxii. 22 sq.——בקרבה see on ver. 1. מָסַךְ; v. 22.

Ver. 15. וְ before זנב and אגמון is here equivalent to "or" (comp. Ewald, § 352, a; Jer. xliv. 28.)

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Jehovah draws near to the judgment against Egypt: the idols flee, the nation is dispirited (ver. 1). This is the theme of the discourse. In what follows the Prophet lets the LORD Himself set forth how He means to carry out in detail what is announced in ver. 1. The Egyptians shall war on one another (ver. 2); bereft of all prudent deliberation, they shall seek counsel from the idols and wizards (ver. 3). But it is of no use. Egypt is subjected to a harsh rule (ver. 4). The Nile dries up; its rushes and canes wither (vers. 5, 6), and also the meadows and fields on its banks (ver. 7); its fisheries come to a miserable end (ver. 8); the preparation of linen and cotton stuff ceases (ver. 9). The highest as well as the lowest classes are ruined (ver. 10); the priests and the wise men that boast an ancient royal descent are at an end with their wisdom; they know not what the LORD has determined concerning Egypt (vers. 11, 12); they are altogether perplexed in their thoughts, so that they only lead Egypt about in a maze (vers. 13, 14). Neither for the highest nor the lowest does labor for the general benefit succeed any more (ver. 15).

2. The burden——midst of it.—Ver. 1. Mizraim, is not the native name for the land of Egypt. The ancient Egyptians never used it. It is neither to be found in the hieroglyphic inscriptions, nor can it be explained from the Koptic language. The Egyptians called their land (the Nile valley) Cham; Koptic, Keme, Kemi, Chemi (i. e. "black"). Mizraim is the name given to the land by its eastern, Semitic neighbors. EBERS (l. c., p. 71 sqq.) proceeds from מָצוֹר, which means coarctatio, and then munimentum, "fortification" (Ps. xxxi. 22; lx. 11; Mic. vii. 12; Hab. ii. 1, etc.). Egypt is so named, Isa. xix. 6; xxxvii. 25; 2 Kings xix. 24; Mic. vii. 12. EBERS maintains that the eastern neighbors so named Lower Egypt primarily, from the circumvallation that extended through the entire Isthmus, from Sues of Pelusium to the Red Sea, and thus completely shut off Lower Egypt from the East; so that it was an אֶרֶץ מָצוֹר, "a land shut off by fortification" for those eastern neighbors. But when the Hyksos had forced an entrance into the land, they learned for the first that it was far larger than they had supposed, viz., that it extended beyond the southern extremity of the fortification far up the Nile to the cataracts: in other words they learned that there was a Lower and an Upper Egypt. Hence the dual מִצְרַיִם. Although the normal dual of מָצוֹר would sound differently, yet EBERS is right in saying that the inflection of proper names often takes its own peculiar form (l. c., p. 86). It is debatable whether the original distinction between מָצוֹר and מִצְרַיִם was afterwards strictly adhered to. In Isa. xi. 11, מצרים is evidently used in the narrower sense in which מצור was originally used. [" מִצְרַיִם is here the name of the ancestor (Gen. x 6), put for his descendants." J. A. A.—"Mizraim, or Misrim, the name given to Egypt in the Scriptures, is in the plural form, and is the Hebrew mode of expressing the 'two regions of Egypt' (so commonly met with in the hieroglyphics), or the 'two Miser,' a name still used by the Arabs, who call Egypt, as well as Cairo, Musk, or Misr." WILKINSON'S Mann. and Cust. of Anc. Egypt, I. 2, quoted by BARNES in loc., who adds: "The origin of the name 'Egypt' is unknown. Egyptus is said by some to have been an ancient king of the country"].

Jehovah sets out for Egypt to hold an assize there. He rides swiftly thither on light clouds (Ps. xviii. 11; lxviii. 34). Egypt's idols flee before Him. They recognize in Him their lord and master, Luke iv. 34. The people are dispirited; their courage sinks. One is involuntarily reminded of the visitation Egypt once before experienced on the part of Jehovah (Exod. xii. 12). Idols and people of Egypt have once before felt the power of Jehovah: just for this reason they flee and tremble before Him (comp. Jer. xlvi. 25; Ezek. xxx. 13; 1 Sam. v. 3).

3. And I will set——Lord of hosts.—Vers. 2-4. DUNCKER (Gesch. des Alterth., I. p. 602) says: "It cannot be determined whether this passage refers to the anarchy that followed the expulsion of the Ethiopians (DIODOR., I. 66) about the year 695, or the contests that preceded Psammetichus' ascending the throne (between 678–670)." But it appears that the anarchy after the withdrawal of the Ethiopians was not considerable. HERODOTUS (II. 147) especially praises the beautiful harmony of the Dodecarche. And if misunderstandings did arise, they might be taken into the Prophet's comprehensive glance as essentially of the same sort with those that soon after preceded the sole dominion of Psammetichus. Such periods of internal discord, any way, occurred often in Egypt. Thus a papyrus discovered by HARRIS in 1855, and belonging to the time of Ramses III., leaf 75 sqq. informs us: "The land of Egypt fell into a decline: every one did as he pleased, long years there was no sovereign for them, that had the supreme power over the rest of things. The land of Egypt belonged to the princes in the districts. One killed another in jealousy." Comp. EISENLOHR, The great HARRIS Papyrus; a lecture, Leipzig, 1872. Thus even the disturbances with which Egypt was visited in consequence of the irruption of the Ethiopian king Pianchi Meramen may be included, which STADE (De Is. vatt. aeth., p. 30 sqq.) holds to be intended by the cruel lord and fierce king ver. 4. For when Isaiah wrote, if the date given above is correct, the events under Pianchi Meramen belonged to the past and not to the future. By the aid of Ionian and Karian pirates (HEROD. II. 152) Psammetichus subdued his opponents, after an eight years' contest, in the decisive battle of Momemphis.

What the Prophet says (ver. 3) of the emptying out of the spirit of Egypt and swallowing up its counsel (comp. iii. 12) indicates the impotence of the rulers to help the situation with such means as shall be at their command. In their extremity they will apply to their idols, their interpreters, i. e. "the mutterers." But in vain. Egypt is handed over to a harsh rule and a stern king. It cannot be denied that these terms apply very well to Psammetichus and the subsequent kings of his race, Necho and Hophra, for they called in foreign help to the support of their dominion, and gave thereby a blow to the old Egyptian existence from which it never recovered. We are told by DIODORUS (I. 67) and HERODOTUS (II. 30) that, in consequence of the favor that Psammetichus showed to foreigners, more than 200,000 Egyptians of the military caste emigrated to Ethiopia during the reign of that king. Under Necho, of the laborers on the canal that was to connect the Nile with the Red Sea, 120,000 perished (HER. II. 158). Hophra or Apries was dethroned because an expedition against Cyrene, for which he had employed an army composed only of Egyptians, ended in severe defeat. For his conduct was construed to be an intentional devotion of the Egyptians to destruction (HEROD. II. 161-169; IV. 159). These and other historical events may be regarded as belonging to the fulfilment of our prophecy. But they do not exhaust it. Nothing was less in Isaiah's mind than to make those transactions the subject of special prediction. How would we in that case apply what follows, where he speaks of the Nile drying up and vegetation ceasing? Can this, too, be meant literally? By both declarations the Prophet means only to announce to Egypt a judgment by which, on both sides of its life, the historical and the natural, it shall be reduced to extremities. This judgment has not been realized by only one or a few definite events. It is realized by every thing that precedes the conversion of Egypt to Jehovah (ver. 21 sqq.) and contributes to it; and to that belongs, above all, its oppression by a foe from without, that is by Assyria. This moment, it is true, does not appear especially in chapt. xix., but to the presentation of this the complementary chapt. xx. is exclusively devoted.

4. And the waters —— confounded.—Vers. 5-9. The Nile is called a sea (comp. xviii. 2; xxvii. 1; Nah. iii. 8; Mic. vii. 12?), not merely because of its normal breadth within its own banks, but also because it really spreads out like a sea at the time of overflow, which to suit the context, must be regarded as the special allusion here. Hence HERODOTUS (II. 97) calls it "the sea of Egypt." Comp. PLIN. Hist. nat., 35, 11. "The water of the Nile resembles a sea." SENECA Quaest. nat. IV. 2. "At first it abates, then by continued accession of waters it spreads out into the appearance of a broad and turbid sea," GESEN. in loc. If יָם, "sea" designates the Nile in its overflow, then נהר means the stream within its normal bed, and the נהרות, "streams" and יארים "ditches," mean the arms and canals of the Nile. With the drying up of the Nile and its branches perishes, of course, the vegetation that depends on them, and thus also the fisheries and the important manufacture of linen and cotton. On the extraordinary, productive fisheries of the Nile, comp. WILKINSON, l. c. I. and II. Linen garments were especially worn by the priests. In the temples they were allowed to wear only linen garments. All mummy bandages also were required to be of linen. On the manufacture of linen and cotton in Egypt, see WILKINSON II.

5. And they shall be broken —— rush, may do.—Vers. 10-15. In these verses the Prophet portrays the ruin of Egypt in another aspect of its national life, viz.: the division into castes, in which he especially sets forth the highest class as overtaken by the ruin. By שתות (see under Text. and Gram.), is not to be understood the lower classes (HENDEWERK and EWALD) nor weaving (with a reference to שִׁית, שָׁת, ROORDA, ROSENMUELLER and others). They are the upper classes, the highest castes (comp. iii. 1). These shall be מדכאים i. e., "cast down, crumbled to ruins" (comp. liii 5, 10; iii. 15; lvii. 15), what is thus predicated corresponding to the figurative meaning of the subject, in which I see an allusion to the ruins. For already in Isaiah's time there were buildings in Egypt whose origin dated back more than a thousand years.

Is it not fitting that the Prophet compares the humiliation of the grandees of Egypt to the ruins of its ancient buildings, and the sorely visited lower classes to swamps of its Nile? (See Text. and Gram. on ver. 10).

In what follows he depicts further the coming to nought of the grandees, setting forth especially the bankruptcy of their wisdom, so celebrated of old (Acts vii. 22; HEROD. IV. 6, 77, 160). The princes of Zoan are only fools. (Zoan = Tanis, the royal residence of Lower Egypt, situated in the Delta of the Nile, comp. EBERS, l. c., I. p. 272 sqq.; identical with Ramses, according to BRUGSCH, address before the Oriental Congress, London, 1874). "The sages among the counsellors of Pharaoh," are properly those of the counsellors who alone deserve the predicate "wise." The expression recalls חַכְמוֹת שָׂרוֹתֶיהָ "her wise ladies" in the song of Deborah (Jud. v. 29) which must also be translated: "the wisest among her princesses." On the חֲכָמִים, the priestly counsellors of Pharaoh, see EBERS, l. c. I. p. 341 sqq.

As to the name Pharaoh, it reads in the hieroglyphic and hieratic writing "Peraa" or "Perā," which means literally "great house" (comp. sublime Porte). Comp. EBERS, p. 263 sqq. The word designates also simply the king's palace (EBERS, ibid.).

The Prophet assumes that the Egyptian priests base their claim to wisdom on two circumstances: 1) on their antiquity, 2) on their high, royal origin. If the ancient kings were of a priestly race, which is correctly assumed, and if the wisdom of the priests was traditional, then the counsel which they gave the king originated from a source which must enjoy the highest consideration in his eyes. How lamentably, says Isaiah, must this counsel, proceeding from such high authority, come to confusion. Did they know what God had determined against Egypt, they could then take measures against it (ver. 12). As it is they are in a maze. They are themselves infatuated, and deceived; hence the "corner-stone of its tribes" (i. e., the tribe, viz.: the class on which the whole Egyptian body politic rests; the priestly class) leads the whole land astray (ver. 13). The LORD has, in fact, as it were, mingled a spirit of perverseness in the inward part of Egypt, so that by the very ones in whom, so to speak, the understanding of the land concentrated, the land is led astray in the most shameful manner. This shameful leading astray he expresses by a very revolting figure: he compares Egypt to a drunken man rolling about hither and thither in his own vomitings (ver. 14). Comp. xxviii. 8; Jer. xlviii. 26 uses the same figure of Moab.——Thus Egypt becomes poor in deeds. All it does is nothing done. Neither head nor tail; neither palm-branch nor rush, i. e., neither the highest nor the lowest (comp. on ix. 13). will accomplish anything. With this the Prophet returns back to the thought from which (ver. 9) he started out.

3) The Transition: Egypt fears the LORD.

CHAPTER XIX. 16, 17.

16 In that day shall Egypt be like unto women:
And it shall be afraid and fear
[a]Because of the shaking of the hand of the LORD of hosts,
Which he shaketh over it.
17 And the land of Judah shall be a terror unto Egypt,
Every one that [b]maketh mention thereof shall be afraid in himself,
Because of the counsel of the LORD of hosts,
Which he hath determined against it.

[a] From before the lifting of the hand, etc., which He lifteth against it. [b] recalls it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1] Ver. 16. חרד comp. x. 29; xxxii. 10; xli. 5.——פחד xii. 2; xxxiii. 14; xliv. 8, 11; lx. 5.——The verb הֵנִיף we have already read of the hand lifted up in threatening: xi. 15, comp. x. 15, 32; xiii. 2; xxx. 28.——תנופה, frequent in the Pentateuch, occurs in Isaiah only here and xxx. 32.——Regarding the expression אדמת יהודה it is to be remarked that, apart from the frequent אדמת ישראל in Ezekiel, אדמה never occurs in connection with the name of a nation except here and Gen. xlvii. 20, 26, in the expression אדמת מצרים.——חָגָּא (from חָגַג, circulare, tripudiare), "the revolving movement of dizziness," is ἅπ. λεγ.——The expression כֹּל אֲשֶׁר וגו׳, is a resolving of the otherwise usual participial construction, on which comp. EWALD, § 337, c, sq. —The Hiph. הִזְכִּיר is frequent in Isaiah: xii. 4; xxvi. 13; xxxvi. iii. 22; xliii. 26; xlviii. 1; lxii. 6, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The discourse is artistically arranged: according to the foregoing, Egypt still thinks it may be saved by its own wisdom. Now it has surrendered this hope. It trembles before the threatening gesture of Jehovah's hand (ver. 16). In fact, whenever the land of Judah is thought of, Egypt quakes with fear lest the decree of Jehovah may be accomplished (ver. 17).

2. The expression of Isaiah "in that day" which is peculiar to the first part (in the second it occurs only lii. 6) appears with more frequency in the present chapter, than in any other passage: viz.: vers. 16, 18, 19, 21, 23, 24. Comp. the remark at ii. 12. As often as one utters the name Judah, men turn affrighted to him, for they know but too well the power of the God of Judah. The counsel of Jehovah, then, of which ver. 12 speaks, must have been partly accomplished. Men fear its further and complete fulfilment.

4) EGYPT BY DEGREES CONVERTED WHOLLY TO THE LORD, AND THE THIRD IN THE CONFEDERATION WITH ASSYRIA AND ISRAEL.

CHAPTER XIX. 18-25.

18 In that day [a]shall five cities in the land of Egypt
[b]Speak [1]the language of Canaan,
And [c]swear to the LORD of hosts;
One shall be called, [d]The city of [2]destruction.
19 In that day shall there be an altar to the LORD
In the midst of the land of Egypt,
And a pillar at the border thereof to the LORD.
20 And it shall be for a sign and for a witness
Unto the LORD of hosts in the land of Egypt:

For they shall cry unto the LORD because of the oppressors,
And he shall send them a Saviour, and [e]a great one,
[f]And he shall deliver them.
21 And the LORD shall be known to Egypt,
And [g]the Egyptians shall know the LORD in that day,
And shall do sacrifice and oblation;
[h]Yea, they shall vow a vow unto the LORD, and perform it.
22 And the LORD shall smite Egypt: he shall smite and heal it:
And they shall return even to the LORD,
And he shall be intreated of them, and shall heal them.
23 In that day shall there be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria,
And [i]the Assyrian shall come into Egypt,
And [j]the Egyptian into Assyria,
And [k]the Egyptians shall serve with [l]the Assyrians.
24 In that day shall Israel be the third With Egypt and Assyria.
25 Even a blessing in the midst of the [m]land: [n]whom the LORD of hosts [o]shall bless, saying:
Blessed be Egypt my people,
And Assyria the work of my hands,
And Israel mine inheritance.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 18. The expression שְׂפַת כ׳ occurs only here.—נִשְׁבַּע with לְ must be distinguished from its use with בְּ. The latter is "to swear by one" (lxii. 8; Amos vi. 8; viii. 7, etc.); the former is "to swear, to oblige one's-self to another by oath," (Zeph. i. 5; Gen. xxiv. 7; l. 24; Exod. xiii. 5; Ps. cxxxii. 2, etc.). הַהֶרֶס or הַחֶרֶס. Sixteen CODD. have the latter reading, also several editions. The LXX. indeed reads ἀσεδὲκ, which is evidently a designed alteration resulting from the application of i. 26 to the Egyptian city. But SYMM., the VULG. (civitas solis), SAADIA, the TALMUD (Menachot Fol. 110, A), also translate "city of the sun." On the other hand the majority of codices and editions have הֶרֶס, and among the ancient versions at least the SYRIAC decidedly so reads (for Ἀρές, which AQU. and THEOD. read, could stand also for חֶרֶס). Thus critically the reading הֶרֶס is the best supported. The authority of the Masora is for it. But the reading חֶרֶס is, any way, very ancient SYMMACHUS, JEROME, the TARGUMIST met with it. And it must have enjoyed equal authority with the other reading. Else the TARGUMIST would not have combined both readings when he writes: קַרְתָּא בֵּית־שֶׁמֶשׁ דַּעֲתִידָא לְמֶחֱרַב, i. e., the city "Beth-Shemes quae futura est ad evertendum, i. e., quae evertetur." And the fact that the treatise Menachot reads חֶרֶס is certainly proof that weighty authorities supported this reading. Add to this that הרס by no means affords a satisfactory sense. For the meaning "lion," which some assume from the Arabic (haris "the render") is very doubtful, first from the fact that it rests only on Arabic etymology. Yet more uncertain is the meaning liberatio, salus, amor, be it derived from the Syriac (which, as GESEN. in loc. demonstrates, rests on pure misunderstanding) or, with MAURER, from the Hebrew, by taking הֶרֶס—"tearing loose," whereas it can only mean "rending in pieces, destroying." And in this latter sense many expositors take the word. But how can a word of such mischievous import suit in a context so full of joy and comfort? CASPARI (Zeitschr. für Luth. Theol. 1841, III.), whom DRECHSLER and DELITZSCH follow, is therefore of the opinion that the Prophet, by a slight change wrote הרס instead of חרס, but will have this word הרס understood in the sense of "destroying the idolatry," like Jer. xliii. 13 prophesies the "breaking in pieces of the obelisks in the temple of the sun in the land of Egypt." But against this view is the fact that such twisting of words occurs always only in a bad sense. Thus Ezek. xxx. 17 calls the city אוֹן by the name אָוֶן; Hos. iv. 15; v. 8 (comp. Amos v. 5) calls בֵּית־אֵל by the name בֵּית־אָוֶן (for which moreover an actual and neighboring בֵּית־אָוֶן Josh. vii. 2 gave the handle); Isa. vii. 6 changes the name טָבְאֵל into טָבְאַל. although he uses it in pausa; and xxi. 11 he introduces Edom under the name of דּוּמָה ("silence of the dead") and, finally the TALMUD in the treatise Aboda sara (Fol. 46 a, in the German translation of EWALD, Nuremberg, 1856. p. 324) gives the following examples as prescribing the rule for changing the names of cities that have an idolatrous meaning: "Has such a city had the name בֵּית גַּלְיָא, "house of revelation," it should be called בֵּית כַּרְיָא "house of concealment" (or fossae, latrinae); has the city been called בֵּית מֶלֶךְ, "house of the king," it should be called בֵּית כֶּלֶב "house of the dog;" instead of עֵין כֹּל "the all-seeing eye," call it עֵין קוֹץ "the eye of thorns."—

Further examples of the kind see in BUXTORF, Lex., Chald., Talmud, et rabb., p. 1086 sq., s. v., בָּרִיא.——Thus we see that הרס as a twisting of חרס must either be opposed to the context or to the usus loquendi. I therefore hold חֶרֶס to be the original correct reading. But חרס means "the sun" (Jud. i. 35, where it is remarkable that a little before, ver. 23, a בֵּית־שֶׁמֶשׁ is mentioned——, viii. 13; xiv. 18; Job ix. 7). I think, as older expositors (comp. GESEN. in loc.) and latterly PRESSEL (HERZ. R. Encycl. X., p. 612) have conjectured, that it is not impossible that this name עִיר־ההרס in our verse was the occasion for seeking a locality near Heliopolis for the temple of Onias. The reason why it was not built immediately in or at Heliopolis was that a suitable site (ἐπιτηδειότατον τόπον) for building was found at Leontopolis, which was yet in the Nome of Heliopolis. That Onias in his petition to Philometor and Cleopatra evidently appealed in a special way to verse 19 proves nothing against the assumption that ver. 18 also had a significance for him. He even says expressly, after having quoted the contents of ver. 19: "καὶ πολλὰ δὲ προεφήτευσεν ἄλλα τοιαῦτα διὰ τὸν τόπον." But if the Egyptian temple, which, according to JOSEPHUS (Bell. Jud. 7, 10, 4), stood 343 years (it ought rather to say 243), was a great offence to the Hebrew Jews, it could easily happen that חרס of our verse was changed by them to הרס. There are in fact six MSS. that read expressly עִיר הַחֶרֶס "city of the curse;" and the Ἀσεδὲκ of the LXX. is manifestly an intentional alteration in the opposite sense.——Therefore intentional changes pro et contra have undeniably been perpetrated. Thus is explained not only the duplicate reading in general, but especially, too, the tradition of הרס as the orthodox reading, and the fixing of the same by the Masorets.—Comp. moreover, REINKE in the Tüb. theol. Quart. Schrift. 1870, Heft I., on the imputed changes of the Masoretic text in Isa. xix. 18, and the remarks of the same writer in his Beiträgen zur Erklr. des A. T. Giesen 1872, Band VIII., p. 87 sqq.

Ver. 20. The combination לאות ולעד occurs only here. Of more frequent occurrence is אות ומופת, Deut. xiii. 2; xxviii. 46; Isa. xx. 3.——רָב particip. = "contestant, champion," comp. xlv. 9; Jer. li. 36; not an uncommon use of the word in Judges: vi. 31; xi. 25; xxi. 22.

Ver. 21. עָבַד with latent transitive notion; Exod. x. 26; comp. Gen. xxx. 29.

Ver. 22. The reason why Isaiah uses the word נָגַף is probably because this word is repeatedly used of the plagues of Egypt: Exod. vii. 27; xii. 13, 23, 27; Josh. xxiv. 5——ונעתר, audientem se praestitit alicui; only here in Isaiah; comp. Gen. xxv. 21; 2 Sam. xxi. 14; xxiv. 25.

Ver. 23. מְסִלָּה see vii. 3.——עבדו can only be understood as the abbreviation of the statement that occurs entire immediately before with application there to Egypt alone. The same service (עָבַד) shall Egypt perform in union with Assyria. The Prophet could so much the more readily express himself thus, in as much as עָבַד is used also elsewhere (Job xxxvi. 11) in the same absolute way.

Ver. 24. שְׁלִישִׁיָּה is in itself tertia; yet not merely pars, but size, degree generally, designated by "three." Compare עֶגְלַת שְׁלִשִׁיָּה xv. 5. Here it is the third element, the third factor that must be added in order to make the harmony complete.

Ver. 25. אשר cannot be construed as simple relative pronoun. For then the suffix in ברכו must be referred to הארץ which will hardly do. It is therefore construed = "so that," or "since," and the suffix named is referred to the individual that each of the three forms by itself (comp. xvii. 10, 13). Therefore אשר here is a conjunction (GREEN Gr., § 239, 1).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Egypt will gradually be altogether converted to the LORD. At first, indeed, only five cities will serve Him (ver. 18), but soon the LORD will have an altar in Egypt, and a pillar dedicated to Him on the border (ver. 19) will at once announce to the approaching traveller that Egypt is a land that pays worship to Jehovah. Then, when they cry to the Lord, He will deliver them from oppression as He did Israel of old in the days of the judges (ver. 20). He will reveal Himself to them, and they will know Him and offer Him divine service in due form (ver. 21). He will, indeed, smite them like His own people, but then He will heal them again: but they will turn to Him, and He will let Himself be entreated of them (ver. 22). But not only Egypt—Assyria too will then be converted to the Lord. And between Egypt and Assyria there will be busy intercourse, and they will no more be enemies of one another, but serve the Lord in common (ver. 23). And Israel will be the third in the confederation, and that will be a great blessing from the LORD for the whole earth (ver. 24), who then will call Egypt His people, Assyria the work of His hand, but Israel always still His special inheritance.

2. In that day——destruction.—Ver. 18. The fifth is the half of ten. It appears to me to be neither a small nor a great number (CORN. A LAPIDE). But if in the ten there lies the idea of completeness, wholeness, then five is not any sort of fraction of the whole, but the half, which added to itself forms the whole. By the five the ten is assured. There does not, therefore, lie in the five the idea of the mustard seed, but rather the idea of being already half attained. From passages like Gen. xlv. 22; Exod. xxii. 1; Num. vii. 17, 23; Matt. xxv. 2, 20; 1 Cor. xiv. 19, it is not erroneously concluded that the five has a certain symbolical meaning. Besides this, in respect to the division of the year into seven months (of freedom from water) and five months (of the overflow) the five was a sacred number to the Egyptians. Comp. EBERS, l. c., p. 359: "Seven and five present themselves as especially sacred numbers." To think, as HITZIG does, of five particular cities (Heliopolis, Leontopolis, Migdol, Daphne, Memphis), is opposed to the character of the prophecy. Five cities, therefore, shall speak the language of Canaan, the sacred language, the language of the law. That is, they shall found a place in the midst of them for the worship of Jehovah.

["The construction of CALVIN (who understands five out of six to be intended) is to be preferred, because the others arbitrarily assume a standard of comparison (twenty thousand, ten thousand, ten, etc.); whereas this hypothesis finds it in the verse itself, five professing the true religion to one rejecting it. Most of the other interpretations understand the one to be included in the five, as if he had said one of them. As לאחת admits either of these senses, or rather applications, the question must depend upon the meaning given to the rest of the clause. Even on CALVIN's hypothesis, however, the proportion indicated need not be taken with mathematical precision. What appears to be meant is that five-sixths, i. e., a very large proportion, shall profess the true religion, while the remaining sixth persists in unbelief." "It shall be said to one, i. e., one shall be addressed as follows, or called by the following name. This periphrasis is common in Isaiah, but is never applied, as GESENIUS observes, to the actual appellation, but always to a description or symbolical title (see iv. 3; lxi. 6; lxii. 4). This may be urged as an argument against the explanation of הַהֶרֶס as a proper name." "All the interpretations which have now been mentioned [the one Dr. NAEGELSBACH favors being included in the number—TR.] either depart from the common text or explain it by some forced or foreign analogy. If, however, we proceed upon the only safe principle of adhering to the common text, and to Hebrew usage, without the strongest reasons for abandoning either or both, no explanation of the name can be so satisfactory as that given by CALVIN (civitas desolationis) and the ENG. VERSION ('city of destruction')." J. A. A.]

The city of destruction.—Isaiah often expresses the future existence of a person or matter by a name, of which he says it shall be applied to the person in question (i. 26; iv. 3; lxi. 6; lxii. 4). Here there seems to be intended, not so much a characteristic of the nature, as a mark that shall serve as a means for recognizing the fulfilment. For why does the Prophet give the name of only one city? Why does he not give the five cities a name in common? It seems to me that the Prophet saw five points that shone forth out of the obscurity that concealed the future of Egypt from his eyes. They are the five cities in which the worship of Jehovah shall find a place. But only one of these cities, doubtless the greatest and most considerable, does he see so clearly that he even knows its name. This name he gives—and thus is given a mark whereby to identify the time of the fulfilment. For if in the future there comes about a condition of things in Egypt corresponding to our prophecy, and if a city under those circumstances bears the name the Prophet gives here, then it is a sure sign that said condition is the fulfilment of the present prophecy. Now, from the dispersion of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar on, Egypt became, to a great part of the Israelites, a second home; in fact it became the place of a second Jehovah-Temple; later it even became a wholly Christian land.

That Jehovah-Temple was built by Onias IV. (according to another calculation II.) under Ptolomæus Philometor (180–145) at Leontopolis in the Nome of Heliopolis (JOSEPHUS Antiq. 12, 9, 7; 13, 3, 1–3; 20, 10; Bell. Jud. 7, 10, 2-4), or rather was a ruined Egyptian temple restored. Built upon a foundation sixty feet high, and constructed like a tower, this temple, of course, did not in its outward form resemble that at Jerusalem. But the altar was accurately patterned after the one in Jerusalem. Onias (and probably in opposition to his fellow-countrymen) appealed to our passage. For the building, strictly interpreted, was of course unlawful. And it was steadily opposed by the Hebrew Jews with greater or less determination. But the Egyptian Jews, as said, thought themselves authorized in the undertaking by our passage, especially ver. 19. It is not impossible that the choice of the locality was conditioned by the fact that our passage originally read עִיר הַחֶרֶס (see under Text. and Gram.) which was translated "city of the sun" and was referred to Heliopolis, the ancient On, the celebrated priestly city (Gen. xli. 45, 50; xlvi. 20). [Would it not be a juster interpretation of the fulfilment of this prophecy in regard to the foregoing application to repeat, mutatis mutandis, Dr. NAEGELSBACH's own remark in the exegetical comment on vers. 2-4 above, p. 224. "Nothing was less in Isaiah's mind than to make those transactions the subject of a special prediction. Else how then is what follows to be applied, where it speaks of a Jehovah-altar in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar or obelisk dedicated to the LORD on the border of it? Can this be meant literally? If not, then neither can ver. 18 be understood literally." Dr. NAEGELSBACH admits above that, "strictly interpreted," the building of such a temple "was of course unlawful;" and the altar must be included in this statement. But in a matter appertaining to a legal and ceremonial worship a "strict interpretation," which must mean "strictly legal," is the only admissible interpretation. Deeds of formal worship that are unlawful by that interpretation cannot be right by any other interpretation, seeing that no other applies to them. How could Isaiah refer prophetically to such a matter as the mimic temple of Jehovah at Leontopolis in such language as we have in our verses 18, 19?—TR.]

3. In that day——heal them.—Vers. 19–22. What was only hinted in ver. 18, is in ver. 19 expressly affirmed: The LORD shall have an altar in Egypt. How this was fulfilled we have indicated already above. Egypt became not only a second home to the people of Israel. [But it must be remembered that this never received the token of God's approval, who said Hos. xi. 5, "He shall not return into the land of Egypt."—TR.]. It became also the birth-place of a most significant form of development of the Jewish spirit. It became moreover a Christian land, and as such had played a prominent part in the history of the Christian church. Call to mind only ORIGEN and ATHANASIUS. If thus the prophecy of the altar of Jehovah in Egypt was literally fulfilled, so the prophecy of the מַצֵּבָה, "pillar," was fulfilled in a way not so literally, but not therefore in a less real sense. The word means statua, "standing image," cippus, "monument." Jer. xliii. 14 so designates the numerous obelisks that were in Heliopolis. Often idol pillars are so designated (1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings iii. 2; x. 27, etc.), the raising of which was expressly forbidden in the law (Lev. xxvi. 1; Deut. xvi. 22). When it is announced here that a מצבה dedicated to Jehovah would be raised up, it is not meant that this would be for the purpose of divine service. Rather we see from "at the border" and also from ver. 20 that the pillar (the obelisk) should serve merely for a sign and mark by which any one crossing the border could know at once that he treads a land that is exclusively consecrated to the service of Jehovah. Altar and pillar, each in its place,—the pillar first and preparatory, the altar afterwards in the midst of the land and definitive—shall be sign and witness of it.

When we said above that this word was fulfilled not literally, yet not therefore less really, we mean it thus: that Egypt, when it ceased to be a heathen land certainly presented just as plainly to the eye of every one entering it the traces of its confession to the true religion, as we now a days observe more or less distinctly on entering a land, how it is with religion and religiousness there. [J. A. A., on verse 19. "A just view of this passage is that it predicts the prevalence of the true religion, and the practice of its rites in language borrowed from the Mosaic or rather from the patriarchal institutions. As we might now speak of a missionary pitching his tent at Hebron—without intending to describe the precise form of his habitation, so the Prophet represents the converts to the true faith as erecting an altar and a pillar to the Lord in Egypt, as Abraham and Jacob did of old in Canaan. [So for substance also Barnes.-Tr.]. Those explanations of the verse which suppose the altar and the pillar, or the centre and the border of the land to be contrasted, are equally at variance with good taste and the usage of the language, which continually separates in parallel clauses, words and things which the reader is expected to combine. See an example of this usage xviii. 6. As the wintering of the beasts, and the summering of the birds are there intended to denote the presence of both beasts and birds throughout the year, so here the altar in the midst of the land, and the pillar at its border denote altars and pillars through its whole extent."].

In what follows we observe the effort to show that the Lord will treat Egypt just like Israel. There will be therefore a certain reciprocity: Egypt conducts itself toward the Lord like Israel, therefore will the Lord conduct Himself toward Egypt as He has done toward Israel. Thus the second half of ver. 20 reminds one of that "crying of the children of Israel to Jehovah" that is so often mentioned in the book of Judges (iii. 9, 15; iv. 3; vi. 6, etc.). In that survey of the times of the judges contained in Jud. ii. 11 sqq. (at ver. 18 comp. Jud. i. 34; vi. 9) the oppressors of Israel are called לֹחֲצִים just as here, and Jud. ii. 16, 18 the performance of the judges whom God sent to the people, is designated הוֹשִׁיעַ, and the judges are on that account expressly called מוֹשִׁיעַ "deliverers, saviours," (Jud. iii. 9, 15; vi. 36; xii. 3). הִצִּיל, too, occurs in this sense in Judges vi. 9; viii. 34; ix. 17, etc.—In consequence of these manifold mutual relations Jehovah shall become known to the Egyptians. The expression "shall be known," etc., recalls the celebrated passage Exod. vi. 3. "But by my name Jehovah, was I not known to them." There the Lord reveals Himself to those that were held in bondage by the Egyptians; here is seen the remarkable advance that the Lord reveals Himself to the Egyptians themselves as Jehovah, that they, too, really know Him as such; serving Him in accordance with His law, they present sacrifice and oblation, i. e., bloody and unbloody offerings, and make vows to Him which they scrupulously perform as recognition of His divine majesty and grace (comp. Lev. xxvii.; Num. xxx.; Deut. xii. 6; xxiii. 21 sqq.; Jer. xliv. 25; Ps. lxi. 9; lxvi. 13; cxvi. 14, 18, etc.). Egypt is like Israel moreover in this, that the Lord now and then chastises it as not yet sinless, but still heals again. The second half of ver. 22 is related to the first as particularizing the latter. In the first half it is merely said: Jehovah will smite and heal Egypt. But in the second half it is put as the condition of healing after the smiting that "they shall return," etc. Thereby is affirmed that the Egyptians shall find grace only on this condition; and also that they will fulfil this condition. The contrast of smiting and healing reminds one of Deut. xxxii. 39, comp. Job v. 18; Hos. vi. 1 sqq.

4. In that day——mine inheritance.—Vers. 23–25. It is observed in verses 19–22, that the climax of the discourse is not quite attained, for Egypt alone is spoken of, and an Egypt that needed to be disciplined. But now the Prophet rises to the contemplation of a glorious picture of the future that is extensively and intensively complete. Israel's situation between the northern and southern world-powers had ever been to it the source of the greatest distress inwardly and outwardly. But precisely this middle position had also its advantage. Israel breaks forth on the right hand and on the left. The spirit of Israel penetrates gradually Egypt and Assyria, and thus binds together these two opponents into one, and that something higher. This the Prophet expresses by saying there will be a laid out road, a highway, leading from Egypt to Assyria and from Assyria to Egypt. Such a road must, naturally, traverse the land of Israel, in fact, according to all that precedes, we must assume that this road properly goes out from Israel in both directions. For it is the Lord that makes Himself known to Assyria as well as to Egypt (ver. 21), and both these unite in the service of the Lord. For it is clear that the concluding clause of ver. 23, does not mean that Egypt shall be subject to Assyria (see עבדו in Text. and Gram.). Then Israel will no longer be the unfortunate sacrifice to the enmity of its two mighty neighbors, but their peer and the third member of their union. Thus a harmony will be established, and the threefold accord will be a blessing in the midst of the whole earth and for them, because the Lord will bless them. For Israel as the earthly home of the kingdom of God, and Assyria and Egypt as the natural world powers represent the entire earth. From them the blessing must come forth upon all. But they must be so blest that the predicates, that hitherto Israel had alone, will be applied to all three. Egypt is called עַמִּי "my people" (comp. iii. 12; x. 2, 24, and often), Assyria מעשה ידי "work of my hands," (comp. lx. 21; lxiv. 7 and often), but Israel retains the name of honor נחלתי, "mine inheritance," for thereby it is characterized as the actual son of the house and head of the family.

β) THE ASSYRIAN CAPTIVITY OF EGYPT.

Chapter XX.

This chapter, whose date is exactly determined by the historical notices of ver. 1 in connection with ver. 3 (comp. the introduction to chapters xvii.-xx.), is related to chap. xix., with which it is manifestly contemporaneous, as a completion. Thus chap. xix. speaks chiefly of the visitations that shall overtake Egypt, by means of catastrophes of its inward political and natural life. But to that conversion of Egypt spoken of xix. 18 sqq., outward distresses also must contribute. These, according to the political relations that prevailed in the period when chapters xix. xx. originated, can proceed only from Assyria. At the same time this weighty lesson resulted from these things, that Judah in its then relation to Assyria and Egypt must not rely on Egypt for protection against Assyria.

Lord by [1]Isaiah the son of Amoz, saying, Go and loose the sackcloth from off thy loins, and put off thy shoe from thy foot, And he did so, walking naked and 3 barefoot. And the Lord said, Like as my servant Isaiah hath walked naked and barefoot three years for a sign and wonder [d]upon Egypt and [d]upon Ethiopia;
4 so shall the king of Assyria lead away [2]the Egyptians prisoners, and [e]the Ethio-

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2. One must carefully note that what follows immediately on the formula of announcement, דבר י׳ ביד־יש׳ לאמר is not something that Jehovah spake by Isaiah, but something that He spake to him (לֵךְ וגו). For בְּיַד never has the meaning "in conspectu," as some would assume in order to obviate the incongruity between ביד and לֵךְ; it has not this meaning even in 1 Sam. xxi. 14, and Job xv. 23. לֵאמֹר, therefore, as to form connects primarily with the לֵךְ immediately following, but in regard to matter it relates to all that follows. ויאמר י׳ in the beginning of ver. 3 like לאמר, is subordinate to the more intensive דִּבֶּר, and introduces the second stage of the revelation announced by דִּבֶּר וגו. The expression בְּיַד for the human organ of the divine revelation occurs in Isaiah only here. In Jeremiah, too, it occurs only xxxvii. 2; l. 1.——Note the constr. praegn. in פתחת חשק מעל ו where the preposition must be connected with a verb understood. Compare Green., § 273, 3.

Ver. 3. שלש שנים occasions difficulty. The interpretation is altogether ungrammatical that takes these words in the sense: "in three years shall be fulfilled what this symbolical act signifies." The words can only be made to relate to הלך, or, according to the accents, to what follows; but in either case must be taken in the sense "for three years." Regarding the words only grammatically, the nearest meaning that offers is: "like my servant Isaiah has gone three years," etc. For were it said: "like my servant goes for three years," why then does it not read הלֵךְ? Or if the meaning were: "like my servant will go," why then does it not read ילֵךְ? Although the Hebrew perfect indicates directly only that something actually occurs objectively without reference to the time, still the fact must belong to some time; and if neither an internal nor external sign points to the present nor future, then we are obliged to take the verbal form that designates facta just in the sense of factum, i. e., in the sense of come to pass, done, in respect to time. However some construe הָלַךְ as perfect, but refer שָׁלֹשׁ שָׁנִים to אוֹת וּמֹפֵת, so that the sense is: "like my servant has gone naked and barefoot for a type of three years long" (tribus annis completis in exilium ducta erit Aegyptus atque Aethiopia; usque ad illud tempus, quod Isajas semel nudus et discalceatus incessit, typus est," Stade, l. c. p. 67; thus, too, the Masorets, Jerome, Hitzig, Hendewerk, Knobel). But to this there is a twofold objection [for the second see under the following Exeg. and Crit. in loc.). First: If it were to be expressly said that Isaiah did not for three years go naked, but only that he was to be a sign for three years by once (Stade) or several times repeated going naked, or more exactly, if the typical transaction itself did not last through three years, but was only to obtain as the sign for the continuance of three years, if therefore שָׁלֹשׁ שָׁנִים is to depend not on הלך but on אות ומופת, then must the dependence be indicated corresponding to the sense. The mere Accusative then durst not be used. If Isaiah was for three years long a type, then must he three years long go naked. But did he go naked only once or a few times, and were only the typical significance of this going naked to extend to three years, then it must read לִשְׁלֹשׁ שָׁנִים or אות וּמוֹפֵת שְׁלֹשׁ שָׁנִים. The latter construction would not be incorrect, as Stade (p. 68) seems to assume, in as much as אות ומופת, as to sense, form only one notion (comp. Ezek. xxxi. 16).

Ver. 4. חֲשׂוּפַי is held by Ewald (§ 211, c, Anm. 2: [comp. Green, § 199 c] to be a change from חֲשׂוּפֵי fixed by the Masorets. Thus, too, שָׂרַי Judg. v. 15. Others (Delitzsch, Dietrich) hold this form, like (חוֹרַי xix. 8), חַלּוֹנַי (Jer. xxii. 14), גוֹבַי (Amos vii. 1; Nah. iii. 17), שַׁדַּי (Exod. vi. 3), for a singular form with a collective signification. Hitzig and Stade regard our word as an archaic ending of the Construct State, of which the punctuators had availed themselves "in order to avoid the disagreeable sound that would be occasioned by the following שֵׁת." But then they would often have had to resort to this change. It appears to me of course probable that the pointing ַי is to be charged to the Masorets. But שֵׁת did not prompt them to this; it was the foregoing singulars עָרוֹם וְיָחֵף. They supposed they must punctuate חשׂופי as singular to correspond with these. Therefore I believe that חשׂופי is to be regarded as a singular like the חֹרַי, etc., named above, but that it is set in the place of the original חֲשׂוּפֵי by tradition only. But ערם ויחף is partly conditioned by ver. 3, partly it is to be treated as an ideal number (xxiv. 22).——ערות מ׳ is in apposition with חשׂופי שׁ׳.

Vers. 5 and 6. מַבָּט, that to which one looks (hoping and trusting) occurs in Isaiah only in these two verses. Beside this in Zech. ix. 5.——לעזרה comp. x. 3; xxxi. 1.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In the year when the Tartan, i. e. commander-in-chief of king Sargon of Assyria, came against Ashdod to besiege the city—which he also took after a comparatively short siege,—Isaiah received commandment from the Lord to take off his garment made of bad sack linen and his sandals, and to go about naked and barefoot (vers. 1, 2). For the incredible thing shall happen that the Egyptians and Ethiopians, shall be compelled to go into captivity naked and barefoot, like Isaiah goes about, (vers. 3, 4). Thereupon all inhabitants of the sea-board of Palestine, will, with terror and shame, be sensible how wrong they were to confide in the power and glory of Ethiopia and Egypt (ver. 5). They will say: Thus it has gone with the power from whom we expected protection; how now shall it go with us? (ver. 6).

2. In the year——barefoot.—Vers. 1, 2. According to the testimony of Assyrian monuments, Tartan is not a proper name, but an appellative. It is the "Assyrian official name for the commander-in-chief." In Assyrian the word sounds tur-ta-nu, and is, to the present, of unknown derivation. On the Assyrian list of regents that is communicated by Schrader (Die Keilinschriften u. das A. T., Giessen, 1872, p. 323 sqq.) it reads (obvers. 9): "Mardukiluya, Tartan, to the city Gozan (obv. 38); Samsulu, Tartan, to Armenia (obv. 48); Samsulu, Tartan, to the city Surat (Reverse 19); Samsulu, Tartan, in the land (Rev. 32); Nabudaninanni, Tartan, to the city Arpad." Thus the ordering of these high officers to their various posts of administration is designated. The word "Tartan" occurs again in the Old Testament, only 2 Kings xviii. 17.——As regards Sargon, it is now settled by documentary proof that Salmanassar and Sargon are not one person. The Assyrian canon of regents, which the great work of inscriptions by Rawlinson, Vol. III., communicates in amended form (comp. Schrader, l. c., p. 317) contains as fifth Eponyme of that administration that followed Tuklat-habal-asar, i. e., Tiglath-Pileser, the name Sal-ma-nu-âsir (another form Sal-man-âsir): and Rawlinson (Athenaeum, 1867, No. 2080, p. 304, comp. Schrader in Stud. and Krit., 1872, IV. p. 737) remarks on this: "Salmanassar IV., (for there were three older Salmanassars) ascended the throne in the year 727 B. C., for which year there was already an Eponyme established, so that he could only enter on his Archonship in 723." But Sargon came to the administration in the course of the year 722 B. C. He is mentioned in the Old Testament only in our passage—whereas the monuments offer just about his reign the richest results. His name in Assyrian is Sarrukin, which by the Assyrians themselves, is construed partly as Sarrukin, i. e. "mighty the king," or "the right king," partly as Sarruakin, i. e. "He (God) appointed the king" (comp. יְהוֹיָכִין). Sargon is the builder of North Nineveh or Dur-Sarrukin, now Khorsabad, whose monuments, with their inscriptions of the most various sorts, are a most valuable source of historical information (comp. Schrader, Keilinschriften, p. 256 sqq.). The following is the account of the conquest of Ashdod as the Khorsabad inscription gives it according to Schrader's (l. c., p. 259 sqq.) translation. "Azuri, king of Ashdod, hardened his heart to pay no tribute and sent demands to the princes of his neighborhood to revolt from Assyria. Accordingly I did vengeance and changed his government over the inhabitants of his territory. Achimit, his brother, I set over them in the government in his place. The Syrians, that meditated revolt, despised his dominion and raised up Iaman over themselves, who had no claim to the throne, and who, like those, refused to own the dominion. In the burning wrath of my heart I did not assemble my whole power, took no concern for baggage. With my men of war, who separated not themselves from me behind the raising of my arms, I advanced on Ashdod. That Iaman, when he perceived the approach of my army from far, fled to a region (?) of Egypt, which lay on the borders of Meroe; not a trace of him was to be seen. Ashdod, Gimt-Asdudim (?) I besieged, took it; his gods, his wife, his sons, the treasures, possessions, valuables of his palace, along with the inhabitants of his land I appointed to captivity. Those cities I restored; I colonized there the inhabitants of the lands that my hands had conquered, that are in the midst of the East; I made them like the Assyrians; they rendered obedience. The king of Meroe, who in the midst . . . . of a desert region, on a path . . . . whose fathers since remote times down to (this time) had not sent their ambassadors to my royal ancestors, to entreat peace for himself: the might of Merodach (overpowered him), a mighty fear came over him, fear seized him. In bonds . . . iron chains he laid him (Iaman); he directed his steps toward Assyria and appeared before me." If we compare the annals of Sargon, which register year by year the deeds of this king, we find that in the year of his beginning to reign (722), which is not reckoned as his first year, he conquered Samaria; in the second year (720) he conquered king Sevech of Egypt in the battle of Raphia and took prisoner king Hanno of Gaza; in the eleventh year (711) he made war on Azuri of Ashdod and conquered the city, after which the king of Ethiopia sued for peace (SCHRADER, l. c., p. 264 sq.). In all, Sargon reigned seventeen years (until 705). The monuments and the Prophet mutually complete one another. If from the former we see the occasion, the nearer circumstances and the time of the expedition against Ashdod, the Prophet, on the other hand, informs us that it was not Sargon himself that conducted the undertaking, as might appear from the monuments. It was the constant usage of those Asiatic potentates, to which there are only a few exceptions, to register the deeds of the leaders of their armies as their own on the monuments. Comp. SCHRADER, Stud. u. Krit., 1872, IV. p. 743. Moreover from the contents of the Khorsabad inscription it is seen that Ashdod was not at that time visited for the first by the Assyrians, as also on the other hand it appears that Egypt had already experienced emphatically the might of the Assyrian arm. For without any campaign, merely out of fear of that arm, the Egyptian-Ethiopian king surrendered the fugitive Iaman. As regards the time, our prophecy, according to the inscription, falls in the year 711, thus in the eleventh year of king Sargon's reign. The siege of Ashdod, for which later Psammetichus required twenty-five years (HEROD. 2, 157), appears not to have lasted long at that time. The capture followed, according to the inscriptions (see above), in the same year. Perhaps the divided state of the inhabitants of Ashdod was to blame for this speedy capture. That there was an Assyrian party among them appears from the inscription communicated above.

The phrase וַיִּלָּחֶם וגו׳, and he fought against, etc., is parenthetical. As to the sense, it is in so far an historical anticipation that the taking did not follow after what is related in ver. 2. But in relation to ver. 3, that phrase is no anticipation. For the meaning of the typical action, if my interpretation of "three years" is correct, can only have been signified three years later. Consequently the entire chapter can not have been written earlier than three years after the "coming of the Tartan" mentioned in ver. 1. In as much as this "coming of the Tartan" is taken as the point of departure for the course of events, while the conquest is only mentioned in parenthesis, as a side affair, the Prophet likely received the command of ver. 2, about the time of that "coming," therefore before the capture. By implication, therefore, there lay in the command at the same time a prediction of that conquest of Ashdod. For the conquest of Egypt presupposes the taking of the outworks. Therefore the point of the prophecy also is directed against Egypt.

At the same time is related to "In the year that the Tartan came" as a wider sphere, as certainly as the notion עֵת is more comprehensive than the notion שָׁנָה. The following contains indeed, information concerning two facts: first concerning the command to go naked, and second, concerning the interpretation that followed after three years. To these refer those two dates, the narrower and the broader, as a matter of course, the first date corresponding to the first fact and the second to the second fact. Therewith is closely connected that the sentence "spake the LORD . . . saying," introduces the entire revelation contained in what follows. (See under Text. and Gram.).

It is not accidental that Isaiah is called here by his complete name, Isaiah the son of Amoz. For this happens, beside the present, only i. 1 and ii. 1, therefore only in the first and second introduction; then xiii. 1 (in the beginning of the prophecies against the nations) and xxxvii. 21, where is related the comforting reply that Isaiah was the means of giving to Hezekiah after the threatening of Sennacherib. By the designation of the Prophet as "the son of Amoz" is signified, as appears to me, that there exists a contrast between this name and what is related of Isaiah in this chapter. It is likely no error to assume that a "son of Amoz" was a man of importance. And this man of noble descent must for three years, when he let himself be seen publicly, go about like a wretched prisoner in the utmost scanty clothing. For that Isaiah went wholly naked is not conceivable. Anciently, indeed, one was regarded as naked who took off the upper garment (comp. nudus ara, sere nudus in VIRGIL, Georg. I. 299; PETRON. 92; Joh. xxi. 7; HERZ. R. Ency. VII., p. 725). We observe from this passage that Isaiah constantly wore a sack, as chief and upper garment, i. e. a sack-like garment and made of sackcloth. The sack-garment was sign of deep mourning and repentance generally (iii. 24; xv. 3; Gen. xxxvii. 34; Dan. ix. 3; Matth. xi. 21, and often). It was variously worn: partly next to the skin (1 Kings xxi. 27), partly over the under-garment, the כְּתֹנֶת "tunic," as was the case, e. g. with Isaiah, and as appears generally to have been a prophet's costume. For, according to 2 Kings i. 8, Elijah wore a hairy garment with a leather girdle, which clothing, Zech. xiii. 4, is described as a prophet's costume generally. John the Baptist, too, wore it, certainly in special imitation of Elijah (Matth. iii. 4; comp. Heb. xi. 37; Rev. xi. 3). Now when Isaiah received command to take off the sack garment and his sandals, it was that he should make himself a living symbol of the extremest ignominy, and of the deepest misery. Not to Judah, however, but to Egypt is this sorrowful fate announced. Judah is only to draw from it the lesson that it must not lean on Egypt for support. For this was the great and ruinous error of the time of Hezekiah, that men supposed they could only find protection against Assyria in Egypt. Against this the Prophet strives earnestly in chapters xxviii.—xxxii.

3. And the LORD said——we escape.—Vers. 3-6. [On the construction of "three years," see under Text. and Gram.; also for a grammatical objection to the sense: "like my servant has gone naked and barefoot as a three years sign," etc. A further objection is as follows.—Tr.] If the typical meaning of the sign was to remain in force only three years, then, too, the fulfilment must actually follow after three years, or the prophecy prove to be false. For what can this mean: the going naked of the Prophet shall be three years long a sign? Only this: after three years the type ceases to be type, and becomes fulfilment. If that does not come to pass, then the sign was an erroneous one and misleading. It is no use here to regard the number three as a round number that is only to be understood "summatim" (Stade, p. 67). For the measures of time of fulfilment, in consequence of the imperfection of our human knowledge about the real length of historical periods, or because of the difficulty of knowing the points of beginning and ending, may very well be represented as only an approximation. But a measure of time which is named as an earnest pledge of a future transaction, must not prove to be incorrect, if the earnest itself is not to be found treacherous. But Egypt was not conquered by the Assyrians three years after the siege of Ashdod, but much later, as will be seen immediately. Therefore the Prophet cannot have proposed a three years' validity of that sign. But he went three years naked and barefoot, in order to set before the eyes of his people very emphatically and impressively the image of how wretched Egypt had become. And only after three years followed the interpretation for the same reason. For three years the men of Judah and Jerusalem were to meditate and inquire: why does the Prophet go about in scanty and wretched garb? When at length after three years they learned: this happened for the purpose of parading before your eyes the misery of Egypt conquered by Assyria,—then they could measure the worth and importance of the warning that the Prophet gave them by what it cost him to give it. For the Egyptian policy was the fundamental error of the reign of Hezekiah through its whole extent (comp. the Introduction to chapters xxviii.—xxxiii). The siege of Ashdod, that key to the land of Egypt, was assuredly a fitting event, for letting this warning sign begin. And if about the year 708 the interpretation followed, that was the time, too, when Sargon's rule drew near its end and that of Sennacherib drew near. It was the time when the alliance with Egypt more and more ripened, and when the warning of the Prophet must become ever more pressing.

Sign and wonder is a sort of Hendiadys, in as much as to the first notion a second is co-ordinated, that properly is only something subordinate to that first: sign and portent for portentous sign. In as far as the nakedness of the Prophet represented the misery of the Egyptians generally, it is a sign of it; but in as far as it represented this misery in advance as something future it is a portentous sign.

To the present, nothing definite is known of any invasion of Egypt by the Assyrians. The Assyrian monuments, however, tell us that the kings Esarhaddon and Asurbanipal (Sardanapalus) conquered Egypt. The first on a brick inscription (Schrader, l. c. p. 210) calls himself: "king of the kings" of Egypt; and his son Asurbanipal says in his cylinder inscription (Schrader l. c. 212) "Esarhaddon—my progenitor went down and penetrated into the midst of Egypt. He gave Tirhaka king of Ethiopia a defeat, destroyed his military power. Egypt and Ethiopia he conquered; countless prisoners he led forth," etc. Asurbanipal himself seems to have prepared a still worse fate for the Egyptians under Tirhaka's successor, Rud-Amon. For he relates the following in one of his inscriptions (Schrader, l. c. 288): "Trusting in Asur, Sin and the great gods, my lords, they (my troops) brought on him in a broad plain a defeat and smote his troop forces. Undamana (Rud-Amon) fled alone, and went to No, his royal city (Thebes). In a march of a month and ten days they moved after him over pathless ways, took that city in its entire circuit, purged it away like chaff. Gold, silver, the dust of their land, drawn off metal, precious stones, the treasure of his palace, garments of Berom (?) and Kum, great horses, men and women, . . . pagi and ukupi the yield of their mountains in countless quantity, they bore forth out of it, appointed them to captivity; to Nineveh, my seat of dominion they brought them in peace, and they kissed my feet." Comp. too, ibid. p. 290. As, according to the Apisstelen, Tirhaka died in the year 664, Schrader fixes the date of this conquest of Thebes about the year 663 b. c. This monumental notice is of great importance for the understanding of Nah. iii. 8–11, and partly, too, for Isa. xix. and for our passage. From this, as also from the other Assyrian communications cited above, we learn that our prophecy, given in the year 708 received a double fulfilment: one in the time of Asarhaddon, who reigned from 681 to 668, the other by means of Asurbanipal about the year 663. Therefore, not after three years, but in the course of the fourth and fifth decade after its publication was it fulfilled Egypt's shame [see under Text. and Gram.).

Did not the Prophet, who for his own person assuredly wore only the lightest Israelitish costume, have here in mind, perhaps, those costumes of the common Egyptians, that allowed the form to appear prominent, which, seen in foreign lands, were well fitted to provoke scorn for Egypt? Comp. e. g. the illustrations in WILKINSON'S, The ancient Egyptians.

It is plain that in ver. 6 the Prophet means the Israelites and their neighbors. It is a sign of displeasure and discontent when one addresses a person that is present in the third person. The expression הָאִי "the isle" in ver. 6 is to be noted. The expression (comp. the singular xxiii. 2, 6) is nowhere else used of the Holy land. But the Prophet also means, not merely this, but the entire coast of Palestine, which, because אִי is not a proper name, but appellative, he can very well call אִי. For, as the conquest of Ashdod itself and the preceding events (comp. the Sargon Inscription, SCHRADER, p. 76) testify, the Phœnicians also, and the Philistines, who shared with Israel in the possession of the coast, were become a prey to the Assyrian power.

When the strong power of Egypt and Ethiopia had proved too weak to bear the onset of Assyria, then, indeed, might the anxious thought arise in the hearts of the smaller nations that had joined themselves to Egypt: how is it now possible that we can be saved? STADE is of the opinion that אִי, "the isle, or coast" means merely the city Ashdod, and that ver. 6 contains the words of the fugitive inhabitants of Ashdod, especially of Iaman. After the overthrow of Egypt the exclamation is put in the mouth of these: "quomodo nos effugere poteramus," (p. 43). But the assumption that the conquered inhabitants of the אִי could not say: "how shall we be saved" is erroneous. They were indeed conquered; but as long as, still dwelling in their land, they saw trains of captives led past them, they are still in possession of their land, and can hope for a favorable turn of fortune, and the shaking off of the foreign yoke. Only the captive carried into exile is finally without hope. Only this final and greatest degree of misfortune do the inhabitants of the אִי have in mind when they exclaim, "how shall we escape?"

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xvii. 1–3. "There are no makers of breaches in city and wall stronger than the sins of the inhabitants. When these strengthen and multiply themselves, then entire cities, well built fall over them, and become heaps of stones; as is to be seen in the case of Jericho, Nineveh, Babylon and Jerusalem itself. Therefore let no one put his trust in fortifications."—CRAMER.

2. On xvii. 7, 8. "Potuit hic," etc. "It may be objected here, are not the ark of the covenant and the temple in Jerusalem also work of men's hands? But the theological canon here is, that in every work regard must be had whether there is a word of God for it or not. Therefore such works as are done by God's command, those God does by means of us as by instruments. Thus those are called works of the law that are done by the law's command. But such works as are done by no command of God are works of our own hands, and because they are without the word of God, they are impious and condemned, especially if the notion of righteousness attaches to them, on which account, also, they are reproved here."—LUTHER.

3. On xvii. 8 (האשׁרים); VITRINGA proposes the conjecture that Osiris is to be derived from אשׁר, which the Egyptians may have pronounced Oser or Osir. And indeed he would have us take as the fundamental meaning of the word, either "beatus," (אָשַׁר), or combine it with שׁור "to look," so that Osiris would be as Sun-god, the all seeing, sharp looking (πολυόφθαλμος). אשׁרה then, as feminine of אשׁר, would be Isis!

4. On xvii. 10. "Si hanc," etc. "If so fearful a punishment followed this fault, thou seest what we have to hope for Germany, which not only forgets God, but despises, provokes, persecutes and abominates Him."—LUTHER.

5. On xvii. 14. "Although the evening is long for us, we must still have patience, and believe assuredly, sorrow is a forerunner of joy, disgust a forerunner of delight, death a forerunner of life." CRAMER.

6. On xviii. BOETTCHER (Neue exegetische kritische Aehrenl. II., p. 129) calls this chapter, "exceeding difficult, perhaps the most difficult in the entire Old Testament." And in fact from the earliest to the most recent times expositors go asunder in the most remarkable manner in regard to the object and sense of the prophecy. JEROME and CYRIL referred the prophecy to Egypt. Others, but in different senses, referred it to Judea. EUSEBIUS of Cesarea held the view that, as JEROME says on our passage, "prophecy in the present chapter is directed against the Jews and Jerusalem, because in the beginning of Christian faith they sent letters to all nations lest they might accept the sufferings of Christ." "COCCEIUS teaches that Judah is that land shadowed with wings, which (for he refers אשׁר to wings) are beyond the rivers of Ethiopia" (VITRINGA). RASCHI and KIMCHI, likewise, refer the prophecy to the Jews, but they see in ver. 6 the overthrow of Gog and Magog, and understand the promised deliverance to refer to that greatest of all that would take place by means of the Messiah. Also VON HOFMANN (Schriftbew. II., 2 p. 215 sqq.) explains the passage to refer to "the return of the departed Israel from the remotest regions and by the service of nations of the world themselves, after that they shall have learned that great act of Jehovah and therewith the worth of His people and of His holy places." Others like PELLICAN think of the Roman Empire. ARIUS MONTANUS even casts his eyes over "to the new world converted to Christ by the preaching of the gospel and by the arms of Spain" (VITRINGA).

7. On xix. 1 b. "The passage recalls the myth concerning Typhon, which represents the Hyksos, who formerly coming from Asia subdued Egypt. The Egyptian gods were afraid (according to a later Greek tradition, which explained the Egyptian heads of beasts as masks, comp. DIESTEL in the Zeitschrift f. histor. Theol., 1860, 2, p. 178) of Typhon and hid themselves (PLUT. De Isid. et Osir., cap. 72); they resigned the wreaths when Typhon had received the kingdom (ATHEN. xv. 25, p 680); they assumed animal forms (APOLLOS I. 6, 3; OVID Metam. V. 325 sqq.; HYGIN. Fab. 196). According to MANETHO in JOSEPHUS (c. Apion I. 26) king Amenophis, who was threatened by Palestinians, carefully concealed the gods.

Other prophets, just as Isaiah does, announce destruction against the Egyptian idols from Jahve (Jer. xliii. 13; xlvi. 25; Ezek. xxx. 13; comp. Exod. xii. 12; Num. xxxiii. 4)" KNOBEL.

8. On xix. 5 sqq. If nature and history have one LORD, who turns hearts like water courses (Prov. xxi. 1) and the water courses like hearts (Ps. xxxiii.), then we need not wonder if both act in harmony, if, therefore, nature accompanies history as, so to speak, a musical instrument accompanies a song.

9. On xix. 11. "This was the first argument of the impious in the world against the pious, and will be also the last: for the minds of the ungodly are inflated with these two things, the notion of wisdom and the glory of antiquity. So the diatribe of Erasmus is nothing else than what is written here: I am the son of the ancients. For he names the authority of the Fathers. The prophets contended against this pride, and we to-day protest against it." LUTHER.

10. On xix. 13 sqq. "Where one will not let the outward judgments of God tend to his improvement, there is added the judgment of reprobation, in such a way that even natural prudence and boldness are taken away from those that are the most prudent and courageous. All this does the anger of the Lord of Hosts bring about."—Tübingen Bibel bei STARKE.

11. On xix. 16, 17. The servile fear of those that have hitherto not at all known God may become a bridge to that fear which is child-like. "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom," Ps. cxi. 10.

12. On xix. 19–22. The Prophet here casts a penetrating and clear look into the future of Egypt. Although the several forms that he depicts make the impression of those forms which, standing in the midst of a sea of mist, rise on an elevated site above the mist, whose absolute distance cannot be exactly made out, still particular traits are remarkably fitting and exact.

13. On xix. 23–25. One sees here plainly that the Prophet regards Egypt, Israel and Assyria as the chief lands of the earth, whose precedence is so unconditionally the measure of all the rest that they do not even need to be mentioned. Such is in general the prophetic manner of contemplating history. It sees only the prominent and decisive points, so as to overleap great regions of territory and periods of time. Comp. DANIEL's Weltreiche ii. 31 sqq.; vii. 3 sqq.

14. On xx. The office of prophet was hard and severe. Such a servant of God must renounce every thing, yield himself to every thing, put up with every thing, let any thing be done with him. He must spare himself no indignity, no pain, no trouble. He must fear nothing, hope nothing, have and enjoy nothing. With all that he was and had he must be at the service of the LORD, unconcerned as to what men might think or approve. Comp. Jer. xv. 19 sqq.; xvi. 2; xx. 7 sqq.; Ezek. iv. 24, 15 sqq.

III. LIBELLUS EMBLEMATICUS: CONTAINING PROPHECIES AGAINST BABYLON, EDOM, ARABIA AND JERUSALEM. TO THIS LAST PROPHECY THERE IS ADDED A SUPPLEMENTAL ONE DIRECTED AGAINST SHEBNA THE STEWARD OF THE PALACE.

CHAPTERS XXI. AND XXII.

These two chapters contain prophecies against Babylon, Edom, the Arabians, Jerusalem. The last of them has an appendix relating to an individual, namely, Shebna, the steward of the palace. The reason of the juxtaposition of these prophecies is seen in their peculiar inscriptions, which are all of an emblematic character. The countries spoken of are not designated by their real names, but Babylon is called the desert of the sea; Edom, Dumah, i. e. silence; Jerusalem, valley of vision. Arabia retains its own name, but that name is seen to be used in a double signification. For the context shows that עֲרָב is intended to stand not only for Arabia, but also for evening. We have, moreover, to remark, that in three of these prophecies (xxi. 1, 13; xxii. 1) the inscription is an expression taken from the prophecy over which it is placed. In arranging these prophecies so much weight was attached to the analogous character of their inscriptions, that from a regard to it even chapter xxii. although directed against Jerusalem, has been taken into the series of prophecies against heathen nations (xiii.—xxiii.) The four prophecies here placed together have yet other points of contact. The first and second exhibit the prophet very prominently in his character as a watcher on his high tower: the fourth presents the antithesis between false and true seeing. In the first Elam and Madai appear as enemies of Babylon; in the fourth, Elam and Kir as enemies of Jerusalem. Moreover, the mode of attack is twice described in the same manner. (Comp. xxi. 7 with xxii. 6). Worthy of observation too, are the frequent points of agreement with the book of Job which both these chapters contain. Comp. xxi. 3 b, and 4 a with Job xxi. 6; xviii. 11, etc.; Isa. xxii. 2 with Job xxxvi. 29; xxxix. 7; Isa. xxii. 4 with Job vii. 19; xiv. 6; Isa. xxii. 22 with Job xii. 14; Isa. xxii. 24 (צאצאים) with Job v. 25, etc. (See the exposition).

The genuineness of xxi. 1–10 is contested by the rationalistic interpreters. The chief reason is that they hold such a prophecy to be an impossibility. But as the form and contents of the piece are so decidedly after Isaiah's manner that, as DELITZSCH says, "a prophecy constructed more exactly in the style of Isaiah than this, is inconceivable," it would follow that we have primarily and properly only to consider the question as a problem which is presented to us: How is it possible that Isaiah could foreknow the fall of Babylon by nations that he calls Elam and Madai? A thing is here held to be impossible, whose impossibility is by no means scientifically established. For it is not demonstrated that there is not a personal God.

It is very difficult to make any definite statement respecting the time of the composition of this prophecy against Babylon. The only thing on which we can base an opinion seems to be the identity of expressions in ver. 3 and xiii. 8. This suggests the inference that the prophecy xxi. 1–10 and the related chapters xiii. and xiv. were composed at the same time. On the question respecting the time of the composition of the three other prophecies, consult the introductions to them and the exposition that follow.

A.—Against Babylon.

Chap. XXI. 1–10.

1 The burden of the desert of the sea.
As whirlwinds in the south pass through;
So it cometh from the desert,
From a terrible land.
2 A [1]grievous vision is declared unto me:
The treacherous dealer dealeth treacherously,
And the spoiler spoileth.
Go up, O Elam; besiege O Media;
All the sighing thereof have I made to cease.
3 Therefore are my loins filled with pain;
Pangs have taken hold upon me,
As the pangs of a woman that travaileth:
I was bowed down at the hearing of it;
I was dismayed at the seeing of it.
4 [2]My heart panted, fearfulness affrighted me;
[a]The night of my pleasure hath he [3]turned into fear unto me.
5 Prepare the table,
Watch in the watch-tower,
Eat, drink;
Arise, ye princes, and anoint the shield.
6 For thus hath the Lord said unto me,
Go, set a watchman, let him declare what he seeth.
7 And he saw a[b] chariot with a couple of horsemen,
A chariot of asses, and a chariot of camels;
And he hearkened diligently with much heed:
8 And [4]he cried, A lion;
My lord, I stand continually upon the watch-tower in the day time,
And I am set in my ward [5]whole nights.
9 And, behold, here cometh [c]a chariot of men, with a couple of horsemen.
And he answered and said,
Babylon is fallen, is fallen;
And all the graven images of her gods he hath broken unto the ground.
10 O my threshing, and the [6]corn of my floor:
That which I have heard of the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel,
Have I declared unto you.

[1] Heb. hard. [2] Or, My mind wandered. [3] Heb. put.
[4] Or, cried as a lion. [5] Or, every night. [6] Heb. son.

[a] the twilight, my joy. [b] a troop of horsemen in pairs, a troop of asses, a troop of camels.
[c] a troop of men, horsemen in pairs.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. לחלף supply הָיוּ, conjugatio periphrastica, comp. Gesen., § 132, Anm. 1; Ewald, § 237, c. The design of this periphrastic construction seems to be to denote what is habitual: ut transire solent—a usage which marks chiefly the later books (2 Chron. xxvi. 5; Ezra iii. 12). The construction is in every case a peculiar one.

Ver. 2. חזות קשה is the accusative depending on the transitive notion latent in the passive הֻגַּד. The ה in אנחתה (אַנְחָה, in Isaiah besides only xxxv. 10, 11) is marked by the Masorets as רָפָה, although "the majority of the most correct codd. and editt." (see GESEN. and DE ROSSI on our place) have the Mappiq in the ה. The sense is the same; for even the form with the quiescent ה denotes "gemitus ejus," for there is no absolute form אַנְחָתָה. Respecting the feminine suffix without Mappiq, comp. EWALD, § 247, d.

Ver. 6. The article before מְצַפֶּה (Micah vii. 4) is the generic.

Ver. 7. The primary signification of רֶכֶב is vectura. This can mean 1) id quo vehitur, and that is a) and indeed predominantly the chariot, but also b) the horse. Here however we have to remark that רכב is not the riding horse, but the chariot horse, and that it has this signification not immediately from the root רָכַב, but per metonymiam from the derivative רֶכֶב chariot, which also signifies the chariot with horses, and then (pars pro toto) the horses alone (comp. 2 Sam. viii. 4; x. 18); 2) vectura signifies also id quod vehitur, i. e., men riding or driving, whether singly (Ezek. xxxix. 20 סוּס וָרֶכֶב equus et vector), or in numbers, as a band, a train (comp. in Arabic rakb a band of camel riders). In this latter signification the word is to be understood here and ver. 9, and xxii. 6. קשב marks everywhere only the activity of the ear and not attentive observation in general. קֶשֶׁב is the simple accusative of the object "et attendit attentionem magnam" (compare Deut. xiii. 2 חֹלֵם חֲלוֹם, also Zech. i. 15, and Ps. xiv. 5).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The first verse contains the theme: the Prophet beholds a violent tempest, which as a Simoon in the South, sweeps from a terrible land against Babylon. In ver. 2 the vision is more exactly defined, both as to the subjective and objective side. In the former relation it is characterized as a hard one, i. e. one which makes a deep and perturbing impression on him who sees it. Objectively the vision is seen to relate to a martial expedition against the perfidious and devastating Babylon. This expedition, in which Elam and Madai are the actors, will at the same time make an end to the sighing, i. e. to the bondage of Israel. In vers. 3 and 4 the feelings of the Prophet at the "hard" vision are more nearly described. Pain seizes him as a travailing woman; he writhes and is terrified at what he hears and sees. His heart beats wildly from the horror which has taken hold of him; the twilight, hitherto so pleasant, as a time of rest, has become a time of dread. In ver. 5 there is a brief description of the way in which Babylon, the object of the announced invasion, behaves in view of it. They furnish the table for a banquet without thinking of any other defence than the appointment of watchmen; they eat and drink till suddenly, in the midst of the feast, the cry is heard: Arise, ye princes, anoint the shield! The following verses depict the issue. In order to observe it, the Prophet had been ordered by the LORD to set a sentry on the watch-tower (ver. 6). The sentry beholds a mighty train of horses, asses and camels, and attends sharply to what it will do (ver. 7). Many days and nights the sentry keeps watch without marking anything (ver. 8). At last he calls with a loud voice; there comes a troop; it is but small, but it announces that Babylon is fallen, that its idols are overthrown (ver. 9). The Prophet in the words of the last verse (ver. 10) declares that he proclaims this as certain truth from the LORD to comfort his people threshed (crushed) in the captivity.

The burden——of the sea.—Ver. 1 a. The four prophecies which are placed together in chaps. xxi. and xxii., have inscriptions of an emblematical character. It is disputed whether מדבר ים is a title derived from the text of this passage, or is an independent figurative designation of the country of Babylon. It is well-known that writings were denominated after their initial word, or, indeed, any word contained in them. Compare the Hebrew names of the Pentateuch, and of Proverbs and Lamentations; also קֶשֶׁת 2 Sam. i. 18. [In the last passage the E. V. has "the use of the bow;" but the ellipsis is best supplied in the rendering "the song of the bow." D. M.]. On such titles the Commentary of GESENIUS may be consulted. The משא בערב ver. 13 (comp. בערב as the second word of the text) and the משא גיא חזיון xxii. 1 (comp. the same expression, xxii. 5) seem to have been designated on the same principle. But although מדבר occurs in ver. 1, ים is not found in the whole prophecy. VITRINGA in a juvenile production (Observv Sacr. L. I., diss. 2, op. 4) expressed the unwarranted opinion which he retracted in his commentary, that ים is substituted for נֶגֶב. But why should not מדבר נֶגֶב be written? And although the sea lay to the south of Babylonia, that is no reason for calling the country "the desert of the sea." There is just as little ground for taking ים in the signification "West," and giving this explanation of the whole expression, that Babylon is called מדבר ים because it lay west of Media and Persia, and a desert intervened (KIMCHI). I see no reason why we should not explain the expression מדבר ים after the analogy of the expressions בערב and גיא חזיון. The title מדבר is therefore taken from ver. 1. But מדבר by itself would be too obscure. Another word had therefore to be supplied for nearer specification. Now Babylon was situated on the Euphrates. The Euphrates, with its canals, ponds and swamps, might as well be called a sea as the Nile, xix. 5. In Jeremiah li. 13 Babylon is thus addressed "O thou that dwellest on great waters." See also Jer. l. 38; li. 32, 36. Interpreters refer to HEROD. I. 184 where speaking of the Euphrates he says: "πρότερον δὲ (namely, previous to the erection of the dikes by Semiramis) ἐώθεε ὁ ποταμὸς ἀνὰ τὸ πεδίον πᾶν πελαγίζειν." A passage from ABYDENUS is also cited (in EUSEB. Praep. Evang. IX. 41), where in reference to Mesopotamia which is watered by the Euphrates it is said: λέγεται δὲ πάντα μὲν ἐξ ἀρχῆς ὕδωρ εἶναι, θάλασσαν καλεομένην." Finally, it is of great weight that Babylonia is on the Assyrian monuments often designated simply as "sea, sea-country," (tihamtu = תְּהוֹם, in Assyrian the common word for "sea," SCHRADER, p.

1 sq.). TIGLATH-PILESER says in the pompous inscription proceeding from the last year of his reign (SCHRADER, p. 129 sq.), that he subdued Merodach-Baladan, son of Jakin, king of the sea (Sar tihamtiv). The same Merodach-Baladan is elsewhere called Sar Kardunias, i. e., king of Southern Chaldaea (SCHRADER, p. 214 note). Further, Asarhaddon states on a cylinder-inscription (SCHRADER, p. 227) that he made over "the Sea-country," (mat tihamtiv) in its whole extent, to Nahid-Merodach, son of Merodach-Baladan. It is clear, therefore, that "sea, sea-country" was just an Assyro-Babylonian designation at least of Southern Chaldaea. If now we take into consideration that Babylon with its many and great waters was formerly a sea-country, and till the times of Asarhaddon was called "sea" (tihamtu) at least in its southern part, and that it still "swims as in the sea;" if, on the other hand, we bear in mind that the prophets depict the future desolation of Babylon with all possible colors, comparing it with Sodom and Gomorrah, places now covered with water, and speaking of its being turned into a lake of water, we might say that the expression "the desert of the sea" comprehends the past, present and future of the country in one conception. But we perceive from the book of the Revelation xvii. 1, 3. 15 that our passage was understood in yet another sense [?] There Babylon, the great whore, sits on many waters (ver. 1) and at the same time in the desert (ver. 3). The waters, however, are (ver. 15) interpreted "peoples, and multitudes and nations and tongues" (comp. Isa. viii. 7; Jer. xlvii. 2). The apostle appears, therefore, to have in his mind a wilderness of peoples, and the expression כְּמִדְבַּר עַמִּים (Ezek. xx. 35; comp. Hos. ii. 16) might also have been present to his view. We see, then, that the expression "the desert of the sea" is capable of a manifold interpretation. Did the Prophet himself use it? I, for my part, find the choice of an expression capable of various explanations, as the inscription of a prophecy, to be quite in accordance with Isaiah's manner (comp. vers. 11, 13, chap. xxii. 1; xxx. 6). [The Seer in the Apocalypse does not put the alleged arbitrary and erroneous construction on the inscription before us. The prototype of the figurative language in Rev. xvii. is rather to be sought in Jer. li. This chapter of Jeremiah was undoubtedly before the mind of John in depicting the mystic Babylon, and in it we have Babylon represented as dwelling on many waters (ver. 13), and as destined to be a desert (ver. 43). The sitting of the whore in the wilderness refers to her impending desolation, and does not exclude her sitting before that time on many waters. John does not employ the expression "a wilderness of peoples." In the whore sitting on many waters we have her condition at the time John wrote. Her appearance in the wilderness denotes her future solitude. It is plain, then, that the Apocalyptic Seer does not misinterpret the enigmatical title of this chapter of Isaiah, "the desert of the sea."—D. M.].

3. As whirlwinds ——land.—Ver. 1 b. According to the Masoretic punctuation this part of the verse consists of three members, of which the middle one is formed by the words ממדבר בא. But against this division the objections lie, 1) that we cannot say the south in general, or for every land its south is the region of storms; 2) that the Prophet does not indicate by a single word that he means the countries situated south of Babylonia; 3) that it is not said "from the south." The expression בנגב taken strictly does not involve the idea of a storm observed in the south by the Babylonians, but only the idea of a storm sweeping south of them: 4) that הַנֶּגֶב has for the native of Palestine a quite definite signification; it is the south of Judah (Gen. xiii. 1; Num. xxi. 1; Deut. xxxiv. 3; Josh. x. 40; xi. 16 et saepe) which is connected with the desert of Sinai called likewise κατ' ἐξοχὴν הַמִּדְבָּר (comp. HERZ. R. Encycl. XIVII. p. 304). The Prophet says therefore: as in the נֶגֶב of Palestine storms coming from Arabia Petraea (Hos. xiii. 15; Jer. iv. 11; xiii. 24; Job i. 19; Zech. ix. 14) sweep along (חלף properly "change," thence transire, viii. 8) so it comes upon Babylonia from a terrible land.—בָּא is neuter and impersonal, a form of expression which we have already found frequently in Isaiah: vi. 10; x. 4; xiv. 32; xv. 2; xviii. 5. A terrible land the country is called, because it is inhabited by a terrible people (xviii. 2, 7). What country is meant by the Prophet we learn from ver. 2 b.

4. A grievous vision——fear unto me.—Vers. 2–4. The vision (חזות in this meaning in Isaiah only here, and xxix. 11; in another sense xxviii. 18; it is found besides only in Daniel viii. 5–8) is first defined as to its subjective side, and in general as hard, i. e., hard to bear, causing perturbation (comp. similar inward experience of the Prophets at the incalculable greatness and importance of what they beheld, Dan. vii. 15, 28; x. 16 sqq.; Heb. xii. 21). To this general description of the subjective impression is added a more particular account of the objective nature of the vision. Here the first question is, whether the words הבוגד to שודד refer to the Chaldeans or to the Persians. In the former case we should be told how the oppressive rule of the Babylonians, while in full swing, was rudely checked. In the latter case, the work of the enemy before approaching the city itself, would be described. Both explanations are grammatically possible. A worldly power in so far as it is opposed to the kingdom of God, can be reproached with acting perfidiously (comp. xxiv. 16 and especially xxxiii. 1, where also the two expressions בגד and שודד occur together. Comp. xlviii. 8), but why stress should be laid on this point as a prominent characteristic of the nation serving God as His instrument is inconceivable. בִּזָּה or שִׁסָּה (xvii. 14) would be less strange. I hold therefore with DRECHSLER that the words הבוגד to שודד denote the worldly power absolutely hostile to God, not that one which serves as His instrument. This view requires that we do not attach to בגד the sense of robbing. This signification has been assumed, as if supported by the places xxi. 2; xxiv. 16; xxxiii. 1. And indeed no other sense than that of robbing suits the passage before us, if it be applied to the Persians. But this application is untenable, and in the other passages the context requires no other signification than that of acting perfidiously. While we refer these words to the Babylonians, we find in them a reason for their punishment. With dramatic liveliness the discourse is directed to those commissioned to execute the judgment. Elam (xi. 11; xxii. 6), and Media (xiii. 17) are to go up (on עלה comp. on vii. 1) and besiege the city of Babylon (צור in this sense only here in Isaiah; besides only chap. xxix. 3 where the signification is similar, but not the same). That the Prophet makes mention not of the Persians, but of the Elamites, a nation adjacent to the Persians on the west, is assuredly not favorable to the view that this part of Isaiah was composed during the exile (comp. on xiii. 17). An author living in the exile would certainly have named the Persians. That the Prophet under Elam includes Persia also, is in a certain sense possible. Not that Elymais formed a part of Persia. It was at a later period that Elam was incorporated in the Persian empire, though Susa, one of the three residences of the Persian kings, was (Dan. viii. 2) in Elam. Elam was a land known to the Hebrews in the times of Isaiah (Gen. xiv. 1, 9), while the Persians were then still quite unknown. We might say that to the view of the Prophet Elam concealed Persia, and so, more or less consciously to him, involved it. And thus this discourse has that character of dimness and obscurity, of oscillating between light and darkness, which befits the prophetic vision, and belongs to the marks of a genuine prophecy. The concluding words of ver. 2 are for those who were oppressed by Babylon, for those who were the victims of the בוגד and שודד. The genitive in אנחתה, "her sighing," is to be taken as the objective, the sighing over her. [We prefer to understand it of the sighing which she, Babylon, caused by her oppression.—D. M.]. In vers. 3 and 4 the Prophet justifies the expression קָשָׁה (ver. 2). From the variety and violence of the painful feelings which the Prophet experienced at the vision, we can infer the fearful nature of the things which he saw. They give us, moreover, to know that the Prophet not only heard the command "Go up, Elam," etc., but also beheld in spirit its execution. What he then saw is what was terrible; and therefore his loins are full of חלחלה (in Isaiah only here; besides Nah. ii. 11; Ezek. xxx. 4, 9), i. e., trepidatio, spasm in the loins. צירים (with חֲבָלִים the most common word for the pains of parturition xiii. 8; it occurs in another signification, xlv. 16; xviii. 2; lvii. 9) have seized him as a travailing woman; he writhes from hearing (נעוה the bowing downwards; in Isaiah besides only in Piel xxiv. 1) and trembles (xiii. 8). Many interpreters take משמוע. מראות as marking a negative result: so that I do not hear, or see. But why should the hearing be hindered through bending, or seeing through terror? On the contrary, as we see from חזות קשה, horror which seizes the inmost soul, proceeds from a seeing and hearing only too accurate. It is certainly not a matter of chance that almost all the expressions here employed occur in xiii. 8, which passage also treats of Babylon, and that some of the words as צירים and נבהל are found only in these two places in Isaiah. There is indeed this difference, that the Prophet here applies to himself what he there says of the Babylonians; but still a relation of the one place to the other indicating a contemporaneous origin is indisputable. תָּעָה is more frequently used of spiritual going astray, of aberration of heart, (Ps. xcv. 10, comp. Isa. xxix. 24, et saepe), but stands here in the physical sense of the abnormal beating of the heart (palpitation). Also פלצות (in Isaiah only here; besides Job xxi. 6; Ps. lv. 6; Ezek. vii. 18) involves the notion of tottering, concussio (Job ix. 6). בעת Piel, a word of special frequency in Job, is used by Isaiah only here. This passage, then, by the words בעת, פלצות and נבהל (comp. especially Job xxi. 6) reminds one strongly of the phraseology of the book of Job. בִּעֵת signifies in every place (even 1 Sam. xvi. 14) "to terrify, affright, disturb." The twilight (v. 11; lix. 10) at other times a welcome bringer of rest to the Prophet after his exciting work during the day (חֵשֶׁק desiderium, deliciae, in Isaiah only here, comp. 1 Kings ix. 1, 19), is to him now a source of new disquietude (חרדה substantive in Isaiah only here). We see from this that the Prophet had the vision in the night, either when awake or dreaming.

Prepare the table——the shield. Ver. 5. The Prophet here paints the judgment falling on Babylon in few, quickly thrown off, but powerful strokes. He indicates by hints couched in brief, mysterious words, wherein that terrible thing consists, which according to vers. 2–4 he must see, and in what way Elam and Media fulfil their mission. These words, too, bear that character of prophetic indefiniteness which we have already noticed in ver. 2. The Prophet speaks as in a dream; he draws nebulous forms. Only when we compare the fulfilment, do the images assume a distinct shape, and we are astonished at their accuracy. This is neither mantic prediction, nor vaticinium post eventum. The prophet does not understand his own words (comp. 1 Pet. i. 11); he is the unconscious organ of a higher being who speaks through him. Comp. my remarks on Jer. l. 24; li. 31, 39. It is well known that Cyrus captured Babylon in a night when the Babylonians were celebrating a festival with merry carousals (Dan. v.; HEROD. I. 191; XENOPH. Cyrop. VII. 5, 15 sqq.). Isaiah certainly did not know this. He is, therefore, ignorant as to what the ערך השלחן refers, why and how it was done. The infinitives absolute leave the action without indication of time or subject. This indefiniteness admirably suits the prophetic style. The expression ערך השלחן is found also in Isaiah lxv. 11; Ps. xxiii. 5; lxxviii. 19; Prov. ix. 2; Ezek. xxiii. 41. That it is the Babylonians who prepare the table, is clear from the context. It is they who are surprised during the carousal. If we take the words צפה הצפית in their obvious meaning (watching, to look out) they seem inappropriate. Other meanings have therefore been sought out from all quarters; they kindle the lamps—they clarify the wine—they set the ranks in order—they prepare carpets, etc. But צָפָה means in Hebrew nothing else than speculari; and צָפִית (which occurs only here, but with which צְפִיָּה, Lam. iv. 17, and מִצְפֶּה, ver. 8, may be compared) must accordingly denote specula, "watch-tower, watch, looking out." It seems to me that the Prophet does not wish us to suppose that in a city surrounded by the enemy, a merry carousal took place without the precaution of appointing guards. He means to say only that they were so reckless as to enjoy a banquet even though watches had been set. How dangerous even that could be, is soon apparent when the cry reaches the revellers in the midst of their carousal: the foe is come, anoint the shield! So foolhardy are they that they do not abandon their revelry (which was proverbial and is mentioned in Scripture xiv. 11; xlvii. 1; Jer. li. 7; Dan. v. 1, and elsewhere, e. g., in Curtius V. 6); but in the presence of the beleaguering foe indulge in banqueting, though they took the precaution of setting a watch. According to Xenophon as quoted above, § 25, there was really a guard in the castle, but they were (§ 27) intoxicated. The princes who are said only now to arise and anoint the shield, are the surprised Babylonians. The anointing of the leather shield (2 Sam. i. 21) was in order to make it more compact, firm, smooth and shining (comp. Herzog R.-Enc., and Winer Real-Lex. Art. Schild). [In 2 Sam. i. 21 the Hebrew text must be consulted. The anointing which in the E. V. is made, by supplying an imaginary ellipsis, to refer to Saul, refers not to him, but to his shield.—D. M.]. It is a sign of great negligence that the Babylonians have not anointed their shields, notwithstanding the enemy is before the gates. Now they must either fight with unanointed shields, or yield without a struggle.

6. For thus hath—broken unto the ground. Vers. 6–9. כִּי in the beginning of ver. 6 seems to be explicative. In fact the vers. 6-9 are related to the preceding 2-5 as an explanation and more particular description. If we could already from verses 2-5 know in general that the ruin of Babylon through Elam and Media was decreed, and that it would be effected by an assault, we see (ver. 7) the army of the Elamites and Medians in march before our eyes, and (ver. 9) the complete success of the attack is announced. The train of thought is the following: Babylon is to be besieged by Elam and Media, and to be captured by a surprise. For the Prophet sees a mighty army moving against Babylon, and soon after, another band coming from Babylon, which proclaims the downfall of the city and of its idols. The connecting of the two parts by the formula: "For thus said Jehovah," reminds one of chap. viii. 11. What the Prophet now beholds in vision is represented in what follows, as if a watchman appointed by the command of God had seen it, and communicated it to him. This style of costume is very effective (comp. 2 Sam. xviii. 24 sqq.; 2 Kings ix. 17 sqq.). Elsewhere the Prophet himself is represented as a watchman on the pinnacle (Hab. ii. 1; Zech. i. 8 sqq.). And, indeed, here too Isaiah himself is the watchman, though another is made to take his place. This is only a rhetorical artifice to heighten the effect. The very words "what he sees he will declare," contain a praise of the watchman. For it is not said יַגֵּד. That would indicate only the duty of the watchman. But יַגִּיד gives us to understand that he will really fulfil this duty. The perfects וְהִקְשִׁיב וְרָאָה ver. 7, cannot mean, "and he shall see, hearken." For the watchman is not to be dictated to in regard to what he shall see. Neither is it allowable with Drechsler to take the words as a conditional sentence, "and if he sees . . . . he shall hearken . . . . ." That the Prophet actually appointed the watchman, would properly be told immediately after issuing the command. But this point, as self-evident, is here passed over, as in other cases where a command given by the Lord to the Prophet is related (vii. 3 sqq.; viii. 1 sq., 3 sqq.). The watchman saw first a train of horsemen (צֶמֶד is a collective, besides in Isaiah only, v. 10, in the signification jugum; פָּרָשׁ is eques, then sometimes equus, xxi. 6, 7; xxviii. 28; xxxi. 1; xxxvi. 9) followed by a train of asses and camels. Interpreters have called attention to the fact that the Medes were renowned for their cavalry (Cyrop. I. 6, 10), which Cyrus was the first to introduce among the Persians (Cyrop. iv. 3, 4 sqq.; vi. 1, 26 sqq.). We learn from this last place that Cyrus furnished his army with numerous and improved chariots of war. To what a formidable arm Cyrus raised the Persian cavalry in a brief period, appears from his being able to march against Babylon with 40,000 horsemen (Cyrop. VII. 4, 16). The employment of asses and camels, not only for transport, but also in battle, is an established fact. In regard to asses, Strabo relates of the Caramanians, a nation dwelling next the Persians to the east, and subdued by them, that they "χρῶνται ὄνοις οἱ πολλοὶ καὶ πρὸς πόλεμον σπάνει τῶν ἵππων." And Herodotus relates that the Scythians in fighting against the Persians under Darius Hystaspis, found no worse enemies than the asses, at whose strange appearance and braying the horses took fright (iv. 129). That Cyrus himself employed camels in battle is expressly related by Xenophon: Cyrop. vi. 1, 30: vii. 1, 22, 27. The watchman sees then an army in march. The Prophet does not mention that he saw infantry. Prominence is evidently given only to what is peculiar and characteristic. And, in fact, hardly another army could have been then found which presented such a diversity of animals used in war as the Persian host with its wonderful variety of races. The watchman not only saw, he also heard, or rather tried to hear; for he really heard nothing at first. The strange, long, martial train disappeared. The watchman then sees and hears nothing for a long time. This surprises him. He becomes impatient. He is not aware that meanwhile a great work is accomplishing which requires time: the capture of Babylon. In his impatience, which does not, however, lessen his zeal, he calls now with a lion's voice (properly as a lion, comp. Ps. xxii. 14; Isa. xlvi. 3, etc.; Rev. x. 3): I stand in vain night and day on the watch-tower. We see from this that that army in march, ver. 7, was a passing appearance, and that after it had vanished, there had been a pause, which the watchman could not explain. He addresses his call to אֲדֹנָי, that is to Jehovah. At the same time the Prophet gives up the assumed character, and lets us see plainly that he himself is the watchman. HITZIG and MEIER would read אֲדֹנִי "my lord." This would suit the connection better, but must the more readily be rejected as a correction, as the Prophet could quite easily drop the character which he personates. The watchman had hardly uttered these complaining words when that for which he had waited so long took place. He sees again something which gives information: a little band of men who ride in pairs, comes from Babylon. The וְהִנֵּה־זֶה is to be regarded as spoken with emphasis. For it stands in a certain contrast to what precedes; hitherto I have perceived nothing, but now, etc. We must, therefore, translate, "but, lo, there comes," etc. Who is the subject of וַיַּעַן in ver. 9? Obviously the watchman. We might think of the troop of horsemen coming from Babylon. This would be possible. But this alteration of the subject would need to be indicated in some way. The want of any indication of this kind is in favor of our assuming the same subject that had governed the whole preceding series of sentences. The watchman learned by inquiry or knew it from infallible signs: Babylon is fallen! A grand utterance! Hence the repetition of נָפְלָה. In Jer. li. 8 this place is quoted. Also in Rev. xviii. 2. Jeremiah likewise emphatically sets forth the downfall of Babylon as a defeat of its gods (Jer. l. 2, 38; li. 44, 47, 52). The subject of שִׁבַּר can be Jehovah. It can also be he who was Jehovah's instrument for this work, the conqueror of Babylon: Cyrus. This "he" who afterwards comes clearly and distinctly under his proper name into the Prophet's field of vision, appears here still veiled as it were: שבר לארץ is a pregnant construction, comp. viii. 11; xiii. 8; xiv. 9, 10; xx. 2. DRECHSLER makes the not inappropriate remark that Isaiah has perhaps in his eye here "the well-known iconoclastic zeal of the Persians."

7. O my threshing——unto you.—Ver. 10. These words intimate the proper immediate object of the prophecy. Judah is to be comforted by the prediction of the fall of the Babylonian fortress. The words seem aimless, if what precedes them is regarded as vaticinium post eventum. We have in ver. 10 a summary of chaps. xl.—lxvi. מְדֻשָׁה (for which other editions read מְדוּשָׁה) is ἀπ. λεγ. It means what is crushed by threshing. Israel is so called as the object of the divine judgment which was executed on him by means of the exile. דּוּשׁ is frequently employed in the sense of cleansing and sifting by divine judgments, xxv. 10; xxviii. 27 sq.; xli. 15; Micah iv. 13; Hab. iii. 12. The expression בֶּן־גָּרְן reminds one of such expressions as בֶּן־הַכּוֹת, בֶּן־יִצְהָר. A son of the threshing-floor is one who lies on it, and is threshed, and that not merely briefly and accidentally, but for a long time, as it were habitually. For he belongs to the floor as a child to its mother. Accordingly בן־גרן is stronger than מדשה. Israel is so named because in the exile the threshing floor had become his home, his mother-country. It is the Prophet who speaks, but in the name, and as it were, out of the soul of God. Otherwise the second half of this verse would contain an intolerable transition. This threshed people, to whom the threshing-floor had become a home, is still the Prophet's own beloved people. With sorrow he announces to them that they must be threshed in Babylon; with joy he declares that they will be delivered from the threshing-floor. Both events are certain. And Israel may and ought to believe this. It is indeed inconceivable that the Prophet can make such an announcement. He himself does not understand even the connection. He therefore declares emphatically: I have not excogitated this; but I have heard it from Jehovah, and therefore declare I it to you as certain truth.

B.—AGAINST EDOM. CHAPTER XXI. 11, 12.

That under Dumah we are to understand Edom is conceded by almost all modern interpreters. In favor of this view there are the following reasons: 1) All other localities, which actually bear the name of Dumah, are either too near or too remote, and do not furnish any hold for the assumption that Isaiah made them the objects of a Massa (oracle). What would such a Massa mean as directed against the isolated city of Dumah, situated in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 52), or against that Ishmaelitish Dumah, of which mention is made in Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chr. i. 30, or against the three still more distant and insignificant places called Dumah, which are not once mentioned in the Old Testament, and which according to the Arabian geographers are situated in Irak, Mesopotamia and Syria (comp. GESENIUS, DELITZSCH, and KNOBEL on our place)? We could most readily think of the Ishmaelitish Dumah (Genesis xxv. 14). But how far-fetched is the assumption that the Simeonites, who, according to 1 Chron. iv. 42 sq., emigrated to Edom, settled just in Dumah! And does not our Massa stand among prophecies directed against heathen nations? 2) The Prophet declares expressly that the cry came to him from Seir. But would he have uttered the taunting expression of ver. 12 against Israelites dwelling on mount Seir? 3) All the four prophecies in chaps. xxi. and xxii. have, as was already remarked, emblematic inscriptions. It accords, therefore, entirely with the manner of forming inscriptions observed in these chapters, if we assume that דּוּמָה is intentionally formed from אֱדוֹם. Consul WETZSTEIN indeed affirms in his Excursus on Isa. xxi. in DELITZSCH'S Commentary, p. 692, that the putting of Dumah for Edom by a play upon the name, would necessarily be misunderstood. But this is by no means the case. For the character of the other inscriptions gives every reader an obvious hint how this one too is to be taken. And then we have the words "out of Seir" immediately following.

That Isaiah is the author of this prophecy is disputed by some rationalistic interpreters (PAULUS, BAUR, EICHHORN, ROSENMUELLER), but is maintained by even GESENIUS, HITZIG, HENDEWERK, EWALD and KNOBEL. It most clearly bears the stamp of Isaiah's style, which only the most obstinate prejudice can fail to see. It is difficult to say anything respecting the time of composition. If we should insist with KNOBEL that the question put by the Idumeans to the Prophet supposes a close relation between them and the Jews, and that such a relation existed only during the rule of Uzziah and Jotham over Judah, which lasted till 743, we should arrive at the conclusion that the prophecy was composed before 743. But the night here spoken of, if we have respect to the then existing state of affairs and to the analogy of all Isaiah's prophecies, cannot possibly mean anything else than the misery threatened by the Assyrian power. If now the Edomites are represented as inquiring if this calamity will soon end, they must in that case have had some experience of it. During the reign of Uzziah and Jotham, however, they had not yet suffered from the Assyrian dominion. The time when the Assyrians threatened the freedom of all nations as far as Egypt (EWALD, Gesch. des V. Isr. III. p. 670; comp. HITZIG, Gesch. des V. Isr. p. 221) was rather the period after the capture of Samaria, when the Assyrian king was engaged in war against Egypt, and was obliged to take care to secure his left flank, and his line of retreat against the warlike nations that occupied the country between Palestine and Egypt. This was the time of Hezekiah (comp. remarks on xx. 1), or more exactly, the time between the capture of Samaria and the baffled attempt on Jerusalem by the army of Sennacherib (xxxvi. and xxxvii.). At that time the Assyrians frequently penetrated into the South of Palestine. Then, if ever, was the time when an inquiry, like that contained in this prophecy, could come from Edom to the Prophet of Jehovah in Jerusalem.

CHAPTER XXI. 11, 12.

11 THE BURDEN OF DUMAH.
He calleth to me out of Seir,
Watchman, what of the night?
Watchman, what of the night?
12 The watchman said,
The morning cometh, and also the night;
If ye will enquire, enquire ye;
Return, come.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11. The participle without specification of subject is often used for the finite verb (Ex. v. 16; Gen. xxiv. 30; xxxii. 7; Isa. xi. 6, etc.,). Here קֹרֵא stands for קָרָא and implies the impersonal or indefinite subject (ix. 5; Jer. xxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16, et saepe). The form לֵיל in the second question may have been chosen for the sake of variety, as לַיְלָה had been employed in the first question. Moreover, it is not improbable that לֵיל is the Idumean form of the word, as we have already in xv. 1 found it to be the form used by the Moabites.

Ver. 12. אתא is the Aramaean word for בּוֹא, but occurs not unfrequently in Hebrew authors. Isaiah, in particular, uses the word often, ver. 14; xli. 5, 23, 25; xliv. 7; xlv. 11; lvi. 9, 12 (in the two last the imperative form אֵתָיוּ also). But the אתא (with א as the last radical letter) is found only here and Deut. xxxiii. 21.—בעה occurs in the Hebrew parts of the Old Testament only in three other places, viz., xxx. 13; lxiv. 1 in the sense of tumescere, ebullire, and Obad. 6 in the sense of searching, seeking out, studiose quaerere. In this latter signification the word is common in the Aramaean (Dan. ii. 13, 16, 23; vi. 5, 8, etc.).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet hears a cry sounding forth from Seir putting to him as watchman the question: How much of the night is past? Thereupon the watchman answers: Morning comes, and also night i. e., first a ray of morning light, then immediately dark night again. And when it will have become night again, you can, if you please, again inquire. Quaerere licet. Whether you will receive a favorable answer is another question.

2. The burden—return, come.—Vers. 11–12. The appellative noun דּוּמָה occurs only in two places of the Old Testament: Ps. xciv. 17; cxv. 17. In these places the word denotes that world of death where everlasting silence reigns. In the passage before us the word has manifestly a similar meaning. Dumah has, it is true, no etymological connection with Edom. For the latter is derived from the root אדם rubrum, rufum esse in Gen. xxv. 30. But as the Prophet represents Babylon under the name of the "desert of the sea," Jerusalem (xxii. 1), under the name of "the valley of vision," and further in ver. 13 takes ערב in a double sense, alluding to its radical meaning as an appellative, so here by a slight modification of the name he calls Edom Dumah; and hereby he intimates that Edom is destined to become Dumah, i. e., silence, to sink into the silence of nonentity.—Seir is the mountainous region which extends from the south of the Dead Sea to the Elanitic gulf, and which became the abode of Esau, (Gen. xxxii. 3; xxxiii. 14, 16; xxxvi. 8) and of his descendants, who are thence called the children of Seir (2 Chron. xxv. 11, 14). The word is found only here in Isaiah. Elsewhere the Prophet always uses Edom. It is natural for him to employ the name Seir here. For if the call is to sound forth from Edom to Jerusalem, it must proceed from the mountain-height, and not from the valley. The Prophet is addressed as שֹׁמֵר, because he is regarded as standing on his watch. The word is of like import with מְצַפֶּה ver. 6, and this affinity of signification is one reason for placing together the prophecies against Babylon (vers. 1-10) and Edom (vers. 11 and 12). מִן before לַיְלָה is partitive. How much of the night (the night of tribulation, comp. v. 30; viii. 20 sqq. xlvii. 5; Jer. xv. 9; MICAH, iii. 6, etc.), is past? As a sick man who cannot sleep or compose himself, so Edom in distress inquires if the night will not soon come to an end. The repetition of the question indicates the intensity of the wish that the night may speedily be gone. The answer to the question is obscure, and seems to be designedly oracular, and at the same time ironical. The first part of the answer runs (ver. 12) morning is come, and also night. What does this mean? How can morning and night come together? Or, how can it be yet night if the morning is come? If we compare the historical events to which the Prophet's answer refers, we can understand these words which must have been unintelligible to the first hearers or readers of the oracle. For, in fact, a ray of morning light was then very soon to shine. The overthrow of Sennacherib before Jerusalem was at hand. That was morning twilight, the dawn. But the glory did not last long. For after the Assyrian power, the Babylonian quickly arises, and completes what the former began (Jer. xxv. 21; xxvii. 3; xlix. 7 sqq.). This change is frequently repeated: the "Chaldaean time of judgment is followed by the Persian, the Persian by the Grecian, the Grecian by the Roman; ever for a brief interval a gleam of morning for Edom (think particularly of the time of the Herods), which was quickly lost in the returning night, till Edom was turned entirely into דוּמָה silence, and disappeared from history (DELITZSCH). The second part of the answer is, if possible, still more enigmatical than the first. The Prophet in dismissing those who question him, by telling them that they may come again, manifestly intends to mock them. For of what advantage is it to be allowed to come again? They knew they might do so. But what will they hear if they come again? What has the Prophet to announce to them as the final doom of their nation? The answer for him who can understand the hint is given by the word Dumah. The words for "come" and "inquire" belong rather to the Aramaean than to the Hebrew dialect, the word for "inquire" occurs farther in this sense, only in Daniel, and in the prophecy of Obadiah, of which Edom is the subject. Further, the singular verbal ending, which Isaiah here multiplies, making a sort of rhyme out of it, was probably current in the Idumean idiom. He mocks the inquirers, therefore, with Idumean sounds. "Return, come," is a pleonasm employed for the sake of the rhyme in the Hebrew. If, then, in ver. 12 there is irony both in the style and sense, it is more than probable that an actual inquiry came to the Prophet from Edom, than that he invented such a question as suitable to the circumstances. For why should he have taunted the Edomites for their questioning, if they had not really inquired of him? That would have been a mockery altogether unjust and uncalled for. But it is quite probable that such a question was really put to the Prophet.

The Edomites saw in Jehovah the national God of the Israelites, and conceded to Him the same real existence which they ascribed to their own false gods. From their point of view Jehovah could have prophets by whom He revealed His will and futurity; as their gods had their oracles and their organs in the goëtae. Such recognition on the part of the heathen of a divine power in the prophets of Israel is oftentimes met with. The king of Assyria, for example, sent Naaman to Samaria that Elisha might heal him (2 Kings v. 1 sqq.). The Syrian king believed that the same Elisha betrayed all his plans to the king of Israel (2 Kings vi. 12 sqq.). The Syrian Benhadad sent Hazael to Elisha to inquire if he would recover from his sickness (2 Kings viii. 7 sqq.). The fame too of Isaiah, as a great Prophet of Jehovah, could have extended to Edom, and, though Edom was no longer in a state of dependence on Judah, the common distress could have occasioned the inquiry. But this question, as it did not proceed from the right believing state of heart, but from an essentially heathen way of thinking, drew from the Prophet an ironical rebuff. [May not those closing words, "if ye will inquire, inquire ye," be intended to intimate that further disclosures would be afterwards made in regard to the future of Edom? The Prophet in the 34th chapter actually returns to this subject, and gives in plain terms the information which he here withholds. Other prophets, as Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Obadiah and Malachi foretell the judgment that would come upon Edom, and the solitude and desolation to which it should be reduced. All travellers who have visited the country, testify to the fulfilment of these predictions, and report that Edom has become a veritable Dumah, a land of silence.—D. M.]

C.—AGAINST ARABIA. Chap. XXI. 13-17.

13 The burden upon Arabia.
In the forest [a]in Arabia shall ye lodge,
O ye [b]travelling companies of Dedanim.
14 The inhabitants of the land of Tema
[1]Brought water to him that was thirsty,
They prevented with their bread him that fled.
15 For they fled [2]from the swords,
From the drawn sword, and from the bent bow,
And from the grievousness of war.
16 For thus hath the Lord said unto me,
Within a year, according to the years of an hireling,
And all the glory of Kedar shall fail:
17 And the residue of the number of [3]archers,
The mighty men of the children of Kedar,
Shall be diminished:
For the Lord God of Israel hath spoken it.

[1] Or, Bring ye. [2] Heb. from the face of. [3] Heb. bows.
[a] in the evening. [b] caravans.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13. בערב is ambiguous. Arabia is called עֲרָב; the pausal form is עָרָב, which, except in pause, occurs only 2 Chron. ix. 14. The second בערב is clearly the source of the first. In the same way "the desert of the sea," ver. 1, and "the valley of vision," xxii. 2 (comp. ver. 5) have arisen. How else could we explain the prefix בְּ which in no other case stands after מַשָּׂא? It is doubtful how the second בערב was originally vocalised. The significations "in Arabia" and "in the evening," are both suitable. The old versions give the latter. But the evening is never denoted by עֲרַב. Still it could be. The form would then come from עָרַב, "to be dark," after the analogy of גְּבַר (once for גֶּבֶר Ps. xviii. 26) etc. The Prophet can have designedly employed the uncommon form instead of the usual עֶרֶב, in order to give the double sense of Arabia and evening, and perhaps to intimate that Arabia should be a land not of the rising, but of the setting sun.

Ver. 14. הֵתָיוּ can be either perfect or imperative. But it must be taken here as perfect, as the next verb קִדְּמוּ is certainly perfect.

Ver. 16. Mark the triple alliteration in this verse. First, we have three words beginning with א, then three beginning with שׂ, then three (or four) whose first letter is a k sound.

Ver. 17. Mark the accumulation of substantives dependent on a noun in the construct state. No less than five words in the construct state occur together.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Even the free pastoral and martial tribes of the Arabian desert must succumb to a power that crushes all before it. The Prophet vividly describes the fate of those tribes in his own peculiar way by setting before our eyes one effect of the pressure of the great worldly power. The caravans proceeding to the various chief emporiums of trade in ancient times, such as Tyre, Sidon, Babylon, were wont to cross the desert without molestation from mighty foes. But now a force assails them, against which they are unable to defend themselves, as they could against the attacks of the separate plundering tribes of Bedouins (comp. Movers, Phœn. II., p. 409). They are forced to give way, and are scattered. The fugitives seek shelter where they can find it. They are fortunate if, far from the regular route, in one of the oäses, or on a mountain slope, they can reach a wood which will conceal them from the eyes of their pursuers, and in which they can find pasture and shade for their cattle. Out of this wood they dare not venture. In order, therefore, that they may obtain subsistence, the inhabitants of the neighboring places must bring them bread and water (vers. 13, 14). From this single circumstance it is easy to infer that the glory of the Arabians who bordered on Syria and Babylon, as whose representatives the Kedarenes are mentioned, is hastening to an end. Within the space of a year, says the Prophet, their power will be reduced to a minimum (vers. 16, 17).

2. In the forest—of war.—Vers. 13-15. I do not think that we should, as Wetzstein supposes, take יַעַר in the sense of the Arabic war, i. e. a place covered with fragments of volcanic rock. For the Hebrew word never means anything else than forest. We are simply informed here that the caravans driven from their course sought shelter in some wood; and woods there actually are there, partly in the oäses, partly on the slopes of the western mountains. The forest conceals the fugitives, and at the same time furnishes shelter and pasture for the cattle. If they lodge (pass the night) in such a forest, it is a matter of course that evening has arrived. But the remark that the forest was situated in Arabia would likewise be superfluous. For if the occurrence happened in the neighborhood of Tema, that sufficiently indicates that the locality is in Arabia. But the expression בערב, as having the double meaning "in Arabia" and "in the evening," is not superfluous. Dedan is according to Gen. x. 7 (1 Chron. i. 9) a descendant of Cush; according to Gen. xxv. 3 (1 Chron. i. 32) a grandson of Keturah also bears this name. In Jer. xxv. 23 Dedan is named along with Tema. In Jer. xlix. 8 they appear as belonging to Edom. And so in Ezek. xxv. 13. They are marked as a commercial people in Ezek. xxvii. 15, 20; xxxviii. 13. WETZSTEIN (in his excursus in DELITZSCH's Commentary) finds their abode on the Red Sea, "east of the Nile, including the desert to the brook of Egypt or the borders of Edom." He calls them Cushite tribes. However this may be, they are clearly enough denoted in the Old Testament as merchants, a people carrying on the caravan trade, especially with Tyre. If such a caravan has found in a forest shelter and pasture for the cattle, only bread and water for the men would be needed. At the dictate of hospitality the inhabitants of Tema bring these requisites to the fugitives in the forest. WETZSTEIN (as above) describes the situation of Tema (Jer. xxv. 23; Job vi. 19) after careful personal investigations. It lies, according to him, two days' journey by dromedary from Dumah. north-east of Tebûk, a station on the route for pilgrims from Damascus to Mecca. Dumah is marked by him as lying in the oäsis el-Gof, four days' journey by dromedary to the south-west of Babylon. He maintains against RITTER that there are not two places called Tema. Ver. 15 explains why the Dedanians must flee. War in every form, and with all its terrors, has assailed them.

3. For thus hath——spoken it.—Vers. 16, 17. What could be learned inferentially (vers. 13-15) from a single fact is now stated directly in general terms. Kedar's might and glory must be destroyed. Kedar is, first of all, according to Gen. xxv. 13, a son of Ishmael. But the name stands here, as very frequently in the later rabbinical usage, for the Arabs, i. e., for the inhabitants of Western Arabia, who alone were known to the Jews. In one year, exactly computed (comp. on xvi. 14), the glory of Kedar shall have an end. As Isaiah beyond a doubt uttered this prediction, its fulfilment must have taken place while the might of Assyria flourished. We know generally that the Assyrians subdued the Arabians, for Sennacherib is called by HERODOTUS (II., 141) "King both of the Arabians and Assyrians," and that while mention is made of his expedition against Egypt. This is not without significance. For when HERODOTUS states that Sennacherib as "King of the Arabians and Assyrians" attacked Egypt, he thereby gives us to understand that he marched against Egypt with an army composed of Arabians and Assyrians. And this fact tallies well with our remark on vers. 11 and 12, that the Assyrian in invading Egypt must have cared for the covering of his left flank and line of retreat. This object could be secured only by placing himself free from danger from the inhabitants of Arabia Petraea and Deserta. Our prophecy was therefore delivered before Sennacherib's invasion of Egypt, which according to the Assyrian monuments, must have occurred in the year 700 B. C. (comp. SCHRADER, The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament, p. 196). In accordance with what we have before observed touching the way in which prophecy advances to its complete fulfilment, it is not at all needful that the predicted catastrophe should have come upon the Arabians as a single stroke, which was not afterwards repeated. It would be sufficient to justify our regarding the prophecy as fulfilled, if in the specified time an event occurred, which was a proper beginning of the fulfilment of the prophecy, and therefore guaranteed its complete realization. We must confess that we cannot furnish direct evidence of such a particular event having taken place. The Kedarenes are here characterized as a warlike nation distinguished for the use of the bow. In this latter respect they walk in the footsteps of their ancestor, who is celebrated as an archer (Gen. xxi. 20).

D.—AGAINST THE HAUGHTY AND DEFIANT SPIRIT OF JERUSALEM AND ITS MAGNATES. CHAPTER XXII.

This chapter interrupts the series of prophecies against foreign nations. On account of its emblematic superscription, it is incorporated in the little book (סֵפֶר) that is distinguished by such superscriptions (xxi. and xxii.). Hence its present place. It contains two parts of almost equal length. In both, presumption is rebuked; in vers. 1-7, the presumption of the secure and reckless Jerusalem; in vers. 8-14, its incorrigible obstinacy, which even a perception of danger cannot overcome. In the second part of the chapter (vers. 15-25) the Prophet declares the punishment of the haughtiness of Shebna, the steward of the palace, involving his deposition and the calling of a worthier successor, who, however, would be likewise in danger of abusing his high office. Touching the time of the composition of the first part, we have to observe that it forms a whole. But in vers. 8-14 the Prophet sets the wicked obstinacy of the present time in opposition to the inconsideration of an earlier. The time referred to (vers. 8-12) is ascertained without difficulty from a study of these verses. It was the period of Hezekiah, and just when the Assyrians were threatening the city (xxxvi. and xxxvii.), which was by no means secured against all danger by the measures which Hezekiah took for its defence (2 Chron. xxxii. 2 sqq. 30). There must have been then in Jerusalem persons, who in opposition to the blind, thoughtless presumption of former times (vers. 1–7), saw clearly the danger, yet in their wicked obstinacy would not seek the LORD, but desired only to satisfy their low carnal passions. The second part of the chapter belongs to the same time. It is directed against Shebna, the proud steward of the palace. In consequence of the divine displeasure here declared, he was actually deprived of his high office, and Eliakim, the person indicated by Isaiah, was appointed his successor. In chapters xxxvi. and xxxvii. we find Eliakim acting as steward of the palace and Shebna only a scribe. The latter had, it is clear, repented and submitted to the judgment of God. Therefore the punishment with which he was threatened was mitigated. But since Eliakim appears in xxxvi. and xxxvii. as already steward of the palace, this prophecy must belong to a somewhat earlier time.

1. AGAINST JERUSALEM'S BLIND PRESUMPTION AND DEFIANCE IN SIGHT OF DANGER. CHAPTER XX. 1–14.

a) The punishment of blind presumption.

CHAPTER XXII. 1–7.

1 THE BURDEN OF THE VALLEY OF VISION.
What aileth thee now,
That thou art wholly gone up to the housetops?
2 Thou that art full of stirs,
A tumultuous city,
A joyous city;
Thy slain men are not slain with the sword,
Nor dead in battle.
3 All thy rulers are fled together,
They are bound [1a]by the archers;
All that are found in thee are bound together,
Which have fled [b]from far.
4 Therefore said I, Look away from me;
[2]I will weep bitterly,
Labour not to comfort me,
Because of the spoiling of the daughter of my people.
5 For it is a day of trouble, and of treading down, and of perplexity
By the LORD God of hosts in the valley of vision,
Breaking down the walls,
And of crying to the mountains.
6 And Elam bare the quiver
With chariots of men and horsemen,
And Kir [3]uncovered the shield.
7 And it shall come to pass,
That [4]thy choicest valleys shall be full of chariots,
And the horsemen shall set themselves in array [5]at the gate.

[1] Heb. of the bow. [2] Heb. I will be bitter in weeping. [3] Heb. made naked.
[4] Heb. the choice of thy valleys. [5] Or, toward.
[a] without bow. [b] afar.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. The question מה־לך (comp. ver. 16 and on iii. 15) is intensified by אֵפוֹא (xix. 12). כֻּלָּךְ for כֻּלֵּךְ comp. Micah ii. 12.

Ver. 2. In תשאות מלאה (apposition to כלך) the accusative stands first for the sake of emphasis.

Ver. 3. On מרחוק, i. e., far off, comp. on xvii. 13.

Ver. 4. אמרר בבכי properly: I will with weeping bring forth what is bitter. The Piel (in Isaiah only here, comp. Gen. xlix. 23; Exod. i. 14) is here, as often, employed like Hiphil in the causative sense. In this sense the Hiphil actually occurs Zech. xii. 10. הָאִיץ (comp. Gen. xix. 15) insistere is found only here in Isaiah.

Ver. 5. מהומה, tumultus, perturbatio, Deut. vii. 23; xxviii. 20; in Isaiah only here. מבוסה, conculcatio, besides only xviii. 2, 7. מבוכה implicatio, entangling, confusion, besides only Micah vii. 4. Notice the assonance in these three words.—מקרקר is to be taken neither as verb. denominativum, nor as substantive (demolition) nor as apposition to יום. It is the participle Pilpel from קור fodere, effodere, of which the Kal occurs xxxvii. 25 and the perf. Pilpel, Numb. xxiv. 17. As to its construction it is in apposition to לַאדֹנָי ה׳. Grammar does not require the repetition of the preposition. Notice here how the sound is an echo to the sense.—

שֶׁוַע is clamor, vociferatio, especially a cry for help. The word occurs only here.

Ver. 6. אַשְׁפָּה quiver, in Isaiah besides xlix. 2. The בְּ before רֶכֶב is the בְּ of concomitance = with. רֶכֶב אָדָם are chariots equipped with men—manned chariots in opposition to wagons for lading (עֲגָלוֹת). פָּרָשִׁים (comp. on xxi. 7) stands ἀσυνδέτως, but yet is governed by בְּ. The meaning, therefore, is: Elam has seized the quiver in the midst of chariots and horsemen, i. e., has furnished an army of bowmen together with chariots and horsemen.

Ver. 7. שִׁית without object = aciem struere, Ps. iii. 7. Comp. Isa. xlix. 15. Notice, too, the alliteration.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In this first half of the discourse directed to the whole of Jerusalem, the Prophet assails the presumption with which the inhabitants formerly witnessed the approach of the enemy on an occasion not more closely specified. He asks the meaning of their going up to the roofs of the houses. It was plainly in order to see the approaching foe, although the Prophet does not expressly say this (ver. 1). But the noise which prevailed in the streets, and the universal gaiety prove that the enemy was not regarded with apprehension, but with proud defiance (ver. 2). In contrast with this presumption stands the result which the Prophet proceeds to depict. He sees the slain and prisoners of all ranks who fell into the hands of the enemy, not in manly conflict, but in cowardly flight (ver. 3). A second contrast to that insolent gaiety, is formed by the profound sorrow which the Prophet Himself now feels as he looks upon the ruin of the daughter of his people (ver. 4). For the LORD Himself brings the day of destruction on Jerusalem, while he employs as His instruments for this purpose distant nations terribly equipped for war, as whose representatives only Elam and Kir are named (vers. 6 and 7).

2. The burden--fled from far.—Vers. 1-3. The expression "the valley of vision" is taken from ver. 5. Consult the Commentary on that verse for further particulars. That the title is formed after the analogy of the superscriptions, xxi. 1, 11, 13, and that the prophecy is placed here for that reason is self-evident. A hostile army advances against Jerusalem. But the inhabitants of Jerusalem are not afraid of the enemy. They ascend the roofs of the houses to see the foe. This is in itself quite natural. But yet the Prophet asks in a tone of displeasure, What is the matter with thee that thou in a body goest upon the roofs? The party addressed is plainly the personified Jerusalem. It is no good sign that all Jerusalem goes up on the house-tops. For this looks as if the coming of the enemy was regarded in Jerusalem as a spectacle for the amusement of all the people. It is yet worse that the accustomed noise prevails in the streets, and this noise is a joyous one. The city is called עַלִּיזָה which epithet includes the idea of haughtiness as well as joy, as we see from xiii. 3; Zeph. iii. 11. (Comp. Isa. xxiii. 12; Ps. xciv. 3; Jer. l. 11; li. 39; 2 Sam. i. 20). It is uncertain to what particular occasion the Prophet here alludes. He cannot have in view what is related 2 Kings xvi. 5; Isa. vii. 1; for great despondency then reigned. This can be said too of chapter xxxvi.; 2 Chron. xxviii. 20 is too doubtful. (Comp. EWALD, History III. p. 667 note). It was probably some event of less importance, perhaps the appearance of a predatory troop. The indignation of the Prophet would befit such an occurrence. The insolence at sight of a seemingly slight danger annoyed him, inasmuch as the appearance before Jerusalem of a single soldier belonging to the army of a power aiming at universal sovereignty, should have made them sensible of the danger threatening them from that quarter. This danger passes into fact before the Prophet's eye. He sees a hostile army before the walls of Jerusalem. It is of course a different one from that whose appearance so little discomposed the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Now things take quite another turn. Insolence is changed into its opposite, into base cowardice; security, into the greatest distress. The Prophet sees the ground covered with dead bodies of his people. They have perished miserably, have died an inglorious death. And those very rulers (קְצִינִים comp. i. 10; iii. 6 sq.), who, on the occasion referred to in vers. 1 and 2, had doubtless set the example of proud defiance, are now found to be the most cowardly. They flee all together, and are, without the drawing of a bow on their part or on that of the enemy (on מִן in the signification "without" see on xiv. 19) taken and bound. But not only the chief men behaved with cowardice. All the Jews who fell into the power of the enemy (נִמְצָאַיִךְ "thy found ones" not "those found in thee) were taken in their flight. They fled afar, not from far (comp. xvii. 13). They had sought in their timidity to flee far away, for they thought themselves safe only at the farthest possible distance from their endangered home. We here readily call to mind what is related 2 Kings xxv. 4 sqq.; Jer. xxxix. 4 sqq. Comp. Lam. iv. 17-20 of the flight of king Zedekiah and all his soldiers.

3. Therefore said I—my people.—Ver. 4. In opposition to that blind presumption (ver. 2) the Prophet, who clearly perceives what will be hereafter, experiences profound grief. His sorrow is unintelligible to the people. They seek to comfort him. He refuses to be comforted, and asks only to be permitted to give vent to his grief. "Look away from me," recalls vividly to mind Job vii. 19; xiv. 6; Ps. xxxix. 14; but in these places the LORD is entreated to turn away His holy, and, therefore, judging eye from sinful men. The expression, "the daughter of my people" first occurs here. It is not to be taken as the partitive genitive, but as the genitive of apposition, or more accurately, the genitive of identity. The daughter of my people is a daughter, i. e., a female who is my people in so far as she represents, or personifies my people. The expression, as the analogous one "daughter of Zion," corresponds to our expressions, Germany, Prussia, Bavaria, etc. These expressions with us likewise denote the personified unity of a people under the representation of a female. Observe further how the Prophet depicts the punishment of their presumption in words which afterwards served as a model for the lamentation over Jerusalem's destruction by the Chaldaeans (Lam. ii. 11; iii. 48).

4. For it is a day——the gate.—Vers. 5–7. The conduct of the Prophet is determined by the procedure of the LORD. As He has decreed a day of destruction on Jerusalem, the sorrow of the Prophet is not without a cause. The expression יוֹם לַאדֹנָי is peculiar to Isaiah. It occurs ii. 12 (xxxiv. 8). What it means is learnt from lxiii. 4 where it is called "a day of vengeance in my heart." The expression in a somewhat modified form is used by Jeremiah (xlvi. 10) and Ezekiel (xxx. 3). The scene of this act of judgment is to be "the valley of vision." That Jerusalem is thus denoted is most clearly determined by the context. KNOBEL'S view that the expression does not mark the city itself, but only one of the valleys surrounding it, is very strange. Not to speak of other things, how would a judgment falling on only one of the valleys surrounding Jerusalem, correspond to the words of ver. 2? I believe that light is thrown on the expression "the valley of vision" by Joel. iii. 12 sqq. The expression "the day of the LORD" is found first in Joel. While then Isaiah speaks of "a day of trouble, and of treading down, and of perplexity" which the LORD has, he is led to think on the place which, according to Joel, should be the scene of "the day of the LORD." This place is "the valley of Jehoshaphat," or, as it is termed a little after, (Joel. iii. 14) "the valley of decision." The place of judgment is thus denoted in Joel by symbolical names. He speaks of the judgment on the heathen which does not touch Israel. Isaiah speaks of the judgment on Jerusalem alone, and therefore does not call the place of judgment "the valley of decision," but chooses instead of it another symbolical name. He calls it "the valley of vision." Too much stress has been laid on the representation of a "valley," both here and in Joel iii. 12, 14. The valley of Jehoshaphat is not the valley of Kidron, which from this passage was afterwards called the valley of Jehoshaphat; but it is an ideal plain spread out at the foot of mount Zion, not called a valley from its lying between two mountains (compare also the valley, plain of Jezreel Josh. xvii. 16; Jud. vi. 33; Hos. i. 5), but in opposition to the lofty height from which Jehovah descends. We have then neither to think on the situation of Jerusalem between mountains (Ps. cxxv. 2), nor on the low street in a valley in which the Prophet is supposed to have dwelt. But Jerusalem is called a valley as being on this lower earth in opposition to the heavenly height from which the Judge comes. There are, besides, not wanting traces of the use of גַיְא in the wider signification of planities, plain. (Comp. 2 Sam. viii. 13; Ps. lx. 2; Num. xxi. 2). But why "the valley of vision?" To me it seems that we must not overlook the fact, that in vers. 1–14 seeing is so much spoken of. The inhabitants of Jerusalem go up on the roofs to see (ver. 1). But they do not see as they ought. Then the LORD removes partially the covering from their eyes, and they look to their armory (ver. 8). They look also to the breaches in their walls (ver. 9), and to the lower pool; but alas! they do not look to Him who formed all this long ago (ver. 11). The Prophet, on the other hand, whose eye the LORD had entirely opened, sees accurately (ver. 14). Might not then Jerusalem be called the valley of (prophetic) vision, because in it the true God-imparted seeing has its place, in opposition to the defective and often quite perverse seeing? The Prophet would therefore mean: In the place where the divine seeing has indeed its home, but on account of false human seeing is not regarded, the LORD will appear to hold judgment. The breaking down of the wall took place at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldaeans (Jer. xxxix. 2). Crying to the mountain.—It seems to me to suit the context better, if we (with EWALD, DRECHSLER) under הָהָר understand not the neighboring mountain sides, but the mountain on which the LORD dwells, whence He, according to Joel iii. 16 sq., roars and utters His judgment, and to which the prayers of the suppliants are directed (Ps. ii. 6; iii. 5; xcix. 9; cxxi. 1; Isa. ii. 3; viii. 18; x. 12, 32; xi. 9, etc.). Vers. 6 and 7 explain what is said in ver. 5. The general, indefinite "and" before Elam involves in this connection the notion "and truly, namely." (Comp. GESEN. Thes. p. 394 c). Elam (comp. xi. 11; xxi. 2) is the Persian Uvaja, i. e., the Susiana of the Greeks (SCHRADER, Cuneif. Inscr. p. 31). That the Elamites were renowned as archers appears from Jer. xlix. 30 (comp. HERZOG, R. Encycl. III. p. 748). Kir is described by Amos (ix. 7) as the earlier dwelling of the Syrians. He also predicts that the Syrians should be brought back thither (i. 5), a prophecy whose fulfilment is attested 2 Kings xvi. 9. It has been almost universally assumed since J. D. Michaelis (opposed to this view are KNOBEL, Voelkertafel (Ethnological Table) p. 151. KEIL on 2 Kings xvi. 9; VAIHINGER in HERZOG, R. Encycl. XV., p. 394) that this Kir is the region near the river Κῦρος, a tributary of the Araxes, which falls into the Caspian Sea (comp. EWALD, Hist. III., p. 638). DELITZSCH properly observes that the river Κῦρος is written not with ק but with כ. The name has not yet been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. That the Prophet named Elam and Kir as representatives of the Assyrian host is certainly possible. Only we must understand the matter thus: For the Prophet who always beheld Assyria in the foreground of his field of vision, Assyria signifies the worldly power in general, for which reason he elsewhere includes even Babylon under the name of Assyria (vii. 20; viii. 7). He mentions Elam and Kir, because they were remote and unknown nations. For the prophets frequently render their announcements of judgment more dreadful, by the threatening that distant people, entirely unknown, and therefore quite reckless and pitiless, should be the instrument of the judgment (comp. Deut. xxviii. 49; Isa. xxxiii. 19; Jer. v. 15). The uncovering of the shield (comp. Cæsar Bell. Gall., 11, 21) is proper for infantry, so that all the constituents of an army—archers, chariots of war, cavalry, infantry, will be represented. In ver. 7 the exact rendering is "And it came to pass; thy best valleys were full," etc. But the past tense is not to be understood absolutely. The Prophet does not pass suddenly from the description of future things to depict what had already taken place. He is to be understood relatively. He marks only a progress in the picture of the future which he beholds. He sees the chariots and horsemen (ver. 6) not merely at rest. He sees them in motion, he marks how they fill the environs of Jerusalem. This movement which belongs to the future, he describes as if it took place before his eyes. Thy choicest valleys, lit., the choice of thy valleys, thy best, most fruitful valleys, chief of these the valley of Rephaim (xvii. 5), are filled and overrun with chariots and horsemen, they are so numerous. But they not merely threaten from a distance. They approach close to Jerusalem. The horsemen have taken their stand right before the gate in order to make a dash the moment they are required.

b) The punishment of defiance in sight of danger.

CHAPTER XXII. 8–14.

8 And he [a]discovered the covering of Judah,
And thou didst look in that day
To the armour of the house of the forest.
9 Ye have seen also the breaches of the city of David,
That they are many:
And ye gathered together the waters of the lower pool.
10 And ye have numbered the houses of Jerusalem,
And the houses have ye broken down to fortify the wall.
11 Ye made also a [b]ditch between the two walls
For the water of the old pool:
But ye have not looked unto the maker thereof,
Neither had respect unto him that fashioned it long ago.
12 And in that day did the LORD God of hosts call
To weeping, and to mourning,
And to baldness, and to girding with sackcloth;
13 And behold, joy and gladness,
Slaying oxen, and killing sheep,
Eating flesh, and drinking wine;
Let us eat and drink,
For to-morrow we shall die.
14 And it was revealed in mine ears by the LORD of hosts,
Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till ye die,
Saith the LORD God of hosts.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11. The feminine suffixes in עֹשֶׂיהָ (regarding the form comp. EWALD, § 256 b) and יֹצְרָהּ are to be regarded as neuters. יָצַר is the forming, shaping in idea, to which then עָשָׂה comes as the execution. In analogous places יָצַר stands therefore before עָשָׂה: xliii. 7; xlv. 18; xlvi. 11. However in xxxvii. 26; Jer. xxxiii. 2, the order is as here. We could say that the succession of ideas is conceived in the one case analytically, in the other, synthetically.

Ver. 13. On these infinitive constructions comp. v. 5; xxi. 5.——The abnormal form שָׁתוֹת is in imitation of שָׁחֹט, comp. Hos. x. 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The inhabitants of Jerusalem are now no longer inspired by thoughtless presumption. They see themselves compelled by this new emergency to consider seriously their means of defence. First, they inspect the store of weapons in the arsenal (ver. 8). They examine the fortifications, and collect water in the lower pool (ver. 9). They pull down houses in order to repair the walls (ver. 10), and they form a new reservoir. But to Him who has caused this distress, and who alone can remove it, they do not turn their eyes (ver. 11). And when He brings upon them bitter misery (ver. 12), the only effect of it is that, with the recklessness of despair, they give themselves eagerly to pleasure, because all will soon be over (ver. 13). But this defiant spirit exhibited no longer in blindness, but in sight of danger, the LORD will not pardon. They must expiate it with their life (ver. 14).

2. And he discovered—long ago.—Vers.

8-11. This section is closely connected with the preceding one, as the construction shows.—And he discovered. The subject of the verb is the LORD God of hosts in ver. 5. But, though the connection of the two sections is so intimate, a considerable interval of time must lie between them, as the transition from that blind presumption to the defiance in sight of danger here described, was hardly quite sudden. But for this close grammatical connection of the two sections one might be tempted to refer the first part (vers. 1-7) as a separate prediction to an earlier time. It would, in fact, have been possible for the Prophet to have combined in one prophecy this earlier prediction with a later one on account of a correspondence in subject-matter between the two. But it is most natural to regard the whole piece, vers. 1-14, as a single composition, and to suppose that the Prophet in the first part (vers. 1-7) transported himself back to an earlier juncture, because it served admirably as a foil to the later crisis which he describes (vers. 8-14). This later situation, which was the occasion of this whole prophecy before us, is here described by him as a basis for the complaints and denunciations of punishment which he utters, ver. 11 b and ver. 13 sq. We have therefore to understand the aorists, ver. 8 sqq., not as praeterita prophetica, but in their proper signification. We perceive from ver. 8 a, that the LORD at last took from the eyes of Judah the covering that caused blindness. גלה is here applied not to that which is hidden, but to that which hides, as frequently. Comp. xlvii. 2; Nah. iii. 5; Job xli. 5. Judah then saw the necessity of preparing for war. They proceed therefore to the armory built by Solomon, of cedars, called the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 Kings vii. 2; x. 17, 21), which is probably identical with the בֵּית כֵּלִים xxxix. 2, in order to see how it stood with the apparatus bellicus. The primary meaning of נֶשֶׁק is tela. They next examine the fortifications of the city of David, and discover that there are many breaches in them. I do not think that under "the city of David" we are to understand the whole of Jerusalem, as Arnold appealing to xxix. 1 maintains (HERZOG R. Enc. XVIII., p. 593). "The city of David" is always the South-western elevated part of Jerusalem; and if this part alone is mentioned here, this need not surprise us, as we cannot expect that the Prophet should give an enumeration historically complete. We learn, moreover, from 2 Chron. xxxii. 5, that Hezekiah fortified especially the proper city of David, or Zion. Another matter, which must be particularly attended to by those who defend a city, is to provide themselves with water, and to cut off the supply of it from the enemy. This is what the inhabitants of Jerusalem do. They collect, draw inwards the waters of the lower pool. In the valley of Gihon which borders Jerusalem on the west there are still two old pools; the upper (now Birket-el-Mamilla) and the lower (now Birket es-Sultân). Compare what is said on vii. 3. The account in 2 Chron. xxxii. 3 sq., and that in the place before us supplement one another. In the former, mention is made only of the stopping of the reservoirs. Here, prominence is given to the other necessary step, the turning into the city of the water cut off from the enemy. קִבֵּץ cannot here denote merely collecting in the pool by hindering it from flowing away. For, first, the water, without flowing off, would have risen and been soon remarked by the enemy. Secondly, the water was needed in the city. I take, therefore, קִבֵּץ in the signification in which it is employed Joel ii. 6; Nah. ii. 11, where it is said that faces קִבְּצוּ פָארוּר, i. e., draw in their brightness. Here, then, the meaning is that the inhabitants of Jerusalem drew the water into their city. In reference to DELITZSCH's remark that this must rather be expressed by אסף, I call attention to the fact that Joel expresses, ii. 10 and iv. 15, by אסף the same thought which he had in ii. 6 expressed by קבץ, whence it follows that in this place, too, קבץ can be used in the signification אסף. It may occasion surprise that ver. 10 interrupts the account regarding the reservoirs. But the Prophet evidently proceeds from the easier to the more difficult. The breaking down of the houses for the purpose of repairing the walls, was a greater work than drawing off the water of the lower pool into the wells or reservoirs already existing in the city. And the formation of a new pool between the walls, in order to empty the old one, might well appear the grandest work of all. The opinion of DRECHSLER, that the numbering of the houses was with a view to quartering the soldiers, is very strange. In Jer. xxxiii. 4 it is supposed that houses were demolished in order to repair the fortifications. The מִקְוָה (only here, elsewhere מִקְוֶה) which (ver. 11) was prepared for the waters of "the old pool," is very probably still in existence in the Birket-el-Batrak (the pool of the patriarchs) which the Franks after this passage and 2 Kings xx. 20; 2 Chron. xxxii. 30; Sirach xlviii. 19, call the pool of Hezekiah. It lies within the present wall of the city east of the Yafa (Joppa) gate. It still receives its water from the Mamilla pool by means of a canal which enters the city south of the Yafa gate. (Comp. ARNOLD in HERZ., R. Enc. XVIII., p. 619, and especially C. W. WILSON'S Ordnance Survey of Jerusalem, 1865, and WARREN'S Recovery of Jerusalem, 1872). In opposition to the new pool, the pool whose waters it received was called "the old pool." The former name of the old pool was "the upper pool," which is twice mentioned by Isaiah (vii. 3; xxxvi. 2). The expression חוֹמֹתַיִם occurs besides only in Jer. xxxix. 4, and in the parallel passages Jer. lii. 7; 2 Kings xxv. 4. In these places in the books of Jeremiah and Kings a double wall seems to be meant, which connected Zion and Ophel at the end of the Tyropœon. This does not suit well the situation of the pool of Hezekiah as before mentioned. It is uncertain whether we are to understand in the place before us a corner of a wall between the north wall of Zion and the wall going north-eastwards round Akra (DELITZSCH after ROBINSON), or a second double wall situated near the Yafa gate. This precaution was certainly not in itself wrong. What was wrong in their conduct was that they fixed their eyes only on these measures of human prudence, and omitted to look with confidence to Him who had made all this, i. e., the whole situation, and had arranged it long ago. [The common view, which supposes God to be here described as the maker and fashioner of Jerusalem, has against it the analogy of xxxvii. 26.—D. M.].

3. And in that day—of hosts.—Vers. 12-14. We may ask how the LORD then called the inhabitants of Jerusalem to weeping, and to mourning, and to baldness (iii. 24), and to girding with sackcloth (xx. 2). The language is probably taken from the proclamations by which a general fast, a day of humiliation and prayer was ordained (1 Kings xxi. 9, 12). Such proclamations proceed proximately from the rulers, but ultimately from the LORD, who by the course of His providence renders them necessary. It is now also the LORD who so "makes and forms" everything that Israel, if it would give heed, would be called thereby to repentance. One thinks here very naturally of xxxvii. 1 sqq., where it is related that Hezekiah, in consequence of the message of Rabshakeh, rent his clothes, covered himself with sackcloth, and sent deputies clothed with sackcloth to Isaiah. I would say that as vers. 8-11 recall to mind the defensive measures taken by Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxii. 2 sqq.), so what is said in ver. 12 reminds us of Isa. xxxvii. 1 sqq. Hezekiah was better than the majority of his people. His own father was Ahaz, and his son was Manasseh. He formed between the two only a short episode, which stemmed indeed for a short time the flood of corruption, but which rendered the inundation under Manasseh all the more impetuous. We can therefore reasonably assume that at the very time when Hezekiah and his immediate attendants were exhibiting these signs of penitence there were very many people in Jerusalem who were doing that wherewith the Prophet (ver. 13) reproaches the Jews. They saw the danger. They were no longer blind as in vers. 1 sqq. They did not, however, let the perception of the danger move them to lay hold of the only hand that could save them, but in defiant resignation they refused this help. They made up their mind to go to destruction, but first they would enjoy life right heartily (ver. 13).

The words אכול ושתו I prefer, with DRECHSLER, KNOBEL, and others, to take as words of the Jews, rather than with DELITZSCH ascribe them to the Prophet. For, as words of the Prophet they are superfluous, while as words of the Jews they round off their speech. Moreover the form שָׁתוֹ makes the impression of being an abbreviation borrowed from popular usage. Ver. 14. The perfect ונגלה cannot be taken as the aorist. It marks rather, as DRECHSLER correctly observes, the revelation as an abiding one, continuing to echo in the inner ear of the Prophet. כִּפֵּר (comp. vi. 7; xxvii. 9) properly to cover. According to the way in which this covering takes place the word denotes forgive, or atone. Here it seems to me to signify to forgive, for the mode of threatening excludes the thought of atonement. A recompense after death is not yet taught in the Old Testament. Punishments are inflicted in this life. If a man has to suffer punishment for guilt unpardoned, he has to bear the burden till it has destroyed him, till he is dead. עַד till, declares, therefore, that up to death, all through life, they will have to bear the punishment of that sin. After death follows only Sheol in which there is no more life. [Isaiah himself seems clearly to teach the doctrine of a punishment after death, xxxiiii. 14; lxvi. 24. And in chapter xiv. the Prophet represents the dwellers of Sheol as meeting the king of Babylon with taunts on his appearance among them. This supposes that there is life there. Though the inhabitants of Sheol are prevented from taking part in the affairs of the present life on earth, as Scripture affectingly testifies, this does not hinder their possession of consciousness and activity in the invisible world.—D. M.].

1. AGAINST THE PRIDE OF SHEBNA THE STEWARD OF THE HOUSE.

CHAPTER XXII. 15-25.

15 Thus saith the LORD God of hosts;
Go, get thee unto this [a]treasurer,
Even unto Shebna, which is over the house, and say,
16 What hast thou here, and whom hast thou here,
That thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here,
[1]As he that heweth him out a sepulchre on high,
And that graveth an habitation for himself in a rock?
17 Behold, the LORD [b]will carry thee away with a mighty captivity,
And will surely cover thee.
18 He will surely violently turn,
And toss thee like a ball into a [2]large country;
There shalt thou die,
And there the chariots of thy glory
Shall be the shame of thy lord's house.
19 And I will drive thee from thy station,
And from thy state shall he pull thee down.

20 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That I will call my servant Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah;
21 And I will clothe him with thy robe,
And strengthen him with thy girdle,
And I will commit thy government into his hand;
And he shall be a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem,
And to the house of Judah.
22 And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder,
So he shall open, and none shall shut;
And he shall shut, and none shall open.
23 And I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place;
And he shall be for a glorious throne to his father's house.
24 And they shall hang upon him all the glory of his father's house,
The offspring and the issue, all vessels of small quantity,
From the vessels of cups, even to all the vessels of flagons.
25 In that day, saith the LORD of hosts,
Shall the nail that is fastened in the sure place be removed,
And be cut down, and fall;
And the burden that was upon it shall be cut off;
For the LORD hath spoken it.

[1] Or, O he.
[2] Heb. large of spaces.
[a] privy counsellor.
[b] will whirl thee out with a whirl as a man.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 15. לֶךְ־בֹּא comp. xxvi. 20; Ezek. iii. 4, 11; 2 Ki. v. 5. The change of אֶל and עַל without any perceptible difference of meaning, which is very common in Jeremiah (comp. on Jer. x. 3) occurs also in Isaiah not unfrequently (comp. on x. 3).

Ver. 16. מרום is accusative of the place.

Ver. 17. Grammar forbids our considering טלטלה (it and Pilp. טלטל only here in Isaiah) as in the construct state. For in all cases where this anomaly appears to occur, the second word is in apposition. To take גבר as a vocative (as after the Syriac version many do, also CHEYNE and DIESTEL), is still harder than to regard it as in apposition to יהוה. For though a tolerable irony might lie in גבר, yet there is no example of the word so standing alone as vocative. The subst. טלטלה stands instead of the customary infinitive absolute. I do not understand why it is said that עטה cannot have the signification "wrap up," "inwrap," for it signifies induere in 1 Sam. xxviii. 14; Ps. civ. 2; Ps. lxxi. 13. Comp. Ps. cix. 19, 29; Isa. lix. 17; Jer. xliii. 12; and this induere cannot be understood in many of these places as merely covering, but must denote an inwrapping or enveloping one's self tightly. It might be said that עָטָה then signifies "to inwrap one's self," and stands with the accusative of the thing which is put on or in which a person wraps himself, while in the passage before us עטה is joined with the accusative of the person. But it is well known that the Hebrew verbal stems are by no means clearly discriminated in respect to transitive and intransitive use, and besides, Isaiah employs here only rare verbal forms. It appears to me that the Prophet by עטה indicates the laying together of the coverings on the person of Shebna. צנף denotes the rolling together into a ball, טלטל the casting forth. צנף is to wrap round, obvolvere (the verb only here and Lev. xvi. 4). Thence comes צְנֵפָה, what is rolled or wound together (ἅπ. λεγ.). כַּדּוּר is not דור with the prefix, but כ belongs to the stem. Comp. xxix. 3 and כִּידוֹר Job xv. 24. The signification is pila, sphaera, globus, ball. It is to be construed in apposition to צְנֵפָה. The word קְלוֹן is found only here in Isaiah. מַצָּב, הָדַף and מַעֲמָד only here in Isaiah; הָרַס is found besides xiv. 17 and in Piel xlix. 17.

Ver. 21. חִזֵּק (with double accusative after the analogy of verbs of clothing) is to make fast, strengthen (Nah. ii. 2).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The prophecy, which chastises the haughty and defiant spirit of the inhabitants of Jerusalem is followed by another which has for its subject the pride of a single person. Shebna, the steward of the palace, and first minister of the king, was a haughty, insolent man. He went so far in his arrogance that he caused a sepulchre to be hewn out for himself in a rock on high (probably on the height of Mount Zion). He was standing beside his new sepulchre, which was yet in course of construction, when Isaiah, by God's command, came to him and asked him by what right and title he was hewing for himself here a sepulchre in the rock on the height (vers. 15 and 16)? Jehovah will cast him away as a ball into a distant, level country. There shall he die, and the disgrace of the house of David will be there his funeral pomp. But before that, the Lord will remove him from his office (vers. 17–19). The LORD will call to his place as steward of the palace Eliakim the son of Hilkiah, who will prove a father to Jerusalem and Judah, and the key of authority over the realm shall be put into his hand (vers. 20–22). Eliakim will thereby raise his family also to high honors. As one hangs on a nail all vessels of the house, so will he elevate and bear all the descendants of his house; but this procedure will not remain unpunished—for the nail will break, and the vessels hanging on it will fall down and be dashed to pieces (ver. 23-25).

2. Thus saith—over the house.—Vers. 15. סֹכֵן occurs only here. The feminine סֹכֶנֶת is applied as a predicate to the Shunammite Abishag (1 Kings i. 2, 4). A סֹכֶנֶת [Margin of English Bible: a cherisher] is there sought for the king and also found in the person of Abishag. That in this connection the signification: "intimate friend," amica intima, familiarissima, suits, is obvious. The signification "intimate friend" is favored by the related root, שָׁכַן, to dwell, with the additional signification, to dwell together (σύγκοιτος. Comp. Prov. viii. 12; GES. Thes. p. 1408), and the Arabic sakan, friend, and the Hiphil. הִסְכִּין, to form acquaintance (Job xxii. 21), cognitum habere (Ps. cxxxix. 3) consuevisse (Numb. xxii. 30). That this was in the East a title of office is well known. (Comp. the LEXICONS and GESENIUS on this place). I therefore translate סֹכֵן by "privy counsellor." The pronoun הַזֶּה this, involves, like the Latin iste, the idea of contempt. The name שֶׁבְנָא (written שֶׁבְנָה, 2 Kings xviii. 18, 26; comp. ibid. vers. 37 and xix. 2; Isa. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22; xxxvii. 2) is in the O. T. applied only to this one individual. From the circumstance that his genealogy is not given, some have been inclined to infer that he was a novus homo, an upstart, perhaps not even an Israelite. Neither conclusion seems to me to be justified. For, that Isaiah does not name the father of Shebna because he was a homo ignobilis, or quite unknown, is so unlikely, that we must rather on the contrary say, if the father of Shebna had been a man of base, or not even of Israelitish origin, or a person quite unknown, Isaiah would have given prominence to this circumstance, because it would serve to set the haughtiness of Shebna in the more glaring light. It is therefore more probable that Isaiah, contrary to the approved custom of the East, omitted the name of the father, because he would not show this respect to the son. The fact that Shebna is further described as placed "over the house," indicates that סֹכֵן was only a general title. He belonged, in general, to the friends of the king, but he was, in particular, the highest among them, viz.: major domus, maire du palais. He filled at the same time the first office at court and in the state. Comp. 1 Kings iv. 6; xvi. 9; xviii. 3; 2 Kings x. 5. From 2 Kings xv. 5 we learn that even the son of the king and subsequently his successor on the throne filled this office.

3. What hast thou——pull thee down.—Vers. 16-19. The question "What hast thou here?" evidently means: What entitles thee to make thy grave here? While the question "Whom hast thou here?" intimates that Shebna will not succeed in burying here even one of his kindred. The thrice-repeated פֹּה, here, intimates that the place was a select one, not standing open to every person. The following words חֹצְבִי מָרוֹם to the end of the verse, make on one the impression that they are a quotation from some poem unknown to us. For 1) the third person does not suit the connection here; 2) the parallelism, consisting of two members, and the forms חֹצְבִי and חֹקְקִי indicate a poetic origin. What height is meant appears from the statement in many passages (1 Kings ii. 10; xi. 43, etc.; 2 Chron. xvi. 14, etc.) that the sepulchres of the kings were in the city of David, i. e., on Zion, and according to 2 Chr. xxxii. 33, on the height of Zion. [Eng. Ver. there runs "in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David;" but "height" should be substituted for "chiefest."—D. M.]. In this quarter, although not in the proper sepulchres of the kings, those kings also were interred who did not appear worthy of the full honor of a kingly burial (2 Chron. xxiv. 16). Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc. I., p. 773 sqq. In the neighborhood of the royal sepulchres on the height of Zion, Shebna also seems to have laid out for himself a tomb hewn in a rock. An honor which was voluntarily accorded to such a man as Jehoiada he arrogates to himself. The last member of verse 16 bears evidently the character of poetic parallelism, for it repeats for the sake of rhetorical effect the thought of the preceding clause, though somewhat modified (the grave is described as a habitation for the dead). Comp. Obad. 3; Hab. ii. 19. Shebna believes that he is able to secure for himself and his family, even after death, a permanent dwelling for all times. But the Prophet announces to him that the LORD will cast him forth, will whirl him out with a whirl as a man, i. e., with the force of a strong man. Ver. 18. We have here a pregnant construction. צנף besides meaning to roll together, must have latent in it the idea of rolling forth, as it is connected with אֶל. צְנֵפָה is then not the act of rolling, but that which is rolled together. The expression רחבת ידים, widely extended on both sides, is found further only in Gen. xxxiv. 21; Judges xviii. 10; 1 Chron. iv. 40; Neh. vii. 4. The Prophet evidently means by this large country Mesopotamia, which then still belonged to the Assyrian empire. It seems to me that there is also an antithesis in this expression. As being cast forth stands in opposition to the peaceful staying at home which Shebna hoped for, so the broad country is in contrast to the elevated rock-hewn sepulchre above the narrow valley. There, consequently, in a place which is the very opposite of the place where Shebna wished to build his grave, there shall he die, and there shall he be buried. But even the burial ceremonies will contrast strangely with those which Shebna had anticipated. Almost all interpreters take קלון בי׳ א׳ as vocative. But then the sentence "and there the chariots, etc.," would be without a predicate; or we must supply an unmeaning predicate such as erunt, venient, or an arbitrary one such as peribunt. The VULGATE and the Peshito have taken the words ושמה to אדניך together as subject and predicate. But when they translate "et ibi erit currus gloriae tuae ignominia domus domini tui" we must not think that they take currus as the subject; for this construction yields no tolerable sense. But ignominia, etc. (קלון ב׳ א׳) is the subject. We have, indeed, so far as I know, no express statements respecting the use of chariots at the funerals of the Hebrews. Only in 2 Kings xxiii. 30 we read that the dead body of king Josiah was brought in a chariot (comp. 2 Chron. xxxv. 24) from Megiddo to Jerusalem. But the thing is in itself probable, and in the passage before us the mention of chariots would be well explained if we durst assume that Isaiah thought of the magnificent funeral with chariots which Shebna might expect. In this supposition I translate "and there will thy state-carriages be—the shame of the house of thy lord;" that is, the shame which the house of thy lord will suffer, and that, too, chiefly through thy fault, this shame will be the escort of thy dead body, it will serve thee instead of the chariots with which they would have furnished thy funeral here, suitably to thy dignity as placed over the palace, it will constitute thy obsequies and accompany thee to the grave. That in the expression "shame of thy lord's house," there is an allusion to the house of the king over which Shebna was placed, is self-evident. There is no hysteron proteron when the Prophet announces the deposition of Shebna from his office. For, in fact, this deposition is only the consequence of the judgment which was to come on Shebna on account of his presumption in building himself a vault. How can a man, against whom such a sentence has been published, remain steward of the palace? He displeases the King of kings. How can the earthly king, if he will not draw on himself the wrath of the heavenly King, retain him? He must dismiss the man to whom Jehovah Himself has given notice of dismissal. Ver. 19. The change of person in the two verbs is best explained, after what has been remarked, in this way: the first person refers to the LORD as the Supreme Ruler; the third person, to the human authority, by means of which the divine will is executed on Shebna. This third person is not mentioned by name, and is to be rendered by "he" or "one." Shebna's pride was certainly only one symptom of a spirit displeasing to God. He was assuredly no "servant of the LORD;" he therefore did not employ his power to promote the cause of Jehovah, and he must give way to a better man.

4. And it shall come—hath spoken it.—Vers. 20-25. On the day when Shebna must quit his post, Eliakim the son of Hilkiah will occupy his place. We know of this Eliakim nothing except what we learn from the present passage and from xxxvi. and xxxvii. He was in all probability of the priestly race. For Hilkiah, as his father was called, was a common name of priests. At all events, all persons called Hilkiah mentioned in the O. T. are, with a single doubtful exception (Jer. xxix. 3) of priestly, or at least of Levitical origin, Jer. i. 1; 2 Kings xxii. 4 sqq.; 1 Chron. v. 39; vi. 30; xxvi. 11; Ezra. vii. 1; Neh. viii. 4; xi. 11; xii. 7. It seems to follow from ver. 21, that the steward of the house had an official dress, with the putting on of which his installation was connected. The כְּתֹנֶת, tunic was one of the principal parts of the dress of the priests. (Ex. xxviii. 40; xxix. 5, 8, etc.). The girdle (אַבְנֵט) also belonged to the dress of the priests (Ex. xxviii. 29; Lev. viii.). מֶמְשָׁלָה in the sense of sphere of rule, jurisdiction, in Isaiah besides only xxxix. 2. Where the paternal authority stands so high as among the Jews the expression, "to be a father to one" denotes a right to rule, which has no other limits than those which nature itself imposes on a father in relation to his child (Gen. xlv. 8; Judges xvii. 10; xviii. 19). The expression "the house of Judah" is found in Isaiah besides only xxxvii. 31. It occurs first in Hosea (i. 7; v. 12, 14); and is especially frequent in the older parts of Jeremiah (iii. 18; v. 11; xi. 10, 17, etc.), and in Ezekiel (iv. 6; viii. 17; ix. 9, etc.). Respecting the distinction between Judah and Jerusalem comp. on ii. 1; v. 3. Ver. 22. The power over the house is essentially a power of the keys. For the key opens the entrance to the house, to the apartments and to all that is in them. He, therefore, who alone has this key, has alone also the highest power. The expression reminds us on the one hand of ix. 5 ("on his shoulder" is a symbolical representation of the office as a burden to be carried), on the other hand of Job xii. 14. The LORD Himself is in Rev. iii. 7 represented after the present passage as He who has "the key of David." Eliakim is not only to possess the highest authority at court and in the State, he is also to use his position for advancing all his house to high honor. This will not happen without abuse of power and evil consequences. A double image is used to express what Eliakim will be to his house. First, he shall be fastened as a nail (יָתֵד xxxiii. 20; liv. 2) in a sure place (i. e., in a place where it sticks fast). I do not think that יָתֵד is here to be taken as a tent-peg; for that would not suit ver. 25. The figure is intended first of all to convey the idea that Eliakim's influential position will be firmly established and secure. The word of the LORD has called him to it. In this secure and influential place Eliakim will be for his own family a throne of honor (1 Sam. ii. 8; Jer. xiv. 21; xvii. 12), i. e., he will bear his whole family, it will honorably rest on him, as upon a throne. We see that the two figures come substantially to the same thing. But the figure of a nail is in itself a less honorable one than that of a throne. For the nail is only a common article serving simply for the hanging up of vessels. It happens then to Eliakim that he is a nail to which all that belongs to the house of Hilkiah attaches itself, in order to attain to honor by him (ver. 24 a). They hang on Eliakim the offspring (צאצאים an expression which occurs only Job v. 25; xxi. 8; xxvii. 14; xxxi. 8 and Isa. xxxiv. 1; xlii. 5; xliv. 3; xlviii. 19; lxi. 9; lxv. 23) and the issue; the two expressions, denote the direct and collateral issue. צְפִעוֹת properly parasite plants, hangers-on. צפיעה, ἅπ. λεγ., is a contemptuous expression, as we can see from צפיע (Ezek. iv. 15). All vessels of small quantity, of smallness (xxxvi. 9, comp. Ex. xv. 16) from the basins (Ex. xxiv. 6) to the skin bottles, or vessels like skin bags or bottles. Thus his entire kindred will fasten themselves on him. The proper, literal expressions "the offspring and the issue" are illustrated by the figurative expressions which follow. Ver. 25. In that day (with significant allusion to ver. 20) i. e., at the time when this nepotism will be at its height, and be ripe for judgment, the nail which was fastened in a sure place will give way, break and fall, and the burden hanging on it will be dashed to pieces. Many interpreters take offence at this turn of the prophecy, which unexpectedly betokens disaster, and HITZIG pronounces ver. 24 sq. a later addition. But as the prophecy directed against Shebna had the effect that he actually resigned his post in favor of Eliakim, and was content with the lower office of a scribe (xxxvi. 3 sqq.), in like manner the unexpected statement, ver. 24 sq., can have had the salutary design, and effect of warning Eliakim. If this result followed, then the words were not, in fact, pregnant with disaster, but with profit. If Eliakim did not let himelf be admonished, he deserved what is threatened.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxi. 2 "God punishes one villain by means of another, and a man is punished by the very sin which he himself commits (Wisdom xi. 17). Thus God punished the Babylonians by the Persians, the Persians by the Greeks, the Greeks by the Romans, the Romans by the Goths, Longobardi, and Saracens."—CRAMER. [The Persians shall pay the Babylonians in their own coin; they that by fraud and violence, cheating and plundering, unrighteous wars and deceitful treaties, have made a prey of their neighbors, shall meet with their match, and by the same methods shall themselves be made a prey of. HENRY. D. M.].

2. On xxi. 3. "The Prophets do not rejoice at the loss suffered by their enemies; but have sympathy for them as for men made in the image of God. We ought not to cast off every humane feeling towards our foes (Matt. v. 34)." —CRAMER.

3. On xxi. 5. "Invadunt urbem vino somnoque sepultam." VIRGIL. "We see here how people commonly feel the more secure, the more they indulge their fleshly lusts, although they are drawing nearer their punishment. So was it with the antediluvian world, so is it now also in these last times when the coming of Christ is expected, as He says, Matt. xxiv. 38."—RENNER. The Prophet Isaiah expounded, etc.—STUTTGART, 1865, p. 73.

4. On xxi. 6 sqq. "It is a grand, infallible evidence of the prophetic Scriptures, and of their divine inspiration, that they do not speak in general uncertain terms, but describe future things so accurately, and exactly, as if we saw them before our eyes. This serves to establish the authority of the Holy Scriptures."—CRAMER.

5. On xxi. 10. Only what the LORD said to him, and all that the LORD said to him, the Prophet declares. Therefore he is sure and certain, even when he has incredible things to announce. Therefore is he firm and courageous, though what he has to proclaim does not please the world. He conceals and keeps back nothing; neither does he add anything. He is a faithful declarer of the mind of God, and does not spare even himself. The proof, fulfilment and accomplishment he leaves to Him who spake through him.

6. On xxi. 11. "He who sets the watch without God, watches in vain (Ps. cxxvii. 1). And when God Himself is approaching, then no care of the watchmen is of any use, whether it be day or night. For when the day of the LORD begins to burn, even the stars of heaven and his Orion, do not shine brightly. For God covers the heavens, and makes the stars thereof dark, and covers the sun with a cloud (Ezek. xxxii. 7). For when God the Creator of all things frowns on us, then all creatures also frown on us, and are terrible and offensive to us."—CRAMER. From this place CHRISTIAN FRIEDR. RICHTER, has composed his fine morning hymn:—

Hüter, wird die Nacht der Sünden
Nicht verschwinden?

[Comp. in ENGLISH BOWRING's well-known hymn:—

Watchman, tell us of the night,
What its signs of promise are.—D. M.]

7. On xxi. 14. "We ought not to forget to be hospitable towards the needy (Heb. xiii. 1)."—CRAMER.

8. On xxi. 16. "I regard as a true Prophet him who does not declare a matter upon mere imagination and conjecture, but measures the time so exactly that he fixes precisely when a thing shall happen."—CRAMER.

9. On xxii. 2 sqq. To see the enemy at the gates, and at the same time to regard him merely with curiosity, and to indulge in mirth and jollity, as if all were well, and this too at a time when God's servants warn men with tears, as Isaiah did Jerusalem (ver. 4), this is blind presumption which God will punish. But when the calamity has burst upon them, and all expedients by which they try to avert it are of no avail, for men to despise then the only one who can help them, and to spend the brief remaining time in sensual pleasure, this is open-eyed defiance, and will lead to judicial blindness, and that sin which will not be forgiven (Matt. xii. 32).

10. On xxii. 13. This is the language of swine of the herd of Epicurus, comp. Isa. lvi. 12; Wisdom ii. 6 sqq.; 1 Cor. xv. 32.

11. On xxii. 14. It is true, as AUGUSTINE says, that "no one should despair of the remission of his sin, seeing that even they who put Christ to death obtained forgiveness," and "the blood of Jesus Christ was so shed for the forgiveness of all sins that it could wash away the sins of those by whom it was shed"—but that obstinacy, which refuses to see the needed help, excludes itself from grace and forgiveness.

12. On xxii. 15 sqq. The mission which Isaiah here receives, reminds us strongly of that which Jeremiah had to discharge towards Jehoiakim (Jer. xxii. 1 sqq., esp. ver. 19), and also of what he was obliged to say to Pashur (xx. 6). A Prophet of the LORD must show no respect of persons. Isaiah indeed seems to have produced the desired effect; for we find xxxvi. and xxxvii. Shebna as Scribe and Eliakim as steward of the house. But Jeremiah received as recompense for the fulfilment of his mission bitter hatred and cruel persecution.

13. On xxii. 17. The Vulgate translates here: Ecce Dominus asportari te faciet, sicut asportatur gallus gallinaceus. And JEROME in his exposition says: "Hebraeus, qui nos in lectione veteris Testamenti erudivit, gallum gallinaceum transtulit. Sicut inquit gallus gallinaceus humero portatoris de alio loco transfertur ad alium, sic te Dominus de loco tuo leviter asportabit." The cock which is never mentioned in the Old Testament, and for which we have no genuine Hebrew word, is in fact called גֶּבֶר by the Talmudists. "Conscience, wanting the word of God, is as a ball rolling on the ground, and cannot rest."—LUTHER.

14. On xxii. 19. "Service at court is not in itself to be condemned, and a good ruler and a worthy prime minister are the gift of God (SIRACH iv. 8, 11; Ch. x.). Let him therefore who is called to such an office abide, as the LORD has called him (1 Cor. vii. 17), and beware of excessive pomp. For God can quickly depose the proud."—CRAMER.

15. On xxii. 21 sqq. The comparison of a magistrate in high position with a father is very appropriate. The whole extent, and the proper measure of a ruler's power are involved in this similitude. The authority of a father and that of a ruler have a common root in love. Eliakim in having the keys of the house of David laid on his shoulder that he might open and no one shut, and shut and no one open is (Rev. iii. 7) viewed as a type of Christ, who is the administrator appointed by God over the house of David in the highest sense, i. e., over the kingdom of God. Christ has this power of the keys in unrestricted measure. The ministers of the LORD exercise the same only in virtue of the commission which they have from Him; and their exercise of it is only then sanctioned by the LORD, when it is in the Spirit which the LORD breathed into the disciples before He committed to them the power of the keys (John xx. 22 sq.). ["The application of the same terms to Peter (Matt. xvi. 19) and to Christ Himself (Rev. iii. 7) does not prove that they here refer to either, or that Eliakim was a type of Christ, but merely that the same words admit of different applications." ALEXANDER. "It is God that clothes rulers with their robes, and, therefore, we must submit ourselves to them for the LORD's sake and with an eye to Him (1 Pet. ii. 13). And since it is He that commits the government into their hand,—they must administer it according to His will, for His glory. And they may depend on Him to furnish them for what He calls them to; according to the promise here. I will clothe him: and then there follows, I will strengthen him." After HENRY—D. M.]

16. On xxii. 25. "No one is so exalted or raised to such high dignity as to abide therein. But man's prosperity, office and honor, and whatever else is esteemed great in the world are, like human life, on account of sin inconstant, vain and liable to pass away. This serves as an admonition against pride and security." CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL HINTS ON XXI.—XXII.

1. On xxi. 1–4. God's judgments are terrible, 1) for him on whom they fall; 2) for him who has to announce them.

2. On xxi. 6–10. The faithful watchman. 1) He stands upon his watch day and night. 2) He announces only what he has seen and what he has heard from the LORD (vers. 9 and 10). 3) But he announces this as a lion, i. e. aloud and without fear.

3. On xxii. 11-12. The spiritual night on earth. 1) It is a. a night of tribulation, b. a night of sin. 2) It awakens a longing for its end. 3) It does not entirely cease till the LORD "vouchsafes to us a happy end, and graciously takes us from this valley of weeping to Himself in heaven."

4. On xxi. 14 sq. We may fitly employ this text for a charity sermon on any occasion when an appeal is made to the benevolence of the congregation (especially for exiles, as those banished from the Salzburg territory for their Evangelical faith). What we ought to consider when our contributions are asked. 1) Our own situation (we dwell in the land of Tema, a quite fertile oasis). 2) The situation of those who come to us in their distress. 3) What we have to give them.

5. On xxii. 1–7. Warning against thoughtlessness. Pride precedes a fall. Blind presumption is often changed into its opposite.

6. On xxii. 8–14. Blind presumption is bad, but open-eyed obstinacy is still worse. The latter is when one clearly perceives the existing distress, and the insufficiency of our own powers and of the means at our command, and yet refuses to look to Him who alone can help, or to consider the fate which awaits those who die without God, and seeks before the impending catastrophe happens to snatch as much as possible of the enjoyments of this world.

7. On xxii. 15–19. He who will fly high is in danger of falling low. God can easily cast him down. The waxen wings of Icarus. Shebna illustrates, 1 Pet. v. 5.

8. On xxii. 20-25. A mirror for those in office. Every one who has an office, ought 1) to be conscious that he has come into the office legally, and according to the will of God; 2) He ought to be a father to those over whom he is set; 3) He ought so to do everything which he does in his office, that its justice is apparent, and that no one can impugn it. 4) He ought not to be like a nail on which all the relations of his family strive to fasten their hope of success; for that is bad for himself and for those who would so abuse his influence.

IV. PROPHECY AGAINST TYRE. CHAPTER XXIII.

All the nations hitherto mentioned, bordering on Judah, come under the power of Assyria. But Tyre, according to verse 13, is to fall a prey to the Chaldæans. This prophecy is placed last on account of its fulfilment belonging to a time subsequent to the supremacy of Assyria. Tyre was not only the head of the minor Phœnician states, but was also the mistress of the sea, both for commerce and war; and for these two reasons was the most important ally of Egypt. He who would attack Egypt from the north must first seek to possess himself of Tyre, which was the bulwark of Egypt. Assyria had long an eye on Egypt. They were, in fact, natural rivals. Shalmaneser, rightly perceiving the importance which Tyre had for his plans against Egypt, made himself master of Phœnicia, with exception of insular Tyre, which he blockaded for five years, and sought, by cutting off its supply of water, to force to surrender. Whether he succeeded in this attempt cannot be definitely ascertained. In any case Tyre suffered no great loss. Our prophecy must have had its rise at this time. For further particulars see below in remarks on xxxiii. 15–18. Rationalistic interpreters place this alternative before us in regard to the genuineness of the prophecy. Either the prophecy refers to a conquest of Tyre by the Assyrians—in that case it is genuine; or it is intended to announce a conquest by the Chaldaeans—in that case it is spurious. It is admitted that it bears the marks of having Isaiah for its author. But it is judged impossible for Isaiah to have announced the Chaldæans as the conquerors of Tyre. I believe it would be more scientific not to regard this as impossible, but to treat it as a problem. Even KNOBEL defends the authenticity of the prophecy against the shallow objections drawn from language and history by HITZIG and MOVERS (Tübingen Quarterly Journal III. p. 506 sqq.). MOVERS afterwards modified his view so as to allow chapter xxiii. to be genuine, but revised and altered by Jeremiah (Phoen. II. 1, p. 396, Note). KNOBEL defends also its integrity against EICHHORN, EWALD and MEIER. The vers. 15-18 stand and fall with the expression "the land of the Chaldæans," ver. 13. The piece consists of two parts, of which the first (vers. 1–14) has for its subject the fall of Tyre, the second (vers.15–18) Tyre's restoration.

a) The fall of Tyre. CHAPTER XXIII. 1-14.

1 THE BURDEN OF TYRE.
Howl, ye ships of Tarshish;
For it is laid waste,
So that there is no house, no entering in,
From the land of Chittim it is revealed to them.
2 Be [1]still, ye inhabitants of the isle;
Thou whom the merchants of Zidon, that pass over the sea,
Have replenished.
3 And by great waters the seed of Sihor,
The harvest of the river, is her revenue;
And [a]she is a mart of nations.
4 Be thou ashamed, O Zidon; for the sea hath spoken,
Even the strength of the sea, saying,
[b]I travail not, nor bring forth children,
Neither do I nourish up young men,
Nor bring up young virgins.
5 [c]As at the report concerning Egypt,
So shall they be sorely pained at the report of Tyre.
6 Pass ye over to Tarshish;
Howl, ye inhabitants of the isle.
7 [d]Is this your joyous city,
Whose antiquity is of ancient days?
[e]Her own feet shall carry her afar off to sojourn.
8 Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre, [f]the crowning city;
Whose merchants are princes,
Whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth?
9 The LORD of hosts hath purposed it,
To [2]stain the pride of all glory,
And to bring into contempt all the honorable of the earth.
10 Pass through thy land as a river,
O daughter of Tarshish:
There is no more [3]strength.
11 He stretched out his hand over the sea;
He shook the kingdoms.
The LORD hath given a commandment [4]against [5]the merchant city
To destroy the [6]strongholds thereof.

12 And he said,
Thou shalt no more rejoice,
O thou oppressed virgin, daughter of Zidon;
Arise, pass over to Chittim,
There also shalt thou have no rest.
13 Behold, the land of the Chaldeans;.
This people was not:—
[g] Till the Assyrian founded it
For them that dwell in the wilderness:
They set up the towers thereof;
They raised up the palaces thereof;
And he brought it to ruin.
14 Howl, ye ships of Tarshish;
For your strength is laid waste.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. הֵילִילִי which is first found in Joel (i. 5, 11, 13), occurs besides in Isaiah only in the first prophecy against Babylon (xiii. 6 here evidently borrowed from Joel) and in the form הֵילִלִי in the Massa against the Philistines (xiv. 31).

Ver. 3. סְחַר never means emporium, mart, which it must signify if ותהי should be referred to אי׳. The form סְחַר can denote only what is traded, or gain resulting from merchandise (xlv. 14 and Prov. iii. 14). It is identical in meaning with סַחַר, ver. 18; Prov. iii. 14; xxxi. 18. [סְחַר is obviously the construct state, and is referred by Ewald to סַחַר, by Gesenius to an assumed form סָחָר.—D. M.].

Ver. 4. גִדַּלְתִּי and רוֹמַמְתִּי as i. 2. [Delitzsch pertinently asks, "Who does not in these words hear Isaiah speak?"—D. M.].

Ver. 5. כְּ before שֵׁמַע marks coincidence. שֵׁמַע is the accusative of time.

Ver. 7. עַלִּיזָה (comp. xxii. 2) involves perhaps an allusion to the Phœnician female name Elissa. יוֹבִיל (= הֵבִיא) is to lead, to bring. מרחוק afar (comp. on xxii. 3).

Ver. 11. מעזניה is treated by some, e. g., Olshausen, as an anomaly; by others it is supposed capable of explanation. We must agree with those who regard it as an anomalous form which has arisen by some oversight.

Ver. 13. בַּחִין, Keri בַּחוּן from בָּחַן explorare is the specula, turris exploratoria. The word occurs only here. עֹרְרוּ Pilel from עָרַר (= עָרָה nudum esse, xxii. 6, עוּר Hab. iii. 9) nudare, to make naked, i. e., to uncover by overturning. The conjugation Pilel only here, Pilpel Jer. li. 58. מַפֵּלָה besides only xxv. 2. Comp. מַפָּלָה xvii. 1.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet in the first place calls upon the Tyrian mariners sojourning in Tarshish far from their home, to break forth into loud lamentation, as the tidings have come to them across the land of Chittim that their home is destroyed, and a return thither is no longer possible (ver. 1). Then in a brief word stillness, eternal silence is enjoined on insular Tyre, that had been hitherto the noisy centre of the Phœnician commerce, the great negotiator between Egypt with its abundance of products and the other nations (verses 2 and 3). Then Zidon is reminded of the shame it will feel, when, on coming to the site of Tyre, it will find no children there, but only the dead rock and unfruitful sea (verse 4). Egypt, too, learns the report, and is affrighted (ver. 5). Nothing remains for Tyre but to flee to Tarshish, as its ships can no more return to Tyre (ver. 6). Next, the Prophet makes a comparison between what Tyre was and what it is. The terrible blow falls on a joyous city having a wide dominion from ancient time (ver. 7). But from whom does this whole purpose respecting Tyre proceed? From Jehovah who humbles all pride (vers. 8, 9), who liberates the nations hitherto oppressed by Tyre (ver. 10), who rules over sea and nations, in order to exercise judgment on the haughty Phœnicians, who now must flee into distant countries, to find even there no rest (vers. 11, 12). But what people will be the instrument in Jehovah's hand to execute this judgment? It will be the people of the Chaldaeans, hitherto not a nation, but who will one day make Assyria a habitation for the beasts of the desert. This people sets up its siege apparatus against Tyre, throws down the high buildings, and reduces the city to ruins (ver. 13). With the cry, "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish, for your strength is laid waste," the discourse closes as it began (ver. 14).

2. The burden of Tyre——revealed to them.—Ver. 1. Attention has properly been called to the fact that the first Massa (xiii.) was directed against Babylon, the greatest worldly power possessing supreme dominion on the land, the rich and luxurious consumer of all precious productions of the earth; and that, on the other hand, the last Massa has for its subject the first power on the sea, the centre of the world's commerce, the great purveyor of all things that are costly, or that minister to enjoyment. Here too we can add that the worldly power first threatened with a Massa, is according to ver. 13 to execute the judgment on the one last threatened. The ships of Tarshish (comp. on ii. 16) are addressed by metonymy instead of the mariners sailing in them. The form of expression is singularly brief and concise. They are to howl כִּי שֻׁדַּד, i. e. that it has been laid waste, that a destruction, a devastation has taken place (xv. 1), and such a one as excludes the mariners from their house and home, and from a return home (בּוֹא the opposite of יָצָא, e. g., in designating the setting of the sun). מִן has a negative signification, and the force of an ecbatic conjunction, marking the result. That the destruction which renders it impossible for the Tyrian mariners to return home is the destruction of Tyre itself, is self-evident. The Prophet is too sparing of his words to say that. This sad news has come from the land of the Chittim to the Tyrian mariners far away from their home. The report reached Chittim first, and thence was carried to Tarshish. They do not learn the news in Chittim, but it comes from it; for the text is "from the land," not "in the land." The name Chittim is found in Citium, Κίττιον, Κίτιον, Κήτιον, the name of a considerable port in the island of Cyprus. The Chittim are then, in the first place, the inhabitants of the island of Cyprus. In a wider signification, however, the word denotes the islands and maritime countries of the Mediterranean Sea in general (ver. 12; Gen. x. 4; Jer. ii. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Dan. xi. 30), comp. on Jer. ii. 10. נִגְלָה (comp. xxii. 14; xxxviii. 12; xl. 5; liii. 1) intimates that the report received from the land of the Chittim was a sure one. Therefore they are summoned to howl.

3. Be still——of the nations.—Vers. 2, 3. The Prophet passes from the extreme west to the extreme east of the Mediterranean Sea. He calls now to the Tyrians themselves; דֹּמּוּ, i. e. be silent, be still (the word only here in Isaiah). He means evidently dumb, speechless amazement (comp. Ex. xv. 16). אִי is terra maritima, including not only an island but also continental territory having a sea coast (comp. on xi. 11; xx. 6). Old Tyre was on the mainland and possessed no harbor. Insular Tyre lay 30 stadia north of Palae-Tyrus, and 3 stadia from the mainland. It had excellent harbors, the best on the whole coast of Palestine (Movers, Phoen. II., I., p. 176). As according to the latter part of ver. 2, only that Tyre can here be meant which the merchants that pass over the sea filled, we must understand insular Tyre under אִי. The word is masculine, but is here treated as feminine, as the feminine suffix in מִלְאוּךְ refers to אִי. The merchants of Zidon (which was an older city, comp. Justin xviii. 3) filled Tyrus, says the Prophet. Zidon was itself a seaport town, but the port of Tyre was better. The Zidonians had in the 13th century, B. C., laid out a port and city on the rocky islands of Tyre (comp. Movers, Phoen. II., 313; Justin xviii. 3, 5). Hiram completed this plan by building the suburb Eurychoros on the east side of the smaller island, and the new city on this smaller island; and at the same time he connected the new city with the western or old city, which was on the larger island. It is readily conceivable that beside the Tyrians, chiefly Zidonian merchants and mariners filled the port and city of insular Tyre. How could old Egypt, a neighboring country, excelling as it once did, all the nations of the East in agriculture and industry, avoid coming into the liveliest intercourse with the great commercial centre, Tyre? The one was necessary to the other. Of late years Ebers in particular (Egypt and the Books of Moses I., p. 127 sqq.) has shown the ancient connection of Phœnicia with Egypt. The Phœnician alphabet, as can be positively demonstrated in regard at least to the greater part of the letters, is derived from the hieratic written characters of the Egyptians. "In the third millenium B. C.," says Ebers, ut supra, p. 149, the Phœnicians stood in close intercourse with Egypt, learned from the subjects of the Pharaohs the cursive mode of writing, and communicated the same to all nations of Western Asia and of Europe." But the Phœnicians received from the Egyptians, not merely intellectual, but also material goods for their own use, and to trade with distant regions: ver. 3, By great waters, i. e., by the Nile and the sea came the seed of Sihor, and the harvest of the river (comp. on xix. 7, where a like expression is to be noted) to Tyre, and so became the income of this city, what was gathered into it. Sihor שִׁחוֹר Hebraized from Σίρις the vernacular name of the Upper Nile, but as a Hebrew word formed from the root שָׁחַר, niger fuit, Job xxx. 30=the black river, Μέλας. The name Sihor denotes undoubtedly the Nile, Jer. ii. 18; the places (1 Chron. xiii. 5; Josh. xiii. 3; xix. 26) are uncertain. The double designation seed of the Nile and harvest of the river is a poetic parallelism which resolves one conception into two, which, it is true, are not equivalent. What was sown and reaped on the Nile the Tyrians gathered in, not to keep it wholly for themselves, but only in order to secure commercial profit by selling it again. Translate the last clause of ver. 3, "And it (the income of Tyre, what was gathered into it) became the merchandise of the nations." What the Tyrians brought in from Egypt goes out from them as profitable merchandise to all nations.

4. Be thou ashamed——of the isle.—Vers. 4-6. Who should be more affected by the fate of Tyre than its mother Zidon in the north, and its neighbor and commercial friend Egypt in the south? Zidon is accordingly bidden to be ashamed at suffering the disgrace of seeing her offspring die out in the second generation. Early extinction of race was regarded as a punishment inflicted by God, and awakened the suspicion of either open or secret crime on the part of the person thus visited (comp. the Book of Job). For this reason want of children was a reproach (Gen. xxx. 23; Isa. iv. 1; Luke i. 25). By "the sea and the strength (fortress) of the sea," most interpreters understand the city of Tyre itself, and the complaint I have not travailed nor brought forth, etc., is supposed to mean: I have lost again all the children born of me. But it must appear strange in the highest degree that Tyre, because it is situated in the sea, and lives from the sea, should itself be called "sea." And "I have not brought forth," etc.," is something quite different from "I have lost again my children." JEROME takes the words "I have not travailed," etc., as words of the sea used metaphorically: "frustra divitias comportavi, ... illa dives illa luxuriosa et populorum quondam gaudens multitudine, in qua nascebatur turba mortalium, caterva puerorum, juventutis examina, cujus plateae virginum . . . . ac juvenum . . . . lusibus perstrepebant, nunc ad solitudinem redacta est." But even according to this view a meaning is artificially put upon the figurative speech which is not necessarily contained in its terms. I believe that a literal, and not metaphorical interpretation suits better both the context and the words employed. Zidon comes to Tyre, her daughter, to look around her. But with shame must the mother behold the place empty where her daughter with her many children had dwelt. She sees nothing but the sea, and the natural bulwark on which the waves of the sea break, the bare rocks of insular Tyre. And the sea together with the bulwark calls to Zidon, ashamed at the sight: "I have not travailed," etc., i. e. thou seekest children, but findest nothing else than rock and sea, which do not travail nor bring forth, nor nourish children. [ALEXANDER seems to me to set forth in brief terms the correct view of ver. 4: "The Prophet hears a voice from the sea, which he then describes more exactly as coming from the stronghold or fortress of the sea, i. e., insular Tyre as viewed from the mainland. The rest of the verse is intended to express the idea, that the city thus personified was childless, was as if she had never borne children."—D. M.]. Ver. 5. As Zidon is ashamed after the fall of Tyre so Egypt is terrified. Translate: "when the report comes to Egypt." The concluding words of the verse seem to contain an empty pleonasm. But this is not the case. The Prophet intends to say: Egypt is affrighted, as the report (reaches, comes to) it, namely, the judgment of Tyre. The terror will correspond to the importance which the fall of Tyre must have both positively and negatively for Egypt. The words of the sixth verse I take as a call uttered by those who have heard the report concerning Tyre, first of all, by the Egyptians. These are forthwith impressed by the thought that nothing further remains for the surviving Tyrians to do than to flee with howling as far away as possible to the opposite end of the earth, to Tarshish. There is yet another reason why Tarshish is the place to which Tyre should flee. There, according to ver. 1, its ships are staying, which cannot return home, and which are now the only property and refuge of the mother country.

5. Is this your joyous——no rest.—Vers. 7-12. These verses contain words of the Prophet. He contrasts what Tyre was once with what it is now. הזאת, etc., is a question. Must it so happen to you? Must this be your lot, as it were, the end of the song? And must such a conclusion follow the joyful beginning? We feel the antithesis between עליזה and the condition to which זאת points. A joyous, because glorious and powerful city was Tyre, and this foundation of its joy was deep and broad. For its origin (קַדְמָה principium, origo, in Isaiah only here) dates from ancient time, and its power extended to the most distant countries. HERODOTUS, who was himself in Tyre, relates (II. 44) that the priests in the temple of Hercules had declared the age of the city and temple to be 2,300 years. As HERODOTUS was in Phœnicia in the year 450 B. C., this would carry back the founding of Tyre to the year 2,750 B. C., and MOVERS (II. 1, p. 135) finds this quite credible. Moreover, this age in comparison with that of the oldest Egyptian things of which we have accounts, would not be a very high one. Comp. STRABO XVI. 2, 22; CURT. IV. 4. Her feet carried her afar (see on xxii. 3) to dwell. It cannot be objected to our explanation that Tyre reached by ship those distant places, and that therefore not flight into regions beyond the sea, but carrying away into captivity, therefore painful migration on foot is held out in prospect to her. For it is unjustifiable to press the expression "feet," and we dare not think on a future migration to a distance, because such a thought is here inept. It would be proper in ver. 6, and also in ver. 12 it suits the connection; but in ver. 7 it makes the impression of tautology. Ver. 8. But who is he who had the power to decree this concerning the rich old Tyre of far-reaching might? The Prophet in the following verses shows a great interest in answering this question. Tyre was not merely the wearer of crowns, but also the bestower of crowns (הַעֲטִיר). This can hardly mean that she herself had crowned kings. (Comp. Hiram, 2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Kings vi. 1; Jer. xxvii. 3). For many cities had these, which are not for this reason called coronatrices. We must, therefore, think of dependent cities, either Phœnician (therefore the king of Tyre is called Great-king, comp. VAIHINGER in HERZOG'S, R. Encycl. XI. p. 617 sqq.), or colonial cities. Of Tartessus (HEROD. i. 163; Ps. lxxii. 10) Citium and Carthage (originally) it is expressly stated that they had kings. Comp. GESENIUS on this passage, MOVERS, Phœn. II. 1, p. 529 sqq.; especially p. 533, 535, 539. Jeremiah too mentions besides the kings of Tyre and Zidon also מַלְכֵי הָאִי Jer. xxv. 22. Moreover, the rich and mighty metropolis had also in her midst citizens, who, though only merchants, equalled princes in wealth, pomp and power. How exactly too the Prophet distinguishes שָׂרִים and מְלָכִים. can be seen from x. 8. The Phœnicians called their country כְּנַעַן and themselves Canaanites. But because they were the chief representatives of trade, merchants in general are called Canaanites; as at a later period Chaldean denoted an astrologer; Lombard, a money changer; and Swiss, a porter or body guard. Observe that here כנען stands for כנעני (comp. Gen. xv. 2, Damascus for Damascene). Above all this pomp and power the might of Jehovah is highly exalted. He has decreed its destruction in order to profane (חַלֵּל) the pride of all glory.—This is to happen by delivering up and casting down into the mire of the earth. From the use of the expression

"profane" the conclusion has not improperly been drawn that the Prophet had especially in his mind the famous, magnificent and ancient temples of Tyre (comp. HERODOTUS ut supra). Jehovah purposed further by the ruin of Tyre to humble all the proud (proudest) of the earth. An essential part of this humiliation is that the colonies hitherto drained of their resources for the benefit of the mother country, and kept under rigorous restraint, now become free. This is illustrated by the instance of the most remote colony Tartessus. Tarshish (ver. 10) is now told that she may be independent, and may dispose freely of her own territory and products. This verse has been explained in a great variety of ways by the old interpreters. (Comp. ROSENMUELLER). Since KOPPE the explanation which we have given is commonly adopted. As the Nile overflows Egypt (comp. Amos viii. 8; ix. 5) so shall Tarshish (daughter of Tarshish, comp. on xxii. 4) spread herself without restraint over her own land. This must have been previously prevented; and the phrase "there is no more girdle" must have a meaning that refers to this. The word מֵזַח is found besides only Ps. cix. 19. Of the same signification is מְזִיחַ Job xii. 21. Both words can only denote in these places the girdle. This meaning does not well suit the passage before us. But it seems to me that the Prophet by the word "girdle" intends an allusion which is unintelligible to us. Possibly an octroi-line restricting commerce for the benefit of the lords paramount, a cordon or something of a like nature, was designated by a Phœnician term cognate with the Hebrew מֵזַח. How, and by what means does the LORD execute His purpose against Tyre? This is answered in ver. 11 in general terms. He sets the sea and the kingdoms of the earth for this purpose in motion. Here as little as in ver. 4 would I understand under "Sea," Tyre (HITZIG), or all Phœnicia (KNOBEL); nor do I take the expression he stretched out his hand, etc., as meaning that He simply reached His hand over the sea (DELITZSCH); for does the Prophet imagine Jehovah to be dwelling on the other side of the sea? But the expression "to stretch the hand over the sea" denotes here, as in Exod. xiv. 21 (which place the Prophet had perhaps before his eye), such an outstretching of the hand as sets the sea in motion. And so הִרְגִּיז denotes here not to put in terror, trembling; but to put in commotion in order that they may arise to execute what the LORD commands them (xiv. 16). The second part of the verse tells for what purpose the sea and kingdoms are put in motion. The Lord has given them a commandment (צִוָּה as x. 6: the pronominal object being omitted, as often happens) against Canaan (כְּנַעַן=Phœnicia, as the Phœnicians themselves gave the country this designation, comp. on ver. 8) in order to destroy (לַשְׁמִד comp. on iii. 8) its bulwarks. The meaning of the whole verse is: Land and sea will conspire to destroy the bulwarks of Tyre. Tyre shall be successfully assailed both by land and sea. But Tyre shall be destroyed not merely for the moment, but permanently (although at first not forever, vers. 15 sqq.). This is the meaning of ver. 12. Tyre had been called "joyous" ver. 7. But the rejoicing shall depart from her. She is now a מְעֻשָּׁקָה a virgo compressa, vitiata (PUAL only here comp. lii. 4), and such a one does not rejoice. That Tyre is here called "daughter of Zidon," i. e., Zidonian, is perhaps not merely a generalization of the name Zidon, but possibly at the same time a blow designedly given to the pride of Tyre, which named herself on coins "the mother of the Zidonians" (comp. MOVERS, Phœn. II. 1, p. 94, 119 sq.), and perhaps called herself so in the time of Isaiah. Tyre must be punished, must be destroyed. Therefore the remnant are summoned to emigrate to Cyprus, into the hitherto dependent colony of Chittim, as the command had already been given (ver. 6) to pass over to Tarshish. But Tyre arrives in Chittim, not as mistress, but as an exile without power; a situation which excites in those who had been hitherto oppressed by her the desire to revenge themselves on her. Hence even there poor Tyre finds no rest.

6. Behold, the land——is laid waste.—Vers. 13 and 14. We had been told (vers. 11 and 12) in general terms how Tyre should be destroyed, and ver. 13 informs us regarding the particular instrument, i. e., regarding the people that the LORD had destined to execute punishment. We receive from ver. 13 the impression that the prophetic vision is turned in another direction. It is as if his look were suddenly diverted from west to east. He sees suddenly before him to his own astonishment the land of the Chaldeans. The land of the Chaldeans, not the people! The people he might see everywhere marching, fighting. The land he can behold only in its own place. The very part of the earth's surface where the country of the Chaldeans lay, apart from its relation to Tyre, was of great importance for the Prophet and his people. Thence should the destroyer of Jerusalem come; there should the people of Judah pass 70 years in captivity. And because the look of the Prophet is here for the first time directed to the Chaldeans, he is prompted to characterize them in brief terms. He does this with two, but with two very significant strokes. The first describes the past, the second the future of the people. He first declares—This is the people that was not. He certainly does not mean to say thereby, that the people of the Chaldeans was not at all, or was not in the physical sense. Could the Prophet have known nothing of Nimrod (Gen. x. 10), nothing of Ur of the Chaldeans, the original home of Abraham? But prophecy, in its grand style, confines, as is well known, the whole history of the world to a few kingdoms; and what does not belong to them is regarded as if it were not. But it was after the Assyrians that the Chaldeans first came upon the theatre of the world's history. Hence from the prophetic view of history the Chaldeans appear to us a people that hitherto was not. But why does he say הָעָם, the people? If he had said "a people," this would not have been at all singular. There were such nations without number. But the Chaldeans do not belong to the common nations. They were a leading nation. There were then in the sense of prophecy only two leading nations, i. e., representatives of the worldly power. The one was Assyria; the other, the Chaldeans, had not yet appeared. With the second stroke אַשּׁוּר '' לצי' he describes the future of the Chaldeans. I decidedly agree here with PAULUS and DEL. who regard אשור as the object of יסד placed absolutely before the verb. Ashur—this has it (viz.: the Chaldean nation) set, founded for the beasts of the desert.—This view alone suits the context. If we take Ashur as the subject, then we must connect it with לא היה as the old versions and some modern interpreters do, but contrary to the Masoretic punctuation. "This people, which is not Assyria," will then signify either; this people will be more fortunate than the Assyrians (were under Shalmaneser against Tyre), or: this people, when it will be no more Assyrian, or: which is not civilized as the Assyrians. This suffix in יסדה is then referred by all to Tyre. It is manifest that all these explanations of לא היה אשור are arbitrary. But if we take אשור according to the accents as subject of יסדה then this will mean: "Ashur has appointed them to be dwellers of the desert, i. e., Ashur has transplanted them to the Babylonian plain, and made of mountaineers dwellers of the desert." It is then assumed that the Chaldeans after their first migration from the Carduchian mountains, which event belongs to a very early time, were subsequently strengthened by additional settlers sent by the Assyrian kings (So KNOBEL, ARNOLD in HERZOG'S R.-Enc. II., p. 628 sqq.). It is certain that there were Chaldeans in Babylonia and in the Armenian mountains. The first point needs no proof; the second point is clear from the narrative of XENOPHON (Cyrop. III. 1, 34; Anab. IV. 3, 4 sqq.; V. 5, 17; VII. 8, 25) and is determined by the statements of STRABO (xii. 3, 18 sqq.), and of STEPHANUS BYZANTINUS (s. v. Χαλδαῖοι), and is also generally acknowledged. It is also quite possible that the Chaldeans separated at a very early time, and that one part remained in the old seats, i. e., in the Karduchian mountains, while another part, pursuing the natural routes, i. e., the river-valleys, migrated to the south, and settled on the lower Euphrates. For according to the Assyro-Babylonian monuments, here lies the mat Kaldi or Kaldu. According to them it extended to the Persian Gulf (comp. SCHRADER, Cuneiform Inscriptions, p. 44). With this agree the classic authors who (as STRABO XVI. 1, 6, 8) designate this border of the Gulf and the swamps in which the Euphrates loses itself as lacus Chaldaici (PLINY VI. 31; comp. STRABO XVI. 4, 1, τὰ ἕλη τὰ κατὰ Χαλδαίους). That these regions were even in very remote times peopled by the Chaldeans, is established by the fact that the ancient Ur of the Chaldeans, the home of Abraham, has been lately discovered in Mugheir, which lies south-east of Babylon on the right bank of the Euphrates. For upon all the clay tablets found there in great number, the name U-ru-u, i. e., אור occurs (comp. SCHRADER ut supra, p. 383 sq.). SCHRADER refers further to an inscription of king Hammurabi dating from the second millennium B. C., composed in the purest Assyrian, in which he states that "Il and Bel, the inhabitants of Sumir and Accad (names of tribes and territories in South Babylonia) surrendered to his rule" (ibid. p. 42). From the language of this inscription it is clear that a Semitic people then dwelt in those regions. But this can have been none other than the people of the Chaldeans. In the tenth century B. C. Asurnasirhabal speaks of the mat Kaldu as a part of his dominion (ibid. p. 44). Resting on all these grounds SCHRADER utters the following judgment: We can assume that since the Chaldeans immigrated in the second or third millennium B. C. into these regions on the lower Euphrates and Tigris, they were uninterruptedly the proper ruling nation, the dominant one under all circumstances. On the other hand, they were certainly not aboriginal in the country. They found already there a highly cultivated people of Cushite or Turanian extraction, from whom they borrowed the complicated cuneiform mode of writing. If the Chaldeans on the lower Euphrates and Tigris were not aboriginal, it is natural after what has been said to assume that they migrated from the territories at the source of the Euphrates and Tigris into the region at the mouth of these rivers (comp. EWALD, Hist. I., p. 404 sq.). But it is a mere hypothesis derived from this passage, and entirely without evidence, to assume a transplantation of the Chaldeans in later times by Shalmaneser. It is also very questionable whether צִיִּים can denote inhabitants of the desert; for the only place which is adduced, Ps. lxxii. 9 ought to exclude the possibility of any other interpretation, in order to be able to counterpoise the weight of all other places where the word signifies "beasts of the desert." It is questionable, too, whether the very fertile country of Babylon could be described as צִיָּה before it was visited by the divine judgments (comp. xiii.; Jer. l.). Many attempts have been made at conjectural emendations of the passage. EWALD would substitute Canaanites, and MEIER, Chittim for Chaldeans. OLSHAUSEN (Emendations of the Old Testament, p. 34 sqq.) would make much greater changes. But all these attempts are capricious and unwarranted. I have already remarked that the view proposed by PAULUS and DELITZSCH (taking Ashur as the object of יסד placed absolutely before it) alone corresponds to the context. Only in this way is something said of the Chaldeans that briefly, but completely, characterizes them. For they are then described as the people that hitherto had not appeared as the great worldly power, but that will now supplant the Assyrians in this character. There is yet another proof of the accuracy of our view. There are in this paragraph various allusions to the ninth chapter of Amos. Three times Amos employs in that chapter the Piel צִוָּה in the signification of "appoint, order, command," in which meaning the word occurs here also (ver. 11). Amos again (ver. 5) twice makes use of the comparison with the overflowing Nile; comp. in our paragraph, ver. 10. In Amos ix. 6, as in אשור יסדה לצים, the object of the sentence is placed first absolutely, and then repeated by means of a feminine suffix attached to יסד. In the word Ashur the Prophet has before him the idea of the country and of the city rather than that of the people. Hence the feminine suffix to יסד. Such constructions κατὰ σύνε-ew occur in Hebrew in the most varied forms.—יסד is constituere, to found, to establish (Hab. i. 12; Ps. civ. 8). The Chaldeans, says Isaiah, make of Ashur, i. e., the country and city, but especially the city, as it were an establishment for beasts of the desert, i. e., a place of residence appointed for them as their legitimate possession and permanent property. Finally we must point to Zeph. ii. 13 sq., as the oldest commentary on this passage. For not only does Zephaniah say clearly what יסד לציים means, but we can also regard his words as a proof of the accuracy of our view in general. For they show that Zephaniah, too, understood this passage of the destruction of Nineveh. When Zephaniah (ii. 15) says of Nineveh "This is the rejoicing city," had he not ver. 7 of our chapter in his eye? The words "and he will stretch out his hand" (Zeph. ii. 13) recall "He stretched out his hand" (Isa. xxiii. 11). Comp., too, in Zeph. ii. 13 צִיָּה כַּמִּדְבָּר with the צִיִּים before us. If then there are clear traces that Zephaniah, when he wrote the second chapter of his prophecy, had beside other passages in Isaiah (xiii. 21; xiv. 23; xxxiv. 11) also this twenty-third chapter in his mind, and if he gives in his prophecy a description of the ruined Nineveh, which by the word צי connects itself with our passage, and appears as a more detailed description of what is only slightly indicated by Isaiah, may we not in such circumstances be permitted to affirm that Zephaniah understood the place before us as we do? Further, there is contained in Zephaniah's reference to this passage the proof that it must have been already in existence in his time, consequently in the reign of king Josiah (624 B. C.). If now Zephaniah did not hesitate to understand this passage of the destruction of Nineveh, we will not allow ourselves to be prevented from doing the same, either by the objection of DELITZSCH that this would be the only place in which Isaiah prophesies that the worldly supremacy would pass from the Assyrians to the Chaldeans, or by the objections of others who regard it as absolutely impossible that in the time of Isaiah a destruction of Tyre by the Chaldeans should have been foretold. In regard to DELITZSCH's objection, I would wish it to be remarked that the prophecy of Isaiah is related to that of those who come after him, as a nursery is to the plantations that have arisen from it. Do not the germs of the later prophecies originally lie to a large extent in the prophecy of Isaiah? Such a germ we have here. The words זה העם to לציים form a parenthesis which quite incidentally, in language brief and enigmatical, and probably not understood by the Prophet himself, deposit a germ which even Nahum and Zephaniah have only partially developed. Not till the time of Jeremiah and after the battle of Carchemish, which determined Nebuchadnezzar's supremacy in the earth, could it be completely unfolded. And if I assume that Isaiah could already prophesy the destruction of Nineveh by the Chaldeans, I must much more affirm that he could also predict the destruction of Tyre by the same people. The Assyrian invasion undoubtedly gave occasion to this prophecy. The Assyrians had a design on Egypt. The taking of Samaria, and the attacks on Judah and on the countries lying east and west of it, were only means to that end. We perceive from vers. 3 and 5 that Tyre then stood in close relation to Egypt. The power of the Tyrians on the sea was naturally of the greatest importance for Egypt. The Assyrians had therefore all the more occasion for depriving Egypt of this valuable ally. Let us add, that Isaiah had then to warn Judah most emphatically against forming an alliance with Egypt. Would not Tyre also have been an object of the untheocratic hopes which the unbelieving Jews placed in Egypt the ally of Tyre? This would aptly explain to us the reason why Isaiah lifted his voice against Tyre also. Israel should trust in no worldly power, therefore not even in Tyre. Tyre too is doomed to destruction; but it will not be destroyed by the Assyrians. This might then readily have been conjectured when the Assyrians were actually engaged in hostilities with Tyre. But it was a part of the task assigned to Isaiah to counteract the dread inspired by Assyria. He therefore declares expressly: another later nation that is not yet a people, namely, the Chaldeans will destroy Tyre. What follows (ver. 15 sqq.), agrees with this. The 70 years are undoubtedly the years of the Chaldean supremacy. As we observed already, the words זה העם to צִיִּים (ver. 13) are to be treated as parenthetical. With הקימו the Prophet proceeds to describe the action of the people of the Chaldeans, as the appointed instrument for the destruction of Tyre. They set up his watch-towers, i. e., the many set up the watch-towers belonging to the whole body (comp. touching this change of number i. 23; ii. 8; vers. 23, 26; viii. 20). With ver. 14 the paragraph closes as it began.

b) The Restoration of Tyre.

CHAP. XXIII. 15–18.

15 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years,
According to the days of one king:
After the end of seventy years
¹Shall Tyre sing as an harlot;
16 Take an harp, go about the city,

Thou harlot that hast been forgotten:
Make sweet melody, sing many songs,
That thou mayest be remembered.
17 And it shall come to pass after the end of seventy years,
That the Lord will visit Tyre,
And she shall turn to her hire,
And shall commit fornication
With all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth.
18 And her [a]merchandise and her hire
Shall be holiness to the Lord;
It shall not be treasured nor laid up:
For her merchandise shall be for them that dwell before the Lord,
To eat sufficiently, and for [2b]durable clothing.

[1] Heb. It shall be unto Tyre as the song of an harlot.
[2] Heb. old.
[b] splendid.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. After 70 years, which will have a character of unity as the period of the reign of one king, the wish will be fulfilled in Tyre that is expressed in a well-known song which advises a forgotten harlot, by singing and playing in the streets of the city, to cause herself to be again remembered (vers. 15, 16). The Lord will again assist Tyre, she will renew her commercial intercourse, which is compared with amorous solicitation, with all the countries of the earth (ver. 17). But the gain of her harlotry will be consecrated to the Lord, and be assigned by Him to His servants for their rich enjoyment.

2. Vers. 15, 16. Regarding the expression In that day comp. on vii. 18. Seventy years shall Tyre be forgotten.—This is the duration of the Chaldæan supremacy, which according to Jeremiah (comp. my remarks on Jer. xxv. 11), lasted from the battle of Carchemish to the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, consequently according to the information we now possess, from 605 (4) till 538 B. C., or 67 years. This period of 67 years may possibly, when we have more exact knowledge, be extended to quite 70 years or thereabouts. It can, however, be taken as a round number of 70 years, according to prophetic reckoning. Tyre will be so far forgotten, as it will be lost in the great empire of the world. This period of its being forgotten shall last 70 years according to the days of one king.—The expression recalls xvi. 14; xxi. 16; but the meaning is different. Here the emphasis lies on אחד. The Prophet intends to declare that this period will have for Tyre a character of unity. It will happen to Tyre under the successor as under the predecessor. The change of rulers will produce no alteration. This time of seventy years, during which Tyre will be forgotten, will bear as uniform a character as if the whole period were the time of the reign of only a single king. These words make the judgment heavier; there will be no alleviation of its severity. [This interpretation is preferable to the common one which makes king stand here for kingdom or dynasty.—D. M.]. After 70 years, what in a well-known song often sung by frivolous young people, is under a certain condition set forth in prospect to a courtesan who is no longer sought after, shall be fulfilled in the case of Tyre. She shall regain the lost favor. But the Prophet intends at the same time to say that Tyre must do as the harlot in order again to attain favor. Tyre shall, after 70 years, endeavor to recover the favor of the nations, and again employ her old commercial arts in order to form business connections. And the Lord will vouchsafe success. [The translation of the latter part of ver. 15, in the text of the E. V., cannot be fairly made out of the original Hebrew. The rendering in the margin is the right one. Ver. 16 is a snatch of the song of the harlot, and might have the marks of a quotation. D. M.].

3. And it shall come——clothing.—Vers. 17, 18. That commercial intercourse is compared with unchaste intercourse has its ground herein that the former serves Mammon and the belly (taken in the widest sense). But mammon and the belly are idols, and idolatry is fornication (comp. Nah. iii. 4). Tyre will return to her hire for harlotry (Micah i. 7), and will practise fornication with all the kingdoms of the earth. And her gain (ver. 3), or her hire as a harlot, will be holy unto the Lord.—It will not be kept by the gainers and laid up in the treasury (xxxix. 6), or concealed, hidden in the ground (חסן as a verb only here), but it will serve those who dwell before Jehovah (not stand, for to stand before the Lord marks the service of the priests in the temple, Deut. x. 8; Jud. xx. 28, etc.), i. e. the Israelites in general, because the territory in which they dwell is the holy land, which has the house of Jehovah for its all-dominating centre. We may ask here how it is conceivable that the Lord can restore a people on which He has inflicted judgment, in order that it may begin again its old business of fornication; and how the wages of prostitution can be consecrated to the Lord, as in Deut. xxiii. 18 it is expressly forbidden to bring "the hire of a whore" into the house of God. I believe that the passage before us, which bears in this point a great resemblance to xix. 18 sqq., belongs to those utterances which must have been obscure to the Prophet himself, because the key to their interpretation is not furnished till they are fulfilled. This fulfilment, however, seems to be afforded by the Christian Tyre, respecting which we shall say more immediately. ["Instead of a queen reinstated on the throne, Tyre appears as a forgotten harlot suing once more for admiration and reward. This metaphor necessarily imparts a contemptuous tone to the prediction. The restoration here predicted was to be a restoration to commercial prosperity and wealth, but not to regal dignity or national importance. . . . . Notwithstanding the apparent import of the figure, the conduct of Tyre is not in itself unlawful. The figure, indeed, is now commonly agreed to denote nothing more than commercial intercourse, without necessarily implying guilt. In ancient times when international commerce was a strange thing, and nearly monopolized by a single nation, and especially among the Jews, whose laws discouraged it for wise but temporary purposes, there were probably ideas attached to such promiscuous intercourse entirely different from our own. Certain it is that the Scriptures more than once compare the mutual solicitations of commercial enterprise to illicit love. That the comparison does not necessarily involve the idea of unlawful or dishonest trade, is sufficiently apparent from ver. 18." ALEXANDER. D. M.].

4. In regard to the fulfilment of this prophecy we can get at the right view only when we attend carefully to the peculiarity of the prophetic vision. The Prophet does not see every thing, but only the principal matters, and he sees all the chief things which are essentially identical, not one after the other, but as it were on one surface beside each other. Hence it happens that that appears to him an immediate effect, which in reality is the result of a long course of development extending over thousands of years. Hence frequently the appearance is as if fulfilment did not correspond to the prophecy, while yet the fulfilment only happens in another way than it seemed from the point of view of the Prophet that it ought to happen. I have, to cite an example, shown in detail in my Commentary on Jeremiah, l. and li., that Babylon was never destroyed by the hand of man. It has been various times captured. The conquerors injured the city, the one on this, the other on that part, but none of them at once so entirely destroyed it, as, according to Jeremiah l. and li., apparently should have been done. And yet the final result corresponds quite to the picture which Jeremiah draws of Babylon's destruction. The same is the case here. Isaiah affirms two separate things: 1) Tyre shall be destroyed, and that by the Chaldeans; 2) It shall be restored after 70 years, and its wealth shall be serviceable to the kingdom of God. And these announcements have also on the whole been fulfilled; but because the separate constituents of the prophecy were accomplished at various times, widely apart from one another, the fulfilment, while it corresponds to the prophetic picture as a whole, is not evident in its details. Our prophecy does not refer to the siege by Shalmaneser, because the Prophet (ver. 13) expressly declares that he has the Chaldeans in view as the enemies that would cause the ruin of Tyre. After what has been already said I cannot acknowledge that there is anything to justify an alteration of the text. But the conflicts of Shalmaneser with Tyre can have furnished the occasion for our prophecy. The object at which the Assyrian, and afterwards the Babylonian rulers aimed for the extension and security of their kingdom towards the southwest, was the conquest of Egypt. The conquest of Syria, Phenicia, Palestine, Philistia and the adjoining territories of Arabia was only in order to the attainment of that end. The possession of Phenicia, that ruled the sea, was especially of the greatest importance for the war with Egypt, because Phenicia, with its fleet in the hands of the Assyrians, could be just as useful to them as, in the service of the Egyptians, it could be hurtful to them. For this reason the Prophet (ver. 5) depicts the terror which the capture of Tyre would produce in Egypt. For that party in Jerusalem that was disposed to rely on the alliance with Egypt against Assyria, the integrity of Tyre must for this reason be a matter of prime moment. We might say: they relied on Tyre as the right arm of Egypt. As now the Prophet combated the reliance on Egypt, he must also be concerned to destroy the false hopes that were placed on Tyre. He does this in our chapter, while he represents Tyre as a city devoted by the LORD to destruction (ver. 8 sqq.). Why should Judah trust in such a power and not rather in Him who is able to decree such a doom on the nations? To set this before his people for due consideration, was certainly the practical aim of Isaiah. But we must now inquire more precisely: Did Isaiah see himself prompted to this discourse before the campaign of Shalmaneser against Tyre, during the same, or after it? It is not indeed impossible for the Prophet to have uttered this prediction before the conflicts which Shalmaneser, according to the fragment of Menander in JOSEPHUS (Antiqq. IX. 14, 2), carried on with the Tyrians; but any ground in facts for making this assumption is entirely wanting. It is also in itself not impossible for Isaiah to have composed the prophecy after the blockade of Tyre had been raised, perhaps at the same time with those prophecies against Egypt (xviii., xix., xx.), and against the nations whose subjugation was a necessary preliminary to attacking Egypt (xv., xvi., xxi. 11 sqq.). We might even appeal in support of this view to xx. 6, where under הָאִי הַזֶּה it would be proper to understand Phenicia and specially Tyre. But this prophecy belongs to the year 711 B. C., consequently to a time when the blockade of Tyre by Shalmaneser was long past. For Shalmaneser was in the year 722 already dead. But now it is certainly less probable that a Prophet should make a matter the subject of a prophecy at a time when this matter has been partially disposed of and engages less the general interest, than that he should do this at a time when the matter in question is going on, and is attracting the greatest attention. I therefore hold it to be more probable that our prophecy was delivered before the year 722, and that it consequently belongs to a time when the conflict with Tyre was still lasting. The prophecy published at this juncture was, moreover, intended to tell the Israelites that the Assyrians would not conquer Tyre, as then seemed likely, but that the Chaldeans would do so. The prophecy then belongs to the same time as chapter xxviii. (comp. the introduction to xxviii.-xxxiii.), which first assails the Egyptian alliance, and, as we will there show, must have been composed before the capture of Samaria (comp. xxviii. 1), and therefore before the contemporaneous blockade of Tyre (comp. SCHRADER, ut supra, p. 155). The blockade by Shalmaneser and his successor Sargon, although the expression ἐκαρτέρησαν in Menander would warrant our inferring a final surrender, does not seem to have been attended with consequences particularly hurtful to the Tyrians. The Assyrians were themselves interested in sparing the resources of the Tyrians, that they might use them for their own advantage. From this time till the commencement of the Chaldean wars there is a complete gap in the history of Phenicia (MOVERS, II., I., p. 400). That Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre is now no more disputed by any one. That the siege lasted thirteen years has at least great internal probability. JOSEPHUS states it on the authority of Philostratus (Antiqq. X. 11, 1) and of the Tyrian Menander (although, without expressly mentioning his name, Contra Apion, 1, 21). We have, besides, the authority of the prophet Ezekiel (xxvi.-xxviii., xxix. 16 sqq.). But the question is: Did Nebuchadnezzar also destroy Tyre? On this subject many needless words have been used by those who thought that the honor of prophecy absolutely required that Tyre should have been destroyed at once and directly by Nebuchadnezzar. This did not happen, and is by no means necessary to save the credit of prophecy. We know from HERODOTUS (II. 161) and DIODORUS (I. 68) that the Egyptian king Apries, who was cotemporary with Nebuchadnezzar, undertook a successful expedition against the Phenicians who had hitherto been his allies. How would this be conceivable if Phenicia (to which doubtless Tyre is to be reckoned) had not been for the Egyptians the country of an enemy, i. e., a Babylonian province? According to the account already mentioned, which JOSEPHUS (Contra Apion I. 21) communicates from Tyrian sources, there arose difficulties in regard to the succession to the throne of Tyre after the thirteen years' siege. A king Baal ruled for ten years after Itobaal, in whose reign the siege began. But then follow two judges, one high-priest, then again two judges, who govern in conjunction with a king. The duration of these governments was, in the case of some of them, very brief. At last the Tyrians procure for themselves a king from Babylon in the person of Merbaal, and after his death they obtain from the same place his brother Hiram. For, according to 2 Kings xxv. 28, there were, beside Zedekiah, other captive kings in Babylon. If now Nebuchadnezzar brought the royal family with him to Babylon, is not that a proof of his having conquered Tyre? (comp. MOVERS, ut supra, p. 460 sqq.). So much is established, that Tyre, since the close of the conflicts with Nebuchadnezzar, ceased to be an independent state. Although it was not destroyed, which would not have served the interests of the Chaldeans, it became a province of the Babylonian empire, whence it passed over into the hands of the Persians, Grecians and Romans, as Jerome on Ezek. xxvii. says: "Quod nequaquam ultra sit regina populorum nec proprium habeat imperium, uti habuit sub Hiram et ceteris regibus, sed vel Chaldæis vel Macedonibus vel Ptolemæis et ad postremum Romanis servitura sit." The conquest by Nebuchadnezzar was the act in the world's history which originated the complete destruction of Tyre, though its ruin was not all at once effected. This act had involved in it what should take place in the future, and this future gradually unfolded the significance of that act which was such a beginning as presaged the coming end, as was the earnest of the final doom of Tyre. Its capture by Alexander the Great (333 B. C.; comp. CURT. iv. 7 sqq.; ARRIAN II. 24) was one of the chief events in the accomplishment of its predicted ruin. But Tyre outlived even this visitation. CURTIUS says expressly: "Multis ergo casibus defuncta et post excidium renata, nunc tamen longa pace cuncta refovente sub tutela Romanæ mansuetudinis acquiescit." Who can help thinking here on the restoration which Isaiah, ver. 15 sqq., promises to the city? Isaiah indeed promises this restoration after 70 years. But these 70 years denote only the duration of the rule of the Chaldeans. The Prophet sees only one master of the Phenician capital—the Chaldeans (ver. 13). This is the relative defect in his vision. He sees too the restoration immediately after the disappearance of this one enemy. This is likewise a relative defect. For, as in reality the destruction of Tyre had many distinct stages, so also was it with the restoration. The occasion and starting point of the restoration is seen by the Prophet in the passing away of this one arch-enemy. But to Isaiah this flourishing anew of Tyre was only a revival of its commerce, and this was really the fact. Thus JEROME on Ezekiel xxvii. states that Tyre "usque hodie perseverat ut omnium propemodum gentium in illa exerceantur commercia." PLINY, however, remarks (Hist. Nat. V. 17): "Tyrus olim clara . . . . . nunc omnis ejus nobilitas conchylio atque purpura constat." Tyre became afterwards a Christian city. When our Lord was upon earth, longing souls came from the borders of Tyre and Zidon to see and to hear Him; and He, on His part, did not disdain to honor these borders with His presence (Mark iii. 8; Luke vi. 17; Matth. xv. 21). Paul found there (Acts xxi. 3 sqq.) a Christian church. In the beginning of the fourth century Methodius was bishop of Tyre. In 315 a church erected there at great expense was dedicated by Eusebius of Cæsarea. In 355 a Synod convoked by the Eusebians against Athanasius was held there. In 1125 it was taken by the crusaders and incorporated in the kingdom of Jerusalem. In 1127 it became the seat of an archbishop. William of Tyre, the celebrated historian, occupied the see of Tyre from the year 1174. Not till the end of the 13th century did the Saracens destroy the fortifications. After Alexander the Great had connected Tyre with the main land by means of a mole, it ceased to be an island, and it is now a village of fishermen's huts, with about 3,000 inhabitants (Sur). All that the Prophet announced has thus in fact been fulfilled. But in the language of prophecy and in the language of its fulfilment, divine thoughts clothe themselves in such strangely different forms that only he can perceive the identity who understands how to combine the long-drawn lines of history into one picture in perspective. This picture will exactly correspond to that of the Prophet. [The remarks of our author, when carefully studied, vindicate the Prophet from the charge of even a relative error. The Prophet does not say that the predicted restoration of Tyre should all at once take place on the expiration of seventy years, or the close of the rule of the Chaldeans. The requirement of the prophecy is satisfied if Tyre should begin to flourish after its deliverance from the Chaldean oppression. The Spirit of God again saw in the capture of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar the germinant force which would issue in its final complete destruction, and accordingly foretells that the ruin of Tyre would follow that event. But whether this should happen at once, or in the course of time, is not declared. Nebuchadnezzar brought Tyre to ruin; for his capture of it led to its entire destruction, though there intervened a long line of operations and issues which it required many ages to develop. The remark of Abarbanel, that has been often quoted, is here in point, "that it is the custom of the prophets in their predictions to have respect at once to a near and remote period, so that prophecies pointing to very distant times are found among others which relate to the immediate future. Whence we may the more certainly conclude that God might threaten the Tyrians with the destruction of their city, though it might be brought on at different times and by gradual advances." There is no mistake made by Isaiah in the picture which he drew. It fully served the object intended by God. The relative mistake is in the exponent of the prophecy.—D. M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 1 sqq. "Commerce and seaports are not in themselves evil—but where commerce prospers and is in full bloom, there God's gift and ordinance are to be recognised. Solomon engaged in commerce (2 Kings x. 28). When trade declines, this is to be looked upon as a punishment from the hand of God on account of the extortion practised by merchants. For a merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong, and a huckster shall not be freed from sin (Ecclesiasticus xxvii. 29). Sin is committed not only where merchants deal falsely, but also where they are proud of their riches and magnificence, and move along as princes and lords, and forget the poor, and at the same time neglect divine service, God's word and sacrament." CRAMER. [This is quite too indiscriminate a censure of merchants and traders. CICERO (De Off. Lib. 1) expresses a similar opinion as to the necessity for hucksters to practise deceit in order to make a profit. Happily the book of Ecclesiasticus is not inspired Scripture, and Christianity has so far improved the spirit of men of business that the language of the Apocrypha as quoted above and of CICERO would not now be tolerated, but would be universally regarded as most unjust and calumniatory.—D. M.]

2. On vers. 8 and 9. "This place affords us consolation. As the threatening of the Prophet against Tyre was not vain, so also the tyranny of our adversaries will come to an end. Neither the Pope nor the Turk believes that they can fall—but they shall fall, as Tyre fell." LUTHER.

3. On ver. 18. "Ego intelligo de futuro regno Christi, quod et ipsa Tyrus convertenda est ad Dominum. Dicit igitur, postquam reversa fuerit ad suas negociationes, imminebit regnum Christi, quod Tyrus quoque amplectetur, sicut testatur Act. xxi." LUTHER.

On ver. 18. They who dwell before the Lord—i. e., who believe on Him, will have: 1) their merchandise, 2) will eat and be satisfied, 3) will be well clothed. Therefore money and property, food and goodly apparel, are not to be condemned and renounced. This admits of practical application against monkery and the Anabaptists." CRAMER. [The original Anabaptists of Germany maintained a community of goods. —D. M.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. [On vers. 1-14. Why did God bring these calamities on Tyre? Not to show an arbitrary and irresistible power, but to punish the Tyrians for their pride (ver. 9). Many other sins, no doubt, reigned among them: idolatry, sensuality and oppression—but the sin of pride is fastened upon as that which was the particular ground of God's controversy with Tyre. Let the ruin of Tyre be a warning to all places and persons to take heed of pride—for it proclaims to all the world that he who exalts himself shall be abased. After HENRY.—D. M.]

2. [Vers. 8 and 9. An appropriate text for a discourse on God's moral government over the nations, Dan. iv. 3.—D. M.]

3. On ver. 18. Concerning the right use of worldly goods: 1) We ought not to gather them as a treasure, nor to hide them. 2. We ought to consecrate them to the Lord, and therefore apply them: a) to sacred objects, b) for the wants of the body according to the will of the Lord.

B—THE FINALE TO THE DISCOURSES AGAINST THE NATIONS: THE LIBELLUS APOCALYPTICUS. CHAPTERS XXIV.—XXVII.

If there is a living God who concerns Himself with the history of mankind and directs the same according to His counsel, without detriment to that human freedom which is the basis of the moral responsibility of every individual,—and if consequently there is such a thing as prophecy which demonstrates the divine rule in history for our consolation and warning, then we need not be surprised if prophecy should refer even to the very close of history. Must not God, who directs history, foreknow what is most remote as well as what is near at hand? And can He have no reason for causing the things that will take place at the end of the world to be predicted by the interpreters of His will, the prophets? There is just the same reason for His doing this which there is for prophecy at all. We ought to know that the history of the world is moving toward a certain goal fixed by God, in order that one class may fear, and that the other may have a firm support in every temptation, and the certain hope of final victory. And we ought therefore not to be astonished if Isaiah, the greatest of all the prophets, penetrates by the spiritual vision given to him into the most distant future. This only would with reason surprise us,—if Isaiah should describe the distant future as one who had experienced it and passed through it. But this is not the case. For we clearly perceive that the pictures of the future which he presents to us are enigmatical to himself. He takes his stand in the present time; he is not only a man, but also an Israelite of his own age. He depicts the destruction of the earth in such a way that we can see that it appears to him as the occurrence on a grand scale of what was well known to him, "the wasting of cities and countries." From his point of view he distinguishes neither the exact chronological succession of the different objects, nor the real distance which separates him from the last things. And he is so much an Israelite that the judgment of the world appears to him as the closing act in the great controversy of Israel against the heathen nations. For DELITZSCH is perfectly right when he regards our chapters as the fitting finale to chaps. xiii—xxiii. The Prophet is, moreover, an Israelite of his own age. For, although he knows that the judgment will extend to all the nations that constitute the worldly power, nevertheless Assyria and Egypt stand in the foreground as its prominent representatives (xxvii. 12, 13). Only once, when he places the countries of the second exile over against those of the first, do the former appear in their natural double form as the countries of the Euphrates and of the Tigris, or, as it is there expressed (xxvii. 1), the straight and the crooked Leviathan. Under the latter we are to understand Babylon (see the Exposition). And in another place (xxv. 10 sqq.) Moab appears for a particular reason (see the Exposition) as the representative of all the nations hostile to the theocracy. The same criticism, which would make the Almighty get out of the way wherever He makes His appearance within our sphere, has endeavored in various ways to refer this prophecy to particular situations in the world's history. But here one interpreter is arrayed against the other, and one testimony destroys the other. After BERTHOLDT (Einleit., p. 1390), KNOBEL is of the opinion (shared by UMBREIT) that the prophecy points to the time when Jerusalem, which had been captured by the Chaldeans, was completely destroyed by Nebuzaradan (2 Kings xxv. 8 sqq.). EICHHORN (Hebr. Proph. III., p. 206 sqq.) refers the piece to the destruction of the empire of the Chaldeans, and assumes as its author a Hebrew dwelling in the ruined and desolate Palestine. ROSENMUELLER (Scholia 1 Ed.), GESENIUS and MAURER represent the piece as composed during the exile, at a time when the fall of Babylon was imminent (xxiv. 16 sqq.; xxvi. 20 sq.; xxvii. 1). BOETTCHER (de inf. § 435, 440) attributes the discourse to a merchant who, resident in the neighborhood of the country of the Moabites, journeyed on business between Assyria and Egypt, and appended his poem on the fall of Babylon (composed in the year 538) to that of another merchant on the fall of Tyre (xxiii.). EWALD refers the piece to the time "when Cambyses was preparing his Egyptian campaign." These are the more important of the views of those who deny that Isaiah wrote these chapters. He who wishes to learn the other opinions may consult ROSENMUELLER, GESENIUS, HITZIG and KNOBEL.

There are four points which seem to me to prove to a demonstration that the Prophet has not in view ordinary events of history. First, the destruction of the globe of the earth announced, xxiv. 18–20. For, when it is affirmed of the earth with a repetition of the word ארץ five times, that its foundations are shaken, that it is utterly broken, clean dissolved, moved exceedingly, and reels to and fro like a drunkard or a hammock, more is certainly intended thereby than a political revolution, or an occurrence in nature accompanying such a revolution. It is the shaking of the earth in a superlative sense—a shaking from which it will not rise again (ver. 20 b). Secondly, it is declared (ver. 21 sqq.) that the judgment will extend to the stars and the angelic powers, and that sun and moon will cease to rule the day and the night (Gen. i. 16), because Jehovah alone will be the source of light and glory (comp. the Exposition). Thirdly, xxv. 6–8, we have set before us in prospect the gathering together of all nations on Mount Zion, the removal of the covering from their eyes, the abolition of death and of every evil. This is no picture of earthly happiness. It points beyond the bounds of this world and of this dispensation.

Fourthly, the resurrection of the dead is foretold (xxvi. 19 sqq.) together with the last judgment which brings to light all hidden guilt. Every restriction of this prophecy to a mere wish involves a contradiction. For that this place really contains the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is acknowledged by all. But no one will affirm, much less be able to prove, that this resurrection was expected in the time of the exile, and in order to the re-peopling of Palestine; or, if the latter is the case, then the resurrection of the dead is not the subject of discourse. For it would be an unheard-of assertion to affirm that the Israelites expected that their return to Palestine and the resurrection should take place at the same time. And how arbitrary is the exegesis which limits "the inhabitant of the earth" ver. 21, to any particular people, and puts into the latter part of the verse the thought: the earth will restore the blood of those who were slain in a certain time! Passages can indeed be quoted in which we read of innocent blood that had been shed not penetrating into the earth (Job xvi. 18; Ezek. xxiv. 7 sq). But the bringing forth again of all shed blood, and the coming forth of all that had been killed out of the earth belong naturally to eschatology. For these are preliminaries to the realization of the final judgment. If the view which refers this prophecy to events in the world's history were correct, must there not be some mention of Nebuchadnezzar and of the Chaldeans, in order to justify the interpretation of BERTHOLDT, UMBREIT and KNOBEL? When we reflect what a mighty impression this worldly power made upon Jeremiah, and how, after the battle of Carchemish, he never comes forth as a Prophet without mentioning Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans, it is inconceivable how a Hebrew who was among those who suffered the crushing stroke from the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, could speak only of Egypt and Assyria, and at most, allusively and covertly, of the Chaldeans (xxvii. 1) as enemies of the theocracy. But if our piece refers to the capture of Babylon by Cyrus, why is there no mention of the Persians? And the same objection avails against all other interpretations which apply the passage to events in the history of the world. Against all of them the want of any specification of such events may be justly objected. In regard to the style, and to the range of thought that characterize this piece, the exact and minute investigation which lies at the basis of our exposition will show that the language is altogether that of Isaiah. If there are found in it manifold points of connection with other pieces which criticism has pronounced spurious, we have simply to say: in view of the large amount of words and expressions that we find here, undoubtedly germane to the authentic style of Isaiah, we are entitled to draw the reverse conclusion, and to affirm that those pieces must be genuine, because they resemble so much our prophecy which undoubtedly has proceeded from Isaiah. The accumulation of paronomasias, which are pronounced devoid of taste, has been made a cause of reproach to our piece. But it must be shown that these paronomasias are more tasteless than other such forms of speech, which we meet with in the acknowledged compositions of Isaiah, and that they are of a different kind. So long as this is not done, I venture to affirm that this ingenious facility in the management of language best corresponds to the eminent intellectual gifts of Isaiah, which we know sufficiently from other sources. Persons of such mental power, and possessing such a command of language, are at all times rare. According to our modern criticism there must have been dozens of them among the Israelites at the time of the captivity. But I fear that such a judgment is only possible when the critics, because they cannot, or will not perceive the divinely great in these works of genius, so degrade them by the aid of their intolerably petty and vulgar standard, that, in sooth, any bungler might have composed them. Further, against regarding Isaiah as the author of these chapters it has been objected that they contain many peculiar thoughts and expressions which occur only here. But what does this objection amount to? Do these thoughts and expressions contradict Isaiah's manner of thinking and speaking? No one has yet been able to prove this. But if this is not the case, the circumstance that they occur only here is of no significance whatever. For among the chapters of Isaiah that are acknowledged genuine, there is not a single one which does not contain thoughts and words that are new and peculiar to it alone. This is not surprising in a mind so inexhaustibly fertile as that of Isaiah. The objection drawn from the occurrence of ideas that are said to belong to a later age, might be of more weight. To this class of ideas is referred the curse of the law (xxiv. 6). But apart from Deut. xxviii.-xxx. (comp. espec. xxix. 19), that the curse should fall on transgressors of the law is so obvious an idea, that it is inconceivable that it should be regarded as the sign of a later time. That it happens not to occur in writings universally admitted to precede the age of Isaiah may appear strange, but is no proof of the later origin of these chapters. That gods are spoken of as protecting powers of kingdoms, xxiv. 21, is just as little established as that the sun and moon, xxiv. 23, are named as objects of idolatrous homage (comp. our Exposition). The cessation of death (xxv. 8), and the resurrection of the dead (xxvi. 19) are closely connected. Both are confessedly ideas which could not have entered clearly into the consciousness of the Israelites till they had attained an advanced stage of religious culture. But that the Israelites first received this doctrine when, in exile, from Parseeism is, as KLOSTERMANN says, "an unfounded, unproved, modern tradition." VON HOFMANN is certainly right when he sees in the first, and fundamental promise [Gen. iii. 15] the basis of the hope that "finally everything will have an end that has come into the world through the enemy of God—sin and death." This does not prevent this passage from belonging to the oldest documents of the awakening consciousness of this hope of faith. As we cannot see in this a proof of the composition of this piece during the exile, so it appears to us equally improbable that this event, which belongs to the final history of the world, could escape the eye of an Isaiah.

In regard to the time of composition, it is very difficult to say anything definite. More particular indications fixing the date are entirely wanting. The Prophet, as it were, soars high above his time, and as if cut loose from it, lives wholly in the future. Nevertheless, he beholds the theocracy in conflict with Assyria and Egypt; and even Babylon appears, although but dimly disclosed, among these foes. If we add that these chapters follow immediately the prophecies against the heathen nations, and appear as the winding up of the same, the supposition very readily suggests itself that they were composed in the time of Hezekiah, and as DELITZSCH says, as finale to chapters xiii.—xxiii. The manifold points of connection with later pieces by Isaiah, which we will particularly point out in the course of our exposition, favor this view.

The structure of the piece indicates no little art. The number two lies at its basis. There are twice two chapters, of which the first and third have the final judgment of the world for their subject, the second and fourth the deliverance of Israel. Each of these four chapters again consists of two parts.

We make out the following plan of the piece:

1) The beginning of distress; the destruction of the surface of the earth (xxiv. 1-12).

2) The destruction of the globe of the earth (xxiv. 13-23).

3) Israel's song of praise for the deliverance experienced (xxv. 1–5).
4) Zion as the place of the feast given to all nations in contrast to Moab that perishes ingloriously (xxv. 6–12).
5) The judgment as the realization of the idea of justice (xxvi. 1–10).
6) The resurrection of the dead, and the concluding act in the judgment of the world (xxvi. 11–21).
7) The downfall of the worldly powers and Zion's joyful hope (xxvii. 1–9).
8) The fall of the city of the world and Israel's glad restoration (xxvii. 10–13).

1. THE BEGINNING OF DISTRESS: THE DESTRUCTION OF THE SURFACE OF THE EARTH. Chapter XXIV. 1–12.

1 Behold the Lord maketh the earth empty,
And maketh it waste,
And [1]turneth it upside down,
And scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof.
2 And it shall be,
As with the people, so with the [2]priest;
As with the servant, so with his master;
As with the maid, so with her mistress;
As with the buyer, so with the seller;
As with the lender, so with the borrower;
As with the taker of usury, so with the giver of usury to him.
3 The [a]land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled:
For the Lord hath spoken this word.
4 The earth mourneth, and fadeth away,
The world languisheth and fadeth away,
The [3]haughty people of the earth do languish.
5 The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof;
Because they have transgressed the laws,
Changed the ordinance,
Broken the everlasting covenant.
6 Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth,
And they that dwell therein are desolate:
Therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned,
And few men left.
7 The new wine mourneth,
The vine languisheth,
All the merry-hearted do sigh.
8 The mirth of tabrets ceaseth,
The noise of them that rejoice endeth,
The joy of the harp ceaseth.
9 They shall not drink wine with a song;
Strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it.
10 The city of [b]confusion is broken down:
Every house is shut up, that no man may come in.
11 There is a crying for wine in the streets;
All joy is darkened,
The mirth of the land is gone.
12 In the city is left desolation,
And the gate is smitten with destruction.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. בּוֹקֵק (comp. xix. 3 and ver. 3; Hos. x. 1; Nah. xi. 3; Jer. xix. 7; li. 2), part. from בָּקַק to pour out, to empty, forms with בּוּלְקָה (devastare) a paronomasia, as also Nah. ii. 11, where only the word occurs again. עִוָּה pervertere, conturbare (comp. xxi. 3 Niph., Piel besides only Lam. iii. 9) is here applied to the surface of the earth in the sense of throwing confusedly together everything found upon it.

Ver. 2. On כְּ—כַּ = as, so, ὡς—ὡς comp. EWALD, § 360. The abnormal employment of the article in כַּגְּבִרְתָּהּ is occasioned by the endeavor to produce an assonance with כְּשִׁפְחָתָהּ. נֹשֶׁה is creditor, and of like meaning with מַלְוֶה, but the idea of usury seems to be involved in נֹשֶׁה.

Ver. 3. הִבּוֹק, הִבּוֹז instead of תִּבַּק, תִּבַּז may be regarded as forms borrowed from the related עו—stems, and are here chosen for the sake of conformity with the infinitive forms הִבּוֹק, הִבּוֹז.

Ver. 4. The half pause, which is indicated by the punctuation אֻמְלְלוּ, has the force of a dash in our language. The application to personal beings of this predicate, that had been used previously of lifeless things, is thereby emphasized.

Ver. 6. חרר in Kal only here, Niph. xli. 11; xlv. 24.

Ver. 7. אָנַח (current only in Niph.) is found only here in Isaiah, probably borrowed from Joel i. 18.

Ver. 10. מִבּוֹא as xxiii. 1.

Ver. 12. שְׁאִיָּה is ἅπ. λεγ. and stands in apposition to the object, or, as the word is passive, in apposition to the subject of יֻכַּת, to express what should be made of the object or subject. Translate: The gate is smitten to ruins. Comp. vi. 11; xxxvii. 26. On the form יֻכַּת (Hoph. from כָּתַת contundere, xl. 4; xxx. 14) comp. OLSHAUSEN, Gram., § 261.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet transports himself in spirit to the end of all things. He describes the destruction of the world. He sees, however, that this destruction will be gradually accomplished. He here depicts the first scene: the destruction of all that exists on the surface of the earth. This destruction bears the closest resemblance to such desolations of countries and cities as even now occur in consequence of wars. Hence the Prophet borrows the colors for this his first picture of the destruction of the world from such occurrences in actual history. Jehovah empties, devastates, depopulates the surface of the earth (ver. 1), and the inhabitants are without distinction of person swept away (ver. 2); and this work of emptying and devastation is thoroughly accomplished (ver. 3). In consequence, inanimate nature appears mourning, and every height and glory of creation has vanished (ver. 4); and this too is quite natural, for the earth has been defiled by the sins of men (ver. 5). Therefore the curse has, as it were, devoured the earth; therefore men, with the exception of a small remnant, are destroyed from the earth (ver. 6). Therefore the precious productions of the earth that gladden the heart of man have vanished, and with them all joy on earth (vers. 7–9). The head of the earth, the great city of the world is a chaos of ruins, its houses no man enters any more (ver. 10). In the streets nothing is heard save lamentations over the loss of what gladdens the heart of man. All joy has departed (ver. 11). Nothing remains in the city but solitude and desolation. The gates are broken to pieces (ver. 12).

2. Behold the LORD . . . do languish.—Vers. 1–4. הִנֵּה, with a participle following, frequently introduces in Isaiah the prophetic discourse: iii. 1; viii. 7; x. 33; xiii. 9, 17; xvii. 1; xxii. 17 et saepe. In general, this usage occurs in all the Prophets. But it is peculiar to Isaiah, quite abruptly and without any introductory formula to begin the prophetic discourse with הִנֵּה. The description of the destruction of the earth begins with its surface (comp. ver. 18 b sqq.). To it the inhabitants also belong, for they can exist only on the surface. If now all things on the surface of the earth are thrown confusedly together, the inhabitants, too, are naturally scattered. הֵפִיץ, an expression which seems to be taken from the threatening words of Deuteronomy (comp. iv. 27; xxviii. 64; xxx. 3) is found besides in Isaiah only xxviii. 25; xli. 16. The LORD knows no respect of persons. When the great forces of nature by God's command assail our race, then all are alike affected. In a desolation wrought by human hands the case can be different. Then the more distinguished persons are often treated otherwise than the poor, and are reserved for a better fate (comp. 1 Sam. xv. 8 sq.; 2 Kings xxv. 27 sqq.). When "people" and "priest" are put in contrast, and not "people" and "prince" or "king," the reason is to be sought in the fact that the priests in the theocracy form properly the nobility. The place, moreover, is a quotation from Hos. iv. 9. Any citizen may become a king; but he only can be a priest who is of the priestly race. Comp. Lev. xxi.; Ezek. xliv. 15 sqq.; JOSEPHUS CON. Ap. I, 7; Mishna Kiddushin iv. 4. [The rightful King of Israel must according to the divine appointment be of the house of David.—D. M.] The sentence ver. 2 contains six comparisons. As in the first half of the verse, the second and third comparisons are not specifically distinct from one another, so is it too in the second half of the verse. With a repetition of assonant sounds, which like waves or shocks succeed one another, the Prophet paints the emptying and plundering of the earth. We have already remarked that he depicts the devastation of the surface of the earth in colors which are borrowed from the devastation of a single country by an earthly enemy. For that the subject treated of is the devastation of the earth, and not merely of the land of Palestine, appears from the whole scope of chapters xxiv—xxvii., which are intended to depict the judgment of the world; and this point comes ever more clearly to light in the course of the prophecy. It might be asked: if ארץ is the earth, who then are the plunderers? But this is an idle question. For the Prophet sees in spirit an occurrence which appears to him at the first sight quite like the devastation of a country in war by a hostile military force. He sees great confusion, men shouting and fleeing, houses burning and falling down, smoke rising to heaven, etc. He sees no particular country; he sees no definite persons in the plundering enemies. It is a question if he really perceives plundering persons. For the whole representation is at first a comparatively indistinct picture which gradually attains greater clearness and definiteness. On the expression "For the Lord hath spoken," which occurs more frequently in Isaiah than in the other Prophets, comp. on i. 2. The addition "this word" is found only here. It is evidently used in order to continue in the second half of the verse the play with words by means of lingual and labial sounds. The effect of the devastation is that the land appears mourning and exhausted (ver. 4). Here too the Prophet heaps together assonant words. אָבַל to mourn, is used by Isaiah iii. 26; xix. 8; xxxiii. 9. The description in Joel i. 9 sq. seems to have been here before his mind. נָבֵל, to fall off, from being withered, is used by Isaiah i. 30; xxviii. 1, 4; xxxiv. 4; lxiv. 5. תֵּבֵל, the earth (either as terra fertilis, or as οἰκουμένη, never as designation of a single country) is a current word with Isaiah. Comp. on xiii. 11. עם הארץ, an expression which Isaiah does not elsewhere employ, seems to denote here the inhabitants of the earth in general. This is the rather possible, as our place is the first and oldest in which the expression occurs. It has not here the specific sense of "common people," plebs, in opposition to people of rank, in which sense it afterwards occurs. Comp. my remarks on Jer. i. 18. מָרוֹם is the abstract for the concrete, the height for the high and eminent. Not only inanimate creation, man too presents the sad look of decay. What among men blooms and flourishes, as well as the fresh green vegetation, becomes withered and languid.

3. The earth also is defiled——covenant.—Ver. 5. This verse must be regarded as related to what precedes as the statement of the cause. For here the sins of men are pointed out. But sin has punishment for its necessary consequence. We must say, therefore, that there lies a causal power in the wav with which this verse begins; as is not unfrequently the case. That the land is defiled through blood-guiltiness and other sin is declared Numb. xxxv. 33, which place Isaiah has probably in his eye, (comp. Jer. iii. 1, 2, 9). תַּחַת is to be taken in the local sense. The earth lies as a polluted thing under the feet of its inhabitants. How could such polluted ground be suffered to exist? It is an object of wrath, it must be destroyed. The second half of the verse tells by what the earth has been defiled; men have transgressed the divine laws, have wantonly slighted the ordinance, and broken the everlasting covenant (xxx. 8; lv. 3). תורות only here in Isaiah, is frequent in the Pentateuch: Gen. xxvi. 5; Exod. xvi. 28; xviii. 16, 20 et saepe. חָלַף of the law only here. Mark the assonance with חנף. The radical meaning of the word is "to change," comp. on ii. 18; viii. 8; ix. 9; xxi. 1. Not only to the people of Israel has God given a law, not merely with this people has God made a covenant; the Noachic covenant is for all men; yea, in a certain sense for all creatures on the earth (Gen. ix. 1 sqq., and ver. 9 sqq.). God has given witness of Himself to all men (Acts xiv. 17), and made it possible for all to perceive His invisible power and godhead (Rom. i. 20). The Prophet indicates here the deep moral reason why our earth cannot forever continue in its present material form.

4. Therefore hath the curse—drink it.—Vers. 6–9. On the statement of the cause, ver. 5, follows anew with "therefore" the declaration of the consequences, so that ver. 5 serves as a basis both for what precedes and what follows. The same condition is described in the main by vers. 6–12 as by vers. 1–4. Only in so far are vers. 6–12 of a different import, as they prominently set forth not only the general, but the special experiences of men through the withdrawal of the noblest fruit, wine, and as they from verse 10 direct the look to the great centre of the earth, the city of the world. Jeremiah has our place in general before his eyes (xxxiii. 10). The curse is conceived as the devouring fire of the divine wrath (Exod. xxiv. 17; Deut. iv. 24; ix. 3; Isa. x. 16 sq.; xxix. 6; xxx. 27–30; xxxiii. 14). The expression אלה אכלה (mark the assonance with ver. 4) occurs only here. אָשַׁם (in Isaiah only here) denotes in this connection, not "to be guilty, to contract guilt," but "to suffer the punishment of guilt." Comp. Hos. x. 2; xiv. 1 et saepe. The effect of that burning wrath which devours the guilty, extends first to men. These are parched by it, their sap is dried up (Ps. xxxii. 4). But where the sap of life is dried up, death ensues, and, in consequence, but few people remain on the earth. This surviving of a small remnant is confessedly a very significant point in Isaiah's prophecy (iv. 3; vi. 13; x. 19 sqq.; xi. 11, 16; xvii. 6). Isaiah uses the word אֱנוֹשׁ more frequently than the other Prophets. He employs it six times beside the case before us; viii. 1; xiii. 7–12; xxxiii. 8; li. 7; lvi. 2. Of the other Prophets only Jeremiah uses it, and but once. In the book of Job the word occurs 19 times. מִזְעָר is found only in Isaiah; x. 25; xxix. 17; xvi. 14. זְעֵיר also is found only Isa. xxviii. 10, 13, and Job xxxvi. 2. שִׂמְחֵי לֵב occurs only here. מָשׂוֹשׂ occurs 17 times in the Old Testament; of these 10 times in Isaiah; viii. 6; xxiv. 8 (bis), 11; xxxii. 13, 14; lx. 15; lxii. 5; lxv. 18; lxvi. 10. Ver. 8 תֹּף the tambourine v. 12; xxx. 32. שָׁאוֹן eight times in Isaiah (v. 14; xiii. 4; xvii. 12 (bis), 13; xxiv. 8; xxv. 5; lxvi. 6); in the whole Old Testament 17 times. עַלִּיז, save in two dependent places in Zeph. (ii. 15; iii. 11), only in Isaiah xiii. 3; xxii. 2; xxiii. 7; xxxii. 13 comp. v. 14. The only Prophet save Ezekiel (xxvi. 13) that uses כִּנּוֹר is Isaiah; he has it five times: v. 12; xvi. 11; xxiii. 16; xxiv. 8; xxx. 32. In בַּשִּׁיר observe the בּ marking accompaniment. שִׁיר is used five times by Isaiah (xxiii. 16; xxvi. 1; xxx. 29; xlii. 10). No other Prophet employs the word so frequently. מָרַר, to be bitter, in Isaiah in different forms three times: xxii. 4; xxiv. 9; xxxviii. 17. שֵׁכָר intoxicating drink; with the exception of Micah who uses the word once (ii. 11), it is used by no other Prophet save Isaiah v. 11, 22; xxiv. 9; xxviii. 7 ter; lvi. 12.

Isaiah, after having foretold, ver. 7, the destruction of the vine, the noblest fruit of the ground, depicts its consequence, the cessation of joy which wine produces (Ps. civ. 15).

5. The city of confusion——destruction. —Vers. 10-12. In these three verses the Prophet proceeds to describe the destiny of the great worldly city, the head and centre of the kingdom of the world. It is not surprising that he gives particular prominence to it, when we consider how largely Babylon figures in prophecy (comp. my remarks on Jeremiah l. and li. Introduction). I would not, however, be understood as affirming that our Prophet had Babylon specifically before his mind. Isaiah intends just the city of the world κατ' ἐξοχήν, whatever name it might bear. I do not think that קריה is to be taken collectively as xxv. 3. (Arndt de Jes. xxiv—xxvii. Commentatio, 1826, p. 10, Drechsler, etc.). For it is unnecessary to emphasize the cities beside the level country. No one looks for their specification; for every one includes the cities in all that has been previously said of the ארץ or תבל. But an emphatic mention of the city of the world, the proper focus of worldliness, corresponds to its importance. The place xxv. 3 cannot be compared; for there the context and construction (plural verbs) are decidedly in favor of our taking the word as a collective. That under this city we do not understand Jerusalem, as most do, is self-evident from our view of this passage. The city of the world is called the city of emptiness, [not confusion] because worldliness has in it its seat and centre, and worldliness is essentially תהו i. e., vanitas, inanity, emptiness. תהו is used in this sense (xxix. 21; xxxiv. 11; xl. 17, 23; xli. 29; xliv. 9; xlv. 18, 19; xlix. 4; lix. 4; 1 Sam. xii. 21). The Prophet declares that the inward chaos would also be outwardly manifested. Every thing here is in accordance with the style of Isaiah. שֶׁבֶר is used very often by Isaiah (viii. 16; xiv. 5; xvii. 25, 29; xxvii. 11; xxviii. 13; xxx. 14, et saepe). קִרְיָה is found sixteen times in the prophets; of these, ten times in Isaiah (i. 21, 26; xxii. 2; xxiv. 10; xxv. 2, 3; xxvi. 5; xxix. 1; xxxii. 13; xxxiii. 20). תהו occurs twenty times in the O. T.; of these, eleven times in Isaiah; one of the places is admitted to be genuine (xxix. 21); the other places where it occurs are assailed by the critics. We might wonder how one could speak of closed houses in a destroyed city. We may not understand this, with Drechsler, of some houses that remained uninjured. It was rather the falling of the houses that rendered them incapable of being entered into. In the street too (ver. 11) the lamentation at the loss of wine and the departure of all joy is repeated (comp. xvi. 7 -10). עָרַב occurs only twice in the O. T.; viz.: Judges xix. 9 and here. Its meaning is nigrum esse, obscurari, occidere. When all joy and life have fled from the city, nothing remains in it but desolation (ver. 12). If I am to state what future events will correspond to this prophecy of the first act of the judgment of the world, it appears to me that the description of the Prophet, as it refers solely to occurrences which have for their theatre the surface of the earth, corresponds to what our Lord in His discourse on the last things says of the signs of His coming, and of the beginning of sorrows (Matt. xxiv. 6-8; Mark xiii. 7-8; Luke xxi. 9 sqq.). And the beginning of sorrows corresponds again to what the Revelation of John represents under the image of seven seals, seven trumpets, and seven vials (chap. vi. sqq.).

2. THE DESTRUCTION OF THE GLOBE.

Chap. XXIV. 13-23.

13 [a]When thus it shall be in the midst of the land among the people,
There shall be as the shaking of an olive tree,
And as the gleaning grapes when the vintage is done.
14 They shall lift up their voice,
They shall sing for the majesty of the Lord,
They shall cry aloud from the sea.
15 Wherefore glorify ye the Lord in the [1b]fires,
Even the name of the Lord God of Israel in the isles of the sea.
16 From the [2]uttermost part of the earth have we heard songs,
Even glory to the righteous.
But I said,
[3]My leanness, my leanness, woe unto me!
The treacherous dealers have dealt treacherously;
Yea, the treacherous dealers have dealt very treacherously.
17 Fear, and the pit, and the snare are upon thee,
O inhabitant of the earth.
18 And it shall come to pass,
That he who fleeth from the noise of the fear
Shall fall into the pit;

And he that cometh up out of the midst of the pit
Shall be taken in the snare:
For the windows from on high are open,
And the foundations of the earth do shake.
19 The earth is utterly broken down;
The earth is clean dissolved,
The earth is moved exceedingly.
20 The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard,
And shall [c]be removed like a cottage;
And the transgression thereof shall be heavy upon it;
And it shall fall,
And not rise again.
21 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the LORD shall [4]punish the host of the high ones that are on high,
And the kings of the earth upon the earth.
22 And they shall be gathered together, [5]as prisoners are gathered in [6]the pit,
And shall be shut up in the prison,
And after many days shall they be [7]visited.
23 Then the moon shall be confounded,
And the sun ashamed,
When the LORD of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem,
And [8]before his ancients gloriously.

[1] Or, valleys. [2] Heb. wing. [3] Heb. leanness to me, or, my secret to me.
[4] Heb. visit upon. [5] Heb. with the gathering of prisoners. [6] Or, dungeon.
[7] Or, found wanting. [8] Or, There shall be glory before his ancients.

[a] For thus it shall be. [b] the lands of light, the east. [c] shake like a hammock.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13. The impersonal expression כה יהיה is to be understood as וְהָיָה xvii. 5.

Ver. 19. רֹעָה is a substantive as בֹּגֵר in ver. 16 and אֲסֵפָה in ver. 22; three examples in this chapter of the infin. abs. being represented by a substantive formed from the same stem. Ver. 22. Many would connect אַסִּיר with אֲסֵפָה; but אַסִּיר is really in apposition to the subject involved in אֻסְּפוּ. The singular אַסִּיר need not cause surprise; comp. xx. 4. The case before us comes under the category of the ideal number treated of, NAEGELSBACH Gr., § 61, 1 sq. עַל stands in the signification of אֶל. Comp. on x. 3.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet depicts here the second stage of the world's destruction. This consists substantially in the shattering of the globe of the earth itself. The transition is formed by the thought, ver. 13, that only few men, a gleaning, as it were, will survive the first catastrophe. But these saved ones are the pious, the elect of God. These flee to the promised land, to Jerusalem. From the sea, i. e., from the west, the prophet hears the song of praise (ver. 14). He answers by calling on east and west to praise the name of the Lord (ver. 15). This summons is obeyed. We perceive from this, that the elect of God are hidden in a safe place (ver. 16 a). But that is just the occasion for the signal to be given for the occurrence of the last and most frightful catastrophe. The Prophet announces it with an exclamation of anxiety and terror. At the same time he declares why it must be so; the sin of men provokes the judgment of God (ver. 16 b). He characterizes beforehand the catastrophe as one which shall take place in different successive acts, each more severe than the preceding, so that he who has escaped the first blow will certainly fall under the second or the third (vers. 17, 18 a). For, as at the deluge, the windows of heaven will be opened, and the foundations of the earth will be broken up (ver. 18 b). The globe of the earth will then rend, burst, break (ver. 19), reel like a drunken man. The earth cannot bear the load of sin. It must, therefore, fall to rise again no more (ver. 20). But the judgment of God is not confined to the earth: The angelic powers that are hostile to God will, as well as the representatives of the worldly power on earth, be cast into the abyss, and there shut up for a time; but after a certain term has expired, they will again be liberated (vers. 21, 22). Sun and moon, too, will lose their brightness, so that only in one place of the world can safety be found, namely, in Zion. For, although the rest of the earth be shattered, Zion, the holy mount, remains uninjured. For there Jehovah rules as king, and through the heads of His people there gathered round Him will He communicate His glory to His people also (ver. 23).

2. When thus it shall be—treacherously.—Vers. 13–16. In the olive and grape harvest the great mass of the fruit is shaken or plucked off and cast into the press. Only few berries remain on the olive tree or vine. The few remaining olives are struck off with a stick. The few grapes remaining on the vine are afterwards cut off. When, then, at the close of the catastrophe depicted in vers. 1–13, only few persons survive, that is a proof of the extent of the catastrophe, and a measure whereby to estimate it. This by the way of explaining the כִּי. [Translate, "For thus it shall be;" not as in the E. V. "When thus it shall be," etc.]. But few escape destruction. These are the elect. To these few, who are by implication supposed in ver. 13 b, הֵמָּה, ver. 14, refers. They exult at their deliverance, which they owe to the majesty of Jehovah. רנן is found as here connected with צָהַל xii. 6; liv. 1. רנן occurs frequently in the first and second part of Isaiah. גָּאוֹן is an expression very common in Isaiah. But why does the Prophet hear from the sea, i. e. from the west the exulting shout of them that have escaped? We cannot, with Drechsler and some older interpreters, take מִיָּם in the comparative sense (they shall cry aloud more than the sea); for צהל, an onomatopoetic word, denotes a clear sound (like the neighing of a horse) which cannot be compared with the thunder of the sea. Does there lie in the expression מים something like a foreboding of the fact that the Church of the Lord would spread especially in the lands of the west, and that, therefore, the great mass of the redeemed would come from that quarter? From the moment when the Prophet announced the comforting word (vers. 13, 14), all the godly dwelling in the east and west are to praise the name of the Lord who has given to them, in place of the terrible day of judgment, the promise of deliverance. There can be no doubt that the word אֻרִים is connected with אוּר, אור (ignis, flamma, a word peculiar to Isaiah; for beside Isaiah xxxi. 9; xliv. 16; xlvii. 14; l. 11, it is found only Ezek. v. 2, and there probably as a reminiscence from Isaiah) and with אוּרִים (on the breastplate of the high-priest). As the light rises daily in the east of the earth, as in opposition to it the north is conceived as צָפוֹן (plaga abscondita, caliginosa), as the Greeks too designate the eastern region of the heavens by πρὸς ἠῶ τ' ἠέλιόν τε (Il. xii. 239 et saepe), we are justified in understanding by אֻרִים the countries of light, or the sun, i. e. the east. The meaning "eastern countries" answers well to the "islands of the sea" in the parallel clause. There is no need for altering the text. In ver. 14 those who are saved are described as coming with jubilation, and in ver. 15 all who desire deliverance are summoned to shout for joy. This explains how the Prophet, ver. 16, actually hears songs of praise (comp. xii. 2; li. 3; xxv. 5) from the end of the earth (כָּנָף ala, ora, extremity; כנף הארץ only here, yet comp. xi. 12). The theme of the songs is צְבִי לַצַּדִּיק. If it were said כָּבוֹד לִי, I would unhesitatingly refer צדיק to God. But, as Delitzsch well remarks, Jahve bestows צְבִי iv. 2; xxviii. 5; but to him כבוד is given. The thought is like that in Rom. ii. 6 sqq. Every one is rewarded according to his works. Therefore praise (צְבִי ornatus, decus, splendor iv. 2; xiii. 19; xxiii. 9; xxviii. 1, 4, 5) is to the righteous, but tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil. The fundamental idea of the divine judgment is thus expressed. The Prophet has seen the one side "glory to the righteous" fulfilled. These, the righteous, have arrived at their hiding place. They are gathered on the holy mountain, and find there protection (iv. 5 sq.). But thereby the sign is given that now the judgment can begin, and has to begin on the ungodly. This prospect agitates the Prophet exceedingly. He sees himself in that fatal moment fear and quake, and hears himself breaking out into the words רזי לי וגו׳. This he introduces with ואמר. רָזִי is ἅπ. λεγ. But the signification is clear. The verb רָזָה denotes attenuare, maciare (xvii. 4). The Prophet feels his powers wasting away as the effect of the extraordinary terror (comp. Dan. vii. 28; viii. 27; x. 16 sqq.). He next declares that the צדיק has his counterpart on earth in the בֹּגֵד. As the former has glory for his portion from a just God, so the latter receives "fear and the pit and the snare." It will have been seen that I do not take בגד in the sense of "robber," but retain its proper signification of perfidy, faithlessness, falling away (xxi. 2; xxxiii. 1; xlviii. 8). The Prophet by the accumulation and repetition of verbal and substantive forms of בָּגַד indicates that this perfidy and faithlessness were exercised in the highest degree, and in all forms.

3. Fear and the pit——rise again.—Vers. 17–20. By three assonant words which sound in accord not only with one another, but also with the immediately preceding symphony, the Prophet characterizes, first in general terms, the terrible catastrophe, the second act of the judgment of the world. By the threefold series of punishments the impossibility of escaping judgment is effectively set before the eyes. And then, in particular, the all-embracing character of the judgment which lets nothing escape, is exhibited by showing how the earth is affected above, below, and in the midst, and shaken till it is broken down. First, the windows (ארבות cancelli, fenestrae, Gen. vii. 11; viii. 2 comp. Isa. lx. 8) from on high, i. e., from heaven, are opened, not to let rain fall in order to produce a deluge; for the earth shall not be destroyed again by water (Gen. ix. 11). But the Lord has yet other weapons. Wind, fire, thunder and lightning, drought, pestilence, etc., are also God's instruments of punishment, and they also in a certain sense come from on high (comp. Ps. lxxviii. 49). The foundations of the earth (lviii. 12, comp. xl. 21) are the foundations on which the earth rests. These shall be shaken (xiii. 13; xiv. 16). Then the globe of the earth, assailed from above, and from beneath deprived of its supports, must feel in itself the powerful hand of Almighty God. Four times in succession is the word "the earth" or "earth" used with emphasis. Terrible, not merely local, but universal earthquakes shake the earth. It receives rents, becomes full of breaks, totters (xl. 20; xli. 7; liv. 10), reels (vi. 4; vii. 2; xix. 1; xxix. 9; xxxvii. 22) as the drunkard (generic article) and oscillates to and fro as the hammock shaken by the wind (i. 8). Who could deem it possible that there is a burden which the earth that sustains everything, cannot bear, by which it is crushed as a house too heavily burdened? This burden is sin (i. 4; Ps. xxxviii. 5). This is the destruction of men and of things. Where God's creation is tainted with it, it must come to naught. As man, the lord of creation, fell by sin, so must the earth also, the theatre of human history, fall by sin never again to rise in its previous form. The words It shall fall and not rise again, are a clear proof that the total destruction of the globe of the earth in its present form is the subject treated of. In its present form! For the earth shall rise again in a higher, holy form beyond the range of sin and its consequence, death. For there is a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness (lxv. 17; lxvi. 22; 2 Pet. iii. 13; Rev. xxi. 1).

4. And it shall come—gloriously.—Vers. 21–23. The Prophet now lifts up his eye to the super-terrestrial sphere. As the lot of the earth is affected by the influence of that sphere, so the swoop of the judgment that falls upon the earth must reach even to it. That צבא המרום are not earthly powers (LUTHER "hohe Ritterschaft," TARGUM, CALVIN, HAVEERNICK and others), may be inferred even from the expression צבא; for the high ones of the earth do not form a צָבָא. Moreover צבא חמרום is evidently identical with "the host of heaven," xxxiv. 4, and by the addition בַּמָּרוֹם this צבא המרום is more than sufficiently distinguished from every conceivable צבא המרום upon the earth. That the host of the height are only the stars, as HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis II. 2, p. 522) would have it, seems to be rendered by the context incredible. For how could the irrational glories of heaven be put in conjunction with the rational glories of the earth? The former correspond not to our kings, but to our earth itself. How, too, can we conceive a judgment executed on a world, without its affecting at the same time those intelligent beings that stand in any connection with that world? It seems to me to be likewise one-sided to refer צבא המרום merely to the angels, who are said to be heads and guardians of the separate kingdoms (Dan. x. 13, 20; ROSENMUELLER, HITZIG, DELITZSCH, and others), or to the heathen gods conceived of as angels (KNOBEL). The judgment of God falls certainly on every thing that can be called צבא המרום, so far as it has at all merited the judgment. The expression is found only here; but the nearly related expression, "the host of heaven," is frequently used to designate, sometimes, the host of the stars (xl. 26; xlv. 12; Jer. viii. 2; xxxiii. 22; Dan. viii. 10), sometimes, the angelic world (1 Kings xxii. 19; Ps. ciii. 21; Neh. ix. 6, and the expression צְבָאוֹת), sometimes, perhaps, both together (Deut. iv. 19; xvii. 3; 2 Kings xvii. 16; xxi. 3, 5; Isa. xxxiv. 4; Zeph. i. 5). The host of the height and the kings of the earth are both the subject of אֻסְּפוּ, ver. 22. As now we have shown that the host of the height can designate the world of angels, and as the Scripture clearly testifies that the angels are bound as a punishment for their apostasy (2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6; Rev. xx. 1–3), can not the Prophet's eye have perceived this feature of the picture of what will take place at the end of the world? The invisible, extramundane heads of the worldly power, as well as their earthly, visible organs, will, according to the statement of the Prophet, be collected as prisoners in the pit, and shut up in it. The pit is here used for Sheol as oftentimes (xiv. 15, 19; xxxviii. 18). But not merely the binding of those angelic and worldly powers, their being set loose for a time is also announced by the Prophet. Only by a brief, obscure word, probably not seen through by himself, does the Prophet intimate this. Even we should not understand this word if the revelation of the New Testament, which is nearer the time of the fulfilment, did not throw light on this dark point. It declares expressly that after a thousand years Satan should be loosed out of his prison (Rev. xx. 7). Isaiah uses here an indefinite announcement of time—after many days—and an indefinite verb. פקד stands here as xxiii. 17 of a visiting which consists in looking again after some one who has remained for a time neglected (Jer. xxvii. 22). This ἐπισκέπτειν can be a gracious visitation, but it can also be a new stage in the visitation of judgment. That we have to take the word here in the latter sense is seen from the place quoted from the Revelation of John. The setting loose of Satan is only the prelude to his total destruction, Rev. xx. 10. Then follows the last, highest and grandest revelation of God. The earth now becomes what it ought originally to have been, but which it was hindered from being by sin, viz., the common dwelling-place of God and of men. The heavenly Jerusalem, the tabernacle in which God dwells with men (Rev. xxi. 3) descends upon the renovated earth. This is the Jerusalem in which according to ver. 23, Jehovah Zebaoth reigns as King. This city needs no sun and no moon any more—for the LORD Himself is its light (Rev. xxi. 23; xxii. 5). Before this light the earthly sun (חַמָּה, xxx. 26) and the earthly moon (ibid.) grow pale (comp. i. 29); they which were created to rule the day and to rule the night, resign their dominion to Him who alone and everywhere from this time on will from mount Zion rule the earth. Here too is the place where the redeemed of the Lord (vers. 13–16) find everlasting rest and protection (iv. 5 sq.). The Prophet has already (1 22 sqq.) shown the importance of rulers for the moral condition of the people. The whole history of the people is a proof of their importance. In the new Jerusalem the new Israel will have new elders also, who will not be the promoters of wickedness and misery any more, but of all that is good and glorious (iii. 14). The elders of the Apocalypse, who perhaps bear their name from this place before us, are, therefore, in my opinion, not angels, as HOFMANN will have them to be, but representatives of the people of God. For why should there not be order and organisation even in the kingdom of glory?

3. ISRAEL'S SONG OF PRAISE FOR DELIVERANCE.

Chapter XXV. 1-5.

1 O Lord, thou art my God;
I will exalt thee, I will praise thy name;
For thou hast done wonderful things;
Thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth.
2 For thou hast made of a city an heap;
Of a defenced city a ruin;
A palace of strangers to be no city;
It shall never be built.
3 Therefore shall the strong people glorify thee,
The city of the terrible nations shall fear thee.
4 For thou hast been a [a]strength to the poor,
A [b]strength to the needy in his distress;
A refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat;
[c]When the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall.
5 Thou shalt bring down the noise of strangers,
As the heat in a dry place;
Even the heat with the shadow of a cloud:
The [d]branch of the terrible ones shall be brought low.

[a] stronghold. [b] stronghold. [c] for the blast of the terrible ones was, etc. [d] triumphal song.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. ארוממך (comp. Ps. xxx. 2) forms an intended rhyme with שְׁמְךָ. The expression עשׂה פלא first occurs Ex. xv. 11. Comp. פֶּלֶא יוֹעֵץ ix. 5. Here עצות follows פלא as there יעץ. Is this accidental? אמונה אמן (אֹמֶן is ἅπ. λεγ.). The two words are dependent on עָשִׂית. God has shown truth which is faithfulness, i. e., faithful, certain. The two substantives of the same root (comp. iii. 1; xvi. 6) which are placed together, stand in the relation of apposition. Similar constructions occur Prov. xxii. 21; Jer. x. 10; Gen. i. 12; Jer. xx. 1. In these cases the substantive standing in apposition serves the place of an adjective that is wanting, or intensifies the notion of the adjective.

Ver. 2. The construction שמת מעיר לגל is a confusio duarum constructionum. For it must be either שַׂמְתָּ עִיר לְגַל (comp. Joel i. 7; Isa. v. 20; xiv. 23, et saepe) or שַׂמְתָּ גַּל מֵעִיר (comp. Hos. xiii. 2; Gen. ii. 19). The construction here employed has arisen from the blending of these two modes of expression. Before חֹרֶב, ver. 5 b, we have to supply כְּ from the first part of the verse, or חרב is to be regarded as in apposition.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The contemplation of the mighty acts of God naturally excites to praise and thanksgiving. We are here reminded of Rom. xi. 33 sqq., where Paul cannot avoid praising in a hymn the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God. In like manner the Prophet here extols the Lord for having executed so gloriously His wonderful purpose embracing the most remote times, thus having proved Himself to be true, and at the same time having attested the Prophet as a faithful interpreter of the thoughts of God (ver. 1). The Lord has shown how He can make good what is most incredible. He announced the destruction of great cities, when they were in the height of their power and glory; and so it has happened (ver. 2). He has thereby constrained even His enemies to honor and fear Him (ver. 3). But to His poor oppressed church He has been a shield and refuge; and has subdued the raging of her enemies against her (ver. 5).

2. O LORD . . . truth.—Ver. 1. The Prophet here sings a psalm as in chapter xii. The very commencement: O LORD, thou art my God recalls places of the Psalms as Ps. xxxi. 15; xl. 6; lxxxvi. 12; cxviii. 28; cxliii. 10; cxlv. 1; comp. Jer. xxxi. 18, places which are related to the one before us partly as models, but mostly as copies. The עצות מרחק are in my judgment not merely the counsels conceived from afar, i. e., from eternity (xxii. 11; xxxvii. 26), but also the counsels reaching to a remote incalculable distance. מרחק can grammatically bear this meaning (xvii. 13; xx. 3). And is it not a quite characteristic mark of the prophecy contained in chap. xxiv. to which this hymn particularly relates, that it reaches to the utmost end of the present aeon of the world? Could this have remained unknown to the Prophet? Although, according to 1 Pet. i. 11, Isaiah, when reflecting on the time of the fulfilment, could not attain to exact knowledge, yet so much he must have been aware of, that his look was fixed on facts which follow the destruction of the globe of the earth in its present form (xxiv. 17 sqq.). The Prophet risked something when he gave expression to these strange unintelligible things which appeared such as an enthusiast would utter. But he could not do otherwise, and he did it unhesitatingly, confiding in the omniscience and veracity of the LORD. And this sure confidence, that he with his bold prophecy would not be put to shame, did not deceive him. He sees all the marvels which he predicted realized. Therefore he praises God's truth, faithfulness.

3. For thou hast made—fear thee.—Vers. 2 and 3. The Prophet now goes into details. The prophecy contains partly threatening, partly promise. The LORD has made both good. This is first affirmed of the threatening, and at the same time the salutary effect of its fulfilment is shown (ver. 3). כִּי in the beginning of ver. 2, and כִּי in the beginning of ver. 4 correspond to one another. Both serve to prove the truth of what was said in ver. 1: For thou hast done, etc. The general expression for thou hast made of a city a stone-heap, sets at defiance all attempts of modern criticism to explain the prophecy of some definite historical fact. Not only once, but as often as it was predicted, the LORD has converted into a stone-heap a city which at the time of the threatening was mighty and flourishing. City and defenced city are used collectively. After the all-including עִיר the Prophet makes mention of the prominent parts of the city, the fortifications and the high buildings (palaces). ארמון xxiii. 13; xxxii. 14; xxxiv. 13. The palaces of the foreigners (comp. on i. 7) have become מֵעִיר, i. e., without city, and therefore no city. They stand desolated and solitary in the midst of the destroyed city, still capable of being recognized as palaces, but yet in the way of becoming what all around them is. For what else than a ruin can a palace become, which no city, no wall encompasses, which is exposed to every attack? The ruins of the palaces of Nineveh, Babylon, etc., attest this. מִן in מֵעִיר is therefore to be taken in that negative sense in which it can denote "without," and also "not." (Comp. xvii. 1; vii. 8; xxiii. 1). We have further to observe that the two מֵעִיר in ver. 2 correspond to one another; if out of the city (מֵעִיר), there has become a heap, then the ארמון is also מֵעִיר, i. e., the palace has no longer a city around it, and is also no more a city. This is very prominently set forth by the last clause it shall never be built (from Deut. xiii. 7, comp. Job xii. 14). The conquered must own the might of the victor, do him homage and fear him. This homage and fear may be caused by sheer force, and so be merely outward. But it is possible that the conquered have been inwardly vanquished by their adversary, i. e., that they have perceived that there is error and injustice on their side, and on the side of their conqueror, truth and right. In this case the honor and fear which they render, will be not merely constrained and outward, but voluntary and sincere. The latter is to be supposed here. Isaiah has frequently predicted the conversion of the heathen ii. 2 sqq.; xi. 10; xix. 18 sqq.; xxiii. 15 sqq.; xxiv. 13 sqq. Mark the imperfects (futures) in ver. 3. The Prophet sees what is expressed in ver. 2 as absolutely past; but the honoring and fearing spoken of in ver. 3, will continue to all eternity.

4. For thou hast been——brought low.—Vers. 4 and 5. The leading thought of these two verses is that the Prophet perceives with gratitude and joy the manner in which the LORD has fulfilled His promises. כִּי in ver. 4 corresponds therefore to כִּי in ver. 2. That the LORD will be מָעוֹז (stronghold, xvii. 9, 10; xxiii. 4, 14; xxvii. 5; xxx. 3) to the דַּל (x. 2; xi. 4; xiv. 30; xxvi. 6) and to the אֶבְיוֹן (xiv. 30; xxix. 19; xxxii. 7; xli. 17) has been often enough declared by the Prophet (comp. the passages referred to). דל and אביון are, as DELITZSCH remarks, designations, well-known from the Psalms, of the "ecclesia pressa." The second part of ver. 4 is almost wholly borrowed from iv. 6. What is there promised is here seen by the Prophet as fulfilled (comp. xxxii. 2). But this fulfilment has a positive and a negative side. The positive, i. e., the giving of safety is only possible on the ground of the negative, i. e., after the destruction of those who would deprive the poor of safety and bring them to ruin. כִּי (translate for) before רוּחַ is therefore not co-ordinate with כִּי in the beginning of vers. 2 and 4, but is subordinate to the latter. רוּחַ is here the blast, the storm, the furious snorting, raging of the violent ones (xxx. 28; xxxiii. 11). זרם קִיר is a wall-storm, i. e., a storm beating against a strong wall. See a parallel expression in ix. 3: מַטֵּה שִׁכְמוֹ, the staff striking the shoulder. Mark how the hindrances to safety previously mentioned are here represented under a three-fold gradation שָׁאוֹן, רוּחַ and זָמִיר. We shall not err if we regard the first word as marking the beginning, the second the middle, and the third the end of the hostile action. For one part of the assaults made by the wicked on the servants and children of God is warded off at the very commencement, when it is yet only snorting. It rebounds without doing harm as rain from the stone wall. But another part reaches its full meridian height. It sends forth the arrows of its fury as the sun sends forth the arrows of its flame in the hot land, but the LORD bends them downwards. After a victory has been won, songs of triumph are sung (זמיר means triumphal song, not branch, comp. Cant. ii. 12). The enemies of the people of God can in many cases have their victory and triumph. But even when it has gone so far, the LORD is still able to afford deliverance. He can bow to the dust the enemy already triumphant, and singing songs of praise. As the shadow (xxx. 2, 3; xlix. 2; li. 16) of a cloud keeps off the rays of the sun, and so diminishes the heat, so will a humiliating termination be prepared for the enemies' song of victory by the hand of the Most High, which He holds as a sheltering shadow over His people (xlix. 2; li. 16; Job viii. 9).

4. ZION AS THE PLACE OF THE FEAST GIVEN TO ALL NATIONS IN OPPOSITION TO MOAB, WHICH PERISHES INGLORIOUSLY.

Chapter XXV. 6–12.

6 And in this mountain
Shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people
A feast of fat things,
A feast of wines on the lees,
Of fat things full of marrow,
Of wines on the lees well refined.
7 And he will [1]destroy in this mountain
The face of the covering [2]cast over all people,
And the vail that is spread over all nations.
8 He will swallow up death [a]in victory;
And the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces;
And the [b]rebuke of his people shall he take away
From off all the earth;
For the Lord hath spoken it.
9 And it shall be said in that day,
Lo, this is our God;
We have waited for him, and he will save us:
This is the Lord; we have waited for him,
We will be glad and rejoice in his salvation.
10 For in this mountain shall the hand of the Lord rest,
And Moab shall be [3c]trodden down under him,
Even as straw is [4d]trodden down for the dunghill.
11 And he shall spread forth his hands in the midst of them,
As he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim:
And he shall bring down their pride
Together with the [e]spoils of their hands.
12 And the fortress of the high fort of thy walls shall he bring down,
Lay low, and bring to the ground,
Even to the dust.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 6. שְׁמָנִים מְמֻחָיִם are not fat pieces unmarrowed, but, on the contrary, fat pieces marrowy, yea provided with abundant marrow. If the stem מָחָה, from which ממחים comes, is to be regarded as not different from מָחָה to wipe away, and not as a denominative from מֹחַ marrow, we must assume as common fundamental signification "to rub, to spread over, to besmear." But as then מְמֻחָה would be only what is covered over with fat, not what is in itself fat, the derivation from מֹחַ is in my opinion more probable. This Pual is found only here, and no other of the forms that occur has the signification "pinguem, medullosum esse." Instead of מְמֻחִים we have מְמֻחָיִם, a verb ל״ה (מָחָה) being formed from מֹחַ and its third radical appearing after the manner of verbs ל״ה (comp. אֵתָיוּ, בְּעָיוּ xxi. 12). The object of employing this form is to increase the concord of sounds which is in ver. 6 so prominent.

Ver. 7. In פְּנֵי הַלּוֹט we have the genitive of identity, the covering being marked as that which forms the front view, as the foreside. The substantive לוֹט is found only here. The participle לוֹט is evidently chosen for the sake of assonance (comp. xxiv. 3). It is formed after the analogy of קוֹם, 2 Kings xvi. 7. Comp. Gesen. Gr. § 72, note 1. מַסֵּכָה and נְסוּכָה are not from נָסַךְ effundere, libare, but from another נָסַךְ whose radical meaning seems to be "to weave." מַסֵּכָה is therefore properly a texture, a woven covering. The word is found besides xxviii. 20.

Ver. 10. הִדּוּשׁ is as a verbal form quite abnormal and unexampled. It appears to me to be a changing of the regular infinitive form הִדּוֹשׁ into a nominal form, and is allied to forms such as הִתּוּךְ, Ezek. xxii. 22, הִלּוּל, Lev. xix. 24. הִדּוּשׁ would then be conculcatio, detrusio.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. After the hymn by which the Prophet had given expression to his subjective emotions, he returns to his objective representation of the future. He resumes the discourse broken off at xxiv. 23, whilst he further depicts what will happen on Mount Zion, and—in opposition to this—what will befall the wicked. What will take place on Mount Zion is of a twofold character, positive and negative. Positively, the LORD will prepare for all nations a feast consisting of the most precious articles of food and drink (ver. 6). Negatively, He will first remove the covering which was hitherto spread over all nations (ver. 7); Secondly, He will abolish death, wipe off all tears, and take away the reproach which His people had hitherto to endure on the whole earth (ver. 8). While believers rejoice in the salvation prepared for them by Jehovah their God, to whom they can now point as to one who is not merely to be believed in, but to be seen in His manifested presence (ver. 9), and whose hand bears and upholds all the glory of Mount Zion (ver. 10 a), the Moabites, i. e., those who are represented by Moab, are cast like straw into the dung-hole on which they stand (ver. 10 b). They will indeed work with the hands in order to rescue themselves, but their efforts will not save them from the most ignominious ruin, and their proud, high fortresses will be levelled to the ground, and crushed to dust (vers. 11, 12).

2. And in this mountain——refined.—Ver. 6. "This mountain" points back to "Mount Zion," xxiv. 23. Not only Israel, all nations will be collected on the mountain. There the LORD will prepare a feast for them. That it is a spiritual feast, and that it is not simply for one occasion, but that it will be a permanent, everlasting entertainment, is implied in the nature of the thing. For there everything will be spiritual; and when according to ver. 8, death will be forever abolished, there must, that the antithesis may be maintained, reign forever life, and everything which is the condition of life. This feast meets us elsewhere, both in the Old and in the New Testament, under various forms. In Ex. xxiv. 11 it is related that Moses and the elders of Israel, after they had seen God, ate and drank on the holy mountain, which transaction we are by all means justified in regarding as a typical one. Comp. Ps. xxii. 27, 30; Isa. lv. 1; lxv. 11 sqq. In the New Testament this holy feast given by God appears sometimes as the Great Supper (Luke xiv. 16 sqq.), sometimes as the marriage of the king's son (Matt. xxii. 1 sqq.; xxv. 1 sqq.), or the marriage of the Lamb (Rev. xix. 7, 9, 17 sqq., in which latter place the counterpart of this feast is set forth). It is remarkable that this most glorious, most spiritual feast is represented in so homely a way by the Prophet. This is a clear example of that law of prophecy according to which the future is always represented from the materials furnished by the present. The richest, strongest, most nutritious thing which Isaiah knew to be served up at an earthly feast, is employed as an image to set forth the heavenly banquet. This richest thing was the fat. Therefore the fat of the animals offered in sacrifice (flos carnis) was the chief constituent of the bloody offerings, especially of the Shelamim [E. V., peace offerings] (Ex. xxix. 13–22; Lev. iii. 3–5; 9–11; 14–16; viii. 16; ix. 19 sqq.). We can therefore say: What God Himself formerly required of men, as the noblest part of the victims offered to Him, He now Himself as host offers to His redeemed upon His holy mountain. But the expression "fat" or "marrow" is used also in reference to the land and its vegetable products, to designate the finest. Thus it is said, Gen. xlv. 18, "ye shall eat the fat of the land;" Numb. xviii. 12, "all the fat of oil and all the fat of new wine and corn;" Deut. xxxii. 14, "the fat of kidneys of wheat." That שֶׁמֶן can stand in this sense, we have already seen from other utterances of Isaiah, v. 1; x. 16; xvii. 4; xxviii. 1–4. The most excellent drink accompanies the choicest food. That Isaiah designates this drink by שְׁמָרִים is owing to the endeavor to put as parallel to שְׁמָנִים a word resembling it in sound. But the question arises, how can Isaiah call the most excellent wine שְׁמָרִים? This word seems primarily to denote a wine containing dregs, that is, turbid with dregs, therefore, a bad wine. But Isaiah manifestly understands by שְׁמָרִים wines which have lain a sufficient time on their lees. For the lees are not only the product of a process of purification, but also a reacting substance which contributes to heighten the strength, color and durability of the wine. A wine poured off from its lees too soon tastes too sweet and does not keep long. CATO, too, (De re rust. cap. 154) designates a wine that has lain long enough on its lees vinum faecatum. Comp. GESENIUS, Thes., p. 1444, and his commentary on this place. The expression שְׁמָרִים (only plural) comes therefore from שֶׁמֶר, and שֶׁמֶר is primarily conservatio, the letting lie, then conservatum, that which is let lie (comp. Jer. xlviii. 11). The plural denotes the multiplicity of the ingredients contained in the sediment. שְׁמָרִים is moreover used here metonymically; for it plainly signifies not the lees alone, but also the wine united with the lees. But we can not, of course, drink the lees united with the wine. This wine poured off from the lees must be percolated (מְזֻקָּק only here in Isaiah).

3. And he will destroy——spoken it.—Vers. 7, 8. The covering here spoken of brings at once to mind the vail of Moses, Ex. xxxiv. 30 sqq. To the visible covering there corresponds an invisible one also, which lies on the heart. But when the LORD will take away the covering, He will first of all remove the covering of the heart, as Paul says, 2 Cor. iii. 16, "περιαιρεῖται τὸ κάλυμμα." Then will the external covering also fall off, and men will be capable of seeing the glory of the LORD face to face (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 John iii. 2). [All that the Prophet here says of a covering and vail must be understood metaphorically. A literal, external covering cast over the nations, distinct from a spiritual one, is not to be thought of. D. M.]. Ver. 8. The second negative blessing is that the LORD swallows up death also. בִּלַּע occurs not unfrequently in Isaiah: iii. 12; ix. 15; xxix. 3; xlix. 19. It seems here and ver. 7 to denote more than that its object is removed, for then it could be placed somewhere else; but its object is to be conceived as existing no more. Paul tells us (1 Cor. xv. 26, 54) that death shall in this sense be swallowed up. When there is no death, there are no more tears. For tears flow, either in the case of the living, over that which leads to death; or in the case of survivors, over those who have suffered death. The Apostle John quotes in Rev. vii. 17; xxi. 4, our place to prove that he regards the things which he saw as a fulfilment, not only of his own prophecy, but also of that spoken by Isaiah. He thus makes his own prophecy an echo or reproduction of the prophetic word of the Old Testament. Where sin and death have disappeared, there can be no more reproach, but only glory. There is a new earth: it is a dwelling-place of God with man; it has, therefore, become the place of the divine glory. Where then could there be upon it any more a place for the reproach of those who belong to the people of God? For the Lord hath spoken it. Comp. on i. 2.

4. And it shall be said——rest.—Vers. 9, 10 a. What follows is not a hymn, but a report of one. This is plain from the use of the impersonal אמר (xlv. 24; lxv. 8). The hymn in ver. 1 sqq. came from the Prophet's own mouth: this one is heard by him, and related with a brief statement of its leading thoughts. The redeemed now see the LORD in whom they have hitherto only believed (comp. ver. 7 and 1 John iii. 2). That they see Him is clear from the expression הִנֵּה זֶה (comp. xxi. 9). The heathen, who believed in false gods, experience the very opposite. They are confounded when they must mark the vanity of their idols; but they who believe in Jehovah will after faith be rewarded with seeing; for they can point with the finger to their God as one who is really existent and present before the eyes of all, and can say: Our God is no illusion as your false gods; we and all see Him as truly existing, as Him who was and is to come, יהוה (Ex. iii. 14). Herein is their joy perfect (John xv. 11). וְיוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ is not "and He saves us," but "that He may save us" (comp. viii. 11; Ew. § 347 a): That the joy for the experienced salvation is not transitory and delusive, but will be everlasting is confirmed by the sentence, For in this mountain shall the hand of the LORD rest, etc., ver. 10 a. The hand of Jehovah will settle upon this mountain, it will rest upon it (vii. 2; xi. 2). But what the hand of Jehovah holds, stands fast for ever.

5. And Moab——to the dust.—Vers. 10 b–12. In opposition to the high, triumphant joy of believers, the Prophet now depicts the lot of unbelievers. He mentions Moab as the representative of the latter. He cannot mean thereby the whole nation of Moab. For all nations partake of the great feast on the holy mountain (ver. 6), from all nations the covering is taken off (ver. 7), from all faces the tears are wiped away (ver. 8). Moab consequently cannot be excluded. Even Jeremiah (xlviii. 47) leads us to expect the turning of the captivity of Moab in the latter days. It can therefore be only the Moab that hardens itself against the knowledge of God which will suffer the doom described in ver. 10 sqq. But if Moab, so far as it is hostile to God, has to bear this sentence, why not likewise the God-opposing elements from all other nations? Moab therefore stands for all. But why is Moab in particular named? The Moabites were remarkable for their unbounded arrogance. Jeremiah (xlviii. 11) specifies as the cause of this arrogance the fact that they had, from the time when they began to be a people, dwelt undisturbed in their own land. Further, we must assume that the Prophet, when he began the sentence (ver. 10 b), had before his mind the image which he uses (vers. 10 and 11), and the whole series of thoughts attached to it. It is, moreover, probable that he chose the name Moab just for the sake of the image. According to Gen. xix. 37 the father of the Moabites owed his birth to the incestuous intercourse of the eldest daughter of Lot with her father. An allusion to this fact has been always supposed to be contained in the name מוֹאָב. And this view is not destitute of philological support, comp. GES. Thes., p. 774, sub voce מואב. The K'ri מֵי מַדְמֵנָה lets us more clearly perceive why Isaiah made mention of Moab as the representative of the heathen world, and should, therefore, perhaps be preferred. But, whether we read מֵי or מוֹ, it is manifest that the Prophet wishes to express the idea "water of the dung-hole," and that, alluding to the etymology of Moab, he has named the unbelievers of Moab as representatives of the unbelievers of all nations. Moab is therefore cast down (xxviii. 27 sq.; xli. 15) under him (i. e., under the place on which he stood, comp. Ex. xvi. 29; Josh. v. 8; vi. 5; Job xl. 12; Amos ii. 13). Straw is cast into the filthy water of the dung-hole, in order that it may be saturated by it, and rendered fitter for manure. Our interpretation of מו מ' is confirmed by the fact that מדמנה obviously contains an intentional allusion to the Moabite city מַדְמֵן (Jer. xlviii. 2). The person cast into the dung-hole seeks to save himself. We have therefore to suppose the hole to be of considerable extent. He spreads forth his hands as if to swim. But it is sorry swimming. The desperate struggle for life is thus depicted. The effort is unavailing. Moab must find an ignominious end in the impure element. The LORD presses Him down. Moab is elsewhere blamed for two evil qualities: 1) his pride, 2) his lying disposition (xvi. 6; Jer. xlviii. 29). A corresponding punishment is inflicted: the lies, the artifices symbolized by the skilful motions of the hands (ארבות from אָרַב nectere, especially insidias struere) are of no avail. The haughty Moab (comp. גאוה here and xvi. 6) must perish in the pool of filthy water. The LORD humbles the proud by making disgrace an element of their punishment. That עם signifies "in spite of" is not sufficiently attested. It can well retain here its proper signification "with;" for, in fact, Jehovah presses down not only the proud, but also the cunning and artful. The humbling of pride is, however, the main thing. This is therefore once more asserted, ver. 13, without a figure in strong expressions. The phrase "the defence of the height of thy walls" for "the defence of thy high walls" is idiomatic Hebrew. Compensation for the adjective is sought in substantive forms (comp. xxii. 7; xxx. 30). Three verbs are used corresponding to the three substantives. If עַד־עָפָר is not equivalent simply to לָאָרֶץ, we must find in it the idea of being reduced to dust.

5. THE JUDGMENT AS REALIZATION OF THE IDEA OF JUSTICE.

CHAPTER XXVI. 1–10.

1 IN that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah;
We have a strong city:
Salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks.
2 Open ye the gates,
That the righteous nation which keepeth the [1]truth may enter in.
3 [a]Thou wilt keep him [2]in perfect peace whose [3]mind is stayed on thee;
Because he trusteth in thee.
4 Trust ye in the LORD for ever;
For in the LORD JEHOVAH is [4]everlasting strength.
5 For he bringeth down them that dwell on high;
The lofty city, he layeth it low;
He layeth it low, even to the ground;
He bringeth it even to the dust.
6 The foot shall tread it down,
Even the feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy.
7 The way of the just is uprightness;
[b]Thou, most upright, dost weigh the path of the just.
8 Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O LORD, have we waited for thee;
The desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee.
9 With my soul have I desired thee in the night;
Yea, with my spirit within me will I seek thee early;
For when thy judgments are in the earth,
The inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness.
10 Let favor be shewed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness;
In the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly,
And will not behold the majesty of the LORD.

[1] Heb. truths. [2] Heb. peace, peace. [3] Or, thought, or, imagination. [4] Heb. the rock of ages.

[a] As firm formation wilt thou preserve peace, peace, for upon thee it is confided.
[b] Thou wilt level right the path of the just.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. Hophal הוּשַׁר only here. According to the punctuation עֹז ought to be connected with לָנוּ. But most interpreters take עִיר עֹז together after Prov. xviii. 19. I believe, however, that the Masoretes indicate the correct sense, and the one which corresponds to the context. We must not forget that the inhabitants of the "land" of Judah speak thus. עִיר stands consequently in opposition to אֶרֶץ. The redeemed of the LORD do not all dwell in the city. They dwell also in the country round about. But the city is their עֹז, their strong defence, and place of refuge. It is therefore as if they said: We dwell indeed in the country, but yet we are not without protection; for we have a city into which we can hasten and find shelter. Comp. Ps. xxviii. 8; lxxxiv. 6; Isa. xii. 2; xlv. 24; xlix. 5; li. 9; lii. 1; lxii. 8. Observe the structure of the second sentence of this verse. The sentence consists of three members, each member has two words; for even עֹז־לָנוּ is rendered by Maqqeph one word. The first two words begin each with ע; the second two with שׁ; the third two with ח.

Ver. 4. That בְּ before יָהּ is not the so-called Beth essentiae was already perceived by DRECHSLER. בְּ serves here not as a mere periphrasis of the predicate (Ps. lxviii. 5); but it marks the idea צוּר, which is by no means coincident with Jehovah (since it can be sought out of Jehovah), as one which believers find in Jehovah (comp. Ps. xxxi. 3; lxxxix. 27; xciv. 22; xcv. 1 et saepe). עֲדֵי עַד comp. lxv. 18. The plural עוֹלָמִים besides here xlv. 17; li. 9.

Ver. 6. רָמָס (comp. on i. 12; xxviii. 3), עָנִי (comp. on iii. 14 sq.), דַּל (comp. on xxv. 4) are all expressions characteristic of Isaiah.

Ver. 8. אַף is an antithetic "yea." Not only does the righteous man wish himself to do right, but he desires also to see the righteousness of God. The word belongs especially to poetry. It is remarkable that it is found in Isaiah in such specifically poetic sections in which בַּל also occurs. אֹרַח is acc. loci. נַפְשִׁי and רוּחִי, ver. 9 a, are acc. instrum. שָׁחַר, Piel שִׁחֵר, is a word current chiefly in the book of Job, in the Psalms and Proverbs. To מִשְׁפָּטֶיךָ a verb is to be supplied (say, יָבֹאוּ as KIMCHI and RASHI propose). The perfect לָמְדוּ does not appear to me to be used in its paradigmatic force to express a matter of experience that has frequently happened (DELITZSCH), for the Prophet complains of a want in this respect,—but the perfect is intended to mark this learning as a certain, infallible effect of the desired judgments.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Here, too, the Prophet relates a hymn which he hears coming from the holy mountain, and out of the holy city. Its leading thought corresponds to the declaration 2 Peter iii. 13 regarding the new earth in which righteousness dwells. This thought is here carried out in all directions. The redeemed, who sing the hymn, begin with telling that they dwell in a strong city well provided with walls (ver. 1). But the gates of the city shall be open only to a righteous people that keepeth truth (ver. 2), as the salvation also which this city affords, the peace which is through faith, rests on the foundation of the faithfulness of God, who will just as surely never disappoint faith (vers. 3 and 4) as He has humbled the proud, unbelieving worldly power, and bowed it under the feet of the once despised believers (vers. 5 and 6). The righteous people, who dwell in the city, walk in righteous ways (ver. 7). But they long exceedingly to see the righteousness of God reveal itself free and unrestricted in all directions. Therefore they wait for the LORD in the way of His judgments (ver. 8). Only when the earth is visited by these judgments, do men learn righteousness (ver. 9). The wicked man, when favored, does not learn righteousness: he pursues his sinful course even in the land of virtue, and never comes to know the majesty of God (ver. 10).

2. In that day——enter in.—Vers. 1 and 2. By the expression in that day, what follows is marked as contemporaneous and homogeneous with xxv. 9-12. (Comp. "in that day," ver. 9). There the redeemed praise the person of their God. They rejoice that they have this LORD for their God. Here they extol the righteousness of their God and of His kingdom. The expression land of Judah is plainly employed to form an antithesis to Moab, xxv. 10 sqq. For not Zion or Jerusalem, but only Judah can stand contrasted with Moab, whether this name denotes country or people, or, as is most probable (comp. ver. 12), denotes both. At the same time it is self-evident that they who dwell in the land of Judah, are the same as those who according to xxiv. 23; xxv. 6, 7-10, are to be found on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, i. e., not merely the people of Judah in the ethnographical sense, but all those who according to xxv. 6 sqq., are called and entitled to partake of the great feast on Mount Zion, i. e., the entire Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικός. The hymn itself begins with a brief description of the city of God. יְשׁוּעָה יָשִׁית וגו׳. Very many interpreters understand that the Prophet here affirms that the city has no walls, but has instead of walls יְשׁוּעָה. Appeal is made to lx. 18 and to Zech. ii. 9 [E. V., ii. 5]. Comp. Ps. cxxv. 2. But it is said, Rev. xxi. 12, of the city of God, that it had "a wall great and high, and had twelve gates," etc. There would therefore exist a contradiction between the Apocalypse and the places that have been quoted from the Old Testament. But this contradiction disappears when we understand Isa. lx. 18 to mean: thou shalt give names to thy walls and gates, and designate thy walls by the name "Salvation," and thy gates by the name "Praise," (as e. g. the walls of Babylon had names: Imgur-Bel and Nivitti-bel. See Comment. on Jer. li. 58). The passage Zech. ii. 8 sq. is no more to be taken literally than Ps. cxxv. 2. But the Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. and xxii., is a quite definite locality, not merely ideal, but real, though spiritual, (pneumatisch-real). Therefore this latter Jerusalem has walls, while Jerusalem, as the spiritual mother that includes all nations (Gal. iv. 26; Zech. ii. 8 sq.), has no material, outward, visible walls. But in our place where the Prophet, as has been shown, distinguishes the land of Judah and the city belonging to it, we have first of all to think of that city spoken of in Rev. xxi. and xxii. This Jerusalem has a real wall. If this wall, according to lx. 18, bears the name Salvation, this can be the case only because it actually affords safety, deliverance. And therefore I take יְשׁוּעָה, as placed first, in apposition to חוֹמוֹת וָחֵל, or as the accusative predicate, although DELITZSCH rejects this construction. [The mode of construing this sentence proposed by our author I cannot assent to. He renders "God places walls and bulwark, for salvation or safety." This rendering is not so well recommended as that given in the E. V., and the thought thus expressed is incomparably less grand and exalted. This bald, prosaic translation is sought out in order to avoid a contradiction with the Apocalypse which speaks of the New Jerusalem as girt with a wall. But the Apocalypse is pre-eminently a symbolical book; and by taking its imagery in the literal sense, it could be easily shown not only to contradict statements of the Old Testament, but to be self-contradictory. E. G. According to Rev. xxi. 2 there is no temple in the New Jerusalem; but Ezekiel describes at large a temple that will be in it, and according to Rev. iii. 12 the believer will abide perpetually in the temple of the city of God. Is there then a contradiction here? No. But when in symbolical language it is said that there will be a temple in the New Jerusalem, the meaning is that what will answer to the idea of a temple will be found there. God's servants will dwell in His presence and continually worship Him. Symbolically a temple can be spoken of. But a material temple will be wanting in the holy city. So it can be said to have a sun which will never go down; and again, no sun will be seen there. So, too, the most perfect protection can be symbolized under the figure of a wall great and high; but the essential meaning of this statement (not a contradiction of it), is given when it is declared "Salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwark." The divine help is a better defence of the city than artificial fortifications. Verse 2 shows that the whole righteous nation will dwell within the strong city whose walls and bulwark are Salvation. The city is thus set forth as the abode of more than a portion of the inhabitants of the land of Judah. "The nations of them that are saved shall walk in the light of it," Rev. xxi. 24. The church, too, can exult in a strong city which she has even now, Ps. xlvi. 4, 5.—D. M.]. The words walls and bulwark are used together as here, Lam. ii. 8, (comp. 2 Sam. xx. 15). חל is the pomœrium, the outer circumvallation before the chief wall. Comp. Comment. on Lam. ii. 8 and Jer. li. 58.

3. Open ye—everlasting strength.—Vers. 2–4. These gates, according to lx. 11 and Rev. xxi. 25 are never shut. In Isa. lx. 11 it is said that they will always, night and day, stand open; but in Rev. xxi. it is said they will not be shut by day. But the latter statement is identical with the former; for there will be no night there, as is expressly declared in the Revelation. I do not think that ver. 2 is to be regarded as spoken by angels' voices, and that the city is to be supposed empty. It is not intended merely to express the first opening of the gates in order to admit inhabitants. The same persons who said "We have a city," say also "Open the gates," and they at the same time declare that they know what their city is intended to be according to the will of God. They know that there shall not enter into it anything that is common, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or a lie (Rev. xxi. 27; xxii. 14 sq.). This fundamental law of their city they here declare. The gates shall always stand open that a righteous nation that keepeth faith may go in. The words recall to mind Ps. xxiv. 7, 9 as they are reproduced in Ps. cxviii. 19, 20. גוי stands here not in an ethnographical, but in a rhetorical signification. It denotes a multitude of people, as e. g., Gen. xx. 4; Isa. xlix. 7. An essential part of the צְדָקָה of this righteous people is that it keeps faith. אמנים is found only here in Isaiah. Not a superficial, vacillating righteousness, but a righteousness having a firm foundation is required. For as God is a sure stronghold, a צוּר עוֹלָמִים in which we can confide, so He requires also a people that trusts firmly in Him, and cleaves to Him with a fidelity that cannot be shaken. אמנים therefore, as the Latin fides, signifies both faith and fidelity. Comp. i. 26. The LORD, on His part, offers as a firm formation, peace, peace (lvii. 19; xxvii. 5). יֵצֶר is a formation, frame. When it denotes a thought that is framed, then יֵצֶר is almost always united with מחשבות or לֵב (Gen. vi. 5; viii. 21; 1 Chr. xxviii. 9; xxix. 18). As יֵצֶר stands alone in our place, it signifies here what it means elsewhere when standing alone;—a thing framed of any kind (xxix. 16; Ps. ciii. 14; Hab. ii. 18). סָמוּךְ (Ps. cxi. 8; cxii. 8) is = established, firmly founded. As now in a city there are many artificial formations, things framed, both of a visible and invisible nature, as pillars, statues, buildings, contrivances, institutions, and such like, which serve partly for ornament, partly for use, so here peace is called a formation or thing framed which the LORD keeps on its firm foundation. The participle passive בָּטוּחַ is found further only in Ps. cxii. 7, where it is used as synonymous with נָכוֹן. We may take it in our place also as = confiding, confidently established (conglutinatum, copulatum ac tanquam concretum ac coagmentatum. FUERST). Peace is a structure that rests on a good foundation, because it is founded on the LORD. But the fact that peace objectively is founded on the LORD does not exclude the necessity for individuals subjectively to found themselves on the LORD, i. e., in faith to rely upon Him. On the contrary, he who does not subjectively yield Himself to the LORD in faith will not be partaker of the blessing of the objective salvation that has been constituted, established (John iii. 14 sqq.). Hence (ver. 4) the emphatic exhortation: "trust in the LORD," etc. [I cannot accept the interpretation of ver. 3 given by Dr. NAEGELSBACH. The best modern interpreters are substantially in accord with the E. V. The most literal translation of the verse that can be given is: "The mind stayed or supported (on Thee) Thou wilt keep (in) peace, peace, because it trusteth in Thee." Peace as an objective formation could not be said to trust in God, for it is not a living being possessed of will. This objection is fatal to the view wrought out so ingeniously and elaborately by our author.—D. M.] The abbreviation יָהּ standing alone is found in Isaiah besides here, xxxviii. 11. The combination forming a climax יָהּ יהוה occurs in Isaiah besides here only xii. 2. צור in the spiritual signification is found in Isaiah viii. 14; xvii. 10; xxx. 29; xliv. 8; li. 1. [This hallowed designation of the LORD, "Rock of Ages," is found as marginal rendering of what in the text of the E. V. is translated "everlasting strength." The rendering of the margin is literal and accurate. The expression "Rock of Ages" is found in the Bible in this place only."—D. M.]

4. For he bringeth——the needy.—Vers. 5 and 6. A pledge that the LORD will be the everlasting refuge of His people is seen by the Prophet in this, that the LORD has already humbled, cast down the worldly power. He expresses this partly in words which he repeats from xxv. 12. Those who dwell on high (xxxiii. 5, 16), the lofty city (comp. xi. 11, 17; xii. 4; xxx. 13), He has brought low [instead of the first verb being in the present tense, as in the E. V., it should be in the perfect]. The following imperfects (futures) express the permanent condition of humiliation in consequence of the overthrow. The Prophet depicts the endless duration of the humiliation by the repetition of the verb expressing it (Anadiplosis). The different forms of the pronominal suffix attached to the verb are an agreeable variation. The feet of those who had before been trodden in the dust by the violent foot of the worldly power now pass without danger over the city of the world which has been laid by God in the dust.

5. The way—majesty of the Lord.—Vers. 7–10. In vers. 3–6 the Prophet, in connection with אמנים had discussed the idea of the reciprocal fides implied in the life of the redeemed in communion with their God and in the city of God. In the following verses he discusses the idea of צַדִּיק, so that the words righteous nation that keepeth faith, ver. 2, appear as the theme on which the Prophet here enlarges. The people of God must before all be themselves righteous. They are such when their path is מֵישָׁרִים, which is here the subject, and means rectitudo, sinceritas. It forms the ground which serves the righteous as substratum of His walk, as the pathway of life. But the glory is due to God. For He it is who so levels (properly rolls, the Prophet had here in view Prov. iv. 26; v. 6, 21) the path (מַעְגָּל only here in Isaiah) of the righteous that it becomes יָשָׁר. The structure of the sentence forms a prolepsis similar to ver. 1. But in order that the idea of righteousness may attain its full realization in the world, it is necessary that the divine righteousness also should unfold itself freely and unconfined. The unrighteousness which reigns in the world must be judged, the holy nature of God must become manifest in its full splendor. And this manifestation of the holiness and righteousness of God forms an object of the most intense desire of the believers of the Old Testament. This desire finds expression in many Psalms, and the Prophet here again adopts quite the tone of the Psalms. We wait for thee in the way of thy judgments, means: We expect to see Thee march through the world as a righteous judge (comp. xl. 14; Prov. ii. 8; xvii. 23). This manifestation of justice is hoped for by the righteous, not for their own sake, but for the sake of the honor of God. Their desire, therefore, is to the name and remembrance (comp. Ex. iii. 15 and Ps. cxxxv. 13) of the LORD, i. e., that the LORD may so manifest Himself that men may be put in a position to call Him by the right name, and to spread and propagate the right knowledge of Him. But even for the sake of the world, i. e. of unrighteous men themselves, the Prophet most fervently longs for the full manifestation of the divine righteousness, which he here conceives of not exactly as that which destroys the ungodly, but rather as that which punishes them for their own profit (ver. 9). After having hitherto used the plural, the Prophet passes over into the singular, I desire, I seek. This can be explained only on the supposition that he here gives expression to a wish in which he personally was intensely interested. Was he not himself the object and perpetual witness of human injustice? He whom the question: How can God tolerate such injustice? and the wish that an end may soon be put to it, does not suffer to rest even in the night, is the Prophet himself rather than those who, dwelling already in the glorified city of God, have behind them the chief stages of the judgment of the world (xxiv.; xxv. 10 sqq.). We cannot ascribe this longing to carnal vindictiveness. In what follows the Prophet gives reasons for his desire in such a way as to show clearly to what an extent he transfers the actual necessities of the present time to that ideal future which he depicts. We have here another example of the Prophet's manner of representing the future with the materials which the present time supplies. The Prophet longs for the judgments of God, because he hopes that in proportion as the earth is visited by them, men will learn righteousness. We recognize here the teacher and preacher, who deeply laments that words produce but little impression, that facts which make themselves profoundly felt are necessary to bring men to the knowledge and practice of righteousness. In ver. 10 the Prophet declares that if judgments do not take place, if the wicked has favor shown him he does not learn righteousness (יֻחַן Hoph of חָנַן, only here in Isaiah; it occurs, Prov. xxi. 10. The conditional sentence is without the hypothetical particle, as is often the case). The wicked is not improved when favor is shown to him, but proceeds even when surrounded by the righteous (נְכֹחוֹת xxx. 10; comp. lvii. 2; lix. 14) to act perversely (עָוֵל, Piel in the causative sense, besides only Ps. lxxi. 4), and will never perceive the nature of God in all its glory and majesty (גֵּאוּת a word characteristic of Isaiah's writings, ix. 17; xii. 5; xxviii. 3: it occurs besides only Ps. xvii. 10; lxxxix. 10; xciii. 1). We must indeed acquit the Prophet of a low carnal desire of revenge, but I am decidedly of opinion that the passage, nevertheless, breathes the legal spirit of the Old Testament (comp. Matth. iii. 7; Luke iii. 7), and is not born of the Spirit whose children we are to be. [A corrective to this last observation is furnished in the Exposition, which well sets forth the motives which inspired the Prophet to desire God's judgments on the earth. Without them men will not learn righteousness. God's goodness is despised or made the occasion of licentiousness, if there is no clear demonstration by terrible things in righteousness, that verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth. If John the Baptist's words (Matth. iii. 7 and Luke iii. 7) are, like those of Isaiah, pronounced inconsistent with the Spirit of the New Testament, what shall be said of the words of our Saviour, Matt. xxiii. 33, and elsewhere? The desire that evil-doers should be punished, and that there should be a manifestation of the retributive justice of God, is not at variance with the Spirit of the Gospel, or that love of our enemies which Christ enjoined and exemplified, comp. Rev. vi. 10; xv. 4; xix. 1–2; 1 Cor. xvi. 22; 2 Thes. i. 6–10, etc.—D. M.].

6. THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD AND THE CONCLUDING ACTS OF THE JUDGMENT OF THE WORLD. CHAPTER XXVI. 11–21.

11 LORD, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see;
But* [a]they shall see, and be ashamed for their envy [1]at the people;
Yea, [b]the fire of thine enemies shall devour them.

12 Lord, thou wilt ordain peace for us:
For thou also hast wrought all our works [2]in us.
13 O Lord our God!
Other lords beside thee have had dominion over us:
But by thee only will we make mention of thy name.
14 They are dead, they shall not live;
They are [c]deceased, they shall not rise:
Therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them,
And made all their memory to perish.
15 Thou hast increased the nation, O Lord,
Thou hast increased the nation; thou art glorified:
[d]Thou hadst removed it far unto all the ends of the earth.
16 Lord, in trouble have they visited thee;
They poured out a [3]prayer when thy chastening was upon them.
17 Like as a woman with child, that draweth near the time of her delivery,
Is in pain, and crieth out in her pangs;
So have we been [e]in thy sight, O Lord.
18 We have been with child, we have been in pain,
We have as it were brought forth wind;
We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth;
Neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen.
19 Thy dead men shall live:
[f]Together with my dead body shall they arise.
Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust:
For thy dew is as the dew of [g]herbs,
And the earth shall cast out the dead.
20 Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers,
And shut thy doors about thee:
Hide thyself as it were for a little moment,
Until the indignation be overpast.
21 For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place
To punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity:
The earth also shall disclose her [4]blood,
And shall no more cover her slain.

[1] Or, toward thy people. [2] Or, for us. [3] Heb. secret speech. [4] Heb. bloods.

[a] they shall see to their shame thy zeal for the people. [b] fire shall devour them, thy enemies.
[c] Shades. [d] thou hast removed far all the borders of the land. [e] far from thy sight.
[f] my dead body shall arise. [g] lights.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 12. It is not inconceivable that תִּשְׁפֹּט stood here originally, and was changed through ignorance into תשפת. In that case שפט would include ideally the transitive notion of awarding, allotting by judicial sentence; and on this ideal transitive notion שלום לנו would depend. We are struck by the rare word שפת, while שפט is suggested by the context. [The correction of the text suggested is unnecessary.—D. M.].

Ver. 13. לְבַד stands here adverbially as Eccles. vii. 29. The normal form of expression would be בְּךָ לְבַדְּךָ (Ps. li. 6; Prov. v. 17).

Ver. 15. יסף is properly "to add." But the word is not rarely employed in the sense of "to increase," it being left to the reader to think either of that to which something is added, or of the addition which is made. Niphal נכבד is found besides here iii. 5; xxiii. 8, 9; xliii. 4; xlix. 5. Piel רִחַק vi. 12; xxix. 13.

Ver. 16. צָקוּן (on this form which is found besides only Deut. viii. 3, 16, comp. Olshausen Gr., § 226, p. 449), is = effundunt (besides here Job xxviii. 2; xxix. 6; xli. 14; Ps. xli. 9). Analogous is the Latin preces fundere (Virg. Aen. 6, 55) and יִשְׁפֹּךְ שִׂיחוֹ Ps. cii. 1.—מוסרך למו corresponds to בַּצַּר in the first half of the verse, and is best taken as a circumstantial clause with a verb to be supplied (comp. Ewald, § 341 a, p. 823). לָמוֹ as לְאָרֶץ ver. 9. Comp. liii. 8.—כְּמוֹ is here, as afterwards, ver. 18 a, conjunction (comp. xli. 25; Gen. xix. 15), and signifies not only in ver. 17, but also in ver. 18, if we examine thoroughly the construction, tanquam, like as (כַּאֲשֶׁר). In ver. 17 this is quite evident, for the construction is simple: As a woman with child is in pain, so were we far from Thee. [Or rather, so we were from Thy presence, i. e., our evil condition proceeded from Thee.—D. M.].

Ver. 18. The particle of comparison has the signification "quasi, as if."

Ver. 20. Instead of דְּלָתֶיךָ the K'eri reads דַּלְתְּךָ, undoubtedly because a chamber has only one דֶּלֶת, and not דְּלָתִים (דְּלָתֶךָ, moreover, is not derived from דֶּלֶת, but from a form דָּלָה which does not elsewhere occur). But both the assonance with חדריך and the anomalous nature of the form דְּלָתֶךָ speak in favor of דְּלָתֶיךָ. חֲבִי is a singular form. It can be derived only from חָבָה, which is not met with elsewhere: חָבָא is the form in use (in Isa. xlii. 22; xlix. 2). The appearance of the radical Yod is also strange (חֲבִי instead of חֲבֵה). If this חבי is to be regarded as a feminine form, this too would be singular; for all the parallel verbal and nominal forms are masculine. The expression כמעט־רגע is found only here and in Ezra ix. 8. Comp. Isa. liv. 7.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. A new wonderful scene of the great eschatological drama presents itself to the view of the Prophet: the resurrection of the dead! He introduces this revelation with three brief sentences addressed to Jehovah, each of them beginning with the name Jehovah. In the first sentence he expresses the thought that men do not perceive the hand of the LORD already lifted up for judgment. But they shall one day perceive it when God's zeal will display itself. But then they will be confounded, and fire will consume the adversaries (ver. 11). On the other hand, the Prophet expresses the assurance that the judgment of God will promote the peace of the godly, as their works are wrought by God Himself (ver. 12). The Prophet in the third place introduces us into that sphere to which he means to direct especially our attention in what follows. For even this sphere stands in the closest relation to the manifestation of God indicated in vers. 11 and 12. He characterizes this region, first in general, as one whose inhabitants in a certain sense are not under the dominion of God, but are in the power of another lord. [Other lords, it should be said. And the verb is in the past tense.—D. M.]. An abnormal condition! The persons here meant cannot praise God; for this can be done only when a man is united to God, when he is in Him (ver. 13). It is at once apparent from ver. 14 that the Prophet means the dead. According to the prevailing opinion the dead cannot live again. God Himself has destroyed and blotted out forever their remembrance (ver. 14). This realm of death goes on increasing; its borders are ever further removed (ver. 15). Yet the longing for deliverance is by no means extinct even in the dead: they seek the LORD, and their whispered prayer ascends to God from their place of trial (ver. 16). Yea, the world of the dead even make exertions to restore themselves to life, which efforts can be compared with the pangs of a woman in travail (ver. 17). But the result is useless: only wind is brought forth (ver. 18). Yet their hope is not disappointed. But only the dead who are the LORD's will rise to life. These are summoned to awake and rejoice. As a dew of luminous substances will it be, when the earth brings to the light the inhabitants of the world of shades (ver. 19). But the earth will restore not merely the bodies of the godly. She will bring to the light all the evil, especially all the blood-guiltiness which is buried in her bosom. This will be a terrible element of wrath and judgment. While this takes place, those who have risen from the dead are to conceal themselves. After a moment the wrath will be past, and then salvation and peace will reign forever (vers. 20, 21). [It is a strange and unique imagination of Dr. NAEGELSBACH, that the Prophet gives us in ver. 13, the language of the dwellers in Sheol; as it is most manifest that the speakers in ver. 12, continue in what follows their speech addressed to Jehovah. See how verse 13 begins like the two preceding verses with the name Jehovah. There is nothing to indicate the assumed change of speakers, or to make us suppose that the occupants of an inframundane region, an infernal limbus, suddenly and without a pause, take up the address to the Almighty, abruptly dropped by the ecclesia militans. The perfect tense, too, in ver. 13, may not be arbitrarily treated as the present, to accommodate the language to the author's theory. This earth, and not Sheol, is unquestionably the theatre of what is described in vers. 15-18. The prayer spoken of in ver. 16 comes not from the shades of the departed, but from the inhabitants of this world when God's judgments are in the earth (comp. ver. 9). It is a purely gratuitous assumption, involving, too, an anti-scriptural error, that a place of trial under the earth is the scene of the vain endeavors so graphically depicted in vers. 18 and 19. I append Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER's brief analysis of vers. 12-21. "The Church abjures the service of all other sovereigns, and vows perpetual devotion to Him by whom it has been delivered and restored (vers. 12-15). Her utter incapacity to save herself is then contrasted with God's power to restore His people to new life, with a joyful anticipation of which the song concludes (vers. 16-19). The additional sentences contain a beautiful and tender intimation of the trials which must be endured before these glorious events take place, with a solemn assurance that Jehovah is about to visit both His people and their enemies with chastisements (vers. 20, 21)."—D. M.].

2. LORD——thy name.—Vers. 11-13. The Prophet perceives the approach of great things, but men perceive nothing of them. He complains of this to the LORD. Thy hand is lifted up, says he, and they see it not. [The adverb "when" is unnecessarily supplied in the E. V. It is better to render literally "Thy hand is lifted up; they will not see" or "(but) they do not see it."—D. M.]. The uplifted hand is ready, and able to smite. The expression יָד רָמָה is found in the Pentateuch in more senses than one. May it not signify here the menacing high hand? According to Scripture great signs on earth and in heaven will precede the coming of the LORD (Matt. xxiv. 3, 8, 29), but the wicked will not give heed to these signs (Matt. xxiv. 37-39). They will not be willing to see the hand of God in them. But they will be forced to their confusion (ויבשו is a parenthetical clause marking a circumstance) to recognize the hand of God in the signs from the correspondence between them and the decisive facts following on them, when they shall have perceived the zeal, i. e., the strict, judging, and avenging righteousness of God (comp. ix. 6; xi. 13; xxxviii. 32; lxiii. 15) attesting itself on the people (comp. in regard to the construction, Ps. lxix. 10). [The expression קנאת עם made dependent in the E. V. on יבשו, and understood of the envy of the heathen toward the people of God, is rightly made dependent by our author on יחזו, and is also rightly understood of the zeal of the Lord of hosts (ix. 6: xxxvii. 32), but this zeal of the Lord is not directed against a people who are none of His, as Dr. Naegelsbach thinks, but is the zeal of the Lord for His own people.—D. M.]. The fire of this zeal will consume those men who could see, but would not see; will devour thy adversaries (צריך, prefixed apposition to the suffix in תאכלם). From the wicked, who to their dismay are surprised by the judgment of God, the Prophet turns to the pious who wait for the day of judgment as the day of their redemption (Luke xxi. 28). These express the confident assurance that the Lord will assign, prepare them peace on that great day. שָׁפַת, ponere, statuere, is found in Isaiah only here, comp. 2 Kings iv. 38; Ezek. xxiv. 3; Ps. xxii. 16. The righteous justly expect from the judgment the peace of God. For how could the righteous Judge award them aught else, seeing that He Himself has wrought their works? Instead of the second לָנוּ we should perhaps rather expect בָּנוּ; but the Prophet, who delights in significant accords in sound, chose undoubtedly to make a second לנו correspond to the first, in order to indicate thereby that the fruit of the judgment must correspond to the fruit of the life. The third sentence begins with יהוה אלהינו. The address is thus more forcible, and forms an antithesis to the subject and predicate of the sentence. Is it not a contradiction which cannot be maintained, when it must be said: Thou art indeed our God, but others rule over us? [But the perfect tense should not be treated as a present.—D. M.]. To understand אדנים of the worldly powers alone, which is the common view, seems to me quite too restricted, and not to correspond to the context. I translate בָּךְ "in thee" ["By thee," i. e., by thy power or help, is the common rendering.—D. M.]. The aim of ver. 13 is that of a general introduction into the region which is afterwards to be particularly spoken of. ["As to the lords who are mentioned in the first clause, there are two opinions. One is, that they are the Chaldees or Babylonians, under whom the Jews had been in bondage. This is now the current explanation. The other is, that they are the false gods or idols whom the Jews had served before the exile. Against the former and in favor of the latter supposition it may be suggested, first, that the Babylonian bondage did not hinder the Jews from mentioning Jehovah's name or praising Him; secondly, that the whole verse looks like a confession of their own fault and a promise of amendment, rather than a reminiscence of their sufferings; and thirdly, that there seems to be an obvious comparison between the worship of Jehovah as our, with some other worship and some other deity. . . . . . An additional argument in favor of the reference of the verse to spiritual rulers, is its exact correspondence with the singular fact in Jewish history, that since the Babylonish exile they have never even been suspected of idolatry." Alexander.—D. M.].

3. They are dead——ends of the earth.—Vers. 14-15. The Prophet proceeds now directly to the thought which he intends afterwards, ver. 19, to bring to light: the resurrection of the dead. But that the light of this wonderful divine revelation may shine more conspicuously he presents, as a foil to it, the opinion which had not been hitherto disputed, and which was supposed to be indisputable, viz., that the dead do not come to life again. [But what indication is given that the Prophet in the 14th verse means to relate an opinion said to prevail universally in regard to the impossibility of a resurrection of the dead? Why not rather understand this verse as a declaration that the other lords just spoken of should not merely cease to exist, but even to be remembered? The language used is applicable to the deities of an effete mythology once worshipped by Israel, as well as to the Babylonian and previous oppressors of Israel. In regard to the opinion which "hitherto has passed and even now passes in the whole world as incontrovertible truth, that there is no redemption from the bands of death," does not Hosea, an earlier Prophet than Isaiah, announce that death and Sheol should be deprived of their prey? Hos. xiii. 14. Isaiah himself, too, does not here for the first time make mention of the vanquishing of death. See xxv. 8; comp. Job. xix. 25-27.—D. M.]. For this very reason (לָכֵן=with reference to this, in so far. Comp. on Jer. v. 2; Isa. xxvii. 9) hast thou visited and destroyed them and made their memory to perish. Most interpreters understand verse 15 of the fall and resuscitation of the people of Israel. [And rightly do they so understand it. Few readers will assent to Dr. Naegelsbach's singular opinion that the land that is enlarged is the region of the dead. In the E. V. the last clause of verse 15 is rendered "thou hadst removed it far unto all the ends of the earth." But the words "it" and "unto" are not in the original text, and the pluperfect is not warranted. Omitting these additions and discarding the pluperfect, we have the rendering, "thou hast removed the ends of the land," i. e., extended the boundaries of the country. Thus we are told that extension of territory had been granted along with increase of population.—D. M.].

3. Lord in trouble——world fallen.—Vers. 16-18. But even in the realm of the dead the longing for life and the hope of regaining it are not extinguished. Even the dead in their distress seek the Lord, the fountain of all hope. ["Visit is here used in the unusual but natural sense of seeking God in supplication."—Alexander]. The prayer of the dead in a low whisper (לחש) ascends from their place of trial to the Lord. [If we take our theology from the book of Isaiah, there is no "place of trial" for the godly after this life. The righteous man when he dies enters into peace, lvii. 2. I need hardly state here that a purgatory, according to Roman Catholic doctrine, is not intended for unbelievers.—D. M.]. Verse 17 obviously supposes that a deliverance from Sheol is possible, and that the hope of this deliverance is not extinct in its occupants. This hope produces rather, according to the view of the Prophet, in the dwellers of Hades, a struggle and endeavor after liberation from prison which can be compared with the pains of child-bearing. But this impulse of hope remains unsatisfied so long as it is a merely natural one. I take מִפָּנֶיךָ not in the causal but in the local signification=far from (comp. xiv. 19; xxii. 3; Judg. ix. 21). Far from Jehovah, without vital union with Him, a dead man cannot raise himself to new life. [I prefer taking מִפָּנֶיךָ in the causal signification. The text runs—"So have we been" (הָיִינוּ), not "we are."—D. M.]. All convulsive efforts of the dead which aim at a new life are ineffectual. They are like bringing forth wind, the issue of an apparent pregnancy in consequence of the disease called empneumatosis (GESENIUS, DELITZSCH). The מֵתִים must learn by experience that without Jehovah they cannot bless (comp. on יְשׁוּעָה ver. 1) the land of their habitation, i. e., here, the earth (comp. afterwards תֵּבֵל), because, however convulsive their pangs may be, through them no inhabitants of the world (Ps. xxxiii. 8; Isa. xviii. 3; xxvi. 9; Nah. i. 5; Lam. iv. 12) will drop, i. e., no births to a new life will take place. נפל is used here and ver. 19 of the partus. Comp. the Greek πίπτειν, the Latin cadere, the German werfen (GES. Thes. p. 897). [This meaning of נפל is in my opinion more than doubtful. But what are we to think of the Shades in Hades striving to give birth to themselves, fruitlessly laboring to get back into the world, and this, not so much for the purpose of releasing themselves from their gloomy abode, as with a view to bless the world with new inhabitants, and to work deliverance or safety for it? Generous Shades! So self-forgetful amid their sufferings in Hades! The judicious reader may be left to make his own comments on this strange notion.—D. M.].

5. Thy dead—the dead.—Ver. 19. ["This verse is in the strongest contrast with the one before it. To the ineffectual efforts of the people to save themselves, he now opposes their actual deliverance by God."—ALEXANDER.]. The suffix of the first person in נְבֵלָתִי corresponds to the suffix of the second person in מֵתֶיךָ. נבלה (ver. 25) is never used in the plural. It is a collective word (comp. Lev. xi. 8, 11 sqq.; Jer. vii. 33; xvi. 4 et saepe). We have to refer the suffix of the first person to the Prophet who here speaks in the name of the church. It is he who after the disconsolate words of the Shades [?] speaks as the interpreter of Jehovah here (and afterwards vers. 20, 21) words of consolation, and in the spirit of prophecy utters the triumphant call to awake, which will one day be pronounced by a mightier voice that it may be fulfilled. שֹׁכְנֵי עָפָר only here, comp. xviii. 3. The words כי טל ונו graphically depict the thought expressed in what goes before. On the morning of the resurrection a wonderful dew will cover the earth. It is no more the earthly dew, it is a heavenly, a divine dew (therefore טַלֶּךָ). If even now the earthly dew, when the rays of the sun mirror themselves in it, sparkles like pearls, how resplendent will be the drops of that heavenly dew, every one of which will be a glorified luminous body, a body of the resurrection! The plural אוֹרֹת is found only here; for אֹרֹת 2 Kings iv. 39 is a quite different word [?]. אוֹרִים also occurs only once; Ps. cxxxvi. 7. The singular אוֹרָה is found Ps. cxxxix. 12; Est. viii. 16. That the signification "lights" suits the connection cannot be doubted. For the new resurrection life is a life in the light (John i. 4; viii. 12), and the δόξα of which our body, as σύμμορφον with the body of Christ, will partake (Phil. iii. 21) is in its nature light (Matt. xvii. 2). But whence come these forms of light which as heavenly dew-drops will on the morning of the resurrection shine on the surface of the earth? They have arisen, i. e., they come out of the earth in which they hitherto as רְפָאִים, as gloomy shades have dwelt. At the almighty word of the LORD the earth was forced to give up (cast out, ver. 18) these רפאים that had been hitherto regarded as a spoil that could not be snatched from it (ver. 14).

6. Come my people——her slain.—Vers. 20, 21. If we receive the simple natural impression made by the Prophet's representation, we must say that we are transported by these two verses into the time after the resurrection. [?] For what people can be addressed except that which according to ver. 19 has been awakened to new life? And why must this people after it had in Hades pined so long in suspense and anxiety, [?] conceal itself again after it had hardly come forth to the light? And why is it set forth as a characteristic mark of the time during which the people shall remain hidden, that in that time the earth shall disclose all the shed blood it had absorbed, and all corpses of the slain which it had concealed and kept? Is that not a clear reference to the time of the last judgment which brings everything to light and finishes everything? These are questions the answer to which was not known by the Prophet himself. It is the Apocalypse of the New Testament that first solves for us this riddle. It distinguishes a first and a second resurrection. And it makes the setting loose of Satan with the last assault on the city of God follow the first resurrection, after which there ensues the second general resurrection with the great universal judgment (Rev. xx.). [According to this exposition they who partake of the first resurrection were gloomy shades in misery till the earth cast them forth; and after having been raised from the dead they must hide themselves. But the dead in Christ were never shades in misery, and when they are raised, they shall be at once caught up to meet the LORD in the air and to be ever with Him. 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. The ingenuity displayed by our author in illustrating this passage of Isaiah from the Apocalypse is very striking.—D. M.]. What those chambers are into which the people should go (חֶדֶר only here in Isaiah) the Prophet does not explain. But when according to Rev. xx. 9 the παρεμβολὴ τῶν ἁγίων and the πόλις ἠγαπημένη is surrounded by enemies, I cannot doubt that the saints are enjoined during the short tribulation of the city to withdraw, and give themselves to solitary prayer in quiet expectation. At the same time this does not, I think, exclude the application of the counsel here given by the Prophet to all cases related to that final and highest storm of indignation as typical and preparatory events. Ver. 21 זַעַם a storm, storm of wrath, is a word which occurs not rarely in Isaiah; x. 5, 25; xiii. 5; xxx. 27. The storm is comparatively short, but in its intensity surpasses all others. For it comprehends according to Rev. xx. 9–15 nothing less than the overthrow of Satan, and the general judgment. Verse 21 answers to this exactly. If Jehovah rises from His place in order to visit the guilt of the inhabitants of the earth (יֹשֵׁב הָאָ׳ collectively) on them, and if the earth then discloses all hidden blood-guiltiness, this plainly enough indicates that that storm of wrath involves a work of judgment. The words "for, behold, the LORD cometh out of his place," are taken literally from Micah, i. 3 comp. Matt. xxv. 31; Rev. xx. 11. As counterpart to the blessed fruits, which the earth according to ver. 19 will bring forth, and at the same time as proof of the all-comprehensive character of the judgment, the slain and the blood that has been shed are specified as what the earth will on that day cause to come to light. The earth opened its mouth to receive the blood of Abel who was the first person slain (Gen. iv. 11). And since that time it has taken in all the blood that has been shed, and all the dead bodies of the slain; and preserves them faithfully for the day of judgment, when they shall come forth as incontrovertible witnesses against the guilty. In the book of the Revelation, too, it is expressly declared that the sea, and death, and Hades will disclose all their dead (Rev. xx. 13).

7. THE DOWNFALL OF THE WORLDLY POWERS AND ZION'S JOYFUL RESURRECTION. CHAPTER XXVII. 1–9.

1 IN that day the LORD with his [a]sore and great and strong sword,
Shall punish leviathan the [1b]piercing serpent,
Even leviathan, that crooked serpent;
And he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea.
2 In that day sing ye unto her,
A vineyard of red wine.
3 I the LORD do keep it;
I will water it every moment.
Lest any hurt it,
I will keep it night and day.
4 Fury is not in me;
Who [c]would set the briers and thorns against me in battle?
I would [2]go through them,
I would burn them together.
5 Or let him take hold of my strength,
That he may make peace with me;
And he shall make peace with me.
6 [d]He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root:
Israel shall blossom and bud,
And fill the face of the world with fruit.
7 Hath he smitten him, [3]as he smote those that smote him?
Or is he slain according to the slaughter of them that are slain by him?
8 In measure, [4]when it shooteth forth, thou wilt debate with it;
[5e]He stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind.
9 By this, therefore, shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged;
And this is all the fruit to take away his sin;
When he maketh all the stones of the altar
As [f]chalkstones that are beaten in sunder,
The [g]groves and [6]images shall not stand up.

[1] Or, crossing like a bar. [2] Or, march against. [3] Heb. according to the stroke of those.
[4] Or, when thou sendest it forth. [5] Or, when he removeth it. [6] Or, sun-images.

[a] hard. [b] fleeing. [c] will set.
[d] In coming days will Jacob take root. [e] he bloweth with his rough blast. [f] stones of mortar.
[g] images of Ashtoreth.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2. On the authority of the Septuagint (ἀμπελὼν καλὸς ἐπιθύμημα), of the Targum (vinea plantata in terra bona), and of many codices and editions, many interpreters read חֶמֶד, which finds support in כַּרְמֵי־חֶמֶד, Amos v. 11, and שְׂדֵי חֶמֶד, Isa. xxxii. 12. Comp. v. 7; Jer. iii. 19. Although חמר is the more difficult reading, חֶמֶד is perhaps to be preferred here. For what does כרם חמר mean? [But compare גֶּפֶן הַיַּיִן, Numb. vi. 4; Jud. xiii. 14, and such phrases as a mine of wealth, a well of water. Though Dr. Naegelsbach follows most modern commentators in preferring the reading חמד, there is no necessity for altering here the common text of the Hebrew Bible.—D. M.]. If the supposition be made that כֶּרֶם denotes a plantation in general, and כֶּרֶם זַיִת, Judg. xv. 5, be appealed to, still כרם alone denotes a vineyard in so many places that the addition חמר appears pleonastic. [But this objection would equally avail against such an expression as a spring of water.—D. M.]. It cannot be proved that חמר denotes a nobler kind of wine. I prefer therefore, with Drechsler and Delitzsch, and many older interpreters, to read חֶמֶד.

Ver. 5. Drechsler is in error in thinking that יַעֲשֶׂה cannot be taken as jussive. Comp. Naegelsbach, § 90, 3, c.

Ver. 6. הִשְׁרִישׁ radices agere (Job v. 3; Ps. lxxx. 10) is denominative from שֹׁרֶשׁ (comp. xlviii. 24).

Ver. 8. The word בְּסַאסְּאָה is best derived from סְאָה mensura, so that the word is contracted from בִּסְאָה סְאָה. Dagesh forte in the second ס arises from the assimilation of the ה, while the first א has completely lost its power as a consonant. Compare לִקְרַאת for לִקְרֹאת, חַטַּאת for חַטְּאַת.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. If we consider that vers. 1, 10 and 11 of this chapter are directed against the worldly power, while vers. 2-9, and 12, 13, contain words of comfort for Israel, we ascertain that the chapter is divided into two principal parts, each of which again consists of two subdivisions which correspond to one another. The Prophet sees here also the salvation of Israel set off by the foil of the judgment inflicted on the heathen worldly power. If we connect, as many do, ver. 1 with chap. xxvi. we destroy the beautiful parallelism of chapter xxvii., violate the principle of the number two, which dominates chaps. xxiv.—xxvii., and bring ver. 1 into a connection to which it does not belong. For after the words in xxvi. 21, which are of so general a character, chap. xxvii. would not follow naturally; and is not xxvii. 1, by the formula in that day, even as manifestly separated from xxvi. 21 as it is connected thereby with xxvii. 2? As chapter xxv. is related to chapter xxiv., so is chap. xxvii. related to chap. xxvi. As in chap. xxv. Mount Zion emerges from the all-embracing scenes of judgment as the only place of salvation and peace, so the leading thought in chap. xxvii. is seen to be Israel's victory over its enemies, the worldly powers, and its deliverance from their grasp, in order, as a united people, to partake of salvation on Mount Zion. The Prophet in xxv. 10 sqq., set forth the worldly powers under the name of Moab, and he now gives a different emblematic representation of them. He exhibits them under the form of beasts as the straight and the coiled Leviathan, and as the crocodile. Of all these he declares that they will be vanquished by the mighty sword of Jehovah (ver. 1). A call is at the same time made by him to begin a hymn regarding Israel, as he himself had already done, xxv. 1 sqq. (ver. 2). In this hymn Jehovah Himself is introduced as the Speaker. He declares that He will faithfully protect and tend Israel as His vineyard (ver. 3). And if hostile powers, like thorns and thistles, should desire again to injure the vineyard, He will terribly intervene, and burn them up (verse 4): unless they make peace with Him by humble and believing submission under His might (5). Israel shall accordingly in the distant future take root, blossom and bud, and fill the earth with its fruits (ver. 6). That the prospect of such a glorious future is disclosed to Israel ought not to seem strange. Think how the Lord has hitherto treated Israel. It has never been exposed to such destructive strokes as its enemies (ver. 7). The Lord metes out punishment to Israel in spoonfuls, not by the bushel, punishing it only by temporary rejection when He makes His breath pass over the land like a blast of the east wind (ver. 8). And by these very chastisements Israel's guilt is purged, and Israel reaps then the blessed fruit, that the stones of the altars of its false gods are become as lime-stones that are crushed and cast away, and that therefore the images of Ashtoreth and of the sun will stand up no more (ver. 9).

2. In that day——in the sea.—Ver. 1. The expression in that day indicates here too that what is introduced by this formula belongs to the same stage of the world's history as what precedes. The Prophet freely uses the verb פקד in these chapters of punitive visitation: xxiv. 21; xxvi. 14, 21; xxvii. 3. That יפקד here is connected with לפקד, xxvi. 21, may be readily admitted. For truly the visitation spoken of in xxvii. 1 is a part, yea, the chief part of that universal one which has for its object, according to xxvi. 21, the whole population of the earth. But I cannot concede that the visitation xxvii. 1 is absolutely identical with the one threatened in xxvi. 21. For, as has been shown above, chap. xxvii. is not of so general a character as chap. xxvi. And the formula in that day points to a difference as well as to contemporaneousness. In xxvii. 1 that part of the judgment is prominently set forth which has respect to the great worldly powers that are the immediate oppressors of Israel, as chaps. xxv. and xxvii. have for their subject the singular position of Israel in the general judgment indicated by בהר ציון ובירושלים (xxiv. 23 comp. xxv. 6) or בהר הקדש בירושלים (xxvii. 13). The sword of Jehovah, symbol of His power that destroys everything opposed to it, is after the original passage, Deut. xxxii. 41 sq., often mentioned; Ps. vii. 13; xvii. 13; Isa. xxxiv. 5, 6; lxvi. 16; Jer. xii. 12; xlvii. 6. This sword with which the LORD will annihilate the enemies of Israel is described as hard in respect to its material, great in regard to its length, and strong with reference to its irresistible action. These enemies of Israel are represented under the image of monstrous beasts. This form of expression is based on views which pervade the divine revelation of the Old and New Testament. Comp. Ps. lxviii. 31; lxxiv. 13; Dan. vii. 3 sqq.; viii. 3 sqq.; Rev. xii. 3 sqq.; xiii. 1 sqq. The kingdom of God is human (Dan. vii. 13 sqq.), the worldly power is animal, brutal, heartless, cruel. Here, first of all, the question arises whether merely earthly powers of the world are meant, and not rather powers of heaven and of the world as xxiv. 21. In support of the view that the two Leviathans mentioned in this verse are powers of heaven, appeal is made to Job xxvi. 13, where certainly נחש בריח is mentioned as a constellation. Hence the conclusion is drawn that also נחש עקלתון is a constellation (HITZIG, HENDEWERK, DRECHSLER). But the whole structure of these four chapters proves that powers of heaven cannot be here in question. For our chapter stands parallel to chap. xxv., and treats of the peculiar position of Israel in opposition to the worldly power. But in chap. xxv. the worldly power is represented by what is of the earth, by the personified Moab. Here there is a climax, while three animal forms, placed at the commencement of the discourse, take the part of Moab, which is there placed at the close. Moreover, in this passage, נחש בריח and נחש עקלתון are not the leading terms. But these designations only define more particularly the term Leviathan. The case would be different if the latter term were wanting, and the Prophet spoke only of נחש ב׳ and נחש ע׳. As our text runs, we can only say that the Prophet has in view two powers that in their nature are closely related, nay essentially alike, for which reason he designates both of them by the name Leviathan.—They have, however, their individual peculiarities, wherefore he more particularly defines the one as the fleeing serpent and the other as the coiled serpent. The predicate "fleeing serpent" is manifestly borrowed from Job xxvi. 13, as we have already observed manifold traces of the use of the book of Job in Isaiah (comp. on xiv. 30; xvii. 2; xxi. 4; xxii. 2, 4, 22, 24; xxiii. 12; xxv. 2). The expression נחש בריח denotes in Job, as is on all hands admitted, a constellation or appearance in the heavens, although the learned still dispute whether it is the dragon, or the milky way, or the scorpion, or the rainbow (comp. LEYRER in HERZOG's R. Ency. XIX., p. 565). Isaiah, however, found the expression in its literal signification fit to be appended as an apposition to the term Leviathan. This is apparent, because Leviathan nowhere else denotes a constellation, and the second apposition נחש עקלתון occurs in no other place as the name of a constellation. The question then is, what is the proper meaning of נחש בריח? That נחש denotes a serpent, is undoubted. The word is found in this signification in Isaiah xiv. 29; lxv. 25. But בריח which, besides here and Job xxvi. 13, occurs only Isa. xliii. 14, can according to its etymology (בָּרַח fugere) have only the meaning "fleeing." A נחש בריח is therefore a serpent which at full stretch flees away in haste. In opposition to it נחש עקלתון is a crooked, coiled serpent. The word עקלתון is ἅπ. λεγ. The radix עקל occurs besides only in מְעֻקָּל (Hab. i. 4 jus perversum) and in עֲקַלְקַלּוֹת tortuosa, crookednesses, crooked ways (Judges v. 6; Ps. cxxv. 5). לִוְיָתָן is a poetic symbolical generic name which is sometimes given to the Crocodile (Job xl. 25; Ps. lxxiv. 14), sometimes to other monsters of the deep (Job iii. 8; Ps. civ. 26). With such a bellua aquatica the two worldly powers are here compared in such a way that each is placed in parallel with a species of this genus. For it is plain that two powers are compared with two species of the genus Leviathan, the one with one species, and the other with another species; and that a third power is compared with the תַּנִּין. The sword is a single one. It is only once mentioned, and is the subject common to three predicates. But the Leviathan is twice named, each time with a different specifying word. And that the Prophet understands under the תנין a third hostile power is evident from his not putting this term in apposition to the term Leviathan. When afterwards, vers. 12 and 13, the land of the Euphrates, Assyria and Egypt are expressly designated as the countries from which redeemed Israel will return home, is not this to be regarded as a consequence of the LORD having according to ver. 1 crushed these hostile powers and so compelled them to let Israel go free? It has been further observed that תַּנִּין denotes Egypt, li. 9 (the only place beside this one where it occurs in Isaiah); Ezek. xxix. 3; xxxii. 2; Ps. lxxiv. 13. The word is in meaning, though not in etymology, closely connected with the term Leviathan. Now if these places where תנין is used in reference to Egypt are borrowed from the one before us, they certainly bear witness to an ancient and indisputable interpretation. We are, therefore, fully justified in understanding Egypt to be denoted by the dragon that is in the sea (regarding יָם comp. xviii. 2; xix. 5; xxi. 1). But if the תַּנִּין denotes Egypt, then the Leviathan, the fleeing serpent, must be the land of the Tigris, i. e., Assyria, for the serpent shooting quickly along is an apt emblem of the rapid Tigris, which name, according to the testimony of the ancients (STRABO XI. p. 527; CURT. VI. 36), means an arrow. In the Persian and Kurdish Tîr denotes both an arrow and the Tigris (comp. GESEN., Thes., p. 448). In regard to the windings of the Euphrates HERODOTUS speaks (I., 185) and relates that in sailing down the river, Arderikka, a place situated on it, is passed by three times in three days. Might not Jeremiah (l. 17) have had this passage before his mind in writing: "first the king of Assyria ate him, and last this Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, hath crushed his bones?" Assyria, the power that rushed straight upon Israel, laid hold of him with its teeth. But it tore off as it were only pieces of his flesh, inflicted flesh wounds. But Babylon has as the Boa Constrictor enfolded Israel in the coils of his powerful body and crushed his bones. Comp. NAEGELSBACH on Jer. l. 17. That Isaiah had Babylon before his mind is just as possible here as xxi. 1–10. Both places are to be similarly explained.

3. In that day——wine.—Ver. 2. While the worldly powers are annihilated, Israel is elevated to high joy and honor. The Prophet announces this for the comfort of his people in a hymn which is parallel to the hymn xxv. 1–5. This hymn is peculiar in its structure, as it consists of brief members formed of only two words. It is true that many members of it consist of three or four words. But two constitute always the leading ideas; what is over and above, may be said to be accessory ideas which are only grammatically indispensable. In ver. 4 in the line מי־יתנני שמיר שית the first two and the last two words form each one principal notion. The two chief sentences, verses 3 and 4, contain each four such members or lines consisting of two ideas; the introduction (ver. 2) and the close (ver. 5) each contain three of them. The principle of duality is here carried out in such a way that the whole consists of six times two, and eight times two, consequently, of 28 members. That the introduction and close have each only three times two members, imparts to the whole the charm of a sort of crescendo and decrescendo. Ver. 2 does not properly belong to the song itself. For it contains only the theme and the summons to celebrate it in song. But it is rhythmically constructed as the song itself, and rhythmically regarded, it is a part of the song. The words כרם חמר form the title prefixed absolutely (comp. הַבָּאִים ver. 6). Israel is compared with a vineyard as in v. 1 sqq. But there is this difference, that in v. 1 sqq. Israel appears as a vineyard consigned to destruction as a punishment; here it is a vineyard faithfully protected and tended. חֶמֶר is found only here and Deut. xxxii. 14. That the word denotes wine is certain; but it is doubtful how this meaning is reached whether ab effervescendo (from fermenting) or a rubedine. [The analogy of the cognate Arabic and Syriac supports the former of these derivations, which is the one commonly adopted by modern scholars. —D. M.]. ענו לה is not to be joined with ביום ההוא. For this date plainly refers to all that follows, and ענו לה are not words of the Prophet, but words which people at that day will call out to one another. ל after ענה in the signification "in reference to" as Num. xxi. 17; 1 Sam. xxi. 12; xxix. 5; Ps. cxlvii. 7.

4. I the LORD——peace with me.—Vers. 3–5. The Prophet by putting into the mouth of the people a song in which Jehovah Himself as speaker gives glorious promises to the people, intimates that the people may regard these promises as their own certain possession. For they belong to them as those who publish them, and they are sure to them, because they proclaim them as verba ipsissima of Jehovah. The LORD promises now that He will keep His vineyard and abundantly water it (לרגעים every moment as לבקרים which two expressions stand together Job vii. 18. Comp. Isa. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxiii. 14 et saepe) yea watch it night and day, that it may not be visited by an enemy (פקד with על which elsewhere denotes a visitation for punishment, comp. Hos. xii. 3; Jer. ix. 24 sq., seems to stand here in the sense of, פָּגַע ,פָּגַשׁ. The fury (חֵמָה here for the first time comp. xxxiv. 2; xlii. 25; li. 13, 17, 20, 22 et saepe in the second part of Isaiah), which the LORD formerly felt and manifested toward His vineyard Israel (ver. 5 sqq.), no longer exists. Nay more, thorns and thistles, which the LORD according to ver. 6 would for a punishment let grow up in the old vineyard, He wishes now to be set before Him in order to show by destroying them the zeal of His love for the renewed vineyard. Thorns and thistles, which grow from the soil of the vineyard itself, are, in opposition to the wild beasts which break in from without, symbols of internal decay, symptoms of the germs of evil still existing in the vineyard itself. Here external foes are not expressly mentioned as in chap. v., and we have therefore to understand here under thorns and thistles everything which could set itself against the nature and purpose of the vineyard. [But does not the expression בַּמִּלְחָמָה point rather to external enemies of the Church as denoted under the symbols of briers and thorns? D. M.]. The asyndeton briers, thorns, is explained by the lively emotion of the Prophet (comp. xxxii. 13). מי יתנני (only here in Isaiah, comp. Job xxix. 2; Jer. ix. 1) is a formula expressive of a wish. The suffix has here a dative sense. במלחמה is connected by the Masoretes with what precedes, but it belongs necessarily to what follows, as KNOBEL and DELITZSCH have perceived. With war, i. e., with martial impetuosity, would the LORD stride in (פשׂע gradiri, ingredi only here, substantives derived from it 1 Sam. xx. 3; 1 Chron. xix. 4) against them (בָּהּ the feminine suffix refers to the nouns שָׁמִיר שַׁיִת, and is to be taken in a neuter sense, as afterwards the suffix in אציתנה) and burn up the bushes all altogether הֵצִית for הִצִּית only here. When in ver. 5 the LORD speaks of people before whom the alternative is placed, either to be overcome by the storm of war just mentioned, or (או as conjunction with omitted כִּי comp. Exod. xxi. 36; 2 Sam. xviii. 13 comp. Lev. xiii. 16, 24) to lay hold of the protection of Jehovah (החזק בְּ iv. 1; 1 Kings i. 50; מעוז defence, protection, xvii. 9, 10; xxiii. 4, 11, 14; xxv. 4; xxx. 3) and to make peace with Him (Josh. ix. 15), we perceive that He thinks of such among the people for whom there is a possibility of repentance and salvation. From this possibility even the external enemies of the theocracy are not excluded (ii. 3; xxv. 6 sqq.), but to Israel it appertains pre-eminently. This is another reason for supposing that under the thorns and thistles (ver. 4) internal enemies arising out of Israel are to be understood. The taking hold of protection is a subordinate matter, involving merely passive submission and endeavor after safety. But in the making of peace with God there is something higher, positive yielding of one's self to him, union with Him.

To the last thought peculiar weight and emphasis is given by its repetition with שלום the chief term placed first. The close of the song is thus at the same time fitly intimated.

5. He shall cause——with fruit.—Ver. 6. The cessation of a uniform rhythm shows that the language of prose is resumed. But what is now said is in sense closely connected with the song, the thoughts of which it explains and completes. For it sounds as the solution of a riddle (comp. ver. 7), when it is now explicitly stated that Israel is the vineyard of the LORD; at the same time the fruit of the vineyard is described as glorious, and spreading far and wide. [DR. NAEGELSBACH's translation of the first clause: "In the coming days Jacob shall take root" is adopted by the best modern scholars, and is much more natural and accurate than the rendering of the Eng. ver.: "He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root." The sense of causing to take root is foreign to the form of the verb employed, and the order of the words will not admit of the translation those that come of Israel.—D M.] הבאים supply יָמִים, comp. e. g., יָמִים בָּאִים Jer. vii. 32; Eccles. ii. 6 and אֹתִיּוֹת res futurae chap. xli. 23; xliv. 7. The accusative marks the duration of time. The names Jacob and Israel designate sometimes the whole people (chaps. 2, 3, 5, 6 and seqq.), sometimes the northern kingdom in particular (ix. 7). Here, however, it seems as if the Prophet by the use of the two names intended to designate the entire people by its two halves. In favor of this view is the plural מלאו, as only the singular would have been requisite, as in the verbal forms יציץ, פרח, ישרש. That יציץ (only here in Isaiah) stands before פרח (germinare, sprout. comp. xvii. 11; xxxv. 1, 2; lxvi. 14) is not to be pressed. We too, can say "blossom and bud" or "bud and blossom." At most we might say that the Prophet wished to put the blossom first as the higher of the two. The fruit (תנובה proventus, produce of fruit, only here in Isaiah) will be in such abundance that the whole earth will be filled with it (xxxvii. 31). Israel will then, when the judgment shall have destroyed the worldly powers and the heathen, be all in all. For mount Zion and Jerusalem shall stand, even if heaven and earth should perish.

6. Hath he smitten—stand up.—Vers. 7-9. The declaration that Israel will continue, even if all the rest of the world should be swallowed up by the floods of judgment, is so bold as to require a particular justification. This is given by the Prophet while he shows from history how the LORD always distinguished Israel, and even when He smote him, never smote him as his enemies. (Comp. x. 24 sqq.). Therefore he asks, verse 7: has Jehovah, his God, smitten him, namely Israel, with the stroke of his smiter (מַכֵּה as x. 26; xiv. 7; xxx. 26; מַכֵּהוּ (comp. ix. 12; x. 20; xiv. 29) i. e., even so hard as He smote those who smote Israel? Or has he ever been so slain as the enemies of the theocracy that were slain by him (Israel)? הֶרֶג in Isaiah besides xxx. 25. Part. הרוגים in Isaiah only here and xxvi. 21. הֹרַג Pual only here and Ps. xliv. 23. The meaning is: Israel has never suffered complete destruction. Turning to address the LORD Himself the Prophet continues: In small measure by sending her away thou punishest her. The connection requires the signification mensura. Reference is rightly made to Jer. x. 24; xxx. 11 (xlvi. 28), where לְמִשְׁפָּט is used in a like sense. KNOBEL objects that סאה does not signify measure in general, but a definite measure, and the figurative use of it would be as hard as if we should say: to punish one by the quart. סְאָה is by all means a definite measure of grain, and according to the statements of the ancients, the third part of an ephah. But this signification suits admirably, The translation in measure is of course not literal. It should be: with the measure of a seah by putting away thou punishest her. The meaning accordingly is that the LORD ordains only a small measureful of punishment for Israel. The antithesis to this is then a large measure which causes destruction. The expression "small measure" involves necessarily the idea of clemency. HITZIG, EWALD and KNOBEL propose to read בְּסַאסְאָהּ Inf. Pilp. from סוא=זוּעַ—by his disquietude. But this thought, apart from the artificial etymology, does not suit the context. It appears to me that this בסאסאה was a popular and familiar expression. At all events, it occurs in the language of Scripture only here. The feminine suffix in the last two words shows that the Prophet, in accordance with the notion of "putting away," thinks of Israel as a wife. ריב stands here with accusative of the person in a signification in which it is commonly construed with one of the prepositions אֶל, עִם or בְּ, namely = altercari, to contend, dispute with, punish. However, this construction with the accusative is found elsewhere: xlix. 25; Deut. xxxiii. 8; Job x. 2; Hos. iv. 4. The imperfect (future) is not used to express repetition in the past; for the Prophet cannot yet say that Israel's exile has terminated. Israel is to-day still in exile. The imperfect rather marks the still uncompleted, enduring fact. That the second person imperfect is used, while before and afterwards Jehovah is spoken of in the third person, has, apart from the ease with which in Hebrew the person is changed, its reason perhaps in this, that the Prophet wishes to make the three words of this clause which are like one another in respect to the ending and number of the consonantal sounds, as conformable to one another as possible in their initial sounds also. For Tau is certainly more nearly related to the S-sounds with which the preceding words begin, than Yod. Lexicographers and interpreters are inclined to regard הָגָה as an independent verbal stem, to which they ascribe the meaning "amovere, separare, to sift," which is supposed to occur only here and Prov. xxv. 4, 5. I believe that our הגה is identical with the הגה that occurs so frequently. The word is clearly onomatopoetic, and its radical meaning is "to breathe;" and it means that kind of breathing which consists in a strong ejection of air through the throat. The sound that is thus produced corresponds to the rough guttural sound of the roaring lion (xxxi. 4), to the noise of thunder (Job xxxvii. 2), to the moaning of a dove (xxxviii. 14), to the muttering of conjurers (viii. 19), and to the sighing of a man (xvi. 7), and is also the physical basis for human speech, whether this be a speaking with others or a speaking with one's self under profound emotion (meditari). Even in Prov. xxv. 4 sq. this signification holds. "Breathe (blow) the dross from the silver" is what we read there. This means, we are to remove by blowing the impure ingredients that swim on the surface of the molten silver. And so (Prov. xxv. 5) the court is to be purified from the hurtful presence of a wicked man, he is to be blown away as scum upon molten silver. In our place, too, הָגָה is simply "to breathe." He breathes with his rough breath in the day of the east wind means nothing else than: God blows Israel away out of his land by sending, like the storm of an east wind, His breath with great force over the land. The thought involved in שלחה is once more expressed by an image. The Prophet knows that exile is the severest punishment which Jehovah inflicts on His people. Whether it was the case that Isaiah had already witnessed the carrying away of the ten tribes, or that passages of the Pentateuch which threaten the punishment of exile were present to him (Deut. iv. 27 sq.; xxviii. 36, 63 sqq.; xxix. 28), he certainly means that Jehovah does not exterminate His people as He, e. g., exterminated the Canaanites, but that He inflicts on them as the maximum of punishment only temporary exile. The use of the perfect הָגָה is then quite normal, in order to describe further a matter contained in the principal sentence (שלחה). The expression רוח קשה does not elsewhere occur. But Isaiah does speak of a אֲדֹנִים קָשֶׁה xix. 4, of a חָזוּת קָשָׁה xxi. 2, of עֲבֹדָה קָשָׁה xiv. 3, of a חֶרֶב קָשָׁה ver. 1. A mighty political catastrophe which would purify the land is here compared with a stormy wind, or east wind, the most violent wind known in Palestine (Job xxvii. 21; Hos. xiii. 15, which place was perhaps before the mind of the Prophet; Jon. iv. 8; Ezek. xvii. 10; xix. 12); and this wind is marked as רוּחַ יהוה as a breath proceeding from the mouth of God; wind being frequently in the O. T. described as God's breath, or God's breath being described as wind (Ex. xv. 8; Job iv. 9; xv. 30; Hos. xiii. 15; Isaiah xl. 7; lix. 19). As a violent tempest causes much damage, but at the same time does much good by its purifying influence, so this punishment of expulsion from the land is so far from being intended for the destruction of Israel, that the salvation of Israel arises from it. For just thereby (לָכֵן as xxvi. 14; Jer. v. 2) the guilt of Jacob is expiated (covered comp. xxii. 14). The words by this, therefore, are to be taken together, and point with emphasis backwards. בזאת cannot be referred to the following בשומו, because atonement is not made for Israel by this שום וגו׳, but on the contrary, this שום וגו׳ is the fruit of the expiation. By this expiatory punishment Israel is made partaker of great blessing. The LORD knows how to make good come out of evil (Gen. l. 20). The expiation, i. e., the removal of guilt has the effect that Israel thereby becomes free also from the power and dominion of sin. [יְכֻפַּר, though it strictly means shall be atoned for, is here metonymically used to denote the effect and not the cause, purification and not expiation. In the very same way it is applied to the cleansing of inanimate objects. ALEXANDER.—D. M.]. זֶה refers to פְּרִי and what follows. All fruit of the forgiveness of sin, consequently all sanctification concentrates itself in Israel's keeping now the first and greatest commandment, and in definitively renouncing idolatry. זֶה is not, however, the demonstrative pronoun, but is to be taken adverbially; this word, as is well known, possessing the two significations this and there. Hence the construction בְּשׂוּמוֹ (not שׂוּמוֹ) can follow. Comp. עֲלוּ זֶה בַּנֶּגֶב Num. xiii. 17. Israel by so dashing in pieces all the stones of their idolatrous altars, that they can no longer serve for places of worship for Ashtoreth and images of the sun, exhibits the fruit of the expiation that has been rendered and of the forgiveness that has been received. גִּר (ἁπ. λεγ.) is lime, אבני גִר are not lime-stones, in the mineralogical sense, but stones in a wall which are covered with lime, mortar [?]. כִנפצות, (comp. xi. 12; xxxiii. 3) are the same stones, when they, in consequence of the destruction of the wall which they formed, lie broken in pieces. This shall happen to the stones of the idolatrous altars, and they will in consequence no longer serve as pedestals on which images of Ashtoreth and of the sun (comp. on xvii. 8) stand up.

8. THE DESTRUCTION OF THE WORLDLY CITY AND ISRAEL'S JOYFUL RESTORATION. CHAPTER XXVII. 10-13.

10 ªYet the defenced city shall be desolate,
And the habitation forsaken, and left like a wilderness:
There shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down,
And consume the branches thereof.
11 When the boughs thereof are withered, they shall be broken off:
The women come and set them on fire:
For it is a people of no understanding;

Therefore he that made them will not have mercy on them,
And he that formed them will show them no favor.
12 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the LORD shall beat off
From the [b]channel of the river unto the stream of Egypt,
And ye shall be gathered one by one,
O ye children of Israel.
13 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the great trumpet shall be blown,
And they shall come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria,
And the outcasts in the land of Egypt,
And shall worship the LORD in the holy mount at Jerusalem.

[a] For. [b] ear of corn.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10. בדד (only here in Isaiah) is an adverb, or substantive used adverbially. It might also be לְבָדָד (comp. Numb. xxiii. 9; Micah vii. 14). That an adverb can be the predicate is well known.

Ver. 12. לְאַחַד אֶחָד, i. e., to one one, to one which is one and nothing else, wholly one. This combination occurs only here (for Eccles. vii. 27 is different). אַחַד is the form of the construct state, and can be treated here as such; for the construct state marks in appositional relations nothing but the closest connection (NAEGELSBACH Gr., § 64, 1). [To one one, i. e., one to the other, to mark careful attention to each individual, and to express the idea that all will be gathered together and without exception.—D. M.].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet again draws on a dark background the picture of the worldly power. He had represented it, ver. 1, in the form of beasts; here, as already (xxiv. 10–12; xxv. 2, 3, 12; xxvi. 5), the great city of the world, the centre of the worldly power, is made to appear. He depicts it as a desolate forsaken place, overgrown with bushes, whose tender branches the calves eat off, whose withered twigs women gather for fuel. This pitiable lot is the punishment of their folly (vers. 10 and 11). Quite different is the case with Israel. This people finds grace in the eyes of its LORD. Out of the sheaves of the nations, which shall be gathered in the day of judgment, all the ears that belong to Israel shall be separated, and bound together (ver. 12). And when the great trumpet sounds, all the Israelites lost and scattered in the lands of the heathen, shall return home, in order to worship Jehovah on the holy mountain at Jerusalem (ver. 13).

2. Yet the defenced—no favor.—Vers. 10, 11. The city which becomes desolate and finds no mercy (ver. 11) cannot possibly be Jerusalem. It can only be the city which the Prophet has already (xxiv. 10–12; xxi. 2, 3, 12; xxvi. 5) so emphatically set forth as the centre of the worldly power, and distinguished from the earth of which it is the centre. Vers. 10 and 11 are therefore connected with ver. 1. כִּי is here explicative, rather than causal. The defenced city of ver. 10 is identical with the קריה בצורה in xxv. 2.—נָוֶה (comp. xxxii. 18; xxxiii. 20; xxxiv. 13; xxxv. 7; lxv. 10) is originally a habitation of Nomades, a place where people can stay with their flocks and herds. Then it is habitation in general; and as the city is here designated as נוה נעזב, what the city was, and not what it is, is denoted by נוה. It was formerly an inhabited city. נוה is accordingly not to be taken here as "pasturage," but as habitation, dwelling-place. The נוה is said by Metonymy to be driven away (מְשֻׁלָּח) although only its inhabitants are so. (Comp. קֵן משלח xvi. 2; הָעִיר הַיֹּצֵאת Amos v. 3; and הָאָרֶץ תֵּשֵׁב Isa. xiii. 20). As the wilderness can be said to be forsaken, but not driven away, we have to connect only נעזב with כמדבר, and not משלח also. On the place that has been so forsaken calves will feed (comp. v. 17; xxvii. 13 sqq.), and lie down, and consume (xlix. 4) the branches (comp. xvii. 6) thereof, i. e., of the forsaken city. What remains of the branches (קָצִיר in the collective sense of foliage, especially in Job xiv. 9; xviii. 16; xxix. 19), and is withered, is broken off (the plural תשברנה to be referred to the idea of a multitude of branches contained in קָצִיר); then women come and kindle it (אוֹתָהּ as a neuter comp. on ver. 4), i. e., they make an אור, a flame of it (xxxi. 9; xliv. 16; l. 11 comp. Mal. i. 10). This judgment comes upon the people (i. e., the nations conceived as one) of the worldly power; because it is a people without right understanding (plural only here. Comp. on xi. 2). Therefore, although Jehovah is the Creator of the heathen also (Gen. i. 26; comp. Job xii. 10; Acts xvii. 26), yet He will not be gracious unto them (עֹשֵׂהוּ as xvii. 7; xxix. 16. יֹצְרוֹ comp. xxix. 16; xlv. 9 et saepe). [Many of the best interpreters hold that the city spoken of in ver. 10 is Jerusalem, and not Babylon. The desolation here described is not so complete as that denounced against Babylon (xiii. 19–22), and corresponds exactly to the judgment foretold elsewhere by Isaiah against Israel and Jerusalem xxxii. 13, 14; v. 17. The people of no understanding, whose Maker and Former is Jehovah, certainly looks like Israel. Comp. i. 3.—D. M.].

3. And it shall come—Jerusalem.—Vers. 12, 13. In contrast to the sad image of a wilderness in vers. 10 and 11, the Prophet depicts Israel's final destiny as a harvest of glory and highest honor for Israel. The image of a great harvest-day (Matt. xiii. 39; Rev. xiv. 14 sqq.), forms the basis of the figurative language of vers. 12 and 13. The sheaves are gathered, even in the countries where Israel lives in exile, mainly therefore, in the countries of the Euphrates and the Nile. For these countries are for the Prophet here, as xi. 11 sqq.; xix. 23 sqq., representatives of the lands of exile in general. But when the harvest-sheaves of those countries are borne by the reapers, the LORD shall beat these sheaves (חָבַט of the beating off of olives Deut. xxiv. 20; of the threshing of grain with a staff Jud. vi. 11; Ruth ii. 17; Isa. xxviii. 27), and the ears of Israel will fall out, and then be gathered to be brought back. It is plain that the Prophet means by this image what he afterwards, ver. 13, states in proper terms. For the scattered Israelitish ears amid the great sheaves of the Gentiles are nothing but the אבדים and נדחים ver. 13. I take therefore שִׁבֹּלֶת ver. 12 as a collective designation of ears of grain. For what significance would it have here to give prominence to the Euphrates being at high water, as it is quite indifferent for the Geographical boundary whether the Euphrates has much water or little (שבלת, fluxus aquae, emphasizes the abundance of water, Ps. lxix. 3, 6; besides only Jud. xii. 6 where the meaning is a matter of no consequence)? We dare not press the line of the Euphrates, or the line of the נחל מצרים any more than the depth of the Euphrates as a sharply drawn boundary-line. For the grain-ears of the Euphrates are just the ears of the lands of the Euphrates, and the ears of the brook of Egypt are the ears of Egypt, as appears from ארץ אשור and מצרים ver. 13. I believe that in regard to grammar we are fully justified in supplying שבלת after עד and before נחל מ׳. The omission of substantives after prepositions of comparison furnishes a perfectly sufficient analogy for this omission (comp. Job xxxiii. 25). [The proposed construction is intolerably hard, and has no clear parallel to support it. It is unwarrantably assumed that שבלת הנהר must mean the high water of the river Euphrates as distinguished from the river at low water. שבלת denotes current, flood, and so abundance of water, and it may well be put as an adjunct of the river Euphrates when the other terminus is the insignificant stream of Egypt, the Wadi el Arish. It appears to me exceedingly forced to take שבלת here as a collective, meaning ears of grain, and then to suppose an ellipsis of this substantive after עד.—D. M.].

That the נחל מ׳ is the Wadi el Arish which flows near Rhinocolura into the sea is certain. (Comp. EBERS, Egypt and the books of Moses, I. p. 275). But it is not mentioned along with the Euphrates to designate a boundary of the Israelitish kingdom (Gen. xv. 18; 1 Kings viii. 65), but as emblem of the southern and first land of exile; as the Euphrates is emblem of the second and northern land of exile.

At the signal which will be given by sound of trumpet (xviii. 3; Matt. xxiv. 3; 1 Cor. xv. 52; 1 Thes. iv. 16) all the Israelites who are lost (Jer. l. 6) and scattered (xi. 12 comp. Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 16) in the lands of Assyria and Egypt (in the same lands which were previously designated by נהר and נחל מ׳) come to worship the LORD in Jerusalem, on the mountain of the Sanctuary (xxiv. 23; xxv. 6, 7, 10). Here ends the libellus apocalypticus of Isaiah. This worship he conceives as never ending (comp. xxv. 7 sq.). Israel's return to his own land is type of the restoration of redeemed men (the Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικός) into the heavenly home. It is not possible in this connection to think merely (as even DRECHSLER does) on a single act of worship before taking possession of the land and settling in it.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. xxiv. 2. "When general judgments take place, no distinction is observed between man and wife, master and servant, mistress and maid, learned and unlearned, noble and plebeian, clergy and laity; therefore let no one rely on any external prerogative or superiority, but let every one without distinction repent and forsake sin."—CRAMER. Though this is right, yet we must, on the other hand, remember that the LORD declares in reference to the same great event, "Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left" (Matth. xxiv. 10 sq.). There is no contradiction in these two statements. Both are true: outward relations will make no difference; there shall be no respect of persons. But the state of the heart will make a difference. According to the inward character there will, in the case of those whose external position in the world is perfectly alike, be some who enter life, others whose doom is death.

2. xxiv. 5 sq. "The earth is burdened with sins, and is therefore deprived of every blessing. The earth must suffer for our guilt, when we have as it were spoilt it, and it must be subject to vanity for our sakes (Rom. viii. 20). What wonder is it that it should show itself ungrateful toward us?"—CRAMER.

[3. xxiv. 13 sq. "Observe the small number of this remnant; here and there one who shall escape the common calamity (as Noah and his family, when the old world was drowned), who when all faces gather blackness, can lift up their head with joy. Luke xxi. 26-28." HENRY.—D. M.].

4. xxiv. 17-20. Our earth is a volcanic body. Mighty volcanic forces were active at its formation. That these are still in commotion in the interior of the earth is proved by the many active volcanoes scattered over the whole earth, and by the perpetual volcanic convulsions which we call earthquakes. These have hitherto been confined to particular localities. But who can guarantee that a concentration and simultaneous eruption of those volcanic forces, that is, a universal earthquake, shall not hereafter occur? The LORD makes express mention of earthquakes among the signs which shall precede His second coming (Matth. xxiv. 7; Mark xiii. 8; Luke xxi. 11). And in 2 Pet. iii. 5 sqq. the future destruction of the earth by fire is set over against the destruction of the old world by water. Isaiah in our place announces a catastrophe whose characteristic features will be that, 1) there will be no escape from it; 2) destructive forces will assail from above and below; 3) the earth will be rent asunder; 4) it will reel and totter; 5) it will suffer so heavy a fall that it will not rise again (ver. 20 b). Is there not here a prophecy of the destruction of the earth by volcanic forces? And how suddenly can they break loose! The ministers of the word have every reason to compare this extreme exposedness of our earth to fire, and the possibility of its unexpectedly sudden collapse with the above-cited warnings of the word of God, and to attach thereto the admonition which is added in 2 Pet. iii. 11.

5. xxiv. 21. The earth is a part of our planetary system. It is not what it appears to the optical perception to be, a central body around which worlds of a different nature revolve, but it, together with many similar bodies, revolves round a common centre. The earth according to that view of the account of the creation in Gen. i., which appears to me the true one, has arisen with all the bodies of our Solar system out of one primary matter, originally united, common to them all. If our Solar System is a well-ordered, complete organism, it must rest on the basis of a not merely formal, but also material unity; i. e., the separate bodies must move, not only according to a principle of order which governs all, but they must also as to their substance be essentially like. And as they arose simultaneously, so must they perish simultaneously. It is inconceivable that our earth alone should disappear from the organism of the Solar System, or pass over to a higher material condition. Its absence, or ceasing to exist in its previous form and substance, would necessarily draw after it the ruin of the whole system. Hence the Scripture speaks every where of a passing away and renovation of the heaven and the earth (Ps. cii. 26; Isa. li. 6; lxv. 17; lxvi. 22; Matth. v. 18; xxiv. 29, 35; 2 Pet. iii. 7, 10, 13; Heb. xii. 26; Rev. xx. 11; xxi. 1). The heaven that shall pass away with a great noise, whose powers shall be shaken, whose stars shall fall, is the planetary heaven. The same lot will happen to the companions of our earth, to the other planets, and to the centre, the sun, and to all other co-ordinate and subordinate stellar bodies, which will befall the earth itself. This is the substance of the view which serves as a basis for our place. But personal beings are not thereby by any means excluded from the צבא מרום. The parallel expression מלכי האדמה, and the use in other places of the related expression צבא השמים lead us rather to suppose personal beings to be included. But I believe that a distinction must be made here. As the heavenly bodies which will pass away simultaneously with the earth, can only be those which arose together with it, and which stand in organic connection with it, so also the angelic powers, which are judged simultaneously with us men, can be only those which stand in connection with the heavenly bodies of our Solar System, i. e., with the earthly material world. There are heavenly bodies of glorious pneumatic substance. If personal beings stand in connection with them, they must also be pure, glorious, resplendent beings. These will not be judged. They are the holy angels, who come with the LORD (Matth. xxv. 31). But it is quite conceivable that all the bodies of our Solar System are till the judgment like our earth suffered to be the theatre of the spirits of darkness.

6. xxiv. 21–23. It seems to me that the PROPHET has here sketched the chief matters pertaining to eschatology. For the passing away of heaven and earth, the binding of Satan (Rev. xx. 1–3), the loosing of Satan again (Rev. xx. 7), and finally the reign of God alone, which will make sun and moon unnecessary (Rev. xxi. 23)—are not these the boundary-stones of the chief epochs of the history of the end of the world?

7. xxv. 6. ["The LORD of hosts makes this feast. The provision is very rich, and every thing is of the best. It is a feast, which supposes abundance and variety; it is a continual feast to believers; it is their fault if it be not. It is a feast of fat things and full of marrow; so relishing, so nourishing are the comforts of the Gospel to all those that feast upon them and digest them. The returning prodigal was entertained with the fatted calf; and David has that pleasure in communion with God, with which his soul is satisfied as with marrow and fatness. It is a feast of wines on the lees; the strongest-bodied wines, that have been long kept upon the lees, and then are well refined from them, so that they are clear and fine. There is that in the Gospel which, like fine wine, soberly used, makes glad the heart, and raises the spirits, and is fit for those that are of a heavy heart, being under convictions of sin, and mourning for it, that they may drink and forget their misery (for that is the proper use of wine; it is a cordial for those that need it, Prov. xxxi. 6, 7) may be of good cheer, knowing that their sins are forgiven, and may be vigorous in their spiritual work and warfare, as a strong man refreshed with wine." HENRY.—D. M.]

8. xxv. 9. "In the Old Testament the vail and covering were before men's eyes, partly because they waited for the light that was to appear, partly because they sat in darkness and in the shadow of death (Luke i. 79). The fulfilment of this prediction has in Christ already begun, and will at last be perfectly fulfilled in the Church triumphant where all ignorance and sorrow shall be dispelled (1 Cor. xiii. 12)." CRAMER.

9. xxv. 8. "God here represents Himself as a mother, who presses to her bosom her sorrowful son, comforts him and wipes away his tears (Isa. lxvi. 13). The righteous are to believe and appropriate this promise, that every one may learn to speak with Paul in the time of trial: the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us, Rom. viii. 18." CRAMER.

10. xxv. 10. "This is now the hope and consolation of the church that the hand of the LORD rests on this mountain, that is, that He will be gracious, and let His power, help and grace be there seen and felt. But the unbelieving Moabites, i. e., the Jews, with all others who will not receive the gospel, shall be threshed to pieces as straw in the mire; these the Lord's hand will not rescue, as it helps those who wait on Him, but it shall press them down so that they will never rise, according to the saying, Mark xvi. 16." VEIT DIETRICH.

11. xxv. Three thoughts contained in this chapter we should hold fast: 1) When we see the world triumph over every thing which belongs to the LORD and His kingdom, when our hearts are anxious about the preservation in the world of the Church of Christ, which is sore oppressed, let this word of the Prophet comfort our hearts. The world-city which contains all that is of the world, sinks into the dust, and the church of Christ goes from her chains and bands into the state of freedom and glory. We have often seen that it is the LORD's way to let every thing come to maturity. When it is once ripe, He comes suddenly with His sentence. Let us comfort ourselves therewith, for thus will it happen with the world and its dominion over the faithful followers of Christ. When it is ripe, suddenly it will come to an end. 2) No one who has a heart for the welfare of the nations can see without the deepest pain how all hearts are now seduced and befooled, and all eyes closed and covered. The simplest truths are no longer acknowledged, but the more perverse, brutal and mean views and doctrines are, the more greedily are they laid hold of. We cannot avert this. But our comfort is that even this seduction of the nations will reach its climax. Then men will come to themselves. The vail and covering will fall off, and the Gospel will shine with new light before the nations. Therewith let us comfort ourselves. 3) Till this happens, the church is sorrowful. But she shall be full of joy. The promise is given to her that she shall be fully satisfied with the good things of the house of the LORD. A life is promised to her which neither death nor any pain can affect, as she has rest from all enemies. The word of the LORD shall be fulfilled in her: Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. The Church that has such a promise may wait in patient quietness for its accomplishment, and praise the LORD in affliction, till it pleases Him to glorify her before all nations." WEBER, The Prophet Isaiah. 1875.

12. xxvi. 1. "The Christian church is a city of God. God has built it, and He is the right Master-builder. It is strong: 1) on account of the Builder; 2) on account of the foundation and corner-stone, which is Christ; 3) on account of the bond wherewith the living stones are bound together, which is the unity of the faith." CRAMER. [The security and happiness of true believers, both on earth and in heaven, is represented in Scripture under the image of their dwelling in a city in which they can bid defiance to all their enemies. We dwell in such a city even now, Ps. xlvi. 4-5. We look for such a city, Heb. xi. 10, 16; Rev. xxi.—D. M.]

13. xxvi. 2. [These words may be taken as a description of the people whom God owns, who are fit to be accounted members of the church of the living God on earth, and who will not be excluded from the celestial city. Instead of complaining that only the righteous and the faithful will be admitted into the heavenly city, it should rather give us joy to think that there will be no sin there, that none but the just and true will there be found. This has been a delightful subject of reflection to God's saints. The last words written by HENRY MARTYN were: "Oh! when shall time give place to eternity? When shall appear that new heaven and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness? There, there shall in no wise enter in any thing that defileth; none of that wickedness which has made men worse than wild beasts—none of their corruptions which add to the miseries of mortality shall be seen or heard of any more."—D. M.]

14. xxvi. 4. "The fourth privilege of the church is trust in God the Rock of Ages, i. e., in Christ, who not only here, but also Matth. xvi.; 1 Cor. x.; 1 Pet. ii., is called a rock in a peculiar manner, because no other foundation of salvation and of the church can be laid except this rock, which is here called the rock of ages on account of the eternity of His being, merit and office. Hence a refutation can be drawn of the papistical fable which makes Peter and his successors, the Roman Pontiffs, to be the rock on which the church is built." FOERSTER. ["Whatever we trust to the world for, it will be but for a moment. All we expect from it is confined within the limits of time; but what we trust in God for will last as long as we shall last. For in the Lord Jehovah, Jah, Jehovah, in Him who was, and is, and is to come, there is a rock of ages, a firm and lasting foundation for faith and hope to build upon; and the house built on that rock will stand in a storm." HENRY."—D. M.]

15. xxvi. 5. "It is very common with the prophets, when they prophesy of the kingdom of Christ to make reference to the proud and to the needy, and to represent the latter as exalted and the former as brought low. This truth is directed properly against the self-righteous. For Christ and His righteousness will not endure spiritual pride and presumption; but the souls that are poor, that hunger and thirst for grace, that know their need, these Christ graciously receives." CRAMER.

16. xxvi. 6. "It vexes the proud all the more that they will be overcome by those who are poor and of no consequence. For example, Goliath was annoyed that a boy should come against him with a staff (1 Sam. xiii. 43)." CRAMER.

17. xxvi. 8-10. That the justice of God must absolutely manifest itself that the majesty of the LORD may be seen, and that the wicked may learn righteousness, must even from a new Testament view-point be admitted. But the New Testament disputes the existence of any one who is righteous when confronted by the law, and who is not deserving of punishment. [But that there is none righteous, no not one, is taught most emphatically in the Old Testament also.—D. M.]. But it (the New Testament) while it shuts up all, Jews and Gentiles, without exception, under sin (Gal. iii. 22; Rom. iii. 9; xi. 32), sets forth a scheme of mediation, which, while it renders full satisfaction to justice, at the same time offers to all the possibility of deliverance. This mediation is through the Cross of Christ. It is only when this mediation has not been accepted that punitive justice has free course. It should not surprise us that even the Evangelist of the Old Covenant, who wrote chap. liii., did not possess perfect knowledge of this mediation. Let us remember John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 7; xi. 11) and the disciples of the LORD (Luke ix. 54). [Let us not forget that Isaiah was a true Prophet, and spoke as he was moved by the Spirit of God. The Apostle Paul did not find fault with the most terrible denunciations of judgment contained in the Old Testament, or affect a superiority over the men who uttered them. On the contrary, he quotes them as words which could not be suffered to fall, but which must be fulfilled in all their dreadful import. See e. g. Rom. xi. 9, 10.—D. M.].

18. xxvi. 12. "It is a characteristic of true, sincere Christians, that they give God the glory and not themselves, and freely confess that they have nothing of themselves, but everything from God (1 Cor. iv. 7; Phil. ii. 13; Heb. xii. 2)." CRAMER.

19. xxvi. 16. The old theologians have many comforting and edifying thoughts connected with this place: "A magnet has the power to raise and attract to itself iron. Our heart is heavy as iron. But the hand of God is as a magnet. When that hand visits us with affliction, it lifts us up, and draws us to itself." "Distress teaches us to pray, and prayer again dispels all distress. One wedge displaces the other." "Ex gravibus curis impellimur ad pia vota." "Ex monte myrrhae procedimus ad collem thuris (Cant. ix. 6). In amaritudine crucis exsurgit odor devotae precationis (Ps. lxxxvi. 6 sq.)." "Ubi nulla crux et tentatio, ibi nulla vera oratio. Oratio sine malis est tanquam avis sine alis. Optimus orandi magister necessitas. Τὰ παθήματα μαθήματα. Quae nocent, docent. Ubi tentatio, ibi oratio. Mala, quae hic nos premunt, ad Deum ire compellunt. Qui nescit orare, ingrediatur mare." "When the string is most tightly drawn, it sounds best. Cross and temptation are the right prayer-bell. They are the press by which God crushes out the juice of prayer." CRAMER and FOERSTER.

20. xxvi. 20. As God, when the deluge was about to burst, bade Noah go into his ark as into his chamber, and Himself shut the door on him (Gen. vii. 16); so does the LORD still act when a storm is approaching; He brings His own into a chamber where they can be safe, either for their temporal preservation and protection against every might (Ps. xci. 1), or, on the other hand, to give them repose by a peaceful and happy death." "His anger endureth but a moment; in his favor is life (Ps. xxx. 6)." CRAMER.

21. xxvii. 1. ["Great and mighty princes [nations] if they oppose the people of God, are in God's account, as dragons and serpents, and plagues of mankind; and the LORD will punish them in due time. They are too big for men to deal with, and call to an account; and therefore the great God will take the doing of it into His own hands." HENRY.—D. M.].

22. xxvii. 2-5. "It seems to the world that God has no concern for His church and Christians, else, we imagine, they would be better off. But certain it is, that it is not the angels but God Himself that will be watcher over this vineyard, and will send it gracious rain." VEIT DIETRICH. ["The church is a vineyard of red wine, yielding the best and choicest grapes, intimating the reformation of the church, that it now brings forth good fruit unto God, whereas before it brought forth fruit to itself, or brought forth wild grapes, chap. v. 4." "God takes care (1) of the safety of this vineyard; I the Lord do keep it. He speaks this, as glorying in it, that He is, and has undertaken to be, the keeper of Israel; those that bring forth fruit to God are, and shall be always, under His protection. (2) God takes care of the fruitfulness of this vineyard: I will water it every moment; and yet it shall not be over watered. We need the constant and continual waterings of the divine grace; for if that be at any time withdrawn, we wither and come to nothing." HENRY. D. M.].

23. xxvii. 4. "Est aurea promissio, qua praecedentem confirmat. Indignatio non est mihi, fury is not in me. Quomodo enim is nobis irasci potest, qui pro nobis est mortuus? Quanquam igitur appareat, eum irasci, non tamen est verum, quod irascatur. Sic Paulo immittitur angelus Satanae, sed non est ira, nam ipse Christus dicit: sufficit tibi gratia mea. Sic pater filium delinquentem castigat, sed non est ira, quanquam appareat ira esse. Custodia igitur vineae aliquando cogit Deum immittere speciem irae, ne pereat luxurie, sed non est ira. Est insignis textus, which we should inscribe on all tribulations: Non est indignatio mihi, non possum irasci. Quod autem videtur irasci est custodia vineae, ne pereas et fias securus. LUTHER. "In order to understand fully the doctrine of the wrath of God we must have a clear perception of the antithesis: the long-suffering of God, and the wrath of God, wrath and mercy." LANGE.

24. xxvii. 7-9. "Christ judges His church, i. e., He punishes and afflicts it, but He does this in measure. The sorrow and cross is meted out, and is not, as it appears to us, without measure and infinite. It is so measured that redemption must certainly follow. But why does God let His Christians so suffer? Why does He not lay the cross on the wicked? God answers this question and speaks: the sin of Jacob will thereby cease. That is: God restrains sin by the cross, and subdues the old Adam." VEIT DIETRICH.

25. xxvii. 13. ["The application of this verse to a future restoration of the Jews can neither be established nor disproved. In itself considered, it appears to contain nothing which may not be naturally applied to events long past." J. A. ALEXANDER.—"This prediction was completely and entirely fulfilled by the return of the Jews to their own country under the decree of Cyrus." BARNES.—D. M.].

THIRD SUBDIVISION.

THE RELATION OF ISRAEL TO ASSYRIA IN THE TIME OF KING HEZEKIAH.

CHAPS. XXVIII.—XXXIII.

As chapters vii.—xii., resting on the facts related vii. 1 sqq., contain the first great cycle of Isaiah's prophecies, so our chapters (xxviii.—xxxiii.), which have for their basis the facts narrated in the historical appendix (xxxvi.-xxxvii.) contain the second great cycle. Chapters vii.—xii. depict the relation of Israel to Assyria in the time of Ahaz. Our chapters set forth this relation as it stood in the time of Hezekiah. As the sin of Ahaz consisted in his seeking protection against Aram-Ephraim not in the LORD, but in Assyria, so Hezekiah erred in seeking protection against Assyria, that had become a scourge through Ahab's guilt, not in the LORD, but in Egypt. Hezekiah, the otherwise pious king, must have been weak enough to yield so far to the influence of those around him, as to sanction a policy which aimed at concluding a league with Egypt, as the infallible means of deliverance. Isaiah now in chapters xxviii.—xxxiii. assails with all his might this Egyptian alliance, which the government of Hezekiah, knowing it to be contrary to the will of God, was seeking behind the back of the Prophet to bring about with all diplomatic skill, and at great sacrifices of money and property. He follows it from its rise through all stages of its development. He leads us, chap. xxviii., to its source. The Prophet assigns as its source a swamp, if we may employ a figure; the swamp of low carnal passion for drink. From this swamp the policy had already issued which Ephraim was pursuing to its destruction. From this swamp too the disposition was produced which led Judah to contemn the admonitions of the LORD, and to place wicked confidence in its own carnal prudence (xxviii. 14 sq.). In chap. xxix. the Prophet lets it be clearly perceived that the secret plotting behind his back did not remain concealed from him (xxix. 15 sqq.). But it is not till chap. xxx. that he plainly declares (ver. 2 sqq.) that those secret machinations were with a view to an alliance with Egypt. But he certifies at once by a written declaration (ver. 8), that this Egyptian alliance will be of no benefit. The LORD only will deliver Israel. He will certainly do it. In chaps. xxxi. and xxxii., which belong together, the LORD proclaims the vanity of Egyptian succor. Assyria will not fall by the sword of a man (xxxi. 8), but the LORD will overturn it; and to this promise of the impending deliverance of Israel from Assyrian oppression the Prophet immediately attaches a glorious picture of the future, which, while it praises the truly noble disposition of those high in rank in the Messianic time, is very severe on the existing aristocracy, composed of the nobility and of public functionaries; and at the same time (as in chap. iii.) addresses with an impressive warning the women who have great influence, and occupy high positions. Finally (xxxiii.), the Prophet speaks directly to Assyria in order to announce its speedy and sudden destruction. This last chapter contains matter which is for the most part of a joyful character for Israel. It has a dark side for the people of the LORD only so far as it sets forth that the predicted glorious deliverance will make a disagreeable impression on the sinners in Israel, who desire to know nothing of Jehovah. Although therefore chaps. xxviii.—xxxiii. are arranged according to a certain plan, they do not form one connected speech. There are rather five speeches delivered at different times, each of which in itself forms a whole, while each presents a complete picture of what the Prophet beheld, embracing threatening and promise. We have here to remark that the Prophet always draws the most remote Messianic future into the sphere of his vision, though he does so every time from a different point of view. The first speech must have been composed before the destruction of Samaria (722 B. C.), for it addresses Samaria as yet standing. Nay, more, as Samaria is seen flourishing in all her pride, and her inhabitants indulge their evil passions without fear or restraint, the speech must have been written before the commencement of the three years' siege of Samaria by the Assyrians, say in the year 725, and therefore in the commencement of the reign of Hezekiah. Chap. xxix. belongs to a later time. In ver. 1 the Prophet declares that the city of Jerusalem should be shut in. He can only mean that isolation of the city in regard to which Sennacherib states in his inscriptions (comp. SCHRADER, pp. 176 and 187), that he had enclosed Hezekiah "as a bird in a cage." This event, according to the usual chronology, happened in the year 714, while according to the Assyrian monuments (comp. SCHRADER, Cuneiform Inscriptions, p. 299, and our Introduction to chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix.), it took place in the year 700. As this difference, as we will attempt to show in the introduction to chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix., was occasioned by a misunderstanding of later writers, there being originally no disagreement between the biblical and Assyrian chronology, but both originally agreeing in referring the expedition of Sennacherib against Phenicia, Egypt and Judah to the 28th year of Hezekiah, i. e., the year 700 B. C., the speech contained in chapter xxix. would consequently have been delivered about the year 702. We have an aid to fixing the date in the words ver. 1: "Add year to year, let the festivals complete their round." According to our exposition the Prophet intimates by these words that after the expiration of the current year another year should complete its revolution, and then the hour of decision should arrive. That at this time the Egyptian alliance had been already, as is hinted in ver. 15, arranged to a considerable extent in secret consultations, is extremely probable. And when we find, xxx. 2 sqq., the Jewish Ambassadors already on the way to Egypt, and hear, xxxi. 1 sqq., the futility of Egyptian help again emphatically asserted, and then read xxxii. 10 that, after an indefinite number of days above a year had expired, Jerusalem should be cut off from its fields and vineyards by the enemy, we may draw from all this the conclusion, that chaps. xxx.—xxxii. were produced not long after chap. xxix. But when we read, xxxiii. 7 sqq., that the ambassadors of peace sent by Hezekiah return in sorrow, because the Assyrian king in addition to the great ransom (2 Kings xviii. 14 sqq.) demands the surrender of the city itself; when that passage describes the occupation of the surrounding country by the enemy, in consequence of which Judah (xxxiii. 23) is compared with a ship whose ropes no longer keep the mast firm, when at last the LORD, xxxiii. 10, exclaims "Now will I rise; now will I be exalted; now will I lift up myself," we shall not err in assuming that this prophecy belongs to the time immediately after the return of those ambassadors of peace, and was therefore uttered shortly before the summons given to Hezekiah by Rabshakeh. Each of the five speeches of our prophetic cycle begins with הוֹי. From the absence of הוֹי at the beginning of chap. xxxii., as well as from the tenor of this chapter, we see that it forms with chap. xxxi. one whole. הוֹי is found once, xxix. 15, even in the middle of the discourse.

That Isaiah is the writer of these speeches is almost universally admitted. The doubts which were raised by Eichhorn in regard to separate parts, were seen by GESENIUS to be unfounded (Comment. I. 2, p. 826); and EWALD's conjecture as to the composition of chap. xxxiii. by a disciple of Isaiah, has been sufficiently refuted by KNOBEL.

We have not in the section before us one organic discourse, but five speeches, which from the initial word common to all of them we shall designate as first woe, second woe, etc.

I.—THE FIRST WOE.

CHAP. XXVIII.

1. SWAMP EPHRAIM, SWAMP JUDAH, AND WHAT ARISES OUT OF THE SWAMPS.

CHAP. XXVIII. 1-13.

1 WOE to the crown of pride, [a]to the drunkards of Ephraim,
Whose glorious beauty is a fading flower,
Which are on the head of the fat [b]valleys
Of them that are [1]overcome with wine.
2 Behold, the LORD hath a mighty and strong one;
Which, as a tempest of hail,
And a destroying storm,
As a flood of mighty waters overflowing,
Shall cast down to the earth with the hand.
3 The crown of pride, [c]the drunkards of Ephraim,
Shall be trodden [2]under feet.
4 And the glorious beauty which is on the head of the fat valley,
Shall be a fading flower,
And as the [d]hasty fruit before the summer;

Which, when he that looketh upon it seeth,
While it is yet in his hand he [3]eateth it up.
5 In that day shall the LORD of hosts be for a crown of glory,
And for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people,
6 And for a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment,
And for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate.
7 But they also have erred through wine,
And through strong drink are out of the way;
The priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink;
They are swallowed up of wine,
They are out of the way through strong drink;
They err in vision, they stumble in judgment.
8 For all tables are full of vomit and filthiness,
So that there is no place clean.
9 Whom shall he teach knowledge?
And whom shall he make to understand [4]doctrine?
Them that are weaned from the [e]milk,
And drawn from the [f]breasts.
10 For precept [5]must be upon precept, precept upon precept;
Line upon line, line upon line;
Here a little, and there a little:
11 For with [6]stammering lips and another tongue,
[7]Will he speak to this people.
12 To whom he said,
This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest;
And this is the refreshing;
Yet they would not hear.
13 But the word of the LORD [g]was unto them
Precept upon precept, precept upon precept;
Line upon line, line upon line;
Here a little, and there a little;
That they might go, and fall backward,
And be broken, and snared, and taken.

[1] Heb. broken. [2] Heb. with feet. [3] Heb. swalloweth. [4] Heb. the hearing.
[5] Or, hath been. [6] Heb. stammerings of lips. [7] Or, he hath spoken.

[a] of the drunkards of Ephraim. [b] valley. [c] of the drunkards of Ephraim.
[d] early fig. [e] followed by note of interrogation. [f] followed by note of interrogation.
[g] shall come.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. צִיץ נֹבֵל as subst. cum adj. would be here abnormal, inasmuch as nothing can come between the nomen rectum and regens. The normal construction would be צִיץ צבי תפארתו הַנֹּבֵל. But we know from i. 30 and xxxiv. 4, that Isaiah uses the participle of נָבֵל substantively in the signification of that which is withered, falling off. We have then to regard נֹבֵל here not as an adjective qualifying צִיץ, but as a substantive coordinate with the other members in the series of genitives. Comp. on צִיצַת נֹבֵל ver. 4. The absolute state שמנים need cause no surprise. The word does not stand in the genitival relation to what follows. But two genitives are dependent on ראשׁ, namely, גיא שמנים and הלומי יין. [We prefer to say with DELITZSCH that שְׁמָנִים, although standing connected with what follows, has the absolute form, the logical relation carrying it over the syntax. Comp. xxxii. 13; 1 Chron. ix. 13.—D. M.]

Ver. 3. The verb תרמסנה in the plural has no expressed subject. This is not necessary. For in the Hebrew language an ideal subject can be readily understood. The proud crown is Samaria. But this one great crown includes many smaller ones. The plural can be referred to this ideal multitude (comp. NAEGELSBACH'S Gr., S. 61, 1). [It appears to me simpler to say with the Jewish grammarians that the word crown is to be taken here as a collective noun.—D. M.]. In ver. 4 צִיצַת looks as a hint for the right understanding of נֹבֵל. We have already remarked on ver. 1 that נֹבֵל is to be taken as a substantive. If this could be seen from the mere grammatical construction, and from the parallel places, i. 30; xxxiv. 4, it is obvious from the word צִיצַת. For we clearly perceive from this nominal form which occurs only here, and which is certainly intentionally chosen, that נֹבֵל is to be regarded as a substantive, and as a coordinate member of the series of genitives.

Ver. 7. פוק, Kal, only here. Besides only Hiphil lviii. 10. פליליה (accus. loci) only here. Comp. xvi. 3; Job xxxi. 28.

Ver. 9. On the preposition between the governing and the governed noun, see NAEGELSBACH'S Gr., § 63, 4 c.

Ver. 12. אבוא for אָבֹו comp. OLSHAUSEN'S Gr., § 226, b, p. 449 sq.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1 Samaria is still standing in proud pomp, but sunk in the vice of drunkenness. Therefore the Prophet proclaims a woe upon it (ver. 1), and announces that a mighty foe as a tempest will cast it to the ground (ver. 2), and tread the proud crown under foot (ver. 3). Then shall this glorious but already decaying flower quickly disappear, as an early fig which a man no sooner sees than he eats it (ver. 4). Not till then is the moment come when the LORD Himself will be to the remnant of His people for an adorning crown, and for a guiding spirit in judgment, and for strength in war (vers. 5 and 6). With Jerusalem it stands no better than with Samaria. There, too, the vice of drunkenness prevails fearfully. Even priests and prophets are under its sway. Even in the sacred moments of prophetic vision [?] and of judging, its effects are visible on them; the holy places are polluted by their vomiting (vers. 7 and 8). And, moreover, they mock the servant of Jehovah who warns them: Whom does he think that he has before him? Are they mere children? (ver. 9). We hear from him continually trifling moral preaching, broken into little bits, which are scoffingly imitated by short, oft-repeated words, which resemble stammering sounds (ver. 10). For this they will have to hear the stammering sounds of a foreign nation of barbarous speech (ver. 11). Because they would not hear the word of Jehovah which offered rest and comfort to the weary (ver. 12), the will of God will be made known to them in words, which in sound resemble their scornful words, but in import are short, sharp words of command. That will of God has this significance, that they will be ensnared in inextricable ruin.

2 Woe——eateth it up.—Vers. 1–4. It is no honor for Jerusalem, when it is said to her that she walks in the footsteps of Samaria. Jerusalem should be ashamed of this likeness, and seek to remove it. This is, doubtless, the reason why the Prophet first directs his look to Samaria in order to describe the there prevailing vice of literal (and in connection therewith of spiritual) drunkenness, and to threaten it with punishment from God. Thence his look passes over to Jerusalem. Micah had before Isaiah done just the same. In chap. i. 6 sq. Micah first of all threatens Samaria with judgment, although "Judah and Jerusalem were the proper objects of his mission" (comp. CASPARI, Micah the Morasthite, p. 105). Isaiah himself had once already (viii. 6 sqq.) announced that the storm of judgment would first come upon Ephraim, and thence spread into the territory of Judah. This way of the judgments of God is not determined simply by the geographic situation. There is also a deeper reason when Jerusalem goes in the ways of Samaria. On הוי comp. on i. 4. עטרת besides only lxii. 3. On גאות comp. on xxvi. 10. צִיץ stands in conjunction with נבל besides only xl. 7 and 8. On צבי תפארתו comp. on iv. 2; xiii. 19. This proud crown of Ephraim, this flower of his glorious ornament which lay upon the head of the valley of fatnesses (comp. v. 1; xxv. 6) i. e., on a beautiful hill commanding a fertile valley, is Samaria (1 Kings xvi. 24; Amos iv. 1; vi. 1). הֲלוּמֵי יַיִן (comp. xvi. 8) are vino obtusi, percussi. Compare Qui se percussit flore Liberi, Plant. Cas. 3, 5, 16; multo percussus tempora Baccho, Tib. 1, 2, 3; mero saucius Mart., 3, 6, 8; οἰνοπλήξ, οἰνόπληκτος, etc. Two images are here blended; namely, that Samaria is the crown of the hill, and the crown or garland on the head of the Ephraimites. The accumulation of predicates shows off the vain-glorious pride of the Ephraimites; and at the same time it is intimated by ציץ נבל and על ראש הלומי יין that this garland, this crown will not endure long. For the garland is withered, and the crown totters upon the head of the drunkards. For the avenger of this drunken pride is already prepared. The LORD has him at hand (ii. 12). He is the Assyrian. He will overturn to the ground (Amos v. 7) Ephraim's glory with his hand (ביד stands over against the following כרגלים), as a storm of hail (xxv. 4; xxx. 30), as a shower of destruction (שער and קטב only here in Isaiah), as the rushing of mighty waterfloods (כַּבִּיר only Job viii. 2; xv. 10; xxxi. 25; xxxiv. 17, 24; xxxvi. 5 bis and Isa. x. 13; xvi. 14; xvii. 12, and in this place; שטף, vers. 15, 17, 18; chap. viii. 7 sq., 10, 22; xxx. 28; xliii. 2; lxvi. 12). The meaning is that Ephraim, when standing, shall be dashed to the ground with the hand; when lying, shall be trodden with the feet. Ver. 4. The flower of the fading one is like the expression כְּלֵי הַקָּטָן xxii. 24. This flower will be destroyed as quietly as an early fig, which is no sooner seen than it is eaten off-hand by him who discovers it. Such a dainty morsel (comp. ix. 10) is not laid by, as the other fruits which ripen at the usual time, which are afterwards eaten at table out of the dish or off the plate. This is the meaning of בעודה. The intentionally lengthened sentence יראה הראה אותה paints how the inquiring look passes slowly and gradually over the tree. The Prophet predicts not a hasty capture of the city (Samaria, as is known, did not fall till after a siege of three years, 2 Kings xvii. 5; SCHRADER, The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the O. T., p. 157 sqq.), but a change of affairs in general, which should take place in a surprisingly brief time, considering the proud security that then prevailed. If our prophecy was delivered in one of the first years of Hezekiah, it was fulfilled in such a manner that four or five years later a kingdom of Israel was no longer in existence. Of this no one could have had a presentiment when the Prophet uttered these words.

3 In that day——to the gate.—Vers. 5 and 6. It is self-evident that ביום הוא is again to be taken as a prophetic date, which is not to be judged according to the ordinary human measure. It simply intimates that when Ephraim has lost the deceptive earthly crown, Jehovah will take the place of it. Judgment must make it possible for the LORD to assume the place at the head of His people which belongs to Him. This has virtually and in principle taken place, as soon as judgment has done its work. But when and how this coronation will be outwardly exhibited, is known to God only. But although it should not happen till after thousands of years, still the word of the Lord is true, and faith may console itself with it in patience. שאר עמו is to be referred neither to the Israelites left in the land after the carrying away of the ten tribes, nor to the tribes of the kingdom of Judah, but to the total remnant primarily of Israel, of which those carried captive, yea, all who are still of the seed of Israel, form a part. For the Prophet here speaks first of all of Ephraim. This brief word of promise, vers. 5 and 6, makes, moreover, the impression as if the Prophet would herewith let Israel have his definite and complete portion of threatening and promise. For in what follows he refers to Judah only. But it is obvious, that Ephraim is included in the promises which are given to the remnant of all Israel (comp. on iv. 2 sqq.; vi. 13; vii. 3; x. 20 sqq.). The expression עטרת צבי is found only here. We frequently meet with עטרת תפארת (Prov. iv. 9; xvi. 31; Isa. lxii. 3; Jer. xiii. 18; Ezek. xvi. 12; xxiii. 42). But Isaiah has here preferred for the sake of the assonance to join תפארה with the term צפירה (from צפר in orbem ivit, orbiculus, hoop, diadem, besides only Ezek. vii. 7, 10). But Jehovah will be not only the source of the highest honor for His people, but also the source of the wisdom and strength so much wanted in the present time. Jehovah Himself, who is one with His Spirit, will fill the judges as a spirit of judgment. (Comp. iv. 4; comp. xi. 1 and 1 Kings xxii. 22). ישב על המשפט can mean to sit over a forensic cause as over the object submitted to the judge, and we may compare such places as 1 Sam. xxv. 13 יֵשְׁבוּ עַל־הַכֵּלִים. Or על stands in a modified signification equivalent to אֶל (לְ), and such places as 1 Sam. xx. 24 וַיֵּשֶׁב עַל־הַלֶּחֶם and Ps. xxix. 10 לַמַּבּוּל יָשָׁב ׳׳ may be compared. לְ is wanting before מְשִׁיבֵי. The לְ which stands in the corresponding ליושב is to be regarded as carrying its force over to this clause. (Comp. xxx. 1; xlviii. 17; lxi. 7). To turn back the war towards the gate is to be understood of the repulse of the enemy either to the gate through which he entered, or back even to the enemy's own gate. (2 Sam. xi. 23; 2 Kings xviii. 8; 1 Maccab. v. 22.)

4. But they also have erred——no place clean.—Vers. 7, 8. The Prophet now turns from Samaria to Jerusalem. With אֵלֶּה he points to his own countrymen in particular. They, too, are seized by a spirit of giddiness which arises from the fearfully prevailing vice of literal drunkenness. The Prophet ingeniously depicts the extent and intensity of this vice, through the accumulation of words related in form: Shagu—ta-u,—shagu—ta-u, shagu—paku. We hear and see as it were the reeling and staggering of the drunken company. שָׁגָה, to reel, is used only here by Isaiah, תעה of a drunken person, also xix. 14 comp. xxi. 4. How fearfully the vice of drunkenness had spread is seen from the fact that even priests and Prophets were addicted to it, and that not only in their private life; but they even performed their official functions in a state of intoxication. This is strictly forbidden in the law. Lev. x. 8, 9 (comp. Ezek. xliv. 21). The expression נבלעו מן־היין occurs only here. It does not mean that they in consequence of drinking wine have been swallowed up one of another. מִן does not here mark what is mediately or remotely causal; but it denotes the immediate cause. The wine itself has swallowed up those who greedily swallowed it (comp. ver. 4). Not only has the carouser the fit of intoxication, but the fit of intoxication has him. ראֶה stands only here for רֹאִי (Gen. xvi. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 12 et saepe) as חֹזֶה vers. 15 for חָזוּת. Even in such moments when they should be under the influence of the Spirit of God alone, they are by a blasphemous perversion under the influence of the spirit of alcohol. Not less wicked is it when judges, who should speak judgment in the name and Spirit of God (Exod. xviii. 15 sq.; Deut. i. 17; xix. 17; 2 Chron. xix. 6), appear governed by that infernal spirit while performing this sacred function. That pronouncing judgment in the highest instance pertained to a priestly tribunal, may be seen from Deut. xvii. 8 sqq. Comp. xix. 17; Herzog, R.-Encycl. V. p. 58. The wickedness, therefore, of these priestly judges appears so much the greater. For they sit in a commission that has not trifling matters, but the most difficult and important causes to decide. Every one may convince himself that the Prophet has not said too much of the drunkenness of those people, who will take the trouble to visit the places where they sit. He will find there palpable traces of it; all tables full of filthy vomit (קִיא xix. 14 vomit, צֹאָה from יָצָא excrementa, sordes, dirt, iv. 4; xxxvi. 12), and consequently, no place to sit on, or to lay anything (בלי especially frequent in Job viii. 11; xxiv. 10; xxxi. 39; xxxiii. 9 et saepe; in Isaiah v. 13, 14; xiv. 6; xxxii. 10; מקום comp. v. 8).

5. Whom shall He teach—— there a little.—Vers. 9 and 10. In these words the Prophet lets his drunken adversaries themselves come on the scene. He makes them utter scoffing words, that he may give the same back to them in another sense as a threatening of punishment. They are themselves Prophets and Priests, and therefore full grown men, educated men, and not children. They, therefore, ask indignantly: Does he—namely the Prophet of Jehovah—not know whom he has before him? To whom does he think that he has to impart right knowledge? (דעה xi. 9). To whom has he to give understanding by his preaching? (שמועה ver. 19 and besides only liii. 1, in the signification "preaching, announcement" = the Greek ἀκοή Rom. x. 16, 17; in another signification Isa. xxxvii. 7). Is it to little children who have just been weaned from the milk (xi. 8), removed from the breasts (עַתִּיק in this sense only here in Isaiah)? And now the Prophet exhibits them as ridiculing the tenor of his preaching in monosyllabic words, which by their sound and repetition are designed to produce merriment, while he at the same time turns his opponents into ridicule, as these monosyllabic words admirably represent the stammering of a person intoxicated. צַו from צִוָּה is praeceptum (besides here only Hos. v. 11); קָו (comp. ver. 17; xviii. 2, 7; xxxiv. 11, 17; xliv. 13) is cord, measuring cord, direction, rule. They reproach the Prophet with bringing forward a mass of little sentences, precepts, rules in wearisome repetition, and without a right plan and order, here a little, there a little (זְעֵיר besides Job xxxvi. 2, comp. מִזְעָר x. 25; xvi. 14; xxiv. 6; xxix. 17). The contemptuous designation σπερμολόγος which the Athenian Philosophers gave the Apostle Paul, has been fitly compared (Acts xvii. 18).

6. For with stammering——and taken.—Vers. 11–13. The Prophet replies to this mocking speech, and concedes that it is to a certain extent accurate and just. For these scoffing words will indeed be spoken. But not as those drunkards think. For (כִּי ver. 11) the Lord will speak them to them by a foreign and hostile people, whose utterances will be to them as stammering and strange jargon. לָעֵג balbutiens, balbus, barbarus is found besides only Ps. xxxv. 16. In chap. xxxiii. 19 Isaiah uses in the same sense, and likewise of the Assyrian language the participle Niphal נִלְעָג. It is easy to conceive that the Assyrian language, as being much less cultivated than their own, and having only the three fundamental vowels a, i, u, made upon the Israelites the impression of being as the lisping of children. What a Nemesis! Because this people to whom the Lord spake words of comfort in its own mother tongue would not hear them, it must hear from the enemy's mouth harsh sounds, which fall on the ear like the scoffing words uttered against the Prophet, but have a quite different meaning; for they are words of command intending the destruction of the vanquished and captured people. The words זאת המנוחה are taken from Micah ii. 10. Micah there reproaches the false Prophets with withholding from the people the genuine word of God, which is affectionate and kind, and with instigating the people with lies to forsake that wherein it would truly find rest. [This is hardly the sense of the passage referred to in Micah.—D. M.]. In opposition to this Isaiah characterizes the genuine preaching of Jehovah by the words זאת המנוחה. For justly in reference to that of which the false Prophets say לֹא־זֹאת הַמְּנוּחָה, the real Prophet must say זֹאת הַמְּנוּחָה. This true "rest of the people of God," says Isaiah, Jehovah has not merely shown from afar. He has also commanded to put the weary souls longing for salvation in possession of it, (הָנִיחַ to procure rest for one, xiv. 3), and has offered the place of rest, i. e., the real means of grace and salvation. מנוחה means elsewhere, place of rest; but here I take it in the sense of rest (comp. lxvi. 1) in opposition to מַרְגֵּעָה the place of rest (ἀπ. λεγ. Comp. Jer. vi. 16). Isaiah, in thus referring to a word of his colleague Micah, which he confirms and applies, reaches him here again the fraternal hand. The words appear too general for us to find any political allusions in them. When in ver. 13 the scornful words of the Prophet's adversaries are employed as a weapon turned against themselves, it seems to me that what makes it possible to put them in the enemies' mouth lies not merely in the effect upon the ear, in the resemblance to stammering sounds, but in the actual meaning also. As we found in קַו־קָו, xviii. 2, 7 the meaning of a short, sharp order, this meaning seems still more to lie in the present place. The Israelites will hear nothing but such short, monosyllabic words. But they will be words full of meaning, whose effect will be seen in what we read at the close of ver. 13. For to fall backward and be broken and snared and taken captive will be the doom of the presumptuous people. Ver. 13 b, from וְכָשְׁלוּ, is an almost literal reproduction of viii. 15.

2. THE FALSE AND THE TRUE REFUGE.

Chapter XXVIII. 14–22.

14 Wherefore hear the word of the Lord, ye scornful men,
That rule this people which is in Jerusalem:
15 Because ye have said,
We have made a covenant with death,
And with [a]hell are we at agreement;
When the overflowing scourge shall pass through,
It shall not come unto us:
For we have made lies our refuge,
And under falsehood have we hid ourselves:
16 Therefore thus saith the Lord God,
Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone,
A tried stone, a precious corner stone,
A sure foundation:
He that believeth shall not [b]make haste.

17 Judgment also will I lay to the line,
And righteousness to the plummet:
And the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies,
And the waters shall overflow the hiding-place.
18 And your covenant with death shall be disannulled,
And your agreement with [c]hell shall not stand;
When the overflowing scourge shall pass through,
Then ye shall be [1]trodden down by it.
19 [d]From the time that it goeth forth it shall take you:
For morning by morning shall it pass over,
By day and by night;
And it shall be a vexation only [2]to understand the report.
20 For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it;
And the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it.
21 For the LORD shall rise up as in mount Perazim,
He shall be wroth as in the valley of Gibeon,
That he may do his work, his strange work;
And bring to pass his act, his strange act.
22 Now therefore be ye not mockers,
Lest your bands be made strong;
For I have heard from the Lord GOD of hosts a consumption,
Even determined upon the whole earth.

[1] Heb. a treading down to it. [2] Or, when he shall make you to understand doctrine.
[a] Sheol. [b] flee. [c] Sheol. [d] as often as.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 15. שׁוֹט שׁוֹטֵף. So we are to read with the K'ri, 1, because the Kethibh שַׁיִט has in xxxiii. 21 the signification "oar," which is not suitable here; 2, on account of the assonance with שׁוֹטֵף, which would otherwise be lost; 3, because in ver. 18 b there is a blending of two figures for the sake of the alliteration. For שׁוֹט is a scourge (x. 26), and שׁטף is to overflow, inundate (comp. on ver. 2). A scourge when swung makes a flowing motion; but it does not inundate, overflow. Only the divine judgments do this, and these for another reason can be called the scourge of God. The K'ri יַעֲבֹר, which is both supported and discountenanced by ver. 18, is anyhow unnecessary, for the perfect can be taken as a futurum exactum (comp. iv. 4; vi. 11).

Ver. 16. The Dagesh forte in מוּסָּד is manifestly intended to distinguish the word as a participle from the substantive מוּסָד.

Ver. 20. Hithp. השׂתרע se extendere, porrigere, only here, Kal שׂרע only Lev. xxi. 18; xxii. 23.

Ver. 21. On the absence of the preposition of place before הַר and עֵמֶק, comp. i. 26; v. 18, 29; x. 14; GESENIUS Gr., § 118, 3, note.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Those scoffers, who are here described as the rulers of the people in Jerusalem, had naturally a foundation on which they rested, in opposition to the foundation of the Prophet which they derided. Their foundation was falsehood and deceit, by the aid of which they hoped that they would have nothing to fear from death and Hades. (Vers. 14 and 15). Against this foundation the LORD now says to them: I have laid in Zion my strong corner—and foundation—stone: only he who holds fast to it will not yield (ver. 16). And on this foundation-stone the building shall be erected by means of judgment and righteousness; but the flood of waters will sweep away that refuge of lies (ver. 17). And that covenant with death and Sheol will not stand. They who made it, shall be trodden down by those who shall come upon them as the scourge of God (ver. 18). That scourge, moreover, shall come not only once, but repeatedly by day and night. Then shall they hear no more a preaching by word, but a preaching by deed; and it will be nothing but terror (19). For Israel's might will then prove too weak (ver. 20). But the LORD will rise in might as formerly on Mount Perazim, and in the valley of Gibeon, in order to execute His very strange work of destruction, which appears to the secure Jews impossible (ver. 21). Therefore the scoffers should be quiet, that they may not remain forever in the snares mentioned ver. 13; for that they should not escape from them is announced by the Prophet as the decree of Jehovah, which cannot be averted (ver. 22). We perceive, therefore, that the section vers. 14-22 corresponds exactly to the preceding one vers. 1-13, and especially to the vers. 9-13. For here the right foundation is set in opposition to that false one, resting on which those scoffers think that they may deride the Prophet (vers. 14-17); then the vanity, yea destructiveness of that false foundation is shown (vers. 18-21), and the scoffers are accordingly exhorted to give up their mocking (ver. 22).

2. Therefore hear—hid ourselves.—Vers.

14, 15. With לָכֵן, ver. 14, the Prophet introduces the judgment of the Lord, which he has to publish on the ground of the accusation preferred vers. 9–13. This judgment is addressed to the scoffers (Prov. xxix. 8), whose derisive speeches (ver. 10) are quoted, and who, after the judgment has been pronounced, are exhorted to mock no more (ver. 22). These scoffers are not insignificant men. They are the leaders of the people (xvi. 1; lii. 5), its Priests and Prophets (ver. 7). כִּי in the beginning of ver. 15 is "because;" the illative particle לָכֵן in ver. 16 corresponding to it. The utterance is put in the mouths of these people, which if not actually spoken by them, yet certainly corresponds to their actual conduct: we have made a covenant with death, etc. This explains why these people scoffed at the Prophet. They stand with their whole manner of thinking and feeling upon another foundation than his. Isaiah has the Lord Himself for his foundation. But they deride this very foundation. They have another and better, as they imagine. This is the art of falsehood, of cunning policy, of fine diplomacy. By its help they hope to be safe from death and Hades. The Prophet admonishes them to obey the Lord, and to trust in Him in order to find protection against Assyria. But in their opinion these are fanatical means of defence, which good policy could not employ. An alliance with Egypt, artfully planned, carried out with all diplomatic skill, appeared to those politicians to be a much more reliable, yea an infallible remedy against the threatening evils. For they hope through that alliance to be proof against death and Hades. They imagine that they have thereby as it were concluded a friendly alliance with death and Hades (כרת ברית as lv. 3; lxi. 8). חֹזֶה (comp. רֹאֶה ver. 7), for which below in ver. 18 חָזוּת stands, has only here the signification "treaty, agreement." The lie of which they speak, may well refer to the relation of dependence on Assyria into which Ahaz, the predecessor of Hezekiah, had brought Judah (2 Kings xvi. 7 sqq.). For they may even then have considered the right policy to consist in a secret league with Egypt, while appearing to stand by the obligations entered into towards Assyria. A like course was subsequently pursued (2 Kings xvii. 4; Ezek. xvii. 15, sqq.). The conjunction of חסה and סתר is characteristic of Isaiah, comp. ver. 17 and iv. 6.

3. Therefore thus saith —— the whole earth.—Vers. 16–22. The scoffers had declared that they had made falsehood their refuge, and that they hope relying on this refuge, to get the better of death and Hades. The Prophet wishes to expose the vanity of this hope. There is only one refuge that guarantees safety. This is the foundation, and corner-stone laid by the Lord Himself in Zion. The water sweeps away the other false foundation, and they who rest upon it go to ruin. Our passage contains, therefore, primarily not a promise, but a threatening. For first of all, the confidence expressed in ver. 15 is to be shown to be unfounded. But naturally the (unreal, resting only on appearance) negation of the truth can be overcome only by the positive setting forth of the truth. And where this real positive foundation of truth is exhibited, it involves always eo ipso a promise. לָכֵן, as has been shown, corresponds to the כִּי in ver. 15. The false affirmation necessitates a protest in which the truth is testified. הִנְנִי הוּא אֲשֶׁר יִסַּד is = הנני יסד comp. xxix. 14; xxxviii. 5. But what sort of a stone is that which the Lord has laid in Zion? It must be a stone which really guarantees truth and right. Consequently it cannot be Zion itself (Hitzig, Knobel), nor the royal house of David (Reinke), nor Hezekiah (Rabbis, Gesenius, Maurer and others; which explanation Theodoret characterizes as ἄνοια ἐσχάτη), nor the temple (Ewald). As Isaiah does not say that they had made Egypt their refuge, but that they had made falsehood their refuge, the antithesis to this refuge of lies can only be a refuge of truth. As such we might, with Umbreit, regard the law, or, with Schegg, the word of God in general. But the law and the word of God, so far as they are laid in Zion as objective means of Salvation, suppose a still deeper, a personal foundation: the law supposes Him through whom the revelation of the law took place; the spoken and written word supposes the living, personal word of God Himself, the Logos (So the Catholic expositors Loch and Reischl, comp. Reinke, the Messianic Prophecies I. p. 404). The Logos, the only mediator between God and men, the Messiah promised in the Old Covenant, who has appeared in the New, this is the personal and living foundation-stone laid in Zion, on whom the whole building fitly framed together grows unto a holy (erected therefore according to the line of right and justice) building (Eph. iii. 20 sqq.). That the personal Word of the Lord can be called a stone, is apparent from viii. 14, where Jehovah Himself is called אֶבֶן and צור. It is not impossible that Isaiah had this last passage in view, and perhaps the composer of the 118th Psalm had in ver. 22 regard to both these passages of Isaiah. Anyhow Peter (1 Pet. ii. 6–8) combines these three places. The Lord Himself (Matt. xxi. 42–44) had in view the place in the Psalms and Isa. viii. 14 sq.; and Paul, Rom. ix. 33, refers to both places of Isaiah; while in Acts iv. 11 reference is made to the 118th Psalm only; and in Rom. x. 11, solely to the place before us. The stone laid in Zion is further called an אבן בחן, i. e., lapis probationis. The term בחן can be taken in an active or passive sense: a tried and a trying stone. The former would mark its tested firmness, the latter would express the idea, that the thoughts of the hearts must be made manifest by it. For no one can escape it, but all must be tried on it, and it must have some effect on all, and be either for their fall or rising. The passages Matt. xxi. 44; Luke ii. 34 speak strongly for the latter view. I do not dispute it, but I believe that the Prophet designedly chose an ambiguous expression. For the former interpretation is likewise recommended, being naturally suggested by the expression employed, and by the context. We expect to hear the nature of the stone extolled, and not merely to be told what service it can render. That the praise should be expressed in this particular form is in accordance with the usus lo- quendi observable in this chapter, in which so many designations of a property are denoted by a substantive in the genitive (vers. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 8). פִּנָּה is corner.—And a stone which forms the corner is naturally a corner-stone. (Comp. xix. 13; Job xxxviii. 6; Jer. li. 26; Ps. cxviii. 22). יִקְרַת is here, as perhaps also Ps. xxxvii. 20; Prov. xvii. 27, a substantive, preciousness, so that we must translate; a corner-stone of preciousness of a founded foundation (מוּסָד after the form מוּסָר, comp. 2 Chron. viii. 16; מוּסָדָה Isa. xxx. 32; Ezek. xli. 8; מוּסָּד Part Hoph.), i. e., a corner-stone well suited (1 Kings v. 31; vii. 9-11) for a firm foundation. The emphatic expression מוּסָד מוּסָּד is like חֲכָמִים מְחֻכָּמִים Prov. xxx. 24. We have already observed that the Prophet shows here a predilection for the accumulation of substantives in the genitive. The firm foundation-stone manifests its saving efficacy, not in a magical way; but this efficacy is conditioned by the inward susceptibility, or faith. The firm foundation itself requires a keeping fast to it. Therefore the Prophet adds: He who believes flees not.—This apothegmatic addition reminds us, both by its form and tenor, of chapter vii. 9 אִם לֹא תַאֲמִינוּ כִּי לֹא תֵאָמֵנוּ. הֶאֱמִין occurs further xxx. 21; xliii. 10; liii. 1. הֵחִישׁ is here not indirectly (to make something or another hasten, v. 19; lx. 22) but directly causative; to make haste, to flee hastily, to retreat. There lies in it an antithesis to the idea of firmness, which is contained in what is said of the stone, and in מַאֲמִין. The word has this meaning no where else. Where the firm foundation is objectively laid, and the individual subjectively in faith keeps fast on it, then the erection of a holy temple in the LORD is possible, an erection in which right serves for the line (קָו comp. on ver. 10), and righteousness for the plummet (מִשְׁקָלֶת only here, comp. מִשְׁקֹלֶת 2 Kings xxi. 13); a figurative expression, the meaning of which can be only this, that this building will arise according to the rules of divine justice, and will consequently be a holy building. מִשְׁפָּט and צְדָקָה stand here related as in i. 27; v. 16; ix. 6; xxxii. 16; xxxiii. 5; lvi. 1; lix. 9, 14. This building stands firm. But the refuge of lies and the hiding-place of deceit the hail will sweep away (יָעָה, whence יָע a shovel for the clearing away of ashes from the altar, Ex. xxvii. 3; xxxviii. 3; Numb. iv. 14 et saepe, is ἅπ. λεγ.) and the waters wash away (ver. 2). In consequence, that covenant with death and Hades, of which they boasted (ver. 15), shall be covered, i. e., obliterated, annulled. The covenant is conceived of as a written document, whose lines are covered, i. e., overspread with the fluid used for writing. Comp. obliterare offensionem, famam, memoriam. To לֹא יְבוֹאֵנוּ in verse 15, וִהְיִיתֶם לוֹ לְמִרְמָס corresponds. Comp. v. 5; vii. 25; x. 6. The Prophet here leaves the image out of sight. The expression is shaped by his realizing in thought the thing signified by the previous figure, namely, the invading host which serves as the scourge of God. This host shall stamp the scoffers under foot, shall tread them like dirt on the streets. The Prophet had expressly declared in x. 6 that the army of the Assyrians should do this. But the scourge will come not once only, but often. Ver. 19. The expression יִקַּח is suggested by another image, namely, the idea of something which takes away (Jer. xv. 15), snatches, washes away, corresponding therefore to שׁוֹטֵף, as a mighty flood which comes along by rushes. In fact, the invasions by the Assyrians and by the Chaldaeans, who were called to complete their work, were as waterfloods that kept ever inundating the land till it was entirely desolated (xxiv. 1, 3). The second half of ver. 19 is clearly related to יָבִין שְׁמוּעָה in ver. 9. There the scoffers had asked: to whom will he preach? They thought themselves much too high to need the preaching of the Prophet. In opposition to this language Isaiah now tells them: because you would not hear my well-meant preaching by word, which was designed to give you מְנוּחָה, you will be compelled to hear a preaching in act, and it will be naught but terror. זוָעָה stands therefore opposed to מְנוּחָה. If in ver. 9 הֵבִין שְׁמוּעָה signified "to make to know, or understand preaching," it must in the connexion in which it here stands signify "to hear preaching" (comp. xxix. 16; Job xxviii. 23; Micah iv. 12 et saepe). For it is not the preacher who experiences terror, but he who hears the preaching. זְוָעָה (only here in Isaiah, besides comp. Deut. xxviii. 25; Jer. xv. 4 et saepe; Ezek. xxiii. 46) is concussio, commotio vehemens, formido. The subject of the sentence is הָבִין and the predicate זְוָעָה. Is not that a dreadful preaching, when one finds himself in a situation which is fittingly compared to a bed that is too short, or to a covering that is too narrow?—This is a distressful condition. For resistance is encountered on all sides, and the means are insufficient for any undertaking. קָצַר in Isaiah besides only l. 2; lix. 1. מַצָּע stratum, ἅπ λεγ. מַסֵּכָה besides only xxv. 7. כָּנַס, colligere, coacervare, Hithp. se ipsum colligere, to make of one's self a heap, only here. כְּ in כְּהִתְכַּנֵּס marks coincidence = when one bends one's-self together, coils one's-self (xviii. 3; xxiii. 5). That such will really be the nature of the situation is now further illustrated by two historical examples. Israel will themselves be in a condition like that in which they through God's help twice brought their enemies. One of these events to which the Prophet here alludes, is the defeat which David inflicted on the Philistines at Baal-Perazim (2 Sam. v. 20; 1 Chr. xiv. 11). David there said פָּרַץ ״ אֶת־אֹיְבַי לְפָנַי כְּפֶרֶץ מָיִם. i. e., Jehovah has broken through my enemies before me, as water breaks through. VITRINGA perceived that Isaiah was led to think of this passage by what he had said in ver. 17 and ver. 2 of the מַיִם שֹׁטְפִים. The other event I take, with most of the older interpreters, to be the defeat which Joshua inflicted on the Canaanites at Gibeon (Jos. x. 10). There, in ver. 11, it is said expressly that the LORD crushed the enemy by a great hail-storm. And this circumstance corresponds exactly to what Isaiah in verse 2 and verse 17 had said of the hail from which Israel should suffer. That victory of David over the Philistines at Gibeon (2 Sam. v. 22 sqq.; 1 Chron. xiv. 14 sqq.) does not supply such an analogy. ירגז comp. on xiv. 9. זר מעשהו (comp. v. 12) and נכריה עבדתו (ii. 6) are parenthetical clauses, and not in apposition to the preceding מעשהו and עבדתו; for the putting of the adjective first would in that case be quite abnormal. Strange, inconceivable is the work of the LORD pronounced, because He does something which could not have been expected of Him. Who could have thought that Jehovah would treat Israel as the heathen, that He would thus destroy His own work? After all these statements we see how foolish and infatuated the people were in scoffing at the warning voice of the Prophet, and in relying on their own miserable, self-chosen supports (ver. 15). The admonition which the Prophet adds at the close, and now be ye not mockers is well-meant, and deserving to be laid to heart. Hithp. התלוצץ = to behave mockingly, is found only here. If they do not cease to mock, the bands by which they have been bound ever since Ahaz foolishly made submission to Assyria (2 Kings xvi. 7 sqq.), can never be broken. For that they must bear these bands, and become acquainted with the nature of them, that is the purpose of God, resolved on, and already revealed to the Prophet. On כלה ונחרצה comp. on x. 23.

THE CHASTISEMENT IN MEASURE.

CHAP. XXVIII. 23–29.

23 Give ye ear, and hear my voice;
Hearken, and hear my speech.
24 Doth the plowman plow all day to sow?
Doth he open and break the clods of his ground?
25 When he hath made plain the face thereof,
Doth he not cast abroad the fitches,
And scatter the cummin,
And cast in [1a]the principal wheat,
And the appointed barley,
And the [2]rie in their [3]place?
26 [4b]For his God doth instruct him to discretion,
And doth teach him.
27 For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument,
Neither is a cartwheel turned about upon the cummin;
But the fitches are beaten out with a staff,
And the cummin with a rod.
28 [c]Bread corn is bruised;
Because he will not ever be threshing it,
Nor break it with the wheel of his cart,
Nor bruise it with his horsemen.
29 This also cometh forth from the LORD of hosts,
Which is wonderful in counsel,
And excellent in [d]working.

[1] Or, the wheat in the principal place, and barley in the appointed place. [2] Or, spelt.
[3] Heb. border. [4] Or, and he bindeth it in such sort as his God doth teach him.

[a] Wheat in rows and barley in the appointed place. [b] and he beats it properly; his God teaches him this.
[c] Is bread corn crushed? [d] helping.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 25. נִסְמָן is ἅπ. λεγ. It seems to be part. Niphal which denotes "marked off, designated by סִימָנִים." This נסמן is to be considered as accus. loci "in the place marked off."

Ver. 28. אָדוּשׁ, if there be not a clerical mistake, is to be derived from a form אָדֻשׁ, which does not elsewhere occur.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. As the Prophet could not leave the brief word concerning Ephraim (vers. 1–4) without a consolatory conclusion (vers. 5 and 6), so he cannot conclude the word directed against Jerusalem (ver. 14) without making at the close of its rebukes an announcement of salvation. This he does by employing a parable drawn from agriculture. He does not interpret the parable in clear terms. Therefore, before uttering it, he calls for attentive reflection (ver. 23). Then he sets forth the parable. It has, we may say, a double point. First, the Prophet makes us observe that the farmer does not always plough, does not always as it were lacerate the ground with sharp coulter or pointed harrow (ver. 24). No, he casts into the bosom of the earth good seed of various kinds (ver. 25). Moreover, the fruit produced from the seed, which can be divested of its integuments only by the application of a certain force, is yet not too severely handled by him, nor is equal force applied to all kinds of fruit, but he is careful in his treatment as the nature of things appointed by God teaches him (ver. 26). For, not a threshing sledge, or threshing roller is applied to the more tender kinds of fruit, as the cummin, but only a staff (ver. 27). Even the corn-fruits that yield bread are not so threshed that the grain is crushed thereby (ver. 28). That, too, has been arranged by the LORD, that His wonderful wisdom in counsel, and His great power to help may be known (ver. 29). The operations of ploughing and threshing, which are necessary for seed time and harvest, should therefore teach Israel in symbol the certainty that the temporal judgments which they must endure are only correctives in the hand of God, from which Israel will come forth as glorious fruit cleansed and purified.

2. Give ye ear——in their place.—Vers. 23–25. The summons to pay attention (comp. as to the words 1, 2 and xxxii. 9), is owing to the character of the following speech. As it is an ingenious parable, it is necessary for the hearer to consider it with attention and reflection, that its meaning may be apparent to him. כל היום ver. 24, i. e., continually, perpetually. The expression is found in Isaiah usually in this signification li. 13; lii. 5; lxii. 6; lxv. 2, 5. The addition לזרע might appear superfluous. But the Prophet wishes to intimate that the end in view is cultivation of the soil, and not merely clearing away of vegetation for any other purpose, such as for building a house. This expression לזרע conveys a pre-intimation that the LORD's procedure towards His people is not simply of a destructive character, no mere negation without positively designing their salvation. הכל היום is to be connected also with the second half of ver. 24 (Jer. xlix. 7). פִּתַּח is only here used of opening, turning over, ploughing the earth. Yet its use to denote engraving in wood or stone is analogous: Comp. Exod. xxviii. 9, 36; 1 Kings vii. 36, et saepe. שִׂדֵּד occare, to harrow, besides here only Job xxxix. 10; Hos. x. 11. The suffix in אדמתו delicately expresses the affection which the farmer cherishes to his own land. Because it is dear to him, he will not wish to injure it. שִׁוָּה occurs in the sense of aequavit, complanavit only here (Piel besides in Isaiah xxxviii. 13). The Prophet has evidently before his mind a large farm regularly laid out in various kinds of fruits. קֶצַח [not fitches as in E. V., but] black cummin (nigella arvensis, common black cummin, or more probably nigella damascena, garden black cummin, which grows wild near the Mediterranean) occurs only in this place. כַּמֹּן cummin, common cummin, carum carvi, which belongs to a different order from that of the black cummin (namely to the umbelliferae, while the other belongs to the ranunculaceae), is mentioned in the Old Testament only here. שָׂם is the proper expression for the placing or planting of the wheat, in reference to which GESENIUS remarks: "Industrious farmers in the Orient plant as they do garden plants, many kinds of grain which with us are only sown (NIEHBUHR's Arabien, p. 157); they thrive when planted much better. (Comp. PLINIUS, Hist. Nat. xviii. 21)." שׂוֹרָה, ἁπ. λεγ. is identical with the Talmudic and Arabic שׂוֹרָה series, row, order. The planting of wheat spoken of, is done in rows (שׂוֹרָה accus. loci). כֻּסֶּמֶת [rye E. V.], according to an excursus of Consul WETZSTEIN, in DELITZSCH's Commentary on Isaiah, is a variety of the common vetch (vicia sativa) the Kursenne. According to the passage before us this plant, which is eaten by cattle much less readily than barley, would be planted around the corn fields as a border or enclosure, in order to serve to protect the nobler kinds of grain, as according to WETZSTEIN, ut supra, the Ricinus is at present employed for this purpose. גְּבוּלָה (Sing. only here, Plur. x. 13) confinium, the border, enclosure. The Suffix in גבולתו is to be referred to some such term as a piece of ground (שָׂדֶה) which is not expressed, but is supposed in what has been previously said.

3. For his God——teach him.—Vers. 26–29. [Dr. NAEGELSBACH renders this verse: "He (the farmer, beats (corrects) it properly, his God so teaches him." But the E. V. is correct (comp. Prov. xxxi. 1) D. M.]. The Prophet does not think of the heathen fables of Isis and Osiris, Bacchus and Ceres, etc. In what follows the way and manner in which the farmer takes fruits from their husks is spoken of. And here there is a two-fold procedure, a part of the fruits is not threshed in the oriental manner, by means of a threshing sledge or threshing roller, but is beaten out with a staff. To this class belong black cummin and cummin—חָרוּץ, acutus, (the full designation is מוֹרַג חָרוּץ Isa. xl. 15) is the threshing instrument, which consisted either of planks only, or of planks with rollers among them. Those planks and rollers were fitted with sharp iron or stones, which tore the ears of grain

(comp. Herzog, R.-Encycl. III. p. 504). The word is found besides only Job xli. 22; Amos i. 3. [Comp. the Latin tribula, a similar threshing machine, whence tribulation, lit, a subjection to the tribula.—D.M.]. אופן עגלה, wheel of the wagon, denotes the last mentioned sort of threshing instrument; whether its rollers were themselves movable, and therefore at the same time wheels, or were immovable, and were drawn by the wheels. יוסב denotes not the turning round of the wagon, its going in a circle, but the turning of the wheels. For סב is also used of the turning of a door on its hinge (Prov. xxvi. 14; Ezek. xli. 24). יחבט comp. on xxvii. 12. לחם יודק must be taken as a question (Hitzig, Knobel, Delitzsch); Is bread-corn crushed? Answer; No! For not incessantly, i. e., till the grain is completely bruised does he thresh it, or drive the wheels of his wagon, and his horses over it. He does not crush it The other explanation: it is crushed into bread, (i. e., afterwards in the mill, but not in the threshing), for not incessantly, etc.—is refuted by the necessity of understanding before כִּי לֹא the words indicated as required to complete the sense; while according to our explanation only the simple "no" must be supplied, and it is implied in the question. לחם is here as σῖτος bread-corn comp. xxx. 23; xxxvi. 17; Gen. xlvii. 17; Ps. civ. 14. The Prophet distinguishes from the various species of cummin the proper bread-corn, whose grains are harder to separate from the husk. דקק besides in Isaiah only xli. 15. הָמַם, concitare, to drive, only here in Isaiah. Ver. 29 גם זאת וגו׳ namely, this procedure of the farmer, comp. ver. 26, יֹורֶנּוּ. That the punishments spoken of vers. 14–22 proceed from Jehovah, needed not to be particularly affirmed. But that this so simple, unpretending, customary procedure of the farmer is a shell wherein a kernel of divine wisdom is concealed, and therefore according to God's intention a means of teaching men such wisdom—this might well be set forth and emphatically affirmed.

הפליא in Isaiah only here and xxix. 14. God manifests wonderfully wise counsel, both in the ordinances of nature, and in His direction of history, for which latter the former work serves as a type full of instruction and comfort. But the aim of this wonderful wisdom is salvation (תושיה only here in Isaiah). It seems to me more appropriate to take the word in the meaning "salvation" (Job vi. 13; xxx. 22; Prov. ii. 7; Micah vi. 9), because the idea of "wisdom" is so nearly related to that of "counsel," that almost a tautology would arise from the translation wisdom. It is certainly reasonable to expect that the Prophet in a place like the present, in which the whole fulness of his thoughts is compressed, should in significant, closing words combine in two different words two specifically different thoughts.

[But God's counsel and wisdom, as nearly related ideas, can be very properly extolled together at the close of this chapter. The rendering of the last word תּוּשִׁיָּה by working in the E. V. is warranted neither by the usus loquendi nor by etymology. The Prophet here simply magnifies the Lord's counsel and wisdom.—D. M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On chap. xxviii. 1–4. A glorious city on a hill overlooking a broad, fertile plain, when the Lord is not its foundation and crown. What is it else than one of the vanities over which the preacher laments (Ecclus. ii. 4 sqq.)? Samaria and Jerusalem, Nineveh and Babylon have fallen. Cannot Paris, and London, and Berlin [and New York] also fall? How vain and transitory is the pomp of men! [All travellers unite in praising the situation of Samaria for its fertility, beauty and strength. But "the crown of pride" has been trodden under foot.—D. M.]

2. On vers. 7, 8. Those words of Solomon are therefore to be remembered: it is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes strong drink; lest they drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted (Prov. xxxi. 4, 5). Most of all is drunkenness unseemly in preachers and teachers. Scripture enjoins that they should be sober and not given to wine (1 Tim. iii. 2, 3)." Renner. Can. Apost. 53: "Si clericus in caupona comedens deprehensus fuerit, segregetur, paeterquam si in diversorio publico in via propter necessitatem diverterit." Can. 1: "Episcopus aut presbyter aut diaconus aleae et ebrietati deserviens aut desinat, aut condemnetur." [What! a priest, a prophet, a minister, and yet drunk! Tell it not in Gath. Such a scandal are they to their coat. Ver. 8. All tables are full of vomit, etc. "See what an odious thing the sin of drunkenness is—what an affront it is to human society; it is rude and ill-mannered enough to sicken the beholders."—Henry.—D. M.] In accordance with the rabbinical usage, which not seldom puts מָקוֹם by a metonymy for God, the expression here employed, בלי מקם, is translated in Pirke Aboth III. 3: "without God." [The passage of the Mishna referred to runs thus: Rabbi Simeon says, Three who have eaten at one table, and have not spoken at it words of the law, are as if they ate of sacrifices to the dead; for it is said, for all their tables are full of vomit and filth, without מָקוֹם," i. e., place, God the place of all things, or who contains all things. Of course this is only an ingenious diversion of the language of Isaiah from its real meaning.—D. M.]

3. Ver. 9 sqq. "This is the language of scorners and the ungodly, who have always mocked and railed at God's word and its ministers. Job, Jeremiah and David must be their song and mocking-stock (Job xxx. 9; Lam. iii. 63; Ps. lxix. 13). If such dear men of God could not render all the people more pious, what will happen in our age in which there will be no lack of mockers (2 Pet. iii. 3)? Cramer."

4. Ver. 13. "The severe and yet well-deserved punishment for contempt of the word of God is that they who are guilty of it fall, and not only fall, but also are broken, and not only are broken, but also are snared and taken. For when they have not the love of the truth, God sends them strong delusions that they should believe a lie, that they all might be condemned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness (2 Thess. ii. 10)." CRAMER.

5. On ver. 15. This is the direct reverse of trust in God. The people of whom the Prophet here speaks believe themselves secure from death and hell because they had made a friendly alliance with them. And the sign of this covenant is their setting their hope on lies and hypocrisy. For the devil is the father of lies (John viii. 44). He who is in league with him must lie, and learns to lie to the highest perfection. But the fools who have built their hope on this master—and their mastery in lying—must at last, as their righteous punishment, see that they are themselves deceived. For the devil urges a man into the swamp of wickedness, and when he sticks so deep in it that he cannot get out, then he leaves the deluded being in the lurch, and appears as an accuser against him. Hence he is called not only tempter (πειράζων), but also accuser (διάβολος, κατήγωρ, Rev. xii. 10).

6. On ver. 16. "Christ is the head and foundation-stone of the Christian Church, and another foundation cannot be laid (1 Cor. iii. 11; Acts iv. 11). There is, moreover, no other means of laying hold of Christ than faith, whose effect and property it is to be confident of what we hope for, and not to doubt of what we do not see (Heb. xi. 1)." CRAMER. [The image of faith here given is that of a stone resting on a foundation by which it is supported and sustained. When we are told that "he that believeth shall not make haste or flee," we are taught the confidence, composure and peace which trust in the Lord Jesus Christ imparts.—D. M.]

7. On ver. 17 sqq. "He who relies on his own wisdom, strength, riches, or righteousness, on the help of man, on the intercession of the saints, on letters of indulgence and such like, he makes to himself a false refuge, and cannot endure, but builds his house on a quicksand." CRAMER. ["They that make any thing their hiding-place but Christ, the waters shall overflow it, as every shelter but the ark was overtopped and overthrown by the waters of the deluge." HENRY.—D. M.]

8. On ver. 19. "People who are not tried are inexperienced, and have a merely speculative religion, which is of no advantage to them. "Meditatio, oratio, tentatio faciunt Theologum." LUTHER. "As long as all is well with us, and we have the enjoyment of life, there is too much noise around us, and we cannot hear the voice of God. Every affliction is a wilderness, in which a man is in solitude and stillness, so that he understands better the word of God. Every tribulation is a power of the soul. In the noisy day we have hearkened so much to the voices of men. In the wilderness there is quiet, and when human voices are silent, the voice of God begins to speak." THOLUCK.

9. On ver. 20. "Vexatio seu crux perinde est atque brevis lectus, in quo contrahendum est corpus, nisi algere velimus. Hoc est: Solus verbi auditus retinendus ac sequendus est. Tribulatio autem continet nos ceu in brevi lecto, nec sinit nos evagrari in nostra studia." LUTHER.

10. On ver. 21. ["This will be His strange work, His strange act, His foreign deed; it is work that He is backward to; He rather delights in showing mercy, and does not afflict willingly; it is work that He is not used to; as to His own people, He protects and favors them; it is a strange work indeed if He turn to be their enemy and fight against them (lxiii. 10); it is a work that all the neighbors will stand amazed at. Deut. xxix. 24." HENRY.—D. M.]

11. On ver. 22. "Nolite evangelium et verbum habere pro fabula, alioquin fiet, ut magis constringamini et implicemini efficacioribus erroribus ut fiatis improbi ad omne bonum opus." LUTHER.

12. On vers. 23 sqq. "God Himself is the husbandman. The field is the Church on earth. Before it can bring forth fruit, it must be ploughed and prepared. The plough is the cross of trial, when the ploughers make their furrows long upon our backs (Ps. cxxix. 3). The seed is the imperishable word of God (1 Pet. i. 23). The rain is the Holy Ghost who gives the increase (Isa. xliv. 3; 1 Cor. iii. 6). Further, when the fruit is gathered in, if men will bake bread out of it, it must be threshed. This is done not for its destruction, but with such moderation as the nature of the grain can bear. The practical application is that we learn to yield ourselves to such husbandry of God, and bear with patience what God does to us. For He knows according to His supreme wisdom to order every thing, that we may be His grain, and good, pure bread upon His table of shew-bread." CRAMER.

13. ["We see (1) The reason of afflictions. It is for the same reason which induces the farmer to employ various methods on his farm. (2) We are not to expect the same unvarying course in God's dealings with us. (3) We are not to expect always the same kind of afflictions. We may lay it down as a general rule that the divine judgments are usually in the line of our offences; and by the nature of the judgment we may usually ascertain the nature of the sin. (4) God will not crush or destroy His people. The farmer does not crush or destroy his grain. (5) We should therefore bear afflictions and chastisements with patience. God is good and wise." BARNES.—D. M.]

14. On ver. 26. [Where men do not cultivate the corn-plants, wheat, rye, barley, etc., the cerealia, as they are called, they are in the condition of savages. Savages live on what comes to hand without patient culture. Man could never have learned the cultivation of the corn-plants without being taught by God. The cerealia do not grow as other annuals, spontaneously or by the dispersion and germination of their seed. If left to themselves, they quickly become extinct. They do not grow wild in any part of the world. Their seed must be sown by man in ground carefully prepared to receive it. But while human culture is necessary for the growth and propagation of corn-plants, man is naturally ignorant of their use and value. It would never have occurred to man to prepare the soil for wheat-seed at a particular time of the year, and to wait many months for the grain that would ripen in the ear; and then to grind the hard seeds, and to mix them with water, and to bake this paste is what man, left to himself, would never have thought of. The fact that we have corn-plants alive on the earth at this day demonstrates that they must have been called into existence when man was on the earth to cultivate them, and that man must have been taught by a Higher Power to do so, and to use them for his support. It is then a matter that can be established by the clearest and most convincing evidence, that God, as the Prophet here tells us, instructed the plowman to plow, to open and break the clods of the ground, and to cast in the wheat and barley. (Vers. 24, 25.) These may appear to us now simple operations. But they must have been at first taught to man by God in order that wheat and barley, and the other cereals which He had made for the use of man, might be preserved on the earth. Beside the natural powers furnished us by God, to whom we owe the capacity of knowledge and the lessons given by Providence in external nature, God still teaches the husbandman through that primeval revelation of the art of agriculture made to man when He put him into the garden to dress it and to keep it.—D. M.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xxviii. 1–6. "In the light of this word of God let the glorious acts of God (the fall of Paris, etc.) be to us a mighty proclamation: 1) of God's judgment, 2) of God's grace." FROMMEL, Zeitpredigten, Heidelberg, 1873.

2. On vers. 11 and 12. An earnest warning voice to our people. It bids us consider 1) What the Lord has hitherto in kindness offered to us (How rest may be had is preached to us Matth. xi. 28 sq.); 2) How we have received what has been offered to us (We will not have such preaching); 3) What the Lord for our punishment will hereafter offer to us (He will speak with mocking lips and with another tongue unto this people).

3. On vers. 14–20. Text for a political sermon such as might be delivered before a Christian court, or before an assembly of those who have influence on the direction of public affairs. God's word to those who direct the affairs of the State: 1) The false foundation: a. as to its nature (ver. 15), b. as to its consequences (vers. 17 b–20). 2) The true foundation: a. wherein it consists (ver. 16), b. the conditions of its efficacy (giving heed to the word, believing), c. its effects.

4. On vers. 16 and 17. The foundation and corner-stone of the Christian Church: 1) Who He is (Matth. xxi. 42; Acts iv. 11; Rom. ix. 33; 1 Pet. ii. 6 sq.). 2) How we partake of His blessing (He who believes flees not). 3) What salvation He brings us (ver. 17). Ver. 16 is often used as a text for discourses at the laying of the foundation-stone of churches.

5. On ver. 19. Affliction teaches us to give heed to the word. Affliction is the best instructress of the foolish heart of man; for it teaches us to know: 1) the vanity of earthly things, 2) the power to comfort and to save which lies solely in the benefits offered to us in the word of God.

6. On ver. 22. Warning to scoffers. God will accomplish in the whole world the triumph of His cause. Woe then to the scoffers. Their bands will only become the harder. They hurt themselves by their scoffing.

7. On ver. 23 sqq. Consolatory discourse. God does not always chastise. Chastisement is with Him only a means to an end, as with the husbandman ploughing and threshing. When the chastisement has reached its aim, it ceases. Let us therefore give heed unto the word, and the trial will not be continued.

8. [The Church is God's tilled land. 1 Cor. iii. 9. Paul tells the Corinthians: Ye are God's γεώργιον, God's tilled land. Christ has called His Father the γεωργός, the husbandman, John xv. 1. God does not leave us without culture. He treats us as the farmer does his field. He gives us, too, what corresponds to the rain and sunshine, in the influences of His Spirit. He employs means for making us fruitful. Comp. Heb. vi. 7, 8 as to the doom of those who fail to bring forth fruit—set forth by a metaphor taken from agriculture.—D. M.]

II.—THE SECOND WOE.

CHAPTER XXIX.

1. THE FOURFOLD ARIEL. CHAP. XXIX. 1–12.

1 WOE [1]to Ariel, to Ariel,
[2]The city where David dwelt!
Add ye year to year;
[a]Let them [3]kill sacrifices.
2 [b]Yet I will distress Ariel,
And there shall be heaviness and sorrow;
And it shall be unto me as Ariel.
3 And I will camp against thee round about,
And will lay siege against thee with a [c]mount,
And I will raise forts against thee.
4 And thou shalt be brought down, and shalt speak out of the ground,
And thy speech shall be low out of the dust,
And thy voice shall be as [d]of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground,
And thy speech shall [4]whisper out of the dust.

5 [e]Moreover the multitude of thy strangers shall be like small dust,
And the multitude of the terrible ones shall be as chaff that passeth away;
Yea, it shall be at an instant suddenly.
6 [f]Thou shalt be visited of the LORD of hosts
With thunder, and with earthquake, and great noise,
With storm and tempest, and the flame of devouring fire.
7 And the multitude of all the nations that fight against Ariel,
Even all that fight against her, and her munition,
And that distress her,
Shall be as a dream of a night vision.
8 It shall even be as when an hungry man dreameth,
And, behold, he eateth;
But he awaketh, and his soul is empty;
Or as when a thirsty man dreameth,
And, behold, he drinketh;
But he awaketh, and, behold, he is faint,
And his soul hath appetite:
So shall the multitude of all the nations be,
That fight against mount Zion.
9 Stay yourselves, and wonder;
[5][g]Cry ye out, and cry:
They are drunken, but not with wine;
They stagger, but not with strong drink.
10 For the LORD hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep,
And hath closed your eyes:
The prophets and your [6]rulers, the seers hath he covered.
11 And the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a [7]book that is sealed,
Which men deliver to one that [h]is learned,
Saying, Read this, I pray thee:
And he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed:
12 And the book is delivered to him that is not learned,
Saying, Read this, I pray thee;
And he saith, I am not learned.

[1] Or, O Ariel, that is, the lion of God.
[2] Or, of the city.
[3] Heb. cut off the heads.
[4] Heb. peep, or, chirp.
[5] Or, take your pleasure and riot.
[6] Heb. heads.
[7] Or, letter.

[a] let the feasts complete a revolution.
[b] then.
[c] post.
[d] of the spirit of one dead.
[e] But.
[f] she shall be visited (delivered).
[g] blind yourselves and be blind.
[h] knows writing.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. By comparing xxx. 1 we see that סְפוּ is not from יָסַף, but from ספה (Jer. vii. 21, et saepe). נקף (Kal only here, Hiphil further in Isa. xv. 8) is circuire circulare. This meaning belongs to תְּקוּפָה Ex. xxxiv. 22; 2 Chron. xxiv. 23.

Ver. 7. צֹבֶיהָ is used for the sake of variety instead of צֹבְאֶיהָ, comp. תאניה ואניה ver. 2, לפתע פתאם ver. 5. The construction of the suffix is to be explained as in קָמַי Ps. xviii. 40, 49. מְצוֹדָה is found also in Ezek. xix. 9, where the king of Judah is spoken of who was caught by means of net and pit, placed in a cage by means of hooks, and brought to Babylon into מְצֹדוֹת. The whole connection there renders it probable that מְצֹדוֹת denotes a place for wild animals that have been captured—a prison or something of that kind—whereas in Eccles. ix. 12, where only the word again occurs, the meaning "net" is undoubted. When then מְצֹדָה, and not מְצוּדָה is in the text, and when, moreover, I consider that the grammatical co-ordination of מצדתה with the suffix in צביה (all her assailants and of her מצדה) would be very abnormal, because we cannot, e. g., say בָּנֶיהָ וְאַחוֹתָהּ instead of בָּנֶיהָ וּבְנֵי אֲחוֹתָהּ,—it seems to me much more probable that מְצֹדָה is intended to denote here not the fortress Zion, but the siege entrenchments set up against Zion, the מְצֻרֹת verse 3, which enclose the city as a net, and can therefore be called its net. And this net of bulwarks, together with those who by means of it distress Zion (מציקים comp. on הציקותי ver. 2), shall disappear as a vision of a dream. Moreover the conjecture of BOETTCHER (Aehrenlese p. 32) that we should read צֹבָיהָ instead of צֹבֶיהָ seems to me not unworthy of attention. For the difficulty still remains to give a specific meaning to צֹבֶיהָ, if it is to stand for צֹבְאֶיהָ. BOETTCHER not unjustly remarks, too, that the צְבִי, the splendor of the city (xxiii. 9; xxviii. 1 sqq.; xxxii. 13 sq.) certainly formed a prominent point in the vanishing vision as "the refreshment which they desire, and imagine they will receive." Whoever is inclined to adopt this conjecture of BOETTCHER, which even KNOBEL accepts, will have no difficulty in connecting וּמְצֹדָתָהּ with what precedes it.

Ver. 8. We should expect a pronomen separatum (הוּא) along with the participles אֹכֵל and שֹׁתֶה, and the adjective עָיֵף. But it is well known that this pronoun is frequently omitted.

Ver. 11. Instead of יֹדֵעַ הַסֵּפֶר we find in the K'ri סֵפֶר without the article, as in ver. 12. But the alteration is needless. For in this connection הַסֵּפֶר can also be said, if only we take the article as the generic. Respecting וְאָמַר, vers. 11 and 12, comp. on xl. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet sets forth in vers. 1 and 2 the theme of his discourse. For he announces to Ariel, i. e., to the city of God, Jerusalem, that he will cause her after a time great distress, notwithstanding that she is Ariel, i. e., lion of God; that she, however, in this distress will prove herself to be Ariel, i. e., the hearth of God. This thought is further developed in what follows. The LORD causes Jerusalem to be told that He will besiege and afflict her greatly (ver. 3), so that she, bowed low in the dust, will let her voice sound faintly as the spirit of one dead (ver. 4). But the comforting promise is immediately annexed, that the enemies of Jerusalem will suddenly become as fine dust or as flying chaff (ver. 5). For Jehovah will come against them as with thunder, and tempest, and devouring fire (ver. 6). The whole force, therefore, of the enemies that fight against Ariel, i. e., here the mount of God, will pass away as a vision of a dream in the night (ver. 7); these enemies will be in the condition of one who in a dream thinks that he has eaten and drunk, and only on awaking perceives that he has been dreaming (ver. 8). In vers. 9–12 the Prophet himself depicts the effect of his words on the obdurate people. They build on other aid. They therefore hear the word of the Prophet in fixed amazement (ver. 9). For they are as blind (ver. 10), and in relation to the prophecy they are as one who has to read a sealed document, or as one who has an unsealed writing given him to read, but he cannot read (vers. 11 and 12).

2. Woe to Ariel—as Ariel.—Vers. 1, 2. This paragraph begins with הוֹי as xxviii. 1; xxix. 15; xxx. 1; xxxi. 1; xxxiii. 1. The name אריאל occurs 2 Sam. xxiii. 20 (1 Chr. xi. 22) as the name of Moabite heroes; Ezra viii. 16 as the name of a Levite; Ezek. xliii. 15, 16 the altar is called הַרְאֵל and אֲרִיאֵל (K'ri, Kethibh אֲרִאֵיל); Isa. xxxiii. 7 אֶרְאֶל is found in the signification "hero." Interpreters take the word as often as it occurs in the passage before us, namely, ver. 1 (bis), ver. 2 (bis), and ver. 7, either in the signification of "lion of God," or in that of "hearth of God." Only HITZIG, who is on this account censured, assumes a play on the word, and takes it in ver. 1 as ara Dei, and ver. 2 as lion of God. I am of opinion that HITZIG has not gone far enough. For it seems to me that the Prophet has each time used the word in a different signification according to the connection, and that it is taken in four different meanings [?]. First of all, Ariel appears as an enigmatical, significant name which the Prophet attributes to the city of Jerusalem in a manner unusual and fitted to excite inquiry. That Jerusalem is meant by it is clear from the connection, especially from קרית חנה דוד ver. 1, and from הר־ציון ver. 8. But we mark from the connection in each instance, that the Prophet intends each time a different allusion while employing the same word. In adding in ver. 1 קרית חנה דוד he gives us to understand that under אריאל he alludes to עָר אֵל city of God. The word עָר is used besides only of the Moabite capital Ar-Moab: Num. xxi. 15, 28; Deut. ii. 9; Isa. xv. 1. עָר אֵל may accordingly involve an antithesis to עָר מוֹאָב—Moab, as in xxv. 10 sq., being thought of as the representative of all opposition to God. The Septuagint translator has referred אריאל to Moab, while he takes this word to designate the Moabite city; for he renders "οὐαὶ πόλις 'Αριήλ, ἣν Δαυὶδ ἐπολέμησεν," whereby he certainly had in his eye the victory achieved by David over the Moabites, 2 Sam. viii. 2. But what led him to think of Moab in connection with אריאל, was either the recollection of the Moabite heroes mentioned 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, or the similarity in sound to the name of the city Ar (Greek 'Αρ Num. xxi. 15; Deut. ii. 9) which lies in Ar-iel. That the resemblance could have been thought of by the Prophet appears from the manifold permutations which occur between א and ע in Hebrew, and in the cognate dialects (comp. ver. 5 פתע and פתאם, אנם and ענם, אזל and עזל, תאב and תעב, גאל and געל, etc. Comp. EWALD, Gr., § 58, a, note 1 and c; GESEN. Thes. p. 2). The yod in אריאל does not militate against our exposition. For, apart from the fact that a mere similarity in sound is the matter in question, the "i" would not grammatically stand in the way of the explanation "City of God," as this "i" occurs not rarely as an antique connecting vowel especially in proper names (comp. Gabriel, Abdiel, etc., EWALD, Gr., § 211, b). Accordingly I consider the words קרית חנה דוד as explanatory of the word Ariel, or as a hint to intimate in what signification the Prophet would have us understand the word here. For Jerusalem, a holy city from a high antiquity (Gen. xiv. 18 sqq.), became the city of God (ch. lx. 14; Ps. xlvi. 5; xlviii. 2, 9; lxxxvii. 3; ci. 8), and the centre of the theocracy from the day when David, chosen king by all Israel, took up in it his royal residence, (2 Sam. v. 6 sqq.). With the words ספו שנה וגו׳ to ואניה the Prophet confirms the woe which he had pronounced. First of all, the question presents itself, whether the words ספו . . . ינקפו contain an indefinite or a definite statement of time. If the declaration of time be indefinite, the occurrence of the calamity would be placed in prospect at a point of time incalculably remote. For nothing would indicate how long this adding year to year, and this revolution of the festivals should last. Thereby, however, the effect of the prophecy on those living at the time of its delivery would be neutralized. For they could indulge the hope that the catastrophe would not affect them. The design of the Prophet could not be to produce such an impression.

We must therefore assume that the Prophet wishes to indicate by these words an interval at least approximately defined, and a point of time not very remote, but rather relatively near (as xxxii. 10). The meaning then would be: Add to the present year another year, and let another annual revolution of festivals be completed. This would be tantamount to saying, that from the end of the present year another year would run its course, and then the catastrophe announced in what follows would take place. The addition חגים ינקפו is intended to intimate that a full sacred year has yet to run its course. If the time when the Prophet spoke this prophecy was coincident with the beginning of the sacred year, then the addition was really superfluous. But if this coincidence did not exist, then the addition had the meaning that the complete year is not to be reckoned from the day when the Prophet spoke the words, but from the beginning of the next sacred year. It is therefore not probable that the Prophet made the utterance at the time of the Passover festival, which formed the commencement of the theocratic year (Exod. xii. 2). But the Prophet must have spoken the words a considerable time before the Passover. ["Many of the older writers, and the E. V., take the last words of the verse in the sense, let them kill (or more specifically, cut off the heads) the sacrificial victims; but it is more in accordance both with the usage of the words and with the context to give חַגִּים its usual sense of feasts or festivals, and נָקַף that of moving in a circle or revolving, which it has in Hiphil. The phrase then exactly corresponds to the one preceding, "add year to year." ALEXANDER.—D. M.] Ver. 2 tells what shall happen at the point of time indicated. Then the LORD will cause Ariel difficulty and distress (ver. 7; viii. 23; li. 13); and there shall arise sighing and groaning (besides only Lam. ii. 5 borrowed from this place; the verb אָנָה Isa. iii. 26; xix. 8, comp. the related תַּאֲנָה of the snorting of the female camel [wild she-ass.—D. M.] in heat, Jer. ii. 24). Here Ariel is represented as on all sides oppressed, which extorts pitiable groaning. The name Ariel seems therefore to involve here an antithesis to הציקותי: The strong is oppressed, and in this his distress he sighs and groans. When then in this connection the idea of strength is prominent in אריאל, we shall have to take the word here in its common signification = lion of God. But this distress does not last forever. The Prophet in this statement passes hastily over the whole field of vision from the bad beginning to the glorious end: Jerusalem (for this is the subject of והיתה) shall yet be to the LORD as אריאל. It is manifest that the word must be taken here as a word of good meaning. In such a signification we find it used Ezek. xliii. 15 sq. For there the altar of burnt offering is so designated. The same altar is also called there הַרְאֵל. But this designation seems to be given to the altar as a whole. When therefore אריאל along with הראל is an altar-name, we may assume that both words have a signification referring to the nature of the altar. In the case of הראל this is at once evident; the high place of God is put in opposition to the high places (בָּמוֹת) of the false gods. It is true that אֲרִי is found elsewhere only in the signification lion. But the radix אָרָה denotes carpere (Ps. lxxx. 13; Cant. v. 1), and can, like בָּעַר, be used of fire. If further we compare the Arabic 'irâ, focus, caminus, and consider that in Isa. xxxi. 9, it is said of the LORD that אוּר לוֹ בְּצִיּוֹן, it follows that the Prophets were justified, in a connection in which a manifold playing on a word is ingeniously practised, in finding in the word ארי an allusion to the place of fire, to the altar. It is particularly to be observed that the Prophet in our place says כַּאֲרִיאֵל as Ariel. He does not say לַאֲרִיאֵל. Jerusalem is not therefore to become an altar, but it is to prove itself as a holy hearth, which it has long been. It shall be treated as such by the LORD, it shall therefore be again delivered out of distress.

3. And I will camp——the dust.—Vers. 3 and 4. What was stated in vers. 1 and 2 with the brevity of a theme is now set forth more fully. And, first, it is shown how the LORD will afflict the strong lion, and compel him to utter lamentable sounds of distress. חנה, which is employed by Isaiah only in this chapter, denotes here encamping with a view to besieging. The word stands frequently in the historical books in this sense in conjunction with עַל: Josh. x. 5, 31, 34; 2 Sam. xii. 28 et saepe. כַּדּוּר (besides only xxii. 18) = as in a circle. דור (related to דור periodus) is to be regarded as standing in the accus. localis. צור (in Isaiah besides only xxi. 2) stands frequently with עַל in the sense of pressing upon: Deut. xx. 12, 19; 2 Kings vi. 25; xxiv. 11; Jer. xxxii. 2 et saepe. מֻצָּב (ἁπ. λεγ.), is synonymous with מַצָּב, מַצָּבָה, נְצִיב = Statio, excubiae praesidium, post. As to construction the word is to be regarded as in the accusative (accus. instrum.). מְצֻרֹה, which occurs in Isaiah only here, is a very general term, which is most frequently equivalent to מָצוֹר in the expression עָרֵי מְצוּרָה (2 Chron. xi. 10, 23; xii. 4; xiv. 5; xxi. 3). It manifestly denotes not instruments for attacking a place, but fortifications, entrenchments employed by a besieging army, among which are סֹלְלָה (2 Sam. xx. 15; Jer. vi. 6, et saepe) and דָּיֵק (2 Kings xxv. 1). The plural then denotes the various parts of the works thrown up by the besiegers. As the fortifications for defence are also called מְצוּרוֹת 2 Chron. xi. 11. The expression והקימתי is not opposed to what has been said. For the machines used in a siege, the כָּרִים, as is clear from Ezek. iv. 2, belong to the מצורים. Ver. 4 illustrates the words in ver. 2, and there shall be sighing and groaning [E. V., heaviness and sorrow]. The construction ושפלת תדברי is the well-known one, according to which an adverbial notion is expressed by the verb that is placed first. Jerusalem will lie so low that her voice will be only heard as if it proceeded from the dust, yea, from under the earth. There is here a climax descendens. The voice comes from a female sitting on the ground, out of the dust, from under the earth. In the clause ומעפרך we mark a pregnant construction. שָׁחַח is used by Isaiah with tolerable frequency: ii. 9, 11, 17; v. 15; xxv. 12; xxvi. 5. The word is used especially of a suppressed voice Eccles. xii. 4. Regarding אוֹב and צפצף comp. on viii. 19. The voice will, like that of the spirit of one dead, come forth out of the earth.

4. Moreover the multitude——Mount Zion.—Vers. 5–8. These words expand the short promise at the close of ver. 2. The distress of Jerusalem shall not last long. The supplication of her who has been brought so low shall be heard; her enemies shall be brought still lower; they shall be crushed even to dust. אָבָק comp. v. 24. דַּק besides xl. 15. הָמוֹן is used by the Prophet four times in this passage: ver. 5 bis, ver. 7 and ver. 8. Regarding זָר comp. on i. 7. The image of chaff carried away by the wind is frequent: xvii. 13; xli. 15; Ps. i. 4; xxxv. 5; Job xxi. 18; Zeph. ii. 2. עָרִיצִים comp. xiii. 11. The crushing of the enemies shall be not only complete, but also sudden. It will be thereby all the more terrible. פֶּתַע is substantive = the opening of the eyes, a moment; but פִּתְאֹם is an adverb (comp. יוֹמָם, הֲלֹם). In regard to the permutation of ע and א see on ver. 1. The two words stand together Num. vi. 9, where, however, we find בפתע פתאם, and Isa. xxx. 13. לְ denotes the measure (momentaneo modo, comp. לָבֶטַח, לְצֶדֶק, לְאַט, etc). Ver. 6 describes the means, by which the LORD crushes the enemy of Jerusalem. תפקד is taken by GESENIUS, HITZIG, KNOBEL, DELITZSCH impersonally: A visitation shall be made. But it seems to me that this would require the passive of the causative conjugation, namely Hophal. (Comp. on xxxviii. 10). The reference to Jerusalem is suggested by vers. 2, 7 and 8. The Prophet says therefore, that Jerusalem will be graciously visited, i. e., delivered (xxiv. 22) [According to this interpretation we must translate "and she shall be visited, etc." If we use the second person as in the E. V., "thou shalt be visited," then the enemy must be addressed, and not the city Jerusalem, which would require the verb to be in the feminine form of the second person.—D. M.]. ברעם וגו׳, observe here the similarity of sound in these words. רַעַם, the cracking, roaring (of thunder Ps. civ. 7; lxxvii. 19), is found only here in Isaiah. רַעַשׁ conquassatio, σεισμός (hence earthquake 1 Kings xix. 11; Amos i. 1), is further used by Isaiah ix. 4. סופה from סוּף (סָפָה, אָסַף) auferre, rapere, is rather the whirlwind, turbo, comp. v. 28; xvii. 13; xxi. 1; lxvi. 15. סְעָרָה tempest, hurricane, comp. xl. 24; xli. 16. Both words are found in conjunction elsewhere only in Amos i. 14. The flame of devouring fire, comp. xxx. 30. The plural להבים xiii. 8; lxvi. 15. Besides לֶהָבָה iv. 5; v. 24; x. 17; xliii. 2; xlvii. 14. אש אכלה comp. xxx. 27, 30; xxxiii. 14. VITRINGA thinks that we ought to take these words literally, and find in them an intimation that the LORD destroyed the Assyrians in that night (xxxvii. 36) by a frightful thunderstorm. But this is a manifest misconception of the Prophetic style. In vers. 7 and 8 the Prophet depicts at the close the disappointment which the enemy will feel. This is expressed by a simple image. The Assyrians, so far as they had really seen Jerusalem before them, and had it in reach of their power, will, after their overthrow, have the impression that they had seen Jerusalem only in a dream, in a vision of the night: and in so far as they had hoped to be able easily to conquer Jerusalem, they will be as if they had eaten in a dream, but on awaking, should feel themselves as hungry as before. By the two images the Prophet expresses very emphatically the thought that the whole attempt of Assyria upon Jerusalem should be as if it had not been; should be in fact as empty and unreal as the fabric of a dream. The subject of ver. 7 is המון־וי and וכל־צביה וגו׳. The expression חלום חזון לילה is found besides only Job xxxiii. 15, where we read בַּחֲלוֹם חֶזְיוֹן לַיְלָה (comp. Job iv. 13; xx. 8). They who fight against Ariel will be as a vision of a dream (צבא as a verb in Isaiah besides only xxxi. 4). In what sense we have to take Ariel here, is evident from ver. 8. For there the whole phrase "the multitude of all the nations that fight against" is repeated, but instead of "Ariel" we read "Mount Zion." This makes it clear that the Prophet would have us take אֲרִיאֵל here in the sense of הַרְאֵל Mount of God [?]. א and ה are interchanged just as frequently as א and ע, comp. אֵיךְ and הֵיךְ, הָמוֹן and אָמוֹן, אֲדֹרָם 1 Kings xii. 18 and הֲדֹרָם 2 Chron. x. 18; (See GESEN. Thes. p. 2). Ezekiel too has in chap. xliii. 15 got from our אֲרִיאֵל his הַרְאֵל. In ver. 8 the Prophet compares the departure of the Assyrians from Jerusalem to the awaking of a hungry or thirsty man who perceives that he has only dreamt that he has been eating or drinking. The term נֶפֶשׁ as in v. 14; xxxii. 6. שׁוֹקֵקָה (Ps. cvii. 9) has the signification "panting for, hungry" as a derivative meaning from the radical notion "to run to and fro," (xxxiii. 4). The concluding words of this verse "the multitude of all the nations that fight against Mount Zion," which correspond exactly to what we find in ver. 7, except that there instead of "Mount Zion" the name "Ariel" occurs, furnish the key to the understanding of the enigmatical word Ariel. Can it be deemed accidental that the Prophet in ver. 8 repeats those words of ver. 7 with the sole change of substituting for "Ariel" the words "Mount Zion?" Is not this a hint which the Prophet at the close gives to assist in understanding his meaning? And the first who understood this hint was Ezekiel (chap. xliii. 15).

5. Stay yourselves—— not learned.—Vers. 9–12. The prediction contained in vers. 1–8, must have been received by the hearers of the Prophet with very mingled feelings, because it holds out to them the prospect of deliverance, but deliverance in a way not agreeable to them. For the saying מעם יהוה תפקד ver. 6 did not please them. Although then the Prophet is aware that he does not say what corresponds to their wishes, still they must just hear it for their punishment. Yes, stop and wonder, whether it please you or not, whether you comprehend it or not; it is so as I have said to you. The Hithpael התמהמה (to stand questioning, refusing, delaying Gen. xliii. 10; Ps. cxix. 60 et saepe) is found only here in Isaiah. תמה to be astonished, to wonder (conjoined with התמהמה in Hab. i. 5 as here) occurs further in Isaiah xiii. 8. Both verbs denote amazement at what is offered, with unwillingness to receive it. The Hithpael השתעשע stands Ps. cxix. 16, 47 undoubtedly in the signification oblectari, delectari. Many expositors would take the word here too in this meaning, while they consider the two imperatives as marking an antithesis (be joyous and yet blind). But we do not perceive from the context why they should be joyful. It is better therefore to take השתעשע in the original signification of Kal which is "permulsum, oblitum esse" (comp. Isa. vi. 10). Hence the significations "oblectari" (xi. 8; lxvi. 12) and "to become blind" are equally derived. Kal occurs only in this passage where it has this last signification. The threatening of a punishment, which should first affect the spirit, is here announced to the Israelites. But this punishment will also produce its outward and visible effects. Because these effects follow in the way of punishment, the Prophet speaks of them no more in the imperative, but in the perfect. He sees the people reel and stagger like drunken men, although this intoxication does not proceed from wine. יין with שכרו is the accusative of the instrument. Where a capacity to receive the divine word is wanting, there it works an effect the very opposite of what it should properly produce; it hardens, blinds, stupefies. It is as if the spirit of understanding had become in those who do not desire the knowledge of the truth, a spirit of stupefaction, of stupidity. תרדמה, which is found only here in Isaiah, has here this spiritual sense. עָצַם is used xxxiii. 15 of the binding up of the eyes, but in xxxi. 1 in its usual signification of being strong. That these two significations are closely connected in other cases also is well known. Compare חיל, חָזַק (xxii. 21) קָשַׁר (Gen. xxx. 42), ἰσχω, ἰσχύω. The Piel עִצֵּם, which is used by Jeremiah (l. 17) as a denominative in the sense of "to break the bones, to bone," occurs only here in Isaiah. The words prophets and seers, if omitted, would not be missed in ver. 10. For this reason it is utterly improbable that they are an interpolation of a glossator. They obscure the meaning, instead of making it more apparent. We might almost conjecture that there were Prophets of a first, and of a second rank. The latter would have been the interpreters of the former, as in the New Testament the speech of those who spoke with tongues was explained by interpreters (1 Cor. xii. 10, 30; xiv. 5, 13). Not as if these prophets of the second rank or interpreters had an official position. For there is no trace of this. But there were persons who, when the meaning of the prophetic utterances was the subject of conversation among the people, pushed themselves in the foreground, claiming to be specially endowed with the capacity of explaining what the prophets had spoken; and perhaps they acquired as such here and there a certain authority. The prophetic word of the great Isaiah may have been often thus interpreted to the people by such prophets. But these subordinate prophets, although perhaps their possession of a certain physical gift of prophecy was not to be disputed, (comp. Saul, 1 Sam. x. 10 et saepe) stood yet in a nearer relation to the people than to the Lord. Therefore their prophetic gift was often not sufficient; often it was even abused by them (comp. 1 Cor. xiv. 32; 1 Kings xxii. 6 sqq.). Isaiah alludes here to this state of matters. The people were often puzzled by the prophecy of Isaiah, and even their prophets who were wont to be their eyes for such things, had as it were bound-up eyes or covered heads. נָבִיא and חֹזֶה, comp. נביא and רֹאֶה 1 Sam. ix. 9. The figure employed in vers. 11 and 12 suits very well to the explanation proposed. Reading was an art which was not understood by every one. He who could not himself read, must request another to read to him. Thus was it too with the prophecy of Isaiah. The people must apply to their prophets to interpret it for them. But it happened then, says Isaiah, as it often happens to one who applies to another in order to have a writing read to him. It can be the case that the person asked is able to read, but yet cannot read the document reached to him, because it is sealed. But what can this mean? If any one reaches me a sealed paper, in order that I may read it to him, he must unite with his request the permission to unseal it. Or, were there seals which could not be removed by every one? It appears to me, that the comparison here made use of is purely imaginary. It is very unlikely that any one could not comply with the request to read a document, because it was sealed. The Prophet only imagines such a case. But what he meant to intimate thereby was most real. The words of Isaiah were to many among those prophets of the people sealed words, i. e., intelligible as to their verbal meaning, but incomprehensible as to their inner signification. To others, or partially perhaps even to all, they were not intelligible even in their verbal meaning. They did not know what to make of them. They stood before them as one who cannot read stands before what is written. It seems that this prophecy regarding Ariel proved to be one of the most obscure prophecies of Isaiah. This gives occasion to the Prophet's expressing himself in this manner regarding the reception and understanding of his prophecies. חזות הכל denotes not merely the immediately preceding prediction, but the prophecy of Isaiah in general. For why should it have happened thus with only those words that immediately precede? חזות (comp. xxi. 2; xxviii. 18) is synonymous with חָזוֹן chap. i. 1.

2. THE SECRET COUNSEL OF MEN, AND THE SECRET COUNSEL OF GOD.

Chapter XXIX. 13–24.

13 Wherefore the Lord said,
Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth,
And with their lips do honor me,
But have removed their heart far from me,
And their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men;
14 Therefore, behold, [1]I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people,
Even a marvellous work and a wonder;
For the wisdom of their wise men shall perish,
And the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid.
15 Woe unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord,
And their works are in the dark,
And they say, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us?
16 [a]Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter's clay;
For shall the work say of him that made it, He made me not?
Or shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?
17 Is it not yet a very little while,
And Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field,
And the fruitful field shall be esteemed as a forest?
18 And in that day shall the deaf hear the words of the book,
And the eyes of the blind shall see
Out of obscurity, and out of darkness.
19 The meek also [2]shall increase their joy in the Lord,
And the poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel.
20 For the terrible one is brought to nought,
And the scorner is consumed,
And all that watch for [b]iniquity are cut off:
21 That make a man an offender [c]for a word,
And lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate,
And turn aside the just [d]for a thing of nought.
22 Therefore thus saith the Lord, who redeemed Abraham,
Concerning the house of Jacob,
Jacob shall not now be ashamed,
Neither shall his face now wax pale.
23 [e]But when he seeth his children, the work of mine hands, in the midst of him,
They shall sanctify my name,
And sanctify the Holy One of Jacob,
And shall fear the God of Israel.
24 They also that erred in spirit [3]shall come to understanding,
And they that murmured shall learn doctrine.

[1] Heb. I will add. [2] Heb. shall add. [3] Heb. shall know understanding.

[a] O your perverting! Or is the clay esteemed like the potter, that the work should say to its maker, etc.
[b] mischief. [c] by word. [d] by deceit. [e] For when he, when his children, see the work of my hands, etc.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13. That we are to read not נֹגֵשׂ (with the Targum and many MSS. and Editions, in the sense of "to urge, trouble, torment one's self,") but נִגַּשׁ, is shown by the antithetic רִחַק. That contrary to the accentuation בפיו is to be connected with נִגַּשׁ, is apparent from this, that the people are to be reproached, not with drawing near to God in general, but with the outward, deceitful approach to Him. The great liberty which in Hebrew is indulged in with reference to person and number, is seen from כברוני and יראתם in relation to שפתיו, בפיו and לבו. We have to take רחק as a causative, and at the same time intensive Piel (to make removal with zeal = to strive to get away).

Ver. 14. On יֹסִף as the third person comp. on xxviii. 16. [יֹכִף is the third person of the future. There is an ellipsis to be supplied: Behold, I (am he who) will add, etc.—D. M.]. אֵת after הפליא is not the sign of the accusative, but is the preposition. Instead of a second infinitive, a noun of the same stem פלא is attached to the infinitive absolute (comp. xxii. 17, 18; xxiv. 19).

Ver. 15. העמיק is the proper causative Hiphil=to make a deepening, a sinking. At the same time the construction with מן is a pregnant one; but לסתיר [syncopated Hiphil comp. xxiii. 11—D. M.] is not a statement of the design, but is the ablative or gerundine infinitivus modalis, which when united with a causative conjugation, can be expressed by us by a verb with any adverb, as here: who deep from Jehovah hide, etc. Comp. Jer. xlix. 8, 30, and as to the usus loquendi Isa. vii. 11; xxx. 33; xxxi. 6. אִם in ver. 16 corresponds to the Latin an, and marks the second member of a disjunctive question, the first of which is to be supplied.

Ver. 20. שָׁקַד σπουδάζειν, alacrem esse, vigilare, invigilare, is elsewhere always construed with עַל (Jer. i. 12; v. 6; xxxi. 28; xliv. 27; Prov. viii. 34; Job xxi. 32). This word is found in Isaiah only here. The construction in this place is to be judged according to such forms of expression as שָׁבֵי פֶשַׁע (lix. 20), חֲלוּץ צָבָא (Numb. xxxii. 27) and similar phrases. The form יְקֹשׁוּן might, considered by itself, be the perfect (comp. יָקֹשְׁתִּי Jer. l. 24), as the form יָקֹשׁוּ with the primitive ן must be יְקֹשׁוּן according to the rule that a closed syllable can be without the tone only when it has a short vowel, and an open syllable precedes (comp. יְקוּמוּן—יָקוּמוּ Ewald, § 85, a; 88, c). But if we have regard to the syntax, the imperfect (future) is more correct, because the Prophet has in his mind not merely single definite facts, but the permanent habit of those people. The form is in this case to be derived from קוּשׁ, which occurs only here.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet urges the people to fear Jehovah, and to trust in Him alone. Even in Hezekiah's times the people were not pleased to do so. On this account the preceding announcement (vers. 1–8), notwithstanding the glorious promise with which it ends, was to so many an offence (vers. 9–12). The Prophet, therefore, directs now his discourse against those who honor the Lord with merely external, ceremonial service, and not from the heart (ver. 13), and announces that the Lord will deal strangely with them, and that their wisdom will be brought to shame (ver. 14). He further reproves those who imagine that they can carry out in the most profound secresy the plans of their untheocratic policy (ver. 15), by reminding them that the clay can never be equal to the potter, or the work formed from clay be able to deny the potter, or accuse him of ignorance (ver. 16). A great change will soon happen: Assyria, which is like Lebanon, shall be brought low; Judah, which resembles only Carmel, shall be highly exalted. Then people will understand the words of the Prophet, which they had before despised, and will perceive that they are true and salutary. But behind that deliverance, which belongs to the history of the nation, the Prophet discerns also Messianic blessing. The comparison has therefore this meaning also for him, that the wilderness shall become uncultivated land, while uncultivated land shall become a wilderness (ver. 17). This means that a poor condition of external nature shall be remedied by the divine favor, and, conversely, a condition of high culture shall, by the withdrawal of the divine favor, pass into a state of wildness; the deaf shall hear, the blind see (ver. 18); the poor and oppressed shall become strong and joyful in the Lord (ver. 19). The violent and false shall be exterminated (vers. 20 and 21). For the Lord, who redeemed Abraham will bring Jacob to honor (ver. 22). For when Jacob shall see the Lord's wonderful work for his salvation, he will sanctify the Lord (ver. 23), and understand what makes for his peace (ver. 24).

2. Wherefore the Lord said——be hid.—Vers. 13 and 14. By means of ויאמר the Prophet connects what he has to say with the immediately foregoing. He indicates by this verbal form that what follows is occasioned by the stupid and perverse behaviour of the people (vers. 9 and 10). That perversity had its root in the people trusting more in themselves and their wisdom than in the Lord. They, therefore, thought that they could satisfy the Lord, whose worship Hezekiah lately imposed on them, by the performance of outward ceremonial service. For the rest, in what concerned their life and conduct, and especially in their policy, they went their own ways. The Lord had already said (Deut. vi. 4 sqq.), that He is not satisfied with mere ceremonial service, but desires hearty love from His people. But it was this chief and greatest commandment (Matt. xxii. 38) which Israel never learned. Hence till the time of the exile the inclination to idolatry prevailed, and if they at times served the Lord, this was only as a pause in the song. And the reformations of Hezekiah and Josiah were no expression of the mind of the people, and were consequently not of long duration. Manasseh followed Hezekiah, and Jehoiakim and Zedekiah followed Josiah. But Isaiah here takes up earlier utterances (Ps. l.; Amos v. 21 sqq.; Micah vi. 6 sq.). He afterwards returns to this subject (lviii. 2 sqq., comp. i. 11 sqq.). The expression מצוה מלמדה is found only here. When we compare such expressions as עֶגְלָה מלמדה. Hos. x. 11, מְלֻמְּדֵי־שִׁיר 1 Chron. xxv. 7, מלמדי מלחמה Cant. iii. 8, we perceive that in מלמדה, as here used, there lies the idea of training, of external discipline and accustoming. [The complaint is that their religion, instead of being founded on the authority of God's word, rested on human ordinances.—D. M.]. The punishment for this hypocritical conduct of the people towards Jehovah is that the Lord continues to deal with them in a wonderful way. Wonderful had been all the ways which the Lord had from the beginning pursued towards the people. The Prophet seems to wish by the word הסתתר to prepare the transition to ver. 15. From the wisdom, which must hide itself, because it is brought to disgrace, he passes over to the wisdom which desires to hide itself, while it cannot do so.

3. Woe unto them——understanding.—Vers. 15 and 16. We clearly perceive here how significant was the position of the great Prophets. They might be said to be the eye and the mouth of Jehovah. They watched over the course of the theocracy, and the leaders of it could not but respect them. If then the policy approved by the leaders was untheocratic, they must fear the word of the Prophets. For their word was the word of Jehovah. When, therefore, there was a consciousness of an untheocratic aim, care was taken to conceal the political measures from the Prophets. Thus Ahaz sought to hide from Isaiah his Assyrian policy (vii.). Here likewise Hezekiah tries to keep secret his Egyptian policy. For even Hezekiah does not seem to have risen to the height of the only truly theocratic policy, which must consist in having the Lord alone as their support. והיה וגו'. Not merely is the plan secretly concocted, but the execution of it, too, takes place with all secresy. מחשך, in Isaiah besides only xlii. 16. מעשיהם, so far as the form is concerned, might be singular. But as the copula הָיָה precedes, מעשיהם can also be the plural, and this view corresponds better to the usus loquendi elsewhere (xli. 29; lix. 6; lxvi. 18). הפככם ver. 16 is an exclamation: O your perverting! That is, how ye pervert things! They act, as if their wisdom were greater than the wisdom of God, as if they could therefore review, determine, and according to their pleasure influence and direct the thoughts of the Lord, while they are but clay in the hand of the potter. The word הפככם (on account of the Dagesh lene, not from the Infin Kal, but from the substantive הֹפֶךְ, which occurs only here, comp. הֶפֶךְ הֵפֶךְ Ezek. xvi. 34) is to be taken in an active signification, so that it marks not so much perversity, as the perversion of ideas which proceeds from perversity, as is in ver. 15 implicitly, and in ver. 16 explicitly evinced. If the potter were clay, and the clay were potter, then the clay could determine and direct the potter, could for this purpose lead him astray, deceive him, etc. Either, then, the Israelites are perverse, or the potter is not clay. If indeed the clay were potter, then the former could justly say: he, the potter made me not,—or he understands and observes nothing. This is what Israel says in imagining that he is able to lead astray the Prophet, that is, the omniscient Lord Himself. While the politicians forge Hezekiah's plans, they think that they knead them, as potters do their vessels, according to their pleasure, and unobserved by the Lord, while they themselves are yet but clay.

4. Is it not yet——a thing of nought.—Vers. 17–21. An end will be put to this evil condition. The Lord Himself will reform His people, and that thoroughly. Then the deaf will hear, and the blind see, and to the poor the Gospel will be preached. But those proud, imperious and infatuated politicians, who forcibly suppress all opposition against their line of action, will go to ruin. When the Prophet holds out the prospect of this reformation within a brief period, he does this in the exercise of that prophetic manner of contemplation which reckons the times not according to a human but a divine measure. For in fact the Prophet here beholds along with, and in what is proximate the time of the end. The prospect of blessedness which he presents belongs also to the days of the Messiah, as we clearly perceive from vers. 18 and 19. The expression עוד מעט מזער is used thus in x. 25 also. Comp. xxvi. 20; liv 7. In a short time, therefore, Lebanon shall become a fruitful field, and the fruitful field a forest. The expression can be variously explained. It seems to me to denote primarily that the Lord can bring down that which is high, and raise that which is low. And in this sense the word was fulfilled in the overthrow of Sennacherib. Then Assyria, the lofty Lebanon, became the low Carmel; but Judah, which was a little mount, and low plain, became a lofty wooded mountain-range. Thereby it became at the same time evident how false the untheocratic policy was in its calculation, and how truly the Lord's mouth spoke by the Prophet. Lebanon and the forest represent wild nature, or the natural wilderness; the fruitful field again represents a state of culture (x. 18; xxxvii. 24). All depends on the essential character, the nature of a thing. What in its nature and essence is good, although it looks rough and wild as the wooded mountain-range, shall yet gradually, even in outward appearance, become a fruitful cultivated land; but what is in its nature rough and wild, even when it appears to be cultivated, will certainly sooner or later manifest its true nature as a wilderness, in a corresponding external appearance. In short, the true nature of things must at last be manifest. ["The only natural interpretation of the verse, is that which regards it as prophetic of a mutual change of condition, the first becoming last and the last first."—Alexander. D. M.].

This form of speech was probably proverbial, and seems to me in the form in which it here lies to bear the meaning assigned to it. That it was used in yet another form, and then naturally in a signification modified as the case required, we can see from xxxii. 15. Instead of שָׁב we find וְהָיָה in xxxii. 15. The passage before us seems to be the only one in which שׁוב is undoubtedly employed in this wider signification = to turn one's self from one direction to another (it properly signifies; to turn one's self back). The definite article before כרמל and יער is the generic (comp. ver. 11). כרמל is used nine times by Isaiah: x. 18; xvi. 10; xxix. 17 (bis); xxxii. 15, 16; xxxiii. 9 and xxxv. 2 (proper name); xxxvii. 24. The expression יֵחָשֵׁב לְ is not meant to affirm that the fruitful field is merely esteemed as a forest, without really being such. That it really is such, is what the Prophet means to affirm. In the following verses the proverbial and figurative expression, ver. 17, is illustrated. The deaf shall in that day (i. e., in the time indicated by כמעט מזער) hear words of the writing, and the blind will see out of obscurity, and out of darkness.—When the bound senses of the deaf and dumb can freely unfold themselves, when the love of life, which is kept under in the poor and wretched, can display itself without impediment, then Lebanon, the wooded mountain range, has become a fruitful field, for then nature has advanced from neglected disorder to a well-ordered, cultivated condition. When it is said that the deaf will hear, דברי ספר, the word ספר seems superfluous. But the Prophet alludes evidently to ver. 11, from which it is at the same time clear that he is not speaking of physical deafness, etc. It was there declared of the people present that the LORD had poured out upon them a spirit of sleep (in which, as all know, one does not hear), and bound up their eyes so that the prophecy was to them as the words of a sealed book. When then Lebanon has become a fruitful field, and nature shall have given place to grace, then too the ears of the people that were previously deaf will be opened, and they will understand the דִּבְרֵי סֵפֶר הֶחָתוּם, i. e., the words of the prophecy proceeding from the LORD through His Prophets, and will emerge from gloom (אֹפֶל only here in Isaiah) and darkness, (in which they hitherto were with their eyes bound up by the LORD), so as to behold the light (comp. xxxv. 5). They will, therefore, perceive also the errors of their policy, and see that the word of the Prophet which shocked them, pointed out the true way of safety. They who were deaf and blind were also unhappy, just for this cause. When they hear and see, then are they happy men, delivered from oppression and distress, and joyful in their God. ענוים outwardly and inwardly oppressed, in Isaiah besides xi. 4; lxi. 1; [ענו means meek, and is to be distinguished from עני poor.—D. M.]. יספו comp. xxxvii. 31; they obtain joy not only once, but continually, i. e., they increase joy. ביהוה comp. ἐν κυρίῳ in the New Testament; it is therefore not merely = through, but = in the LORD, namely as those who are rooted and grounded in the LORD. The expression אביוני אדם is found only here, comp. Ex. xxiii. 11. קדוש י׳ comp. on i. 4. יגילו,—the rejoicing too has the LORD first for its basis, afterwards for its object (xli. 16). Is not the purport of these two verses, 18 and 19, reproduced in the saying of Christ, "The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them" (Matt. xi. 5; Luke vii. 22)? In this passage in the Gospel allusions are commonly found only to Isa. xxxv. 5; lxi. 1. Without wishing to deny these references, we yet remark that Isaiah xxix. 18 and 19 contains the ideas conjoined, which the other places present apart. And when the LORD in dealing with John, who had fallen into doubt regarding His Messiahship, describes His works by pointing to this passage, are we not justified in saying that this passage is of Messianic import? We of course admit that Matt. xi. 5 is not an exact quotation of our passage. The joy of the pious has as its condition the removal of the wicked, whose unchecked display of themselves is identical with the deterioration of the fruitful field into a forest. Hence vers. 20 and 21, which explain ver. 17 b, are connected by כִּי with what immediately precedes. אֶפֶס besides only xvi. 4. לֵץ only here in Isaiah, but comp. xxviii. 14, 22. Hiphil החטיא to make, to declare a sinner, (Deut. xxiv. 4; Eccles. v. 5), only here in Isaiah. They make people sinners by words, i. e., they bring about their condemnation not by actual proofs, but merely by lying words. [The rendering of the E. V. is much more easy and natural: that make a man an offender for a word, and is justly preferred by EWALD, ALEXANDER and DELITZSCH.—D. M.]. מוֹכִיחַ the reprover, reprehensor, he who maintains the truth. Comp. Job xxxii. 12; xl. 2; Prov. ix. 7; xxiv. 25, et saepe; Ezek. iii. 26. Isaiah seems to have had specially before him Amos v. 10. הִטָּה with the accusative of the thing (Deut. xxvii. 19; Prov. xvii. 23; Amos ii. 7), or the person (Prov. xviii. 5; Amos v. 12), to designate a violent deed perpetrated by wresting judgment, is of frequent occurrence. But where it is joined with בְּ, it denotes the sphere in which, or the means by which the wresting of judgment is accomplished, not the terminus in quem. As moreover תהו denotes everywhere in Isaiah what is null, vain, empty, and is synonymous with רוח (wind) אֶפֶס, הֶבֶל (comp. xxiv. 10; xxxiv. 11; xl. 17, 23; xli. 29; xliv. 9; xlv. 18, 19; xlix. 4; lix. 4), we have to regard תהו as designating the empty lying accusations which were brought against the Prophet.

5. Therefore thus saith—doctrine.—Vers. 22–24. These verses contain the comprehensive close. According to verses 13 and 14, Israel had omitted to serve the LORD in the proper manner, and according to verse 15, they had omitted to trust in the LORD alone. That on this double sin a double crisis must follow, which will make the good elements of the people ripe for salvation, the bad elements ripe for judgment, had been declared vers. 16–21. Now the close follows: As the ancestor of Israel had been delivered from the danger of idolatry like a brand plucked from the fire, so shall Israel also be delivered, when it shall have seen that judgment on the wicked. It will sanctify the name of the LORD, it will learn the true wisdom, and that will be its safety. אל־בֵּית י׳ ver. 22 = in reference to the house of Jacob (comp. Gen. xx. 2; Ps. ii. 7 et saepe), for in what follows it is spoken of in the third person. The clause אשר פדה וגו׳ refers to יהוה. That God, who had formerly saved Abraham, the progenitor of Israel, from the snares of idolatry (Josh. xxiv. 2, 14, 15), will also redeem Israel from the internal and external dangers which now threaten him. Israel will in the end not be put to shame (xix. 9; xx. 5; xxxvii. 27; xlv. 16, 17; liv. 4 et saepe). חָוַר candidum esse, pallescere is ἅπ. λεγ. DELITZSCH here observes "that people whose faces are of a bronze color know in their language only of a growing pale for shame, and not of a blushing for shame." Both the correction (vers. 20 and 21), and the deliverance (vers. 18 and 19), will bear fruit. The Prophet intends both when he speaks of the work of Jehovah among the people. When Israel (i. e., not the patriarch but his descendants, ילדיו is added by way of explanation to בראותו to obviate any misunderstanding) shall see this, he will sanctify the LORD, i. e., regard Him as holy (comp. on viii. 13, and the first petition of the LORD's prayer). [But the E. V., which puts the work of my hands in apposition to his children, is better, comp. xlix. 18–21.—D. M.]. The Prophet states in ver. 23 b, that the effect of the sanctification of the name of God will be that the people will esteem as holy the Holy One of Jacob, and will fear the God of Israel. Beside the variation of Jacob and Israel, which is so frequent in the second part of Isaiah, mark how the Prophet distinguishes between sanctifying the name of God, and sanctifying the Holy One of Jacob. This sanctification must be substantially one and the same. But when the Holy One of Jacob and the God of Israel is named as object of the second sanctification (ver. 23 b), a sanctifying seems to be thereby intended, which gives in a way which all men can perceive, the glory to this God above the gods of the heathen. The fruit of the inward disposition of heart which is externally perceptible and operative, seems to be thereby intended. As יקדישו שמי refers to viii. 13, so יעריצו refers to viii. 12. Thus Israel will become truly wise. That wisdom which they thought they must conceal from God, was both foolishness and destruction. But when they shall have learnt to sanctify the LORD, then they who hitherto erred in spirit (comp. Ps. xcv. 10), will attain the true wisdom, and they who heretofore murmured against God's counsel and direction (רגן Kal only here), will be satisfied with the discipline of God, and let it have its effect upon them (לֶקַח what one takes, Prov. i. 5; iv. 2 et saepe, only here in Isaiah).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxix. 1–8. The Prophet designates Jerusalem as Ariel in a four-fold sense. Taking Ariel as denoting the city of God, the name suits Jerusalem as the holy, separated dwelling-place in which the church of God, and all saving ordinances have their seat and centre. Taking Ariel as the lion of God, the names applies to Jerusalem as the ecclesia militans, as the host of God fighting against the worldly power and conquering it. Taking Ariel as denoting the Altar of God, it sets forth Jerusalem as the place in which reconciliation with God, and the bestowal of all the gifts of His grace take place. And, lastly, Jerusalem appears as Ariel in the signification of Mount of God, because it is the height of God which overtops all other heights, in which He manifests His glory to all the world, and to which all nations flow in order to worship Him (ii. 2 sqq.). But when Jerusalem forgets these her high honors, and neglects the obligations thereby laid upon her, she is corrected and humbled as any other city. [There may be an allusion made by the Prophet to the two-fold meaning of Ariel as lion of God, and hearth of God, but sober exegesis will be slow to admit the other meanings attached to the name of Ariel, and supposed to be here significantly alluded to by Isaiah.—D. M.].

2. Ver. 3. ["It was the enemy's army that encamped against Jerusalem; but God says that He will do it, for they are His hand, He does it by them. God had often, and long, by a host of angels, encamped for them round about them, for their protection and deliverance; but now He was turned to be their enemy, and fought against them: The siege laid against them was of His laying, and the forts raised against them were of His raising. Note, when men fight against us, we must, in them, see God contending with us." HENRY.—D. M.].

3. On ver. 7 sq. "A very consolatory comparison. The Romans and all enemies of the church are as blood-thirsty dogs. But when they have drunk up a part of the blood of the saints, and imagine, that they have swallowed up the church, it is only a dream. Since we see, that Christ and His Christians are, thank God, not yet destroyed."—CRAMER.

4. On vers. 9–12. "Awful description of the sorest punishment from God, which is spiritual, confirmed blindness; which is at this day so manifest in the Jews. For although they are confuted by so many clear and plain Scriptures of the Prophets, although they must themselves confess that the time is past, the place no more in existence, the lineage of David extinct, so that they can have no certain hope of a Messiah, they yet remain so hardened and obstinate in their opinion, as if they were drunken, mad and drowned in the snares of the devil by which they are bound, and could not come to sober and rational thoughts. This we ought to take as a mirror of the wrath of God, that we, while the book is yet open to us, may freely and diligently look into it, that it may not be closed and sealed before our eyes also.—CRAMER.

5. On vers. 9-12. To all those who bring to the reading of the Holy Scripture not the Spirit, from whom it proceeded, but the opposite spirit, the spirit of the world, the Scripture must be a sealed book, into which they can stare with plastered eyes, which see and yet do not see, which watch and yet at the same time sleep (vi. 9, 10; Luke viii. 10; Acts xxviii. 26, 27).

6. On ver. 13. Ah! how pious people would be, if only piety consisted in lip-service, and external behavior! Dévotion aisée, convenient religion, that is the business of all those who would willingly give to God what is God's, and to the devil, what is the devil's; that is, who would like to have a religion because it is required by a voice within the breast, and the power of custom and example, without thereby paining the flesh. Comp. Isa. i. 11 sqq.; lviii. 2 sqq.; Amos v. 23; Matt. xv. 7 sqq.

7. On ver. 14. ["They did one strange thing, they removed all sincerity from their hearts; now God will go on and do another, He will remove all sagacity from their heads: the wisdom of their wise men shall perish. They played the hypocrite, and thought to put a cheat upon God, and now they are left to themselves to play the fool; and not only to put a cheat upon themselves, but to be easily cheated by all about them. . . . . This was fulfilled in the wretched infatuation which the Jewish nation were manifestly under, after they had rejected the gospel of Christ . . . Judgments on the mind, though least taken notice of, are to be most wondered at. —HENRY, D. M.].

8. [Formalism in worship is here assigned as the cause of the judicial blindness which has happened to Israel. Mark the logical connection between vers. 13 and 14. The same judgment inflicted for the same reason, has befallen a large part of the nominal Christian Church. They who worship God must worship Him in spirit and in truth. We are amazed at the ignorance in matters of religion displayed by men of great mental capacity and learning, who have appeared among the Jews, and professors of a corrupt Christianity. That which excites our astonishment is here accounted for.—D. M.].

9. On ver. 18 sqq. "Here everything is reversed. Before, he had said, the wise shall be blind. Here he says, the blind shall see. The scope of all that is said is that they who were in office and were called priests and Levites, together with the bulk of the people, should be blinded for their unbelief. On the other hand, the poor, wretched people, that had neither office nor reputation, together with the heathen, shall be called, and shall be the people of God, who truly know God, invoke His name, and have joy, comfort and help in Him." VEIT. DIETRICH.

10. On ver. 23. ["The emphatic mention of the Holy One of Jacob and the God of Israel, as the object to be sanctified, implies a relation still existing between all believers and their spiritual ancestry, as well as a relation of identity between the Jewish and the Christian church. ALEXANDER.—D. M.].

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

On xxix. 1–8. How the Lord regards and deals with His church. 1) She is precious in His eyes, a. as the city of God; b. as the lion of God; c. as the altar of God; d. as the mount of God. 2) He brings her very low (vers. 2–6). 3) He delivers her wonderfully (vers. 7, 8).

2. On vers. 9–12. As the light of the sun does not illuminate, but dazzles and closes an eye which is not adapted for receiving it (e. g., that of the mole), so also the word of God is for those who are not born of God and cannot receive the Spirit of God, by no means a light which enlightens their inner sense, but rather an element which dazzles their mental eye, and confuses their senses, so that they stand before the word as one who can read stands before a sealed book, or as one who cannot read before a writing which is handed to him.

3. On vers. 13–14. Warning against hypocrisy. 1) Its nature (it consists in honoring God with self-invented, external, ceremonial service, while yet the heart is far from Him); 2) its punishment (the wisdom which is self-asserting and forgets God will come to shame).

4. On vers. 15–24. Every man has his task in this life. Some, however, are minded to transact their affairs without God. For either they do not believe that there is a God, or if they believe it, they wish to be independent of Him. They wish to execute everything according to their own mind and their own lusts. But when they imagine that they can carry out their plans as it were behind God's back, unobserved by Him, this cannot be (vers. 15 and 16). This is great folly, too. For such a work cannot succeed. Therefore the Prophet utters a woe on such an attempt, ver. 15. They, on the other hand, who do everything with God, partake of the most manifold blessing; the deaf hear, the blind see, the wretched rejoice, the poor are enriched, the oppressed and despised are delivered.

III.—THE THIRD WOE.

CHAPTER XXX.

1. THE SIN OF THOSE WHO SEEK HELP FROM EGYPT, NOT FROM JEHOVAH.

CHAPTER XXX. 1–5.

1 WOE to the rebellious children, saith the LORD,
That take counsel, but not of me;
And that [a]cover with a covering, but not of my spirit,
That they may add sin to sin:
2 That walk to go down into Egypt,
And have not asked at my mouth;
To strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh,
And to trust in the shadow of Egypt!
3 Therefore shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame,
And the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion.
4 For his princes [b]were at Zoan,
And his ambassadors [c]came to Hanes.

5 They were all ashamed of a people that could not profit them,
Nor be an help nor profit,
But a shame, and also a reproach.

[a] make an alliance. [b] have been. [c] come.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. If we take סוררים in a causative sense = making apostasy, which view is justified by the form of the word, (which is after the Pilel conjugation), and by its use elsewhere, (Lam. iii. 11), we can then join with it לעשות וגו׳ as the infinitive of nearer specification. This infinitive then expresses wherein and how far they are בנים סוררים (i. 23; lxv. 2).

Ver. 2. The Kal. עוּז, from which many derive עוֹז, does not occur. We find only Hiphil הָעִיז, x. 31; Ex. ix. 19; Jer. iv. 6; vi. 1. The context too appears to me not to require by any means the signification "confugere and refugium," as this meaning is contained in the following clause, and a repetition of the same thought cannot be expected. I prefer, therefore, to take עוֹז in the signification "to be strong" and מָעוֹז, as it is often used = munimentum, defence, protection (xvii. 10; xxv. 4; xxvii. 5, et saepe). חָסָה is confugere; it is found united with עַל Judges ix. 15; Ps. xxxvi. 8; lvii. 2.

Ver. 3. חָסוּת (= מַחְסֶה iv. 6; xxv. 4; xxviii. 15, 17), is ἅπ. λεγ.

Ver. 5. הֹבְאִישׁ is a mongrel form arising from הֹבִישׁ הִבְאִישׁ, the former of which itself proceeding from a confusion of the two roots יָבֵשׁ and בּוֹשׁ, signifies pudorem produxit, to produce shame, to be ashamed, to come to disgrace, while הִבְאִישׁ denotes foetorem protulit, both together therefore signify "to produce stinking disgrace, or disgraceful stench, to make a stinking, disgraceful figure, therefore, ignominiously to come to shame." All (EWALD, § 236, c) are disgraced on account of a people that does not profit them (the senders of the embassy), is not for help, nor for profit. This ולא להועיל strikes us as tautological. It is probably occasioned by the effort clearly apparent in this sentence to multiply the "L" and "O" sounds, and especially the combination of the two.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The subject treated by the Prophet in these chapters is unfolded more and more fully, so as to be perfectly clear. What he had hitherto only hinted at, he now declares in plain terms: the alliance with Egypt is the sin against which he contends with all the force of his spirit. This alliance is no longer a subject of deliberation. It has already taken shape. An embassy to conclude this league is already on the way. The Prophet therefore utters another (the third) woe against the apostate people, because they form such purposes without the LORD, only to heap sin upon sin (ver. 1). They have gone down to Egypt without consulting the Lord, in order to find there increase of power, and protection (ver. 2). But power and protection shall be changed into disgrace (ver. 3). It was possible to try to invalidate this threatening of the Prophet by a denial of the facts. But he leaves no room for such contradiction. For, says he, the Jewish princes are already in Zoan, and will come to Hanes (ver. 4). Therefore, he repeats with emphasis his threatening: Israel will be ashamed of the Egyptian nation which can bring to the people of God no advantage, but only disgrace.

2. Woe to——a reproach.—Vers. 1–5. הוי comp. on xxix. 1. עשות עצה is = to execute a counsel (2 Sam. xvii. 23). ולא מני as Hos. viii. 4. We had מַסֵּכָה xxv. 7; xxviii. 20 (comp. מַסֶּכֶת Judges xvi. 13, 14) in the signification "woven or plaited covering;" but in this chapter, ver. 22, (comp. xlii. 17) the word has the signification "what is molten, cast." That נסך מסכה signifies here (ver. 1) to form an alliance, is placed out of doubt by the context. But it is questionable whether the expression originally denotes "to weave a web," or "σπονδὴν σπένδεσθαι." The latter is to me the more probable, not although, but because מסכה from נָסַךְ to pour, to cast, denotes a molten image. For it seems to me that the Prophet intends a double sense by the expression: libationem effundere and idolum fusile fundere. He hints therewith at the idolatrous character of such a league, which is a transgression of the first [second] commandment. This agrees very well with ולא רוחי, an expression which, both in sense and construction, is connected with ולא מני, as we are to regard רוחי as dependent on the preposition מן. The clause that they may add sin to sin does not express the conscious, subjective design, but only affirms that the objective fact is of such a character as to warrant the conclusion as to the conscious design (comp. Amos. ii. 7; Jer. xliv. 8 et saepe). ספות comp. on xxix. 1. ההלכים ver. 2 (apposition to בנים סוררים ver. 1) marks the going away, the terminus a quo, לרדת the terminus ad quem. In ההלכים we must not press the notion of time, but only the notion of the word, i. e., the Prophet does not set forth that they are now going away (praesens), but states the simple fact of their going away. If we so understand the word, every appearance of a contradiction with ver. 4 disappears. שאל פי י׳ besides only Josh. ix. 14 comp. Gen. xxiv. 57. Ver. 4 contains a proof which is introduced by כִּי. It appears to me that the Prophet supposes the attempt on the part of his hearers still to deny this league with Egypt which had been laid to their charge. He therefore says: Everything stated in verses 1–3 is true, for the ambassadors have been already in Zoan, and are now on the way to Hanes. היו is therefore the proper perfect; the imperfect יגיעו (comp. Gen. xxviii. 12) stands for the designation of a fact yet incomplete, still in progress, i. e., the ambassadors are only about to reach Hanes. The accusative is accus. loci. How Isaiah could so speak is easily seen, if we do not forget that he was the Prophet of Jehovah, and that the Spirit of the LORD, whom the others excluded in their consultations (ver. 1), assisted the Prophet. Men told him nothing at all of the embassy; assuredly the ambassadors themselves sent him no message, nor was a message sent by them communicated to him. But yet he knows that the ambassadors have actually arrived in Egypt. His mentioning the cities Zoan and Hanes is not to be pressed, i. e., he does not mean to mark precisely the exact points between which the ambassadors now are. He has other reasons for naming these cities. I do not comprehend how DELITZSCH can say, "the Tanitic dynasty then bore rule, which preceded the Ethiopian: Tanis and Anysis were the two royal seats." For after the middle of the 8th century B. C., the Ethiopian (the 25th) dynasty already bore rule (DUNCKER, Geschichte des Alterth. I p. 598). Hezekiah cannot therefore have formed an alliance with the predecessor of the Ethiopian dynasty. DELITZSCH seems here to rely too much on Herodotus, II., 137 init., where a king Anysis of Anysis, i. e., Hanes, is named as predecessor of the Ethiopian Sabakos. Moreover, Ewald's assumption resting on Herodotus, II. 141, that the Egyptian king, with whom Sennacherib had to do, was the Ethiopian Sethon, priest of Hephaestos, who was at the same time ruler of lower and middle Egypt with Tanis for his royal seat, is refuted by Assyrian monuments. For, although the first inscriptions that mention the name Tirhaka (Assyrian Tar-ku-u), belong to the time after Sennacherib, yet the monuments of Sennacherib expressly name his Egyptian opponent "king of Meroe" (SCHRADER, die Keilinschriften und das A. T., p. 203), which could not possibly be said of a Tanitic king. When Isaiah here mentions Zoan (situated in the Delta of the Nile, southwest of Pelusium), he is probably led to do so, because this city, since the end of the second millennium before Christ, had been the capital of the kingdom. For till the expulsion of Hyksos, Memphis, then Thebes, had been the capital; then, from the epoch mentioned, Zoan, (comp. DUNCKER, Geschichte des Alterth, I, p. 598). Isaiah had already (xix. 11) mentioned Hanes (Egyptian Hnés, Ehnes, afterwards Herakleopolis, situated in the neighborhood of lake Moeris), because it had been last after Tanis the royal seat of a native dynasty (comp. Herodotus, II,, 137). If then Zoan and Hanes are the cities which had last been royal seats, and if they were known as such to the Prophet, there is really no reason with HITZIG, KNOBEL and others to adopt the reading חִנָּם יְגָעוּ, which lies at the basis of the Alexandrine version, but has in it only a very uncertain support. It is likewise unnecessary, and does not correspond to the context to refer the suffix in מַלְאָכָיו to the Egyptian king as having vainly summoned the warrior caste by his messengers (Herodotus, II. 141). It is most natural to refer the suffix in מלאכיו to the same subject to which the suffix in שריו belongs. If the Prophet wished the suffix in מלאכיו to have a different reference from that in שריו, he must have made this known in a way not to be misunderstood.

2. THE PROPHET AS HE OUGHT TO BE, AND AS HE OUGHT NOT TO BE.

CHAPTER XXX. 6-14.

6 The burden of the beasts of the south:
[a]Into the land of trouble and anguish,
From whence come [b]the young and old lion,
The viper and fiery flying serpent,
They will carry their riches upon the shoulders of young asses,
And their treasures upon the bunches of camels,
To a people that shall not profit them.
7 For the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose;
Therefore [c]have I cried [1]concerning this, Their strength is to sit still.
8 Now go, write it before them in a table,
And note it in a book,
That it may be for [2]the time to come for ever and ever:
9 That this is a rebellious people,
Lying children, children that will not hear the law of the LORD:
10 Which say to the Seers, See not;
And to the prophets, Prophesy not unto us right things,
Speak unto us smooth things, prophesy deceits:
11 Get you out of the way, turn aside out of the path,
Cause the Holy One of Israel to cease from before us.

12 Wherefore thus saith the Holy One of Israel,
Because ye despise this word,
And trust in [3]oppression and perverseness,
And stay thereon:
13 Therefore this iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall,
Swelling out in a high wall,
Whose breaking cometh suddenly at an instant.
14 And he shall break it as the breaking of [4]the potters' vessel,
That is broken in pieces; he shall not spare;
So that there shall not be found in the bursting of it a sherd
To take fire from the hearth,
Or to take water withal out of the pit.

[1] Or, to her. [2] Heb. the latter day. [3] Or, fraud. [4] Heb. the bottle of potters.
[a] through a land of trouble. [b] lioness and lion. [c] I call it; Boaster that sits still.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11. The form מְנֵי is found only here. The Masoretic note under the text is to be read "Two Nuns with Tseri." מְנֵי is formed after the analogy of the forms עָלֵי, אַחֲרֵי, etc., and has the same meaning as the more common מִנֵּי (xlvi. 3).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In order to set forth right vividly the certainty of his prophecy, Isaiah tells the people that he has been commanded to mark his utterance concerning the Egyptian help as a particular massa, to which he now gives an emblematic title similar to what we find in chapters xxi., xxii. The purport of this massa is this: The Jewish ambassadors drag rich treasures laboriously through the perilous wilderness to Egypt, in order to purchase the assistance of the Egyptians which will prove to be empty vapor; wherefore Jehovah Himself gives Egypt the name "Boaster, sitting still" (vers. 6 and 7). This massa is to be preserved till the remotest future, as a witness for the truth of what was said by the Prophet (ver. 8). In this way it must be made possible to establish objectively the truth of the prophetic testimony, as all sense for the truth is wanting in the people of Israel, for they are a lying race, that will not hear the law of Jehovah (ver. 9). They show this by actually demanding of the prophets that they should not tell them the truth, but only what is agreeable, even when it is pure falsehood (verse 10); and, further, by requiring that they (the prophets) should depart from the right way, and remove from their (the people's) eyes the Holy One of Israel (ver. 11). Because then they despise the word of the Lord, and rely only on violence at home and a perverse foreign policy (ver. 12), this their sin shall be to them as a rent wall which bulges out and threatens every moment to fall (ver. 13). And it will also fall, and its remains will through the violence of the fall become reduced to small pieces such as the sherds of a pot, none of which is large enough for one to carry in it fire from the hearth or water from the pit (vers. 14).

2. The burden——and ever.—Vers. 6–8. Very unjustly is the spuriousness of the inscription משׂא בהמות נגב maintained. In ver. 8 the Prophet is commanded to record it, i. e., the preceding brief, sharply marked saying in a particular tablet to serve as documentary evidence in the future. I understand this saying to be verses 6 and 7. For they are essentially of the same import as verses 1-5. But they reproduce this import in a quite peculiar, emblematic, mystical form. They bear, we might say, a decidedly prophetical character. Their purport is designedly set forth in this peculiar form for the purpose of being specially recorded. If now this brief saying is manifestly designed to have an independent existence, why should it not also have its own name, its particular inscription? The Prophet has recorded from xiii.—xxiii. a series of prophecies against foreign nations, to each of which he gives the title מַשָּׂא. He has, in particular, in chapter xxi. brought together some rather short utterances under the title משׂא with an emblematical addition (xxi. 1, 11, 13). Might he not designedly insert here in the text such a brief emblematic מַשָּׂא, as he was led to do so by the peculiar circumstances attending its origin? As he states, ver. 8, he received, after having orally delivered the words, the command also to make a particular record of them in writing. As now this recording formed an interlude to his oral teaching, and as he committed to writing all his oral teaching, why should he not record this interlude also? It could not possibly be passed over. Nor could he place it as an independent משׂא among the rest, for it would have been unintelligible in that connection. It is a rash conclusion to declare that the very expression משׂא is an evidence that the inscription did not proceed from Isaiah, because he never used the word. It is only in such prophecies as immediately refer to the theocracy that Isaiah does not use the word. It is with him a standing designation of prophecies concerning foreign nations. On this very account the word is here entirely appropriate. This only may be admitted, that when Isaiah orally delivered the prophecy contained in vers. 6 and 7, he did not then employ the words משׂא בה׳ נ׳. Possibly they may have been put as an inscription only to the writing mentioned in ver. 8. The purport of the massa is denoted by the words בהמות נגב. I believe that these words are ambiguous, and are purposely used in their ambiguity. The emblematic inscriptions xxi. 1, 11, 13; xxii. 1 are ambiguous. נגב is the south generally (Josh. xv. 4; xviii. 15, 19, et saepe), but also specially the south of Judah (comp. on xxi. 1). It is clear that the word cannot be taken here in the latter sense. For although the ambassadors on the way to Egypt crossed the south of Judah, they went also far beyond it. They made a journey into the south, into southern lands in general, and to these Egypt, the end of their journey, belongs. The בהמות נגב are therefore beasts which belong to the south generally. As then the Prophet above all means to warn against Egypt, must not also an Egyptian beast belong to these בהמות נגב? In fact בהמות recalls to mind the בְּהֵמוֹת Job xl. 15, the hippopotamus, in Egyptian probably p-ehe-mou, from which there is formed in Hebrew בְּהֵמוֹת resembling the plural of בְּהֵמָה (Comp. Lepsius in Herz. R.-Enc. I., p. 141), which could the more easily happen, since the Egyptian word signifies bos aquae, as the animal is called among the Arabians gamûs el-bahr, the river buffalo, and among the Italians bomarino. Comp. Herod. II. 71. But the Prophet does not think of the behemoth only. He has certainly also in his eye the beasts going to the south, bearing the treasures of Judah. Yea, I believe that the editors of Drechsler's Isaiah (II. p. 65, note) are perfectly right, when they say that we are to regard also as a subject of the oracle "the Magnates of Judah sent to Egypt, who more devoid of knowledge than ox and ass, belong to the beasts of burden." This kind of irony corresponds to the manner of Isaiah, and suits the context well. For not the innocent beasts, but those fools and untrustworthy Egypt must be regarded as the objects of the divine massa. [The beasts of the south are simply the asses and camels that bear the treasures to Egypt.—D. M.]. בארץ צ׳ וצ׳ is to be connected with ישאו. לביא to מעופף is parenthetical. The expressions צָרָה (angustiae) and צוקה (coarctatio) occur also in the verse, viii. 22; yet they are found combined as here only in Prov. i. 27.—לביא comp. on chap. v. 29. לַיִשׁ is found combined with לביא only here, and occurs besides only in two other places: Job iv. 22; Prov. xxx. 30. מֵהֶם refers to ארץ, there being substituted for this term in the singular the idea of the many separate localities from which such beasts may come. We, who are more accustomed to mark the place where, than the place whence anything appears (comp. e. g. מֵעַל and מִתַּחַת לָרָקִיעַ Gen. i. 7), can fitly render "wherein are lioness and lion." אֶפְעֶה vipera, regulus, besides here lix. 5; Job xx. 16. שרף מעופף comp. on xiv. 29. Observe the irony: through so dangerous a country the grandees of Judah drag their treasures, in order to purchase a help which will leave them in the lurch. עירים (Kethibh עֲיָרִים) comp. ver. 24; Gen. xxxii. 16; Judg. x. 4; xii. 14. The plural of חַיִל occurs besides only in the signification "forces, bands of warriors," and is mostly preceded by גִּבֹּרֵי or שָׂרֵי (1 Chron. vii. 5, 7, 11, 40; Jer. xl. 7, 13; xli. 11, et saepe). Only in Eccles. x. 10 does the word stand in the general signification "vires." דַּבֶּשֶׁת hump, bunch, is ἅπ. λεγ. But Egypt will help vapor and emptiness (הבל וריק only here) i. e., the result of its assistance will be nothing but empty vapor. הבל וריק are therefore not to be taken as adverbs (which they can indeed be, comp. Ps. lxxiii. 13; Job xxi. 34; xxxv. 16, et saepe), but as accusatives of the object depending on an idea of making, effecting latent in עזר (comp. xix. 21; Exod. x. 26; Job vi. 4; Zech. vii. 5). The Lord gives Egypt also a characteristic name, as it were, to serve as a warning that no one may rely on this deceitful help to his own detriment. He names Egypt רהב הם שבת. Here, first of all, it appears to me that the Prophet chose this expression with reference to a place in Job. We read, Job ix. 13, in a context which treats of the might and majesty of the supreme God: "Eloah turns not His anger, under Him bow themselves עֹזְרֵי רָהַב." Whatever the author of the book of Job may have understood by these עזרי רהב, at all events in view of Isaiah's unquestionable acquaintance with the book of Job, and of his frequent references to it, it is certainly not to be regarded as accidental that he applies to Egypt the two words עזר and רהב which stand together in that remarkable passage in Job which we own to be for us very obscure—רהב (from רָהַב tumultuari, strepere iii. 5; Prov. vi. 3; Ps. cxxxviii. 3; Cant. vi. 5) is ferocia, superbia, and is used poetically to designate a huge aquatic animal (Job xxvi. 12; Isa. li. 9) which is conceived of as symbol of Egypt; hence רַהַב occurs simply as symbolical name of Egypt: Ps. lxxxvii. 4; lxxxix. 11. רהב is then also here a designation of Egypt in the sense of ferocia, superbia, haughtiness, boasting. The words הם שבת are a closer specification, involving at the same time an antithesis. We best fill up the ellipsis by supplying אֲשֶׁר before הֵם, as hereby the abruptness of the construction is avoided. Cases such as עֵמֶק הַשִּׂדִּים הוּא יָם הַמֶּלַח, בֶּלַע הִיא־צֹעַר Gen. xiv. 2, 3 are not analogous; as in them an unknown name is explained by one that is known. But in our passage a new essential antithetic element is to be added to the first name; the whole name is to be marked as consisting of two parts in contrast to one another: Boasting that is at the same time sitting still. This thought is best expressed in German [and English] by the total omission of the pronoun, Boasting—sitting still.

["Those who approve of our common rendering, Their strength is to sit still, consider the words as designed to teach that the true strength and security of the Jews consisted in the exercise of quiet and patient confidence in God, assured that He would deliver them in His own way. To justify such rendering, however, the first two words must be joined, רְהָבָהֶם. But against this construction there lie two objections. First, the pronominal suffix could not with propriety be referred to any antecedent but Egypt at the beginning of the verse. Secondly, the noun רַהַב never occurs with the acceptation strength, but always signifies pride, insolence, rage." HENDERSON. If we only keep in mind, as a Hebrew would do, the significance of the name Rahab as meaning arrogance, we shall hardly find a happier translation of this expression than that given by LOWTH, Rahab the Inactive.—D. M.]. The same explanation is to be given of the plural הֵם as of מֵהֶם in ver. 6. DRECHSLER is disposed, after the example of COCCEIUS and VITRINGA, to derive שֶׁבֶת from שָׁבַת desinere. But, not to mention that such a derivative שֶׁבֶת does not occur (for in Gen. xxi. 19; Prov. xx. 3 שֶׁבֶת is certainly the infin. of יָשַׁב), the notion of ceasing, of doing nothing more is here quite unsuitable. The context requires the idea of inability to do anything, notwithstanding great noise with words and gestures. The Prophet, after having hitherto delivered his prophecy orally, received the command also to write it down immediately. And this should be done אִתָּם, i. e., before their (the people's) eyes (lix. 12; Job xii. 3 et saepe). For it was to be established that the Prophet had predicted the fruitlessness of the effort to obtain aid from Egypt, in order that, when this should be demonstrated by fact, the omniscience of Jehovah, and the trustworthiness of His servant as a Prophet, might appear indubitable. It appears to me that בּוֹא intimates that the Prophet could not do the writing on the spot where he was speaking, but must repair to a place where he would find the materials necessary for writing. לוּחַ and סֵפֶר differ only rhetorically in the parallelism. For, in fact, the word was to be not twice, but only once, written down. It is not necessary to read לָעַד for לְעַד. Observe the climax in the three specifications of time.

3. That this is a——of the pit.—Vers. 9–14. The writing down which was commanded would not be needful, if there were alive in the people a mind for the truth and for what was really conducive to their welfare. But as they now refuse to hear the warning voice of truth, so they would also hereafter deny that they had been warned, if it could not be proved to them, as we say, on black and white. The Prophet, therefore, gives a reason for what he had said, vers. 6-8, by the words כִּי עַם מְרִי וגו׳ vers. 9 sqq. The expression עַם מְרִי is found only here in Isaiah. He had, perhaps, Numb. xvii. 25 [E. V. xvii. 10] in view, where the command is given that the rod of Aaron should be kept לְאוֹת לִבְנֵי־מֶרִי. כַּחַשׁ is found only here. So corrupt are the people that they actually dare to attempt to prescribe to the Prophets what they ought, and what they ought not to prophesy, as if the true Prophet could see anything else than what Jehovah shows him (comp. the demand made upon the Prophet Micaiah, the son of Imlah, and his answer to it, 1 Kings xxii. 13, 14, also the answer of Balaam Numb. xxii. 38, sqq.). The distinction between רֹאִים and חֹזִים has merely a rhetorical significance; for there is no real difference between them (comp. xxix. 10 and 1 Sam. ix. 9). רֹאֶה occurs in this signification in Isaiah only here. These people would have best liked entirely to forbid the Prophets of Jehovah to see anything as Prophets. But where this failed, they tried to induce them at least to accommodate their visions to the wishes of the public. They said to them: see not right things (the truth xxvi. 10; lix. 14) for us (dat. commodi), speak unto us what is agreeable (properly smooth, going smoothly on, Ps. xii. 3, 4, only here in Isaiah), and see deceptions (מַהֲתַלּוֹת ἅπ. λεγ., comp. הֲתֻלִּים Job xvii. 3 and Hiph. הֵתֵל Gen. xxxi. 7; Judg. xvi. 10 et saepe). Yea, they proceed quite consistently still further; they call upon the Prophets to turn aside altogether from the right way, that is, to forsake the LORD Himself, and to remove Him, the Holy One of Israel (on xxix. 19) entirely from the face of the people. They thus require that the Prophets should not only apostatize to idolatry, but even take up an offensive attitude against the LORD. הִשְׁבִּית (xiii. 11; xvi. 10; xxi. 2) is used of the abolition of idolatrous institutions, e. g., 2 Kings xxiii. 5. This wicked conduct cannot remain unpunished. Because they thus contemptuously reject (מאס with בְּ comp. vii. 15 sq.; xxxiii. 15; comp. Amos ii. 4) the warning word of the LORD, which Isaiah announced to them respecting their Egyptian policy, and hope for their deliverance by exacting by violence the money needed to purchase the aid of Egypt (ver. 6, comp. 2 Kings xv. 20), and by sinful reliance on the help of the heathen (נָלוֹז part. Niph., perversum, pravum, only here in Isaiah, besides only in the Proverbs of Solomon ii. 14; iii. 32; xiv. 2 comp. iii. 21; iv. 21), this godless procedure of theirs shall be to them the precursor of certain destruction. As the breach in a wall and its bulging out is the sure precursor of its fall, (comp. Ps. lxii. 4), so this Egyptian alliance shall be a symptom, not of the deliverance, but of the ruin of Judah. פֶּרֶץ (besides only lviii. 12) is manifestly not simply the mere rent, but that which is rent or burst in pieces. A פרץ נפל is a part of a wall that has burst asunder, which is falling, i. e., about to fall. It is also נִבְעֶה (tumescens, בָּעָה to swell up, boil up, lxiv. 1, to desire eagerly xxi. 12; except in Isaiah the word occurs only Obad. 6) in a high wall. The higher the wall, the more dangerous the breach. פתאם לפתע comp. xxix. 5. The suffix in שְׁבָרָהּ refers to חוֹמָה. When we read in the next verse וּשְׁבָרָהּ, Jehovah is evidently the subject, and the object is the wall, by which Judah is to be understood—a rapid transition from the image to the thing signified, which is here the less surprising as another image is immediately employed in what follows. That the subject of שְׁבָרָהּ must be a person, clearly appears from the nature of the figure, as it is more closely defined by the following words כתות לא יחמל. For it is not a potter's vessel that breaks of itself that is spoken of, but one which is intentionally (לא יחמל) broken in pieces (כתות is therefore the nearer specification of שְׁבֹר: the transition from the infinitive to the finite verb in לֹא יַחְמֹל occurs frequently, and is here rendered necessary especially by the negation). כְּתִתָּה contusio, then as the abstract for the concrete, that which is broken in pieces, the fragments. חָתָה capere, to fetch, besides here only Ps. lii. 7; Prov. vi. 27; xvii. 10; xxv. 22. יָקוּד (the verb יָקַד in Isaiah only x. 16; lxv. 5 and here), is that which is kindled, burning, the glowing fire. חָשַׂף is properly nudare, retegere. But while we take off the surface, we, as it were, uncover the fluid. עָרָה, nudavit, is likewise used of pouring out, because the bottom of the vessel is thereby uncovered—(Gen. xxiv. 20; 2 Chron. xxiv. 11; Isa. liii. 12). חָשַׂף occurs further in Isaiah xx. 4; xlvii. 2; lii. 10. גֶּבֶא is a cavity, a deep place in the earth. only here in Isaiah (comp. Ezek. xlvii. 11). That the Prophet alludes here to the exile is evident. But the passage did not receive its complete fulfilment till the second, or Roman exile.

3. THE PRESUMPTUOUS AND THE WELL-FOUNDED CONFIDENCE.

CHAPTER XXX. 15-18.

15 For thus saith the LORD God, the Holy One of Israel;
In returning and rest shall ye be saved:
In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength:
And ye would not.
16 But ye said, No; for we will [a]flee upon horses;
Therefore shall ye flee:
And, We will ride upon the swift;
Therefore shall they that pursue you be swift.
17 One thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one;
At the rebuke of five shall ye flee:
Till ye be left as a [1b]beacon upon the top of a mountain,
And as an ensign on an hill.
18 And therefore will the LORD wait, that he may be gracious unto you,
And therefore will he be exalted, that he may have mercy upon you:
For the LORD is a God of judgment:
Blessed are all they that wait for him.

[1] Or, a tree bereft of branches: Or, a mast.

[a] hasten. [b] a pine.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. That the way of deliverance pursued by Israel was wrong, appears not only from its roots (vers. 9-11) and from its fruit (vers. 12-14), but also from setting over against it that which is declared by Jehovah to be alone salutary: Returning and rest in Him; quiet, patient trust in Him who only is strong and makes strong. But Israel declined to take this latter way (ver. 15). According to their notion, only Egypt's horses could help them. But these horses are to serve only for precipitate flight. Runners, too, there shall be, but at the disposal of the pursuers of fleeing Israel (ver. 16). A great number of Israelites will flee from a petty band of enemies, and Israel's whole might will be reduced to but a small remnant, that might be compared with a single pine or a solitary banner on a mountain-height (ver. 17). And the final consequence will be that the LORD, as He is a God who exercises justice, must delay His help, which eventually will not be withheld. Then will it appear that only they are to be pronounced happy who hope on the LORD (ver. 18). [I understand the purport of ver. 18 differently. See exegetical and critical remarks on it.—D. M.]

2. Vers. 15-18. For thus saith——wait for him.—שׁוּבָה (ἅπ. λεγ.) is certainly not quickening, vivificatio, but returning. For the question here relates to what Israel was bound to do. And שׁוּב is that very significant leading term in the prophecy of Isaiah, and especially in that of Jeremiah, which we have already (i. 27) taken notice of, and have particularly remarked in the name שְׁאָר יָשׁוּב (comp. on vii. 3). נַחַת, from נוּחַ, to rest (comp. ver. 30, et saepe), as רַחַת, ver. 24, from רוּחַ, marks, as it were, the point where the שׁוּבָה ends. For Israel has to return to the LORD and then rest in the LORD (comp. "Syria resteth on Ephraim," vii. 2). This meaning seems to me more appropriate than that of "rest from one's own self-confiding endeavor" (DEL.). [DELITZSCH appears to me to set forth the exact idea intended by נחת. It is hard to assume an ellipsis of the words "in the Lord" after rest.

But the supplement proposed by Delitzsch is naturally suggested by the context.—D. M.]—השקט includes the idea of abstaining from making one's self outwardly busy, as well as that of inward composure. Isaiah called הִשָּׁקֵט (vii. 4) to Ahaz, who was seeking safety in external military and political measures. בטחה (ἅπ. λεγ.) forms a fine counterpart to השקט: the true repose rests on the confidence which casts every concern on the Lord (comp. xxxii. 17, where also השקט and בטח stand together. In this union of self-restraint and of yielding one's self to the Lord would consist Israel's strength (גבורה, iii. 25; xi. 2; xxviii. 6; xxx. 15; xxxiii. 13; xxxvi. 5; in the second part only the plural גְבוּרוֹת, lxiii. 15, occurs). But alas! Israel refuses to make this self-surrender to the Lord (ver. 9). The people say rather: על סוס ננוס (ver. 16). The Vulgate translates: ad equos fugiemus, as in x. 3. But it is apparent that the rhyme between נוס and סוס is designed; and for the sake of the rhyme a modification of the meaning of נוס is allowable. The following words—we will ride upon the swift—make clear the thought which the Prophet desired to express by על סוס נ׳. I therefore take נוס, as many modern interpreters do, in the sense of celeriter ferri, festinare (comp. נוּץ, נִיץ; in German fliehen and fliegen [in English to flee and to fly]). If the clause signified "on horses will we flee" (Drechsler), then it must be said in opposition: therefore shall ye flee on foot. We should then expect a word which would indicate slow flight. But in using this language the Israelites were thinking of meeting the enemy on swift horses. The appropriate antithetic statement which the Prophet makes is: no, horses will serve you only for flight. Parallel to "we will hasten upon horses" is the clause על-קל נרכב. Only here is קַל, celer, κέλης (comp. v. 26; xviii. 2; xix. 1) used of the swift horse. The Israelites were warned in the Law against the horses of Egypt (Deut. xvii. 16; comp. 1 Kings x. 25, 28), and our Prophet utters soon after (xxxi. 1, 3) in plain words the same blame which we find here. [Beside the play of words in סוס, נוס and תְנוּסוּן, that in קַל and יִקַּלּוּ should not be overlooked.—D. M.] Ver. 17 depicts the disgraceful haste and senselessness of their flight in terms that evidently allude to passages in the Law (comp. Lev. xxvi. 17; and especially Deut. xxxii. 30). [Lowth supposes that after חֲמִשָּׁה there stood originally רבבה, which has dropped out of the text. But the connection with the following words would be disturbed by this proposed emendation: "at the rebuke of five shall ye flee till ye be left," etc. Henderson properly quotes the censure of Kocher on such intermeddling with the sacred text: Quin tandem aliquando suae sibi viae certum vatem ire sinentes nostros errores corrigimus?—D.M.] This wasting, destructive flight will last till there remains of Israel only a small remnant. The smallness of this remnant is set forth by the Prophet under a double image. He compares it first with a single pine (תֹּרֶן=אֹרֶן, xliv. 14, originally the pine, then the mast made out of it, xxxiii. 23; Ezek. xxvii. 5), on a high mountain, which is all that remains of a thick wood; and then with a solitary signal-pole (Numb. xxi. 8 sq.; Isa. v. 26; xi. 10, 12, et saepe) set up on a bare height (xiii. 2). The choice of this second image was perhaps determined by the resemblance in sound between נֵס and נוס. Ver. 18 describes the second and last effect of the לא אביתם in ver. 15. The first was destruction and dispersion, the second is the delay in God's showing favor [?] חִכָּה with לְ to wait for something, Ps. cvi. 13; Job iii. 21; Isa. viii. 17; lxiv. 3. The sense of delaying lies in this word in 2 Kings vii. 9; ix. 3. This sense, too, is not foreign to the passage, Job xxxii. 4. The parallelism indicates that the words ירום לרחמכם must have an analogous sense. I understand רום here with Rashi (comp. Gesen. Thes. p. 1274) in the sense of יִתְרַחֵק, he is high, i. e., gone away upwards, because he dwells on high. He takes a high, i. e., retired, distant position in relation to pitying you (comp. מרום משפטיך, Psalm x. 5). It must be admitted that we should expect מֵרַחֶמְכֶם instead of לר׳. The matter is still dubious. Perhaps we should read יִדּוֹם or יָדוֹם (with Houbigant, Lowth, Ewald, Cheyne, and some Codices). That God delays in granting deliverance, is according to His justice. He must punish you. Divine justice requires this. If He should only show mercy, this would not be good for the sinner himself (xxvi. 10). It is therefore on the ground of the declarations Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7; Numb. xiv. 18 said of him [rather the Lord Himself says]: "I will not make a full end of thee; but I will correct thee in measure, and will not leave thee altogether unpunished" (Jer. xxx. 11; xlvi. 28). Yet from this correction in measure, which satisfies justice and love, there is a deliverance to the enjoyment of the full light of salvation for those who wait on the Lord in faith. This thought forms the transition to the second part of the chapter, which is of a consolatory character. The last clause of ver. 18 recalls to mind the closing words of the second Psalm. [Must we then give up using the hallowed phrase: "The Lord waiteth to be gracious" as an encouragement to come to Him, and in deference to just criticism regard these words as rather a threatening that the Lord will delay to show favor? Though one or two instances of the rare use of חכה in the sense of delaying may be adduced, yet the word more naturally marks a tending or inclining to the object of waiting. Here we have חכה followed by לְ, which forces us to give the word a sense the very opposite of deferring or delaying. Dr. Naegelsbach confesses the unsatisfactoriness of the explanation which must be given to the following parallel clause, if the first clause of the verse is to be understood of Jehovah delaying to be gracious. But, it may be asked, how is לָכֵן at the beginning of the verse to be explained, if it does not contain a threatening? I connect "therefore" with the miserable condition of Israel described in the preceding verse. This misery awakens the divine compassion. Therefore the LORD "repents Himself for His servants when He seeth that their power is gone," Deut. xxxii. 36. He seeks opportunity to relieve the distressed because "He delighteth in mercy." And "He is exalted above the heavens," not to be remote, not to withdraw Himself and to withhold aid, but that "His beloved may be delivered," Ps. cviii. 5, 6. Need I add that it is in accordance with Scripture to represent the LORD as displaying His righteousness when He fulfils His promise to show mercy, and is faithful in keeping His gracious covenant? See how in the next, the 19th, verse the Prophet illustrates what he means by the LORD waiting that He may be gracious to Israel, when He declares "He will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry."—D. M.]

4. THE SANCTIFICATION AND SALVATION OF THE PEOPLE.

CHAPTER XXX. 19-26.

19 For [a]the people shall dwell in Zion at Jerusalem:
Thou shalt weep no more:
He will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry;
When he shall hear it, he will answer thee.
20 And though the LORD give you the bread of adversity, and the water of [1]affliction,
Yet shall not thy teachers be removed into a corner any more,
But thine eyes shall see thy teachers:
21 And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying,
This is the way, walk ye in it,
When ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left.
22 Ye shall defile also the covering of [2]thy graven images of silver,
And the ornament of thy molten images of gold:
Thou shalt [3]cast them away as a menstruous cloth;
Thou shalt say unto it, Get thee hence.
23 Then shall he give the rain of thy seed,
That thou shalt sow the ground withal;
And bread of the increase of the earth,
And it shall be [b]fat and plenteous:
In that day shall thy cattle feed in large pastures.
24 The oxen likewise and the young asses that ear the ground
Shall eat [4c]clean provender,
Which hath been winnowed with the [d]shovel and with the fan.
25 And there shall be upon every high mountain and upon every [5]high hill,
Rivers and streams of waters
In the day of the great slaughter,
When the towers fall.
26 Moreover the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun,
And the light of the sun shall be seven-fold,
As the light of seven days,
In the day that the LORD bindeth up the breach of his people,
And healeth the stroke of their wound.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 19. יָחְנְךָ for יְחָנְּךָ as Gen. xliii. 29. Comp. OLSHAUSEN, Gr., § 243, a. כְּ before שָׁמְעָתוֹ marks coincidence. Comp. Gen. xxiv. 30; xxxiv. 7; xxxix. 15, et saepe. The Infinitive שָׁמְעָה with the feminine ending is found only here.

Ver. 20. מַיִם is in the absolute state instead of the construct. [On this kind of apposition the note in DELITZSCH's Commentary in loco may be consulted.—D. M.]. כָּנַף occurs as a verb only here. There is no reason apparent why this word should not be the root of כָּנָף covering, wing, and accordingly signify to cover, to hide, in the Niphal to hide one's-self. The singular is used because יכנף is the prefixed predicate.

Ver. 21. תאמינו for תְּיַמִּינוּ (comp. EWALD, Gr., § 122, e). This form occurs only here.

Ver. 22. [דָּוָה is abbreviation for כְּלִי דָוָה. DEL.].

Ver. 23. מקניך could be in the singular. But forms such as מִקְנַי Ex. xvii. 3; Numb. xx. 19, show that the word is also actually used in the plural. ירעה is therefore singular as יכנף in ver. 20. (See remark on the latter place).

Ver. 24. זֹרֶה is either Pual part. for מְזֹרֶה, or Part. Kal as a verbal form in which the subject is implied (comp. ii. 9; xxiv. 2; xxix. 8).

Ver. 26. LOWTH, GESENIUS, HITZIG, HENDEWERK and KNOBEL regard the words כאור שבעת הימים as a gloss because they are wanting in the LXX. and form a needless epexegesis which disturbs the parallelism. But their absence in the LXX. is no reason for treating them as an interpolation. They are found in the Targum, in the Syriac and in Jerome. There is here no fixed metre. We can neither affirm that the verse consists of four members, nor that a definite length is required for each line. And in regard to the sense, the epexegesis is not so needless. For who is not sensible that the שבעתים is set more vividly before us by the addition that follows?

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet, after preparing the way by ver. 18, looks into the distant future. It presents itself to him as a blessed time. He gives a general picture of it in colors borrowed from the present. We call it a general picture, because it will not be realized in a fixed time; but it comprehends as in a frame what will take place for the good of the people from the proximate till the most remote future. But this picture of the future is painted with colors of the present, for the circumstances of the present supply the images under which the Prophet represents the blessings of the future. He assumes that there will always be a people dwelling in Zion, i. e., Jerusalem. This people will not always have to weep; a time will come when its requests will be speedily answered (ver. 19). They will not indeed be without bread of distress and water of tribulation in the future, but their eyes will also be constantly able to see the teachers who will show them the way out of distress (ver. 20); and the ears of the people will hearken every moment to the voice which will call from behind the direction as to the way they should go (ver. 21). Then will the people put away the abominations of idolatry (ver. 22). And the LORD will grant rain and glorious fruit to nourish men and cattle (vers. 23, 24). Springs of water, too, will gush forth on the high mountains in the time when the LORD by rivers of blood has made this possible (ver. 25). The light of sun and moon will shine many times brighter than now, in that time when the LORD shall have healed the wounds of His people (ver. 26).

2. For the people——Get thee hence.—Vers. 19–22. The cheering prospect of which ver. 18 permitted a view, is now fully and completely unfolded. First of all, the Prophet promises that in Zion—Jerusalem a people will always dwell, i. e., the holy city will never like the world-city become a desert forsaken by men (xiii. 19 sqq.; xxv. 2; Jer. l. 13 et saepe). בירושלם is added for nearer explanation, and as if to prevent a misunderstanding. If the Prophet had written only Zion, it might have been supposed that he speaks of the kingdom whose proper centre was Zion, the seat of the house of David (comp. Ps. ii. 6; cx. 2 et saepe). By the addition "Jerusalem" the Prophet renders it impossible to mistake that he means the city. And in fact Jerusalem has never ceased to be inhabited, whereby it is distinguished from the world-cities Babylon and Nineveh, which have lain desolate for thousands of years. We may not take עַם as a vocative, though in that case תבכה would fitly follow; but the first clause would then have no meaning. The sudden change of person, which occurs frequently in this paragraph, should not cause surprise. Comp. ver. 20 לָכֶם, ver. 21 לְכוּ ,אָזְנֶיךָ, ver. 22 כַּסְפֶּךָ, טִמֵּאתֶם. The infinitive absolute בָּכוֹ has evidently the force that the weeping will not be long continued, as the LORD will speedily have mercy. In the future to which the look of the Prophet is directed, Israel will not be without tribulation. But this tribulation the Prophet comprises in the expression bread of distress, water of affliction. לֶחֶם צַר is found only here. 1 Kings xxii. 27; 2 Chron. xviii. 26 we find לחם לחץ ומים לחץ to designate the meagre fare of prisoners. As the Prophet according to what follows (comp. especially ver. 26) has the entire future in his eye, we cannot refer the expressions "bread of distress and water of affliction" merely to the siege of Jerusalem by the Assyrians (xxix. 3 sqq.). But, although that siege stands in the fore-ground of the Prophet's field of vision, we have to look upon that siege with its bread of distress and its water of affliction only as a type and representative of all the affliction which Israel must endure in the future. And if this affliction is here alluded to only in sparing terms, this is owing to the character of this second part of our prophecy, in which the threatening almost disappears behind the promise. But Israel will bear affliction quite otherwise than formerly. Hitherto they displayed in times of need their rage against the Prophets of the LORD. These were called those who trouble Israel (1 Kings xviii. 17), were treated as ringleaders of sedition (Amos vii. 10), and traitors to their country (Jer. xxxviii. 4 sqq.); all misery was attributed to the forsaking of the worship of idols owing to their urgent effort (Jer. xliv. 16 sqq.). Then the Prophets were persecuted, and must conceal themselves (Matt. xxiii. 37; Jer. xxxvi. 26). This will happen henceforth no more. But Jerusalem will, on the contrary, in affliction direct its eyes to the teachers in order to follow them; it will open its ears to the word of the LORD which the servants of God, who are conceived as commanders marching behind a procession, will call to it, and will direct its steps exactly according to their commands.

["Their teachers were to be before them, but when they declined from the right way, their backs would be turned to them, consequently, the warning voice would be heard behind them. The first and last clauses of the verse closely cohere."—HENDERSON. D. M.]. This obedience to the word of Jehovah implies that they will abandon idols. This will be done while they treat the silver and golden images, without (see command Deut. vii. 25) regard to the precious metal, as impure things, yea, cast them away as objects of abhorrence (comp. ii. 20). טִמֵּא as 2 Kings xxiii. 8, 10, 16 (only here in Isaiah). צִפּוּי is the metal covering of statues (Deut. xvii. 3, 4; Ex. xxxviii. 17, 19) אפדה is found besides only in Ex. xxviii. 8 and xxxix. 5 in the expression חֵשֶׁב אֲפֻדָּה, a part of the priest's dress. ["The word is the feminine of אֵפוֹד; but here, as parallel with צִפּוּי, it signifies a covering or plating over the body of an image."—HENDERSON]. מַסֵּכָה (ver. 1) fusio, fusura, fusile, a molten image (Exod. xxxii. 4, 8 et saepe, further in Isaiah only xlii. 17). The expression תזרם thou shalt scatter them, recalls Exod. xxxii. 20. צֵא is a strong expression (comp. 2 Sam. xvi. 7). The singular לו here involves the notion of something contemptible: Get out! thou wilt say to the trash.

3. Then shall he give——their wound.—Vers. 23-26. To the change of life described there is now attached the promise of the richest blessing even of a temporal kind. First, to the seed the necessary rain is promised, a blessing which could never be wanting in an oriental picture of prosperity, and is therefore also so frequently referred to in the theocratic promises: Lev. xxvi. 4; Deut. xiv. 11; Joel ii. 23; Jer. v. 24; Zech. x. 1 et saepe. The rain which is to fructify the seed is the seed-rain or early rain (יוֹרֶה) which falls in October. The expression "He shall give the rain of thy seed" instead of "to thy seed" recalls places such as Gen. xxxix. 21; Numb. xii. 6. אשר תזרע = with which thou shalt sow (comp. xvii. 10) [זָרַע is here construed with a double accusative]. לחם is by תבואת האד׳ generalized. It is therefore all that the earth produces for the food of man, as לחם is used also in this comprehensive sense in the expression "to eat bread." (Gen. xxxi. 54; xliii. 16; Jer. xli. 1 et saepe). All these products of the field serving for food shall be of the best quality, full of sap and strength (דָּשֵׁן as an adjective only here in Isaiah: comp. Ps. xcii. 15; Gen. xlix. 20). כַּר in the signification of pascuum only here and Ps. xxxvii. 20; lxv. 14. The Niphal נרחב dilatatum, spatiosum esse is likewise found only here. The oxen and asses which till [In the E. V., we have the word ear which is now obsolete and means to plough or to till.—D. M.] the land are the animals employed by the farmer for draught and carrying burdens. These shall be fed with the best provender. בְּלִיל (only here in Isaiah, besides Job vi. 5; xxiv. 6) is a mixture, a mash, provender consisting of grain (comp. the following זֹרֶה) and chopped herbs. חָמִיץ leavened, salted (comp. חֹמֶץ, חָמֵץ) is ἅπ. λεγ. The provender is salted with salt or saltish herbs, in order to make it more palatable. It has previously to be cleansed from impurities that it may be more excellent. This is done by winnowing. The implements which serve for winnowing are רַחַת and מִזְרֶה which are still called Racht and Midra. The former is a flat shovel and serves, according to the interesting Excursus of WETZSTEIN in DELITZSCH's Commentary, to winnow leguminous fruits, and the mixed remains of the better kinds of grain. The latter is a five or six pronged fork which is employed in winnowing the superior kinds of grain. If the Prophet had mentioned the winnowing shovel only (racht), the meaning would be that the cattle would be fed only with inferior provender. The mention of the מִזְרֶה intimates that they should also have grain of wheat and barley. רַחַת is ἅπ. λεγ. מִזְרֶה occurs further in Jer. xv. 7. On all high mountains and towering hills were the places of idolatrous worship, where flowed the blood of the offerings so offensive to God, especially of the children sacrificed to Moloch (1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xvii. 10; Jer. ii. 20; iii. 6; Ezek. vi. 16; xx. 28). Instead thereof there should now flow on the mountains and hills water-brooks, a blessing hitherto confined to the valleys (xli. 18). פלגים are certainly natural brooks; יְבָלִים (besides xliv. 4) are perhaps water-courses turned off from them. But as the Prophet had already, ver. 20, intimated by the mention of bread of distress and water of affliction, that distress and affliction would not be wanting, so here at the close of his discourse he sets forth the prospect of great slaughter and falling of towers. By these intimations he lets us perceive that the glorious time of the end lies beyond a dreadful period which first must be passed through. This latter he has described often enough (comp. xxiv. sqq.), to be able to suppose that these brief allusions would be quite well understood by his readers. ביום is to be taken here in that general sense in which we have already frequently met it (comp. e. g., xxvii. 1); but in our place the occurrence following that time is placed first. It is implied, too, in the ביום that there is a certain connection between the occurrences mentioned. There is no chasm lying between them, so that the following time has absolutely nothing to do with the foregoing. That water-streams of blessing succeed streams of blood is not accidental. These streams of blood must atone and purify so as to prepare the ground for blessing. הֶרֶג occurs further xxvii. 7. I find in הרג and נפל מגדלים simply an allusion to the great judgments which must fall on people and city before the day of redemption. The old, theocratic Jerusalem with its towers and its temple is reduced to ruins, while streams of blood have at the same time flown. And here the Prophet takes in one view the first and second destruction of Jerusalem. But immediately behind this destruction he sees the time of blessing. That long periods of time must intervene between these occurrences is matter of no moment. Verse 26 transports us into a time which lies beyond the present state of things, though not into the time of the new heaven and new earth, for the present sun and the present moon still exist. But their influence is intensified; they are elevated in the scale of existence. DELITZSCH is certainly right in saying: "It is not the new heaven of which the Prophet here speaks, but that glorification of nature promised both in Old and New Testament prophecy for the final period of the world's history." Comp. Rev. xx. 1–4.

The light of the moon (לבנה besides only xxiv. 23; Cant. vi. 10) will then be as the light of the sun (חמה, likewise in xxiv. 23 and Cant. vi. 10, besides Job xxx. 28); but the light of the sun will be the seven-fold (septuplum Gen. iv. 15, 24; Ps. xii. 7) of what it now is. For it will be as the light of seven days, i. e., the quantity of light which has hitherto been sufficient for seven days will then be concentrated in a single day. On this day all the wounds which the LORD must inflict on His people before and after the time of the Prophets (vers. 20 and 25), will be healed. שֶׁבֶר is a word of very frequent use by Isaiah. מחץ מכתו is the fracture, contusion of the bone caused by the stroke which it receives. מחץ seems to indicate a sorer evil than שבר. [Instead of the E. V., the stroke of their wound, we should rather render the wound of their stroke. It is doubtful whether the suffix in מכתו should be referred to עם or יהוה.—D. M.].

5. THE MUSIC OF THE WORLD'S JUDGMENT.

CHAPTER XXX. 27–33.

27 Behold, the name of the LORD cometh from far,
Burning with his anger, [1]and the burden thereof is [2]heavy;
His lips are full of indignation,
And his tongue as a devouring fire:
28 And his breath, as an overflowing stream,
Shall reach to the midst of the neck,
To sift the nations with the sieve of vanity:
And there shall be a bridle in the jaws of the people,
Causing them to err.
29 Ye shall have a song, as in the night
When a holy solemnity is kept;
And gladness of heart, as when one goeth with a pipe
To come into the mountain of the LORD,
To the [a]mighty One of Israel.
30 And the LORD shall cause [3]his glorious voice to be heard,
And shall show the lighting down of his arm,
With the indignation of his anger,
And with the flame of a devouring fire,
With scattering, and tempest, and hailstones.
31 For through the voice of the LORD
Shall the Assyrian be beaten down,
[b]Which smote with a rod.
32 And [4][c]in every place where the grounded staff shall pass,
Which the LORD shall [5]lay upon him,
It shall be with tabrets and harps;
And in battles of shaking will he fight [6]with it.
33 For [d]Tophet is ordained [7]of old;
Yea, for the king it is prepared;
He hath made it deep, and large,
The pile thereof is fire and much wood;
The breath of the LORD, like a stream of brimstone,
Doth kindle it.

[1] Or, and the grievousness of flame. [2] Heb. heaviness. [3] Heb. the glory of his voice.
[4] Heb. every passing of the rod founded. [5] Heb. cause to rest upon him. [6] Or, against them.
[7] Heb. from yesterday.

[a] Rock. [b] with the rod will he smite. [c] every stroke of the rod of doom. [d] a place of burning.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 28. הֲנָפָה for הָנִיף x. 15 is a verbal noun used as an infinitive. Comp. Esther ii. 18.

Ver. 32. Instead of בָּהּ which we must refer to the land of Assyria, the K'ri has the preferable reading בָּם.

Ver. 33. The reading of the K'ri הִיא has probably arisen through the attempt to produce a conformity with the feminine suffix in מְדֻרָתָהּ.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The Prophet sees the LORD appear with all His attributes as Judge, and the nations brought to Him as beasts compelled by the bridle to come to be destroyed (vers. 27 and 28). Meanwhile Israel's song is heard as the rejoicing at a festival (ver. 29). Then Jehovah's majestic voice sounds forth, and His arm is seen to descend to strike (ver. 30). It is Assyria that stands trembling before Him and receives the strokes (ver. 31), and every stroke is inflicted with the music of tabrets and harps, to which the sound of the heavy blows forms as it were the accompaniment (ver. 32). This is the immolation of Assyria, as we see from the broad and deep place of burning which is prepared with a huge pyre, which the breath of the LORD, as a brook of burning brimstone, will kindle in order to consume the slaughtered victim Assyria, i. e., the worldly power (ver. 33).

2. Behold the name——to err. Vers. 27 and 28. The name of Jehovah that comes from far to judgment is not a mere word, nor does it stand simply for God Himself, but it is a manifestation of Deity in which He reveals His holy and righteous nature and His almighty majesty for the purpose of judgment. We have here to refer to Ex. xxiii. 21, where the LORD declares of His angel: my name is in him;—and to all those places where it is said that the name of Jehovah dwells in His holy temple; and, lastly, to places such as Ps. lxxv. 2 where we read "Thy name is near." The name of Jehovah that comes to judgment is a person. It is He who is the Agent in every revelation of the Godhead, and accordingly He to whom the Father has committed all judgment (John v. 22; Acts xvii. 31; Rom. xiv. 10; et saepe). The name of God comes from far, because He comes from heaven (Ps. cxxxviii. 6). But as far as the eye can reach He is seen. His appearance is like a tempest. בֹּעֵר אַפּוֹ recalls Ps. ii. 12. וְכֹבֶד מַשָּׂאָה supply הָיָה. מַשָּׂאָה is lifting up, and according to Judg. xx. 38 of smoke. It occurs only here. זַעַם foam, foaming rage, (x. 5, 25; xiii. 5; xxvi. 20). אֵשׁ אֹכֶלֶת occurs Ex. xxiv. 17; Deut. iv. 24; ix. 3; hence in Joel ii. 5 and Isaiah xxix. 6; xxx. 27, 30; xxxiii. 14. It has been rightly remarked that two images—that of a tempest and that of a raging man—are here blended. The LORD moves along in His wrath like an overflowing brook which divides (יֶחֱצֶה) the man who has fallen into it into two unequal parts, only the smaller appearing above the water (viii. 8). He sifts the people with the sieve (נָפָה ἀπ. λεγ.) of emptiness, i. e., a sieve which lets the light, useless grain fall through it. [This explanation is not natural. The sieve of vanity, or emptiness, or destruction is so-called as marking the result of the sifting, a reduction to nothingness.—D. M.]. The LORD comes as Judge. The nations are brought to Him against their will. A bridle is put into their jaws which compels them to go from the way which they intended (רֶסֶן מַתְעֶה the expression only here, הִתְעָה in Isaiah iii. 12; ix. 15; xix. 13 sq.: lxiii. 17).

3. Ye shall have a song——Israel. Ver. 29. The Prophet marks by the article before שִׁיר the customary solemn festal song. לָכֶם is the dat. commodi. The night when the festival is kept or consecrated is the night from the fourteenth to the fifteenth of the month Nisan, the night in which the paschal lamb was eaten amid solemn songs; for this was the only festival which was celebrated at night. On the fifteenth the feast of unleavened bread began, to which the passover served as an introductory dedication. Israel's preservation in the night when the destroying angel smote the host of Sennacherib (xxxvii. 36 sqq.) can be regarded as one, but not the only one, of the events which Isaiah had here in his eye. The Prophet comprehends in the section vers. 27-33, all that is future, as he had done in the parallel section vers. 19-26. הִתְקַדֵּשׁ is vox solemnis for the consecration preparatory to the festival (Ex. xix. 22; Numb. xi. 18; Josh. iii. 5; vii. 13 et saepe). But in those places the people or the priests are the subject. Here it is the festival. The expression is a metonymy, the festival being put for those who celebrate it. חָג κατ' ἐξοχὴν is elsewhere the feast of tabernacles. Here the festival is definitely marked as that of the passover by לֵיל. Beside the solemnity celebrated at night with song, the Prophet makes mention in the second part of the verse of another such solemnity happening by day. He also employs the manifold festal processions which with accompaniment of song and music moved to the temple, as types of the joy granted to Israel in distinction from the heathen. כְּשִׂמְחַת הוֹלֵךְ – כַּהוֹלֵךְ comp. v. 29; x. 10; xiii. 4, et saepe. חָלִיל, v. 12; בְּ marks accompaniment, xxii. 6; xxiv. 9. בְּהַר צ׳. In order to avoid using the same preposition twice בְּ is here used instead of אֶל or עַל. The expression צוּר־יִשְׂרָאֵל occurs besides here only 2 Sam. xxiii. 3. The expression suits admirably the context in which it is said that Israel stands while all else falls. How could what has this rock as a refuge fall?

4. And the LORD——kindle it. Vers. 30-33. The verses 27 and 28 had depicted the approach of the judge (comp. בָּא ver. 27). The description of the judgment begins with ver. 30. Jehovah makes the glory of his voice to be heard, the action of his arm he makes to be seen. The image of corporal chastisement is employed by the Prophet to make his picture of the judgment the more incisive. זַעַף snorting, anhelitus, only here in Isaiah. נֶפֶץ is ἅπ. λεγ. The root נָפַץ denotes "to scatter, to break or dash in pieces" (xi. 12; xxxiii. 3; Jer. li. 20 sqq.). As snorting of the nose and flame of fire point to a thunder storm, while זֶרֶם and אֶבֶן בָּרָד are kinds of rain, נֶפֶץ must also belong to this category. We take it as signifying the breaking, the rending of a cloud, a water-spout. זרם comp. on xxviii. 2. אֶבֶן בָּרָד comp. xxviii. 17; Josh. x. 11. כִּי in ver. 31 is explicative. What is the nature of the chastisement in question is explained. First, we are told who is the party punished. It is Assyria. He stands before the Lord and trembles as a boy before his punisher's rebuke—יֵחַת comp. vii. 8; xxxi. 4; li. 6, 7 et saepe. He who administers the punishment is Jehovah. It is He who strikes with the staff. Hence the repeated lighting down of his arm. The words בשבט יכה I do not refer to Assyria notwithstanding the agreement with x. 24. For it was not needful to mention that Assyria formerly smote Israel with the rod. But it was necessary to say that Jehovah now strikes Assyria with the rod, in order to explain נחת זרועו ver. 30 and also כל מעבר יגר ver. 32. The staff makes strokes, passes (מַעֲבָר here in the active sense, the passing over). The staff is called מַטֵּה מוּסָדָה because it is handled according to divine appointment and ordination (Hab. i. 12) comp. xxviii. 16 and Ezek. xli. 8. יָנִיחַ is related to נחת ver. 30. The meaning is "to make rest," so that the ceasing, the extreme point of the motion is thus indicated (comp. Ezek. v. 13; xvi. 42; xliv. 30; Exod. xvii. 11). Every stroke, which Jehovah makes to fall or rest on Assyria, is inflicted amid the noise of timbrels (v. 12; xxiv. 8) and harps (v. 12; xvi. 11; xxiii. 16; xxiv. 8). This is doubtless that joyous noise with which Israel as it were accompanies the acts of judgment of his God (ver. 29). Thus there arises a complete concert. The timbrels and harps form the soprano; "the battles of shaking," i. e., the battles of the Lord fought with shaken, brandished hand, beat as it were the time, and also represent the bass. The strokes spoken of in vers. 30 and 32 are deadly strokes. This appears from the altar being already prepared for the slaughtered victim. And a dreadful altar it will be, a Tophet, deep and broad, with a huge pile of wood, which will be set on fire by the breath of the Lord in the form of a burning stream of brimstone. The Prophet had already said (x. 16 sqq.), that Assyria's glory will perish by violent fire. Who does not here think of the destruction of Nineveh, in which fire played a prominent part (comp. Otto Strauss on Nah. iii. 15)? תָּפְתֶּה is ἅπ. λεγ. תֹּפֶת occurs most frequently in Jeremiah. The derivation is uncertain (comp. my remarks on Jer. vii. 31). The form תָּפְתֶּה is after the analogy of אִשָּׁה, לְבֵנָה. The Tophet in the valley of Hinnom was a place of sacrifice dedicated to Moloch; the Tophet here spoken of is intended to burn up the מֶלֶךְ himself, in which word there is probably an allusion to מֹלֶךְ. It is therefore a place like Tophet, and this may be the force of the form enlarged by the addition of ה ֶ. The form אֶתְמוּל occurs only here and Micah ii. 8. With the preposition מִן it is commonly מִתְּמוֹל. It cannot possibly mean here the definite past (yesterday). It denotes the indefinite past which is represented by yesterday. From the fact that the place of burning has been long ago prepared, we see that those strokes (vers. 30 and 32) are not mere chastisements administered in love, but destructive, deadly strokes. With גַּם הוּא the second sentence begins. These words cannot be referred to מֶלֶךְ, for then they must come after it. But the Prophet intends to say that Ashur shall not only be slaughtered, but also solemnly consumed in a vast place of sacrifice specially prepared for this purpose. But why this consuming by fire? Not simply to denote total annihilation. If the supposition should not be established that the worship of Moloch which Ahaz introduced was connected with Assyrian influences (comp. Keil on 2 Kings xvi. 3), still Assyria was essentially a representative of the idolatrous worldly power. And when Ashur is now told that the dreadful end of a sacrifice to Moloch awaits him, there lies therein a not indistinct allusion to the everlasting fire of that infernal lake which burns with fire and brimstone, which we find again xxxiv. 9, 10, whose name Gehenna is derived from the place Tophet גֵּי הִנֹּם, a trace of which drawn from Isaiah we meet with Dan. vii. 11, and which is more fully unfolded in the eschatological discourse of our Lord (Matt. xxiv. and xxv. where xxv. 41 τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον τὸ ἡτοιμασμένον clearly recalls "ordained of old" in our passage), and the Revelation of John, xiv. 10, 11; xix. 20; xx. 9, 10, 14. When mention is made in these places of a pool of fire and brimstone, it may be maintained that the idea of the λίμνη is drawn from the expression "he hath made it deep and wide," while the idea of fire and brimstone comes from the latter half of this verse. מְדוּרָה from דּוּר (xxii. 18; xxix. 3) is the round pile of wood, the pyre. The word is found besides only Ezek. xxiv. 9 comp. ibid. ver. 5. I do not look on אֵשׁ וְעֵצִים as a hendiadys; for we see from the last clause of the verse that the Prophet desires to give prominence to the circumstance that fire will not be wanting to kindle properly the huge pile of wood. The two ideas of wood and fire are therefore not to be blended, but to be kept distinct. The words נשמת וגו׳ accordingly tell us whence the mighty fire will come which is destined to kindle the pile of wood. The breath of Jehovah (ii. 22; xlii. 5) is here described as a stream of brimstone (נחל גפרית comp. xxxiv. 9). Brimstone is set forth in Scripture as a destructive means of judgment, on the ground of that rain of brimstone which fell on Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix. 24). בֹּעֵר in the signification accendere or accendi Hos. vii. 4; Ps. ii. 12. Not slowly and gradually from a spark will the flame spread, but suddenly and in an imposing manner a whole stream of burning brimstone shall kindle the pile of wood. Thus the view of the Prophet, which embraces together the near and the most remote, is directed from the temporary occasion of the Egyptian embassy to the end of the present dispensation.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On vers. 1-14. "Such false trust as the Jewish people placed in Egypt is the sin of idolatry, which is so strictly forbidden; and all who herein follow the example of the Jews are fitly called rebellious, disobedient, lying children. God brings them to shame and derision in regard to what they relied on, and ordains a curse and destruction upon them. Therefore the Scripture saith: "The fear of man bringeth a snare; but whoso putteth his trust in the LORD shall be safe." Comp. also Ps. cxlvi. 3 and Jer. xvii. 5-8. RENNER. ["God is true, and may be trusted; but every man a liar, and must be suspected. The Creator is a Rock of Ages, the creature a broken reed; we cannot expect too little from man, or too much from God." HENRY.]

2. Ver. 8. ["The Prophet must not only preach this, but he must write it. 1. To shame the men of the present age who would not hear and heed it when it was spoken; their children may profit by it, though they will not. 2. To justify God in the judgments He was about to bring upon them; people will be tempted to think He was too hard upon them, and over severe, unless they know how very bad they were. 3. For warning to others not to do as they did, lest they fare as they fared." HENRY.]

3. Ver. 10. A faithful minister must not suffer men to prescribe to him what he should preach. For some would tell him to prophesy of wine and strong drink (Mic. ii. 11), the covetous would ask that he should preach how they might practice extortion and oppression. Or if they dare not be so impudent, they would at least desire that he should pass over in silence what would be disagreeable to them, and speak what their ears itched for (2 Tim. iv. 3). But faithful ministers preach sharply against sin that it may be avoided. Examples: Ahijah, 1 Kings xiv. 6; Micaiah, 1 Kings xxii. 18." CRAMER.

4. Ver. 15. "Neque in religione solum valet hic locus sed etiam in politia. Sic enim fere accidit quod praecipitia consilia fallunt. Contra felicia sunt ea, quae timide et cum ratione suscipiuntur. Ideo laudant Romani cunctatorem Fabium qui cunctando restituit rem. Semper etiam fallit praesumtio de nostris viribus. Bene igitur dictum est illud 'patiens terit omnia virtus.' Et Paulus: 'Vincite in bono malum' ..... non enim possunt durare impii, et est verissimum, quod dicitur 'malum destruit se ipsum.' Simus igitur quieti et commendemus omnia manibus Dei. Deinde etiam speremus futuram liberationem et experiemur, quod spes non confundet nos, sed confundentur adversarii nostri, qui impietatis causam contra Christum impie defendendam susceperunt." LUTHER.

5. Ver. 18. "Precious consolatory discourse for all who have to bear the cross. God waits till the right time to help comes." CRAMER.

6. Ver. 19. ["He will be very gracious — and this in answer to prayer, which makes His kindness doubly kind: He will be gracious to thee at the voice of thy cry; the cry of thy necessity, when that is most urgent; the cry of thy prayer, when that is most fervent. When He shall hear it—there needs no more—at the first word He will answer thee, and say, Here I am. Herein He is very gracious indeed." HENRY.]

7. Ver. 20. [It was a common saying among the old Puritans, "Brown bread and the Gospel are good fare." HENRY.]

8. Ver. 22. ["Note: To all true penitents sin is very odious; they loathe it, and loathe themselves because of it; they cast it away to the dunghill." HENRY.]

9. Ver. 29. ["It is with a particular satisfaction that wise and good men see the ruin of those who, like the Assyrians, have insolently bid defiance to God, and trampled upon all mankind." HENRY.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

On vers. 1-3. What one who needs counsel has to do. 1) He is not to take counsel without the LORD; for a. thereby he apostatizes from the LORD, and heaps sin on sin; b. the counsel thus resolved on leads only to disgrace and misery. 2) He is to let himself be led by the Spirit of the LORD, while he a. invokes Him in prayer; b. seeks to know His will out of the word of God; c. according to such direction makes conscientious use of the means at his command.

2. On ver. 8. Text for a sermon at a Bible festival. The importance of the written word—litera scripta manet.

3. On vers. 9-14. A mirror which the Prophet holds before our churches also. 1) Do you make the same demands on your minister which the contemporaries of Isaiah, according to vers. 9-11, made on the prophets? If so, it will happen to you according to the word of the prophet in vers. 12-14. 2) Or will you hear the law of the LORD (ver. 9)? Then you will be spared the judgments of God, and the peace of God will be imparted unto you.

4. On vers. 15-17. We have many and severe conflicts against outward and inward foes to stand. For this we need strength. Wherein does the right strength consist? 1) Not in horses and runners, etc. 2) The right strength is in the LORD, which we obtain when a. we make room for it by being still; when b. by believing hope we attract it to us.

5. On ver. 18. ["He will wait to be gracious; He will wait till you return to Him, and seek His face, and then He will be ready to meet you with mercy. He will wait, that He may do it in the best and fittest time, when it will be most for His glory, when it will come to you with the most pleasing surprise. He will continually follow you with His favors, and not let slip any opportunity of being gracious to you." HENRY.—D. M.]

6. On vers. 20 and 21. The importance of a faithful teacher.

7. On vers. 26-33. We can in treating of the last things cite these words, and show that the judgment has two sides, according as it has respect to the children of God, or to the ungodly.

IV.—THE FOURTH WOE.

Chapters XXXI.—XXXII.

1. EGYPT CANNOT PROTECT WHAT THE LORD DESTROYS.

Chapter xxxi. 1–4.

1 Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help;
And stay on horses,
And trust in chariots, because they are many;
And in horsemen, because they are very strong;
But they look not unto the Holy One of Israel,
Neither seek the Lord!
2 Yet He also is wise,
And will bring evil, and will not [1]call back His words:
But will arise against the house of the evil-doers,
And against the help of them that work iniquity.
3 Now the Egyptians are men, and not God;
And their horses flesh, and not spirit.
[a]When the Lord shall stretch out his hand,
[b]Both he that helpeth shall fall, and he that is holpen shall fall down,
And they all shall fail together.
4 For thus hath the Lord spoken unto me,
Like as the lion and the young lion [c]roaring on his prey,
When [d]a multitude of shepherds is called forth against him,
He will not be afraid of their voice,
Nor abase himself for the [2]noise of them:
So shall the Lord of hosts come down to fight [e]for mount Zion,
And for the hill thereof.

[1] Heb. remove. [2] Or, multitude.

[a] But. [b] And. [c] growling. [d] the totality. [e] against.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. לעזרה comp. on x. 3; xx. 6.——Note the structure of sentence in this verse. First a participle depends on הוי, which, according to familiar Hebrew usage, in the second clause immediately changes to a verb. finitum, and that the Imperfect, because a continuous, not concluded action is meant; to this is joined the third clause by the Vav consecutivum, because it contains a special consequence of the preceding general clause; whereas the two negative concluding clauses are in the perfect, because they express the fundamental fact, complete and present, that conditions all that precedes. Comp. v. 8, 11, 18, 20 sqq.——פרשים comp. on xxi. 7, 9; xxii. 6 sq.; xxviii. 28.——שעה comp. on xvii. 7 sq.; xxii. 4.——קדוש י׳ comp. on i. 4.

Ver. 2. The aorist ויבא depicts the certainty.——הסיר comp. Josh. xi. 15.——The expression בית מרעים occurs only here: yet comp. i. 4; xiv. 20; Ps. xxii. 17; xxvi. 5; lxiv. 3.——עזרה stands here as abstractum pro concreto: the help for the totality of those helping.

Ver. 4. הגה of the growling of a lion only here; comp. on viii. 19.——מלא, comp. vi. 3: viii. 8, is the full number the totality.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Woe to them——the hill thereof.—Vers. 1–4. The Prophet raises anew his warning voice against trusting to Egyptian help, by representing its uselessness; on the other hand, he promises most glorious help from the grace of Jehovah, on condition of turning back from idols. For the fourth time from xxviii. on הוי, "woe," appears here at the head of a section, so that we may regard this resemblance as a sign that these chapters belong together. We must understand by "those that go down," not only those physically going down to Egypt, but also those that accompanied them in spirit and shared their intention. Five clauses depend on "woe," which all belong to one and the same degree of time, and in our way of speaking depend on one relative notion: woe to those who go down . . . lean on . . . trust . . . but look not to God . . . and seek not the Lord. See Text. and Gramm.

The sending to Egypt seemed to the friends of this policy a particularly prudent measure. They plumed themselves far too much on their penetration. In antithesis to it the Prophet says: Jehovah, too, who opposes that policy, is wise. [The comparison is double-edged: "God was as wise as the Egyptians, and ought therefore to have been consulted; He was as wise as the Jews, and could therefore thwart their boasted policy."—J. A. A.] This statement, humble as it appears, contains, however, only a divine irony. For if God, comparing His wisdom with that of men, says: "I am wise also," it means in effect: "I am wise and ye are fools." The words that the LORD will not recall must be threatenings that He had uttered against the Egyptian alliance (comp. xxix. 14 sqq.; xxx. 12 sqq.). That God keeps His word under all circumstances is declared Num. xxiii. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 29. The people in Egypt are indeed persons, therefore רוּחוֹת, yet only finite, creature persons, thus not of a divine sort, and no equals of God. But their horses are not even spirit, not even creature spirit, but only weak, perishable flesh. Therefore neither man nor horse in Egypt is to be relied on, and Jehovah has but to stretch forth His hand, and both Egypt that is called to help and Judah that is supported by this help will be laid low.

Ver. 4 proves the statement of ver. 3 by a comparison. It might, for instance, seem strange that the LORD, ver. 3, made no difference between Judah and Egypt, as if the former were no more to Him than the latter. Therefore He assures most expressly that no power will be able to deter Him from the judgment determined against Judah. The formula of transition, "for thus hath the LORD spoken unto me," we had identically or at least similarly viii. 11; x. 24; xviii. 4; xxi. 16; xxviii. 16; xxx. 15. For when a lion has stolen one of the flock, all the shepherds are called to help (note the allusion to the calling on Egypt to help) and save it. But the lion is not alarmed (comp. vii. 8; xxx. 31; li. 6 sq., etc.) by their cry and does not crouch (xxv. 5) at their noise. He does not let them deprive him of his prey. From BOCHART (Hieros. I., cap. 44) on, expositors here recall similar images in HOMER. Il. XII. 298 sqq.; XVIII. 161 sqq. So the LORD does not suffer Jerusalem, in as far as He has made it the object of His wrath, to be seized from Him by the mutual aid of Judah and Egypt. Mount and hill of Zion are put antithetically, also x. 32. It is seen from this passage that the Prophet understands by the mount the highest summit, the places of the temple and of the king's house; but by the hill the other dwelling-places of the people. But most expositors understand ver. 4 of the protection that the LORD would extend to Jerusalem. [Thus BARNES, J. A. ALEXANDER, BIRKS, etc.] The meaning would then be, not that Egypt, but that He, the LORD, would protect Zion and not suffer His city to be taken from Him. But (with HITZIG, HENDEWERK, DELITZSCH) I am decidedly of the opinion that the Prophet would say that the LORD will not suffer Jerusalem, as the prey of His anger, to be taken from Him (comp. xxix. 1 sqq.; and regarding צבא with עַל, xxix. 7, 8; Num. xxxi. 7). In ver. 3 He has emphatically said, in fact, that both, the protector and the protected, should be destroyed. To this thought the "For" (כִּי, init.) of ver. 4 must relate. For did it only relate to כשל עוזר ("the helper shall stumble"), there would arise a direct contradiction between vers. 3 and 4. It is urged that ver. 5 requires ver. 4 to be taken in a sense favorable to Jerusalem [see Translator's note on ver. 5]. But then the fact is overlooked that ver. 5 has no sort of connecting word that joins it to ver. 4. It follows abruptly, whereas ver. 4 is closely joined to ver. 3 by כִּי. The Prophet purposes here an abrupt transition from darkness to light. In all preceding chapters night and sunshine alternate. All begin with severe threatening, that is to change to glorious promise. This transition is effected in the preceding chapters in a variety of ways. But it accords with the facile spirit of our Prophet once, in the present case, to effect this transition with a leap, as I might say. Would he thereby intimate, perhaps, that the deliverance also shall presently come, with a leap, quite suddenly and unexpected?

2.—JEHOVAH PROTECTS HIS EARTHLY HOME THAT HONORS HIM.

CHAPTER XXXI. 5-9.

5 As birds flying, so will the LORD of hosts defend Jerusalem;
Defending also he will deliver it;
And passing over he will preserve it.
6 Turn ye unto him
From whom the children of Israel have deeply revolted.
7 For in that day every man shall cast away
His idols of silver, and [1]his idols of gold,
Which your own hands have made unto you [a]for a sin.
8 Then shall the Assyrian fall with the sword, not of a [b]mighty man;
And the sword, not of a [c]mean man, shall devour him:
But he shall flee [2]from the sword,
And his young men shall be[3] [4]discomfited.
9 And he [5]shall pass over to [6]his strong hold for fear,

And his princes shall be afraid of the ensign,
Saith the LORD, whose fire is in Zion,
And his furnace in Jerusalem.

[1] Heb. the idols of his gold. [2] Or, for fear of the sword. [3] Or, tributary.
[4] Heb. for melting, or tribute. [5] Heb. his rock shall pass away for fear. [6] Or, his strength.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 5. גָּנַן Hiph. הֵגֵן — "to make a cover," is always joined to עַל (אֶל) xxxvii. 35; xxxviii. 6 comp. 2 Kings xix. 34; xx. 6; Zech. ix. 15 or בְּעַד Zech. xii. 8.——גנון והציל פסוח והמליט is to be judged grammatically thus: 1). The infinn. absol., are to be regarded as put after the verb. fin. יָגֵן; 2) the perfects והציל and והמליט signify by means of the Vav consec. the immediate consequences of that fact of the future intimated by יגן גנון פסוח, which may be expressed by "that." There is accordingly no reason for regarding הַצִּיל and הַמְלִיט (with GESENIUS in loc.), as rare infinitive forms.

Ver. 6. After העמיקו סרה one might look for מִמֶּנּוּ, or perhaps, too, according to the connection, לוֹ. But אֲשֶׁר is to be construed as a relative word in the broadest sense, or as universal relative adverb ("where"), that involves any kind of relative reference, however determined. העמיקו comp. i. 5; Hos. v. 2; ix. 9.——I would not take בני ישראל as vocative to שׁוּבוּ, because the third person העמיקו intervenes: it must be regarded as the subject of העמיקו.

Ver. 7. חֵטְא is in the accusative as the casus adverbialis signifying the (inward) modality: "sinful-fashion," as quite similarly the substantives שֶׁקֶר, בֶּטַח, מֵישָׁרִים, הֶבֶל, אֱמֶת, are used.

Ver. 8. לֹא אִישׁ, etc., comp. לֹא אֵל Deut. xxxii. 5; Amos vi. 13; Jer. xvi. 20; לֹא עֵץ x. 15, etc. On the distinction between אִישׁ and אדם comp. ii. 9.——חרב תאכלנו comp. i. 20.——נס לו dat. ethicus, comp. ii. 22; xxxvi. 9.——היה למס "to be held in villanage, made to serve, made a slave" (Gen. xlix. 15; Deut. xx. 11, etc.), only here in Isaiah.

Ver. 9. אור "fire, flame," is quite an Isaianic word. For excepting Ezek. v. 2, it occurs only in Isa. xliv. 16; xlvii. 14; l. 11, and here.——תַּנּוּר only here in Isaiah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Judah gains nothing by self-elected human means. But the LORD will help in His fashion. As a bird spreads its feathers over its young, so the LORD protects Jerusalem (ver. 5). But, of course, only on condition that it turns from its deep falling away to its God (ver. 6). And this condition will be fulfilled; Israel shall cast away its idols (ver. 7). And so then Assyria shall be destroyed in all its parts by the sword of the LORD. This will certainly happen, for Jehovah has said it, who has His dwelling in Zion (vers. 8, 9).

2. As birds flying——in Jerusalem.—Vers. 5–8. עָפוֹת is not predicate, but attribute of צפרים; therefore not "as birds fly," but as "flying birds." Of course the form of expression is short, and only suggestive. For it is not said what sort of flying is meant. One sees from the res comparata that the Prophet thinks of birds that, hovering over their young, protect them (comp. Deut. xxxii. 11). That עוּף may mean such hovering appears from its being used for every sort of flying (Deut. iv. 17; Isa. vi. 6; xi. 14; lx. 8; Zech. v. 1, 2; Ps. xviii. 11). [These citations prove the very reverse of the Author's idea.—TR.] צפור is used sometimes as masculine, sometimes as feminine. Being used here as feminine, one sees that the Prophet thinks of the female bird, therefore of maternal love. In פסוח [from which is derived פֶּסַח, "passover"] there lies a plain allusion (comparable to that in xxx. 19) to that sparing of the avenging angel in "passing over" the Israelites, Exod. xii. 13, 23, 27 (the only passages, with the text, in which the word occurs in this sense).

[Most readers will likely hesitate to take the Author's leap from ver. 4 to ver. 5, but will rather agree with the almost universal sentiment that embraces them in one paragraph. The transition to light is plainly marked (even rhetorically marked by "turn ye"), at ver. 6. The Author's division is prompted by the interpretation of the simile of ver. 5, which is the common, perhaps the universal interpretation. If this interpretation is correct, and the Author's interpretation of the simile of ver. 4 be correct, then the division he makes of the context seems necessary. Certainly the view of ver. 4 given above seems obvious. The simile expresses "the intensity of God's purpose" (BARNES). Jerusalem, as the object of His anger, shall not escape Him, or be wrested from Him, no matter how many Egypts may be summoned to thwart Him. This is in perfect accord with the many passages that construe these alliances as rebellion against God Himself. Why shall we not let this clear sense prescribe the meaning of the next simile? The Author shows how, vice versa, the supposed obvious meaning of ver. 5 has controlled the interpretation of ver. 4 (see above). The simile of ver. 5, then, is but a change of figure, such as is common in Isaiah, and represents by the motions of a bird of prey what was before represented by a beast of prey. It is a picture to the very life. עפות describes the strong-winged bird. It covers (גנן with עַל) its quarry with its wings, and snatches it away (הציל, the common primary sense of נצל in Isa. who frequently uses it in both parts; see List at the end of the volume; comp. also xxxviii. 6, where both גנן and נצל occur and imply the same figure as here); passing over (פסוח), say the heads of those that would frighten it from its prey, it gets off with it (המליט; comp. Job xx. 20 and FUERST Lex. s. v. מלט). To this there seems absolutely no objection. The Author's inference, from the use of צפור in the feminine, is not well grounded, seeing that the word is always feminine, there being only two exceptions (see FUERST'S Lex.). Moreover the word is explicitly used by Ezekiel (xxxix. 4, 17) of birds of prey along with beasts of prey. The interpretation just given has the advantage of imparting to our context consistent sense and rhetorical harmony.—TR.]

But to that protecting and sparing grace of God is attached a condition, which is expressed ver. 6. Israel must turn back from its idols (ver. 7) to its God. As we supply in thought this condition here, so at ver. 7 we must supply the thought that Israel is ready to fulfil this condition. In that day points into the time that the Prophet has before his eyes in all these promises. It is the day of salvation that begins with the deliverance from Assyria as its first morning twilight, and continues to the end of all days (comp. xxx. 26). Within this time will fall the entire conversion of Israel from idols. But the precise moment of this the Prophet does not declare. For he does not distinguish the stages of time. He does not see the things one after the other, but beside one another. Idols of silver, etc.—See ii. 20; comp. xxx. 22; xxvii. 9; xvii. 8. What has just been said is confirmed anew by ver. 8. For there it appears as if the overthrow of Assyria would follow the time in which Israel would renounce the worship of idols, whereas in fact the reverse was true. [Why may not 2 Kings xviii. 1-8, with the history of Sennacherib following, be taken as a literal fulfilment, in its degree, and in the actual order of the text? So BARNES.—TR.] The Prophet even sees Assyria's fall along with the events of the last time. To determine the exact time relation is not his affair. It is enough for him to settle the "that" of the great facts of the future. The "when" can only become perfectly clear by the fulfilment.

For the understanding of ver. 9 it must first of all be settled that Assyria shall fall, not by human, but by GOD'S power! By this means we will avoid several explanations that are prosaic or far-fetched. The antithesis to שׂרים, "princes" (comp. also xxxii. 2) suggests that by סלע is to be understood the king of Assyria (LUTHER, HENDEWERK, DELITZSCH). This hitherto strong and never shaken refuge of His army shall now suddenly abscond and disappear (comp. xl. 27; Deut. xxvi. 13; 1 Kings xxii. 24, etc.). The parallelism with ממגור indicates that מנס refers not to the Assyrian standard that the princes desert, but to the Jewish, whose appearance is enough to put them to cowardly flight. Israel may assuredly rely on this comforting promise, for it proceeds from the mouth of God, who has chosen Zion above every other place in the whole earth as His dwelling-place. It is implied that He Himself is interested in bringing to nought the plan of the Assyrian; for it would, so to speak, have driven Jehovah Himself out of His own favorite dwelling. אור is the fire at which one warms himself, and תנור is the oven in which one cooks, and especially bakes bread. It never signifies the hearth for sacrificial fire. The expression is anthropomorphic, but for Israel uncommonly honorable and comforting. For by it Zion is signified to be not a mere place of worship, but actually the earthly home of Jehovah. ["But this use of fire and furnace is not only foreign from the usage of the Scriptures, but from the habits of the Orientals, who have no such association of ideas between hearth and home. The true explanation of the clause seems to be that which supposes an allusion both to the sacred fire on the altar and to the consuming fire of God's presence, whose altar flames in Zion, and whose wrath shall thence flame to destroy His enemies."—J. A. ALEXANDER, in loc.].

3. THE FALSE AND THE TRUE NOBILITY.

CHAPTER XXXII. 1-8.

1 Behold, a king shall reign [a]in righteousness.
And princes shall rule [a]in judgment.
2 And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind,
And a covert from the tempest;
As rivers of water in a dry place,
As the shadow of a [1]great rock in a weary land.
3 And the eyes of them that see shall not be [b]dim,
And the ears of them that hear shall hearken.
4 The heart also of the [2]rash shall understand knowledge,
And the tongue of the stammerers shall be ready to speak [3]plainly.
5 The [c]vile person shall no more be called [d]liberal,
Nor [e]the churl said to be bountiful.
6 For the [c]vile person will speak [f]villany,
And his heart will work iniquity,

To practise [a]hypocrisy, and to utter error against the LORD,
To make empty the soul of the hungry,
And he will cause the drink of the thirsty to fail.
7 The instruments also of the [h]churl are evil:
He deviseth wicked devices
To destroy the poor with lying words,
Even [4]when the needy speaketh right.
8 But the [d]liberal deviseth [d]liberal things;
And by [d]liberal things shall he [5]stand.

[1] Heb. heavy. [2] Heb. hasty. [3] Or, elegantly.
[4] Or, when he speaketh against the poor in judgment. [5] Or, be established.

[a] according to. [b] plastered up. [c] fool. [d] noble. [e] the cheat be called baron.
[f] folly. [g] uncleanness. [h] cheat. [i] persevere.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. לצדק is found only here. לְ here signifies the norm, as in לְמשפט. It is thus = secundum, comp. לְמִשְׁמַע אָזְנָיו ,לְמַרְאֵה xi. 3. ["The use of לְ here may have been intended to suggest, that he would reign not only justly, but for the very purpose of doing justice." J. A. A.].—לְ before שׂרים—quod attinet ad, comp. Eccl. ix. 4. Manifestly this unusual construction is for the sake of having the L—sound maintained, which thus occurs consecutively in five words.——שׂרר, from which the imperfect ישׂרו, Prov. viii. 16, occurs only here in Isaiah.

Ver. 2. מַחֲבֵא, "hiding corner, place of hiding," ἅπ. λεγ., comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 23.——סתר comp. xvi. 4; xxviii. 17.——פלגי מ׳ comp. xxx. 25.——צָיוֹן comp. xxv. 5.——צל comp. iv. 6; xxv. 4, 5.——ארץ עיפה again only Ps. cxliii. 6.

Ver. 3. תִּשְׁעֶינָה can hardly be derived from שָׁעָה. It comes nearer to take it in the sense of שעע "oblinere, to close up; plaster up," in which sense this latter verb often occurs in Isa.: vi. 10; xxix. 9.——קָשַׁב, probably kindred to קָצַב "to point, to prick" (the ears), occurs only here in Kal.

Ver. 4. עִלֵּג, "balbus," ἅπ. λεγ.——צַחוֹת (comp. xviii. 4) are nitentia, clara, clear, plain words.

Ver. 5. Isaiah uses נבל only here; נבלה again ix. 16.

כִּילַי, written כֵּלַי in ver. 7 for the sake of similarity in sound with כֵּלָיו, is to be derived from נָכַל fraudulenter egit (RASCHI, KIMCHI, GESEN., and others), Gen. xxxvii. 18; Num. xxv. 18; Ps. cv. 25; Mal. i. 14, so that from נְכִיל, by rejecting the נ, as in תֵּת, שְׂאֵת, שׂ׳א, etc., there results כִּיל with the rare ending ַי (comp. שַׁדַּי ,נֵבַי, חֹרַי). See GREEN, § 194, 2, b.——שׁוֹעַ (from שׁוע "amplus, dives fuit," kindred to יָשַׁע) is the rich man, independent on account of his means.

Ver. 6. עָשָׂה אָוֶן occurs only here (comp. lix. 6); the idea is always expressed elsewhere by פעל און.——לעשׂות, gerundive.——חֹנֶף, ἅπ. λεγ.; comp. חֲנֻפָּה Jer. xxiii. 15; substantive from חָנֵף ix. 16; x. 6; xxxiii. 14.——תּוֹעָה "error," comp. xxix. 24; again only Neh. iv. 2.——Hiph. החסיר again only Exod. xvi. 18.——The construction לְהָרִיק—יַחְסִיר is to be explained as a return of the subordinate form into the principal form.

Ver. 7. A mutual attraction appears to have happened here: 1) כלים chosen for the sake of כִּילַי; 2) כִּילַי changed to כֵּלַי for the sake of כֵּלָיו—זִמָּה "consilium" (Job xvii. 11) then especially consilium pravum, scelus, occurs only here in Isaiah.——חַבֵּל "to destroy," comp. xiii. 5; liv. 16.

Ver. 8. נְדִיבָה occurs again only Job xxx. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. This passage, which strongly reminds one of xxix. 18–24, and somewhat also of xxx. 20 sqq., must necessarily be joined to what precedes, as it can neither stand alone, nor be regarded as belonging to what follows. We see in these verses an amplification of xxxi. 6, 7. For the latter passage only presents to view in a negative way the turning back and abandonment of idolatry. But in our passage is set forth what positive forces of blessing will become operative in the entire ethical life of the nation, and especially in the relation of the powerful and nobles to the lowly. It is manifest that the Prophet, in enumerating what shall no more be, has in mind the irregularities of his own time. It is very probable that he even alludes to particular, concrete facts, in a way that his contemporaries would understand.

2. Behold——speak plainly.—Vers. 1–4. The king that will rule righteously must be the Messiah. For the time when Israel will be cleansed and purified, and live and be ruled according to truth and righteousness, is the Messianic time (comp. i. 24 sqq.; ix. 6, 7; xi. 1 sqq.; xvi. 5; xxviii. 16 sqq.). Nothing justifies us in assuming that such a condition as our vers. 1–8 describe, will intervene before that time. In that time only the Messiah can be king. Of an under-king prophecy knows nothing. One must only say, that, in distinction from passages like ix. 6 sq.; xi. 1 sqq., the person of the Messianic king appears more in the background, and the Prophet depicts the admirable surrounding of the expected Messiah, rather than His personality. One may suppose that the state of things under Hezekiah furnished the occasion. The king himself was good; but his surroundings did not correspond. Hence the Prophet emphasizes here, that in the Messianic time, the glorious central figure, whom he only briefly names ver. 1, will have also a suitable environment. Thus the point of this passage is directed against the magnates that surrounded the king. Instead of oppressing the nation as heretofore (i. 23; iii. 15; x. 2; xxviii. 15; xxix. 20), each of them (the princes) will himself be a protector of the oppressed, like a sheltering, covering place of concealment protects from wind-storm and rain. Yea, they will even afford positive refreshment to the poor and wretched, as water-brooks and dense shade do to the traveller in the hot desert. The eyes of them that see, the ears of them that hear (ver. 3), are eyes and ears that can see and hear if they will. It is well-known that there are ways of plastering up such eyes, and of making such ears deaf (i. 23; v. 23; xxxiii. 15). The like of that shall not be with these princes.

Delitzsch well remarks that, according to ver. 4, Israel shall be delivered also from faults of infirmity.

I would only so modify this remark as to make ver. 4, like that which precedes and follows, refer, not to Israel in general, but to the princes. Thus the נמהרים "the rash, reckless," are such judges as are naturally inclined to judge hastily, and superficially (comp. on xxxv. 4). These will apply a reflecting scrutiny (comp. on xi. 2) in order to know what is right. The stammering are such as do not trust themselves to speak openly, because they are afraid of blundering out the truth that is known to them, and so bringing themselves into disfavor. Thus all the conditions for the exercise of right and justice will be fulfilled. The judges will be what they ought to be in respect to eyes, ears, heart and mouth.

3. The vile person——shall he stand.—Vers. 5-8. From those in office the Prophet passes to the noble apart from office. In this respect there often exists in the present conditions the most glaring contradiction between inward and outward nobility. This contradiction will cease in the Messianic time. For then a fool will no longer be called a noble. A fool, נָבָל, is, according to Old Testament language, not one intellectually deficient, but one that practises gross iniquity; for sin in its essence is perverseness, contradiction, nonsense. The wicked surrenders realities of immeasurable value for a seeming good that is transitory; whereas the pious surrenders the whole world in order to save his soul, and this is at the same time the highest wisdom (comp. Deut. xxxii. 6; Jer. xvii. 11; Jud. xix. 23 sq.; xx. 6; 1 Sam. xxv. 25; 2 Sam. xiii. 12).—נָדִיב [Eng. Bibl.: "liberal"]" undoubtedly involves originally the notion of voluntariness (Exod. xxv. 2; xxxv. 5, 21, 22, 29, etc.). But he that does good from an inward, free impulse is a noble man. Thus gradually נדיב acquires the sense of noble, superior man, and indeed so much without regard to inward nobility, that the word is used with a bad side-meaning (Job. xxi. 28). Isaiah uses it again only xiii. 2. One will not call a swindler baron, the prophet proceeds to say, ver. 5 b.

By the following causal sentence, ver. 6, the Prophet proves the sentence "the fool will no more be called noble." His argument may be represented by the following syllogism: In the Messianic time each will be called what he is. But in that time also there will be people that are fools. Therefore in that time these will also be called fools and not noblemen. [It is not the Prophet's aim in ver. 6, to state what fools will do in that time, as if their doing then will be different from now, which obviously it will not be. He would say there will be fools, and they will be called fools, and nobles and they will be called nobles.—Tr.]. Of course for the Prophet the only important thought is that in the last time falsehood will no longer reign as in the present, and that accordingly a man's being and name will no longer be in contrast, but in perfect harmony. One sees that it is a point with him to say to the cheats of his day and age how they ought to be called, if every man had his dues. The general thought of ver. 6 a, is particularized in what follows. One does and speaks folly when he practises unclean, shameful things (by which the land is defiled before God, xxiv. 5; Jer. iii. 1), and utters error, (what misleads) against Jehovah. This doing and speaking is for the purpose of enriching one's self by robbery of the poor and weak (i. 23). This is figuratively expressed: to make empty the soul of the hungry (i. e., to take away what can satisfy the need of the hungry, comp. xxix. 8) and to "cause the drink," etc. כלים, ver. 7, are properly instrumenta. Not the physical implements are meant here, but the ways and means in general of which the swindler makes use. ["He deviseth plots to destroy the oppressed (or afflicted) with words of falsehood, and (i. e., even) in the poor (man's) speaking right (i. e., even when the poor-man's claim is just, or in a more general sense, when the poor-man pleads his cause)."—J. A. Alexander].

In ver. 8 we must remark the same in regard to וְנָדִיב that we did in regard to נבל and כילי vers. 6 and 7. The Prophet will not in general give a characteristic of the נדיב, but he would say in what regard the names נדיב and נבל will be held in the Messianic time. Thus vers. 6-8 are proof of ver. 5. According to these verses none will be given a name that does not become him. He that is called נבל "fool," will also speak נבלה, and he that is called נדיב will certainly confirm his claim to this name by having noble thoughts, generosa meditatur.—קום על נדיבות can hardly mean "to stand on noble ground" (Meier), for נדיבות are generosæ facta, the exhibitions of generosity, not this generosity as a moral fundamental habit. Otherwise the second נדיבות would have a meaning different from the first. Therefore יקום וגו׳ must mean: and he perseveres in his noble thoughts, i. e., he not only conceives them, but he carries them out. In bestowing the name, men will not be influenced only by the thoughts that proclaim themselves; men will make the name depend on one's steadily adhering to them his whole life. קום often has this sense of continuing, persevering. Comp. xl. 8; Lev. xxv. 30; xvii. 19.

4.—THE PRESENT PUNISHMENT OF THE PROUD WOMEN, AND THE FUTURE GLORY OF THE NATION.

CHAPTER XXXII. 9–20.

9 Rise up, ye women that are at ease;
Hear my voice, ye careless daughters;
Give ear unto my speech.
10 [1]Many days and years shall ye be troubled, ye careless women:
For the vintage shall fail, the gathering shall not come.
11 Tremble, ye women that are at ease;
Be troubled, ye careless ones:
Strip you, and make you bare, and gird sackcloth upon your loins.
12 [a]They shall lament for the teats,
For [2]the pleasant fields, for the fruitful vine.
13 Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briars;
[3]Yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city:
14 Because the palaces [b]shall be forsaken;
The multitude of the city [b]shall be left;
The [4]forts and towers [c]shall be for dens forever,
A joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks;
15 Until the spirit be poured upon us from on high,
And the wilderness be a fruitful field,
And the fruitful field be counted for a forest.
16 [d]Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness,
And righteousness remain in the fruitful field.
17 And the work of righteousness shall be peace;
And the [e]effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever.
18 And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation
And in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places;
19 [f]When it shall hail, coming down on the forest;
And [5]the city shall be in a low place.
20 Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters,
That send forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass.

[1] Heb. Days above a year. [2] Heb. the fields of desire. [3] Or, Burning upon, etc.
[4] Or, clifts and watchtowers. [5] Or, the city shall be utterly abased.

[a] They beat on the breasts for. [b] is. [c] are. [d] And. [e] service. [f] And it will hail when the forest falls.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 9. בֹּטֵחַ is here used absolutely as in Jud. xviii. 7, 10, 27; Jer. vii. 8; xii. 5.——שַׁאֲנָן again vers. 9, 11, 18; xxxiii. 20; xxxvii. 29.

Ver. 10. The singular שָׁנָה must be taken in the sense of one year, seeing there is nothing to indicate that it is a collective.——After the specification of time the sentence ought properly to proceed with the Vav. consec. and the perf. Yet there are also examples of the use of the imperf. with Vav. (Exod. xii. 3; Jer. viii. 1 K'thibh) or without it (xxvii. 6; vii. 8 comp. xxi. 16; Jer. viii. 1 K'ri; Gen. xl. 13, 19). The accusative יָמִים responds to the question "when," to signify the point of time where the predicted event will intervene.——On בְּלִי comp. at xiv. 6.

Ver. 11. In חִרְדוּ we have the masculine as the chief form that includes the feminine, as the man rules and represents the woman: In חֲגוֹרָה, עֹרָה, פְּשֹׁטָה, רְגָזָה we have also the chief form of the imperative, i. e., the masculine, with the cohortative He of motion toward. Thus these imperatives contain no individualized command, but one formed quite generally as to matter, without regard to person and number: similar to our way in giving words of command, wherein at least no regard is had to the number of those addressed as we use the infin., or past particip. [the illustration is drawn of course from the Germ. idiom.—Tr.]. This verse shows plainly how in Hebrew the gender of words is not so rigidly fixed as in classical and modern languages, and hence it not so consistently adhered to.——Isaiah uses פשׁט only here.——Of עוּר "nudum esse" he uses the Piel xxiii. 13.

Ver. 12. The same preponderance of the masc. gender appears in סֹפְדִים that is noticed in ver. 11, and has the same explanation.——ספד as verb in Isaiah, only here; comp. xxii. 12; Jer. xlix. 3.——Note the similarity in sound of עַל־שָׁדַיִם and עַל־שְׂדֵי.——חֶמֶד "amoenitas, delicias" only here in Isaiah, comp. on xxvii. 2; Amos

v. 11.—פריח comp. xvii. 6; Ps. cxxviii. 3; Ezek. xix. 10.

Ver. 13. קוֹץ "thorn, thorn bushes," again in Isaiah only xxxiii. 12, and is joined with שָׁמִיר only here. Everywhere else Isaiah joins this word with שַׁיִת (v. 6; vii. 23 sqq.; ix. 17; x. 17; xvii. 4). One might grammatically regard the words קוץ שמיר as having a genitive relation. But as the words שָׁמִיר שַׁיִת, xxvii. 3, occur in apposition (שמיר which is שית), we may assume the same construction here. The general notion קוץ (resecandum, from קָצַץ = קוץ comp. קְוֻצּוֹת "locks") is more exactly defined as שָׁמִיר ("prickly thing").—The בתי משוש are not necessarily the houses of קריה עליזה. For there are such houses of pleasure, not only in the capital, but in all cities and villages of the land. Therefore I can as little take בתי מ׳ in the genitive with קריה ע׳ as I could assume that construction xxviii. 1. As there הלומי י׳, so here קריה ע׳ is dependent on עַל.

Ver. 14. This verse is subordinated to the last clause of ver. 13, for it explains how the city has become overgrown with thorns.—There is a metonymy in the expression הכון עיר עזב, the effect being put for the cause, i. e., חמון עיר stands for עיר הֹמִיָּה xxii. 2.

Ver. 15. The expression רוח ממרום occurs only here; מרום occurs in Isaiah, often: xxii. 16; xxiv. 18; xl. 26; lvii. 15; lviii. 4, etc.

Ver. 17. מעשה (comp. v. 2; iv. 10; Hab. iii. 17) is "the yield;" עבדה in the sense of "fruit of service," comp. פְּעֻלָּה, occurs, as far as I can see, only here.—נָוֶה in the same sense as here xxxiii. 20; xxxiv. 13; xxxv. 7.—מבטחים in Isaiah only here.—מנוחה xi. 10; xxviii. 12; lxvi. 1.

Ver. 19. The verb בָּרַד occurs only here: but comp. xxviii. 2, 17; xxx. 30 —שִׁפְלָה is ἅπ. λεγ.—Note that בָּרַד and בְּרֶדֶת, שִׁפְלָה and תִּשְׁפַּל on the one hand, and יַעַר and עִיר on the other correspond in assonance.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. As in chapter iii. so here, the Prophet addresses men and women separately, having in mind especially those of the higher, and highest ranks. According to the foregoing exposition, vers. 1–8, under the guise of a glorious Messianic prophecy, contain a sharp reproof for powerful ones in Jerusalem. The second part of the chapter, on the other hand, is directed against the proud, secure women, announcing a season of disaster for them (vers. 9–14), ["until by a special divine influence a total revolution shall take place in the character, and, as a necessary consequence, in the condition of the people."—J. A. A., on ver. 15] (vers. 15–20).

2. Rise up——pasture of flocks.—Vers. 9–14. The form of the introduction calls to mind i. 2; xxviii. 23, but more especially the address of Lamech to his wives Gen. iv. 23. I do not think that "rise up" demands a physical rising up. Like our German "auf" "up," it may signify the merely inward rousing of the spirit to give attention (comp. Num. xxiii. 18). שאנן has elsewhere also the secondary meaning of proud ease: Ps. cxxiii. 4; Amos vi. 1; Zech. i. 15.

The specification of time in ימים על־שנה ver. 10, does not relate to the continuance of the desolation, as is evident from ver. 15 "until the spirit," etc. According to xxix. 1, which is manifestly related to our passage both as to matter and time (see the exposition there), it is probable that the Prophet means an indefinite number of days added to a year. (See Text. and Gram.). Evidently the Prophet has in mind women that have heretofore never known any want, but have continually lived in abundance and luxury. Just for this reason will trembling and dismay seize them. For they would assuredly not have dispensed with the products of the wine and fruit harvest, had not the enemy occupied the territory about Jerusalem and made gathering and plucking impossible. Thus the scarcity of those noble products, felt as a sure token of the enemy's presence, most of all in the apartments of women of rank, will frighten the women out of their secure and proud repose. Comp. xvi. 7 sqq. בציר "the wine harvest" (comp. xxiv. 13). אֹסֶף, elsewhere אָסִיף (Exod. xxiii. 16; xxxiv. 22), is "the fruit harvest" (Mic. vii. 1). The word occurs again only xxxiii. 4, and there only in its fundamental sense. That which ver. 10 is presented as in prospect, is announced in ver. 11 as the command, the will of God. Hence it must happen. Strip you, etc. The command to disrobe is that garments of mourning may replace those before worn (Joel i. 13; Isa. xv. 3; xxii. 12).

Though we may translate כִּי, ver. 13 b, by "yea" (immo), as more accordant with our speech, still there underlies it a causal relation. That the land is overgrown with thorns and thistles, will appear the more credible, when it is perceived that even the houses of pleasure, indeed the very capital grows rank with such weeds. (See Text. and Gram.). The joyous city means Jerusalem (comp. xxii. 2; Zeph. ii. 15). עליז, as was shown at xxii. 2, has the secondary meaning "presumptuous joy." The propriety of this sense here in reference to the women of careless ease is evident. (On the logical connection of ver. 14 see Text. and Gram.). Inasmuch as "joyous city" and "multitude of the city," (which expressions are conjoined xxii. 2), occur only in xxii. 2 and our text, one properly infers a relationship between these chapters both as regards matter and time.

As not every city has an Ophel, and thus Ophel may not be taken as a general attribute of cities, but as something peculiar to Jerusalem (though not in distinction from all cities, for Samaria had an Ophel, 2 Kings v. 24), so we may understand by it the locality mentioned, 2 Chron. xxvii. 3; xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 26 sq.; xi. 21, "the southern steep, rocky prominence of Moriah from the south end of the temple-place to its extremest point, the Ὀφλᾶ, Ὀφλᾶς of JOSEPHUS." (ARNOLD in HERZOG'S R. Ency. VIII., p. 632).—בַּחַן (ἅπ. λεγ.) is anyway kindred to בָּחוֹן or בַּחִין (xxiii. 13) and must, according to the fundamental meaning of the verb בחן (probare, explorare, examinare) signify a locality suitable for this, a watch-tower, look-out. But whether towers in general or a particular tower is meant, is hard to say. בַּחַן does not occur elsewhere; yet the common word for "tower," מגדל, signifies also watch-tower (2 Kings ix. 17; xvii. 9, etc.), and wall-towers (Neh. iii. 11; xii. 38). Perhaps this would have been used here, were only towers in general spoken of. Hence it is rather probable that this word בחן named along with עפל, and occurring only in this passage, signifies a tower especially designated by this name, located in Ophel; perhaps "the great tower" of Neh. iii. 27 that is mentioned in connection with Ophel. Ophel and בחן shall be pro speluncis or vice speluncarum. בְּעַד which everywhere involves the notion of something separating, has here the meaning "for, instead of." For what intervenes for another, in a measure puts itself before it, and in this way forms a partition between it and the observer. Wild, lonely, and far remote from all human intercourse must be the caves in which the wild ass (פְּרָא only here in Isaiah) has as much joy as a man in his finely built dwelling (ver. 13).

3. Until the spirit —— and the ass.—Vers. 15–20. As all the preceding prophecies are double-sided, including as it were day and night, such too is the case with the present one. But here, too, the Prophet does not promise immediate salvation. He sets the glorious Messianic last time over against the pernicious present time, yet in a way that overleaps the long centuries that intervene, and sees that future directly behind the present. Thus עד that begins ver. 15 is both a restriction of the hyperbolical עד־עולם (immeasurable extent of time as e. g., lxiii. 16; Jer. ii. 20), and a bold bridge from the present into the remote future. He portrays the latter in that aspect that corresponds to the things he reproves in the present. Proud security now reigns, for which however there is no reason. But in that time there will reign security and repose, resting on the securest foundation. For Israel will then be filled with the spirit of God, and serve in this spirit, by which shall be assured to them God's protection and support against all enemies. The expression יערה is very strong, meaning properly: the spirit from on high will be emptied out on us, completely poured out (comp. xi. 9, and respecting the word Gen. xxiv. 20 comp. Isa. iii. 17; xxii. 6; liii. 12). How far-reaching and comprehensive is the gaze of the Prophet here! He regards the spirit from on high not merely as an ethical and intellectual, but also as a physical life-principle. He speaks here, as he does xi. 2-9, of nature and of persons as wholly pervaded by spirit. And the wilderness will be a fruitful field, etc., which has a proverbial sound, must certainly be taken in another sense than that of xxix. 17. The latter passage speaks of retrogression; here progress is meant. There is a descending climax, Lebanon, fruitful field, forest; here an ascending, desert, fruitful field, forest, in which the Prophet manifestly treats the forest, not as representing absence of cultivation, but as representing the most prodigious development of vegetation. He would say: what is now waste will then be fruitful field, and what is now fruitful field will then be forest, i. e., will stand high as a forest. Then a very different, a higher principle of life, originating from the divine δόξα will penetrate even nature. Of course, then, the personal life of men also. And how beautifully the Prophet depicts this harmony of both! He names again the wilderness and the fruitful field (ver. 16) in order to say that judgment and righteousness shall dwell in them (comp. i. 27; v. 16; ix. 6; x. 22; xxviii. 17). And the fruit of this spiritual right-being will in turn make its impress by a right glorious outward appearance, viz., in everlasting peace, rest and security. What a picture for the proudly secure women (ver. 9 sqq.)! They may see why they are so called in a reproving sense. Their ease and security lack foundation.

When it shall hail, etc. I can only regard ver. 19 as the sombre foil which the Prophet uses to enhance the splendor of that future which he displayed to his people. [Some think there is an allusion to the hail in Egypt while Goshen was spared; see Exod. ix. 22–26.—Tr.]. We have had several such pictures of the future with a dark background (xi. 14 sq.; xxv. 10 sqq.; xxvi. 5 sq., etc.). Every one admits that 19 a, relates to Assyria. We had the forest as emblem of Assyria ix. 17; x. 18, 19, 34. This forest shall fall under a storm of hail. On ירד comp. Deut. xxviii. 52; Zech. xi. 2. It is not said that the forest shall break down by the hail, but that it shall hail when the forest breaks down. Thus this breaking down may be effected by something else, say by the blows of an axe. Anyway the forest will break down under a storm of hail, some phenomenon coming from on high and accredited as a divine instrument of judgment. Very many expositors understand the city in a low place to mean Jerusalem (Hitzig, Knobel, Caspari, Delitzsch, etc.). But why of a sudden this dark trait in the picture of light? Is not the abasement of Jerusalem sufficiently declared in vers. 13, 14? Why a repetition here? or, if not repetition, why thus suddenly a new judgment in the midst of the blessed, spirit-effected condition of peace? If the forest means the world-power generally, then the city must mean the centre of it, the world-city (comp. xxiv. 10–12; xxv. 2, 3, 12; xxvi. 5. It is worthy of remark that, xxv. 12; xxvi. 5, the Prophet uses השפיל thrice in reference to the judgment on the world-city. That he does not elsewhere in xxviii.-xxxiii., mention the world-city is no reason why he may not once mention it here. Why need he mention it oftener? Is it more probable that he would not mention it at all, than that he should do so once?

In ver. 20 the Prophet returns exclusively to Israel. In contrast with the desolations (near for Israel, remote for the world-power), he promises to his people the possession of the land in its widest extent, and the freest use of it for cultivation and pasture. Blessed are ye (comp. xxx. 18; lvi. 2) he says, who sow beside all waters, i. e., on all fruitful lands. Thus all well-watered and so fruitful land-stretches will be at Israel's service, and Israel shall cultivate them, and raising cattle shall be unhindered (comp. xxx. 23).

In fact the earth shall be theirs, and they may use as much land as they wish for either. Cattle may pasture in full freedom, unrestrained by fetters or fence. The whole land "shall be for the sending forth of oxen," vii. 25.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxxi. 1, 2, "Against the perverted confidence and fleshly trust in human wisdom, power and might, because the people doubt God's help, and because of such wicked doubt put their trust in human power, wit and skill. It is true the Scripture does not deny that one may use means and call in human aid in danger, yet so that even the heart looks rather to God, and knows that if He watches not and keeps not Israel, all other human help and means are in vain (Ps. cxxvii. 1; Jer. xvii. 5)."—CRAMER.

2. On xxxi. 3. "Notetur diligenter sententia isthaec prophetae: Aegyptus homo et non Deus, adeoque symboli loco semper in ore habeatur et usurpatur tum ad doctrinam, tum ad consolationem (Ps. lxii. 10; lxxiii. 18 sq.)."—FOERSTER.

3. On xxxi. 4, 5. The LORD, on the one hand, compares Himself to a lion, that will not suffer his prey to be torn away from him, and means by that that He will not suffer Himself to be turned from His counsel against Jerusalem by those false helpers, to which Jerusalem looks for protection against the punishments that it has deserved. But on the other hand the LORD compares Himself most touchingly and fittingly to the eagle that stretches its feathers over its young to protect them (Deut. xxxii. 11) [see Tr's. note on ver. 5]. Blessed is he that sits under the shelter of the Highest, and abides under the shadow of the Almighty (Ps. xci. 1; comp. Matt. xxxiii. 27).

4. On xxxi. 7. FOERSTER remarks on this verse, that it is used by the Reformed as a proof-passage against the use of images in churches. He distinguishes between imagines superstitiosae, whose use is of course forbidden, and imagines non superstitiosae, the like of which were even permitted and used in the worship of Jehovah, e. g., the cherubim and other images of art in the Tabernacle and in the Temple.

5. On xxxi. 8. "God has manifold ways by which He can head off tyrants, and does not need always to draw the sword over them. Examples: Sennacherib, 2 Kings xix. 35; Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iv. 30; Herod, Acts xii. 23."—CRAMER.

6. On xxxi. 9. That the LORD has in Zion His fire and His hearth in Jerusalem is at once the strength and the weakness of the Old Covenant. It is its strength so far as, of course, it is a high privilege that Israel enjoys above all nations of the Gentile world, that the point of the earth's surface that the LORD has made the place of His real presence on earth is the central point of their land and of their communion. But it is its weakness so far as this presence is only a transient and outward one, which, when misunderstood, can minister only to an outward worship and a false confidence (comp. Jer. vii. 4) that affords only a treacherous point of support that is dangerous to the soul. How totally different is the real presence of the LORD in the church of the New Covenant! To it the LORD is organically joined as a member, as on the other hand the LORD joins all members of His church really to Himself by His Spirit and His sacraments.

7. On xxxii. 1-8. "The picture which the Prophet paints here of the church of the last time is the picture of every true congregation of Christ. In it, the will of the LORD must be the only law according to which men judge, and not any fleshly consideration of any sort. In it, there must be open eyes and ears for God's work and word; and if in some things precedence is readily allowed to the children of this world, still in spiritual things the understanding must be right and the speech clear. Finally, in it persons must be valued according to their true Christian, moral worth, not according to advantages that before God are rather a reproach than an honor. But the picture of the true congregation mirrors to us our own deformities. All this is not found in us. Everywhere appears worldly consideration, looking to the world, much weakness in spiritual judgment, and in speech far too much respect for the advantages that worldly position and wealth give the church member. May the LORD mend these things in us; and if only at the last He transforms the old church in its totality into the new, so let each of us pray the LORD that still He would more and more transform each worldling into a true, spiritual man."—WEBER. The Prophet Isaiah, 1875.

8. On xxxii. 1-4. Men of all times may learn from the Prophet's words what sort of persons true kings, noblemen and officials ought to be. Underlying the whole discourse of Isaiah is the thought that those in authority are there for the sake of the people [comp. Luke xxii. 25, 26.—TR.], and that truth and honor are the first conditions of flourishing rule (comp. HERZ., R.-Encycl. XI. p. 24).

On ver. 8. Old FLATTIG once met the Duke of Wurtemburg on the latter's birth-day. "Well, FLATTIG," inquired the Duke, what did you preach on my birth-day?" "Serene highness, what did I preach? I just preached that princes ought to have princely thoughts." The Duke rode on without making any reply. Where there is no princely heart, there can come forth no princely thoughts. And only then does one have a princely heart when the LORD is the heart's prince.

9. On xxxii. 9. "One must not suppose that it was no part of the Prophet's office to reform women, seeing God includes all men under sin, and the proud daughters of Zion with their ostentation, were a great cause of the land being laden with sins (iii. 16)."—CRAMER.

["The alarm is sounded to women,—to feed whose pride, vanity and luxury, their husbands and fathers were tempted to starve the poor."—M. HENRY, in loc.].

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. On xxxi. 1-4. WARNING AGAINST CONFIDING IN HUMAN HELP. 1) It is insulting to God. 2) It proves idle at last, for a, the power of men is in itself weak; b, it is wholly powerless against the strong hand of God.

2. On xxxi. 5–9. THE LORD ALONE IS THE SHELTER OF HIS OWN. 1) He will be such (ver. 5); 2) He must be such (ver. 9 b, His own interest demands this); 3) He alone can be such (ver. 8); 4) He will be such on one condition (ver. 6).

3. [On xxxi. 6, 7. A GENUINE REFORMATION. 1) It is general: every one shall cast away his own idols and begin with them before trying to demolish those of other people, which there will be no need of when every man reforms himself. 2) It is thorough: for they shall part with their idolatry, their beloved sin, made more precious by the gold and silver devoted to it. 3) It is on the right principle: a principle of piety and not of policy; because idolatry was a sin and not because it was profitless ("deeply revolted," "sinfully made idols"). After M. HENRY, in loc —TR.].

4. On xxxii. 1–8. As there are always poor people, so there must always be persons of power and superior rank. The latter must know that they are there for the sake of the people, as guardians of right, as protectors of the poor and weak, so to speak, as the eyes, ears and tongues of the commonwealth. But as in God's kingdom descent from Abraham counts for nothing any more, and true worship is no more that which is offered in Jerusalem, but that which is in spirit and in truth, so, too, the nobility of the flesh must yield precedence to nobility of the spirit. Not he that is noble according to the flesh, but a fool according to the spirit shall be called noble. Only he that has princely thoughts shall be called a prince; for truth reigns in the kingdom of God.

5. [On xxxii. 2. This may be given a spiritual application by a special reference to Christ, as eminently true of Him, the King of kings. This application is old and precious. Wind and tempest, rain and hail and burning heat are emblems of the calamities of life, and especially of God's judgments on sin. Distress and impending judgment make men seek shelter. Christ is the only adequate hiding-place and covert. Let men run to Him with the eagerness of travellers in the burning desert taking refuge under a rock from the coming storm. The same rock-cliff often has a bountiful stream issuing just there where its cavernous recess affords the best shelter. While the traveller is safe from the tempest, he may rest and refresh himself from the distress he has endured. The rock "not only excludes the rays of the sun, but it has itself a refreshing coolness that is most grateful to a weary traveller." —BARNES. "Some observe here, that as the covert, and hiding-place, and the rock, do themselves receive the battering of the wind and storm, to save those from it that take shelter in them, so Christ bore the storm Himself to keep it off from us."—M. HENRY. TR.].

6. On xxxii. 9–11. When a land goes to ruin a great part of the blame of it rests on the women. For they are more easily prompted to evil, as they are to good. Where evil has once taken root, they are the ones that carry it to an extreme. "Und geht es zu des Bösen Haus, das Weib hat tausend Schritt voraus." Therefore the punishment falls the hardest on them. As the weaker and more delicate, they suffer the most under the blows of misfortune.

7. On xxxii. 15 sqq. When once the Spirit of God is poured out on all flesh (Joel iii. 1) then the personal and impersonal creation will be glorified. Then Satan will be bound, and the LORD alone will rule in men, and in nature. Then at last will it be beautiful on earth. For then right and righteousness will reign on earth, and peace, and that rest that is promised to the people of God (Heb. iv. 9).

V.—THE FIFTH WOE.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

1. THE GLORIOUS TURNING POINT: THE WOE UPON ISRAEL BECOMES A WOE UPON ASSYRIA.

CHAP. XXXIII. 1.

1 WOE to thee that spoilest and thou wast not spoiled;
And dealest treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee!
When thou shalt cease to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled;
And when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

שׁוֹדֵד and בּוֹגֵד conjoined as in xxi. 2.——The primary meaning of בָּגַד is "to cover;" hence בֶּגֶד "the cover, garment." Hence the secondary meaning of perfidious, treacherous doing [like the secondary meaning of the English word "to cloak."—TR.].——On the inf. כהתמך see EWALD, § 114 a, GREEN, § 141, 3.——כַּנְּלֹתְךָ stands for כְּהַנְלֹתְךָ, comp. iii. 8; the Dag. f. in the נ is because of the Masorets assuming a synkope, whereas, properly, there is an elision.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The season of preparation for withstanding the Assyrian foe, that Israel has spent in so perverse a fashion, is past. The enemy is at hand (comp. ver. 7). But now, too, is the time when God will fulfil His word that He would smite the Assyrian (xxx. 18 sqq.; 31 sqq.; xxxi. 8 sq.). Now, therefore, the Prophet turns the woe against Assyria. This power, hitherto unconquered, will be overthrown (ver. 1). This is the principal thought of the chapter, which the Prophet puts at the head ver. 1, as a theme. But as a stone thrown into the water makes wave-lines that extend in concentric circles wider and wider, so the Prophet joins on to this primary theme three declarations which, enlarging in extent and contents, state the particulars of the condition, the completion and consequence of that act of deliverance. This woe follows as a fifth those of xxviii. 1; xxix. 1; xxx. 1; xxxi. 1. But unlike the preceding, which are directed against Israel, this is against Assyria (comp. x. 1, 5). For, according to the contents of the chapter, none but Assyria can be the desolater. This announcement of its destruction is opposed to that audacious presumption that regarded itself as invincible (x. 5–14).

2. THE PRAYER OF FAITH QUICKLY HEARD.

Chapter XXXIII. 2–6.

2 O Lord, be gracious unto us; [a]we have waited for thee:
Be thou their arm every morning,
Our salvation also in the time of trouble.
3 At the noise of the tumult the people [b]fled;
At the lifting up of thyself the nations [c]were scattered.
4 And your spoil shall be gathered like the gathering of the caterpillar;
As the running to and fro of the locusts shall he run upon them.
5 The Lord is exalted; for he dwelleth on high:
He [d]hath filled Zion with judgment and righteousness.
6 And wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of the times,
And strength of [1]salvation:
The fear of the Lord is his [e]treasure.

[1] Heb. Salvations.

[a] we wait. [b] flee. [c] are. [d] fills. [e] treasure-house.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2. חננו comp. Ps. cxxiii. 3; lvii. 2; li. 3, etc.——קִוָּה often in the Pss., mostly with the Accusat. With לְ referring to God it occurs only Ps. cxix. 95, compare Ps. lxix. 21. But Isaiah often construes the word thus: viii. 17; xxv. 9; lx. 9.

Ver. 3. נָפְצוּ is from נָפַץ (Niph. of פָּצַץ) inflected like the Kal. נפץ, perhaps because פצץ does not occur except in this and in two analogous Niphal forms (Gen. ix. 19; 1 Sam. xiii. 11).

Ver. 4. אֹסֶף may not be taken passively (with Cappellus, Doederlein, Drechsler, etc.), as appears from the image itself, and from גבים (ἅπ. λεγ. comp. גוֹב Nah. iii. 17; גֹּבַי Amos vii. 1, certainly a name of the locust, although of uncertain derivation and meaning. Comp. Herz. R. Enc., VI. p. 70). This latter word is expressly active.——On אֹסֶף אֹסֶף comp. xxiv. 22. אֹסֶף is here as xxxii. 10 a noun (Mic. vii. 1). As to construction, it is to be regarded as in the acc. modalis.——חסיל only here in Isaiah; see Joel i. 4; ii. 25.——שקק (xxix. 8) used in the same sense Joel ii. 9.——מַשַּׁק, "descursitatio," ἅπ. λεγ.——בו refers to the camp, not before named, yet ideally present.

Ver. 5. נשגב, ii. 11, 17; xii. 4.——שכן מרום again only lvii. 15; comp. xxxiii. 16.——מִלֵּא Piel, again xxiii. 2; lxv. 11, 20.

Ver. 6. The Plural עתים occurs principally in later books; still also Job xxiv. 1. Only here in Isa.: comp. Ps. xxxi. 16.——אמונת עתיך is predicate, the following substantives to דעת are subject.——חֹסֶן "opes, thesaurus," only here in Isaiah comp. Prov. xv. 6; xxvii. 24; Jer. xx. 5; Ezek. xxii. 25.——ישועת xxvi. 18, elsewhere only in the Pss. xviii. 51; xxviii. 8; xlii. 6, 12; xliii. 5, etc.——The suffix in אוצרו relates to the same subject as the suffix in עתיך. Interchange of person often occurs in Isaiah, but it is not always so easily traced to its motive as in ver. 2. See below in Exeget. and Crit.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The first wave-circle! In grand, rapid flight the Prophet's gaze hastens through three stages: he shows what must precede the overthrow of Assyria, then this itself, then its contrast in the remote future. For having by a prayer intimated that believing trust in Jehovah is the condition of salvation (ver. 2), he describes the immediately consequent overthrow of Assyria (vers. 3, 4). But on this present earthly salvation follows for the Prophet at once the Messianic future with its blessings, of which the deliverance from Assyria is a type.

2. O LORD——His treasure.—Vers. 2–6. This short prayer, that unexpectedly interrupts the prophecy, is assuredly not an involuntary sigh, but it occupies a place in the discourse chosen with deliberation. The Prophet intends two things by it. First he would present to the people what they must do on their part to obtain deliverance. They must believe and confide in the LORD, according to the words "if ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established" (vii. 9), and "he that believes will not yield" (xxviii. 16.). But as the Prophet gives, not a warning to pray merely, but an example of it, and himself intercedes, he gives on the one hand an example to men, and on the other hand a proof to God that there are still righteous men in Israel (comp. Gen. xviii. 24 sqq.) that love the people and trust in God. A people from which issues such prayer is no dead heap of ashes. There is a glow in them that can be kindled up again (xlii. 3). The prayer has the form of those in the Pss. (comp. xii.).

The (suffix of the) third person in זרעם "their arm," that occurs in such harsh dissonance with (the suffixes of) the first person preceding and following, is to be explained, it seems to me, by the word זְרֹעַ "arm" itself. The Prophet means here those called to protect city and state with the power of their arm. He and many others do what they can with heart, and head and otherwise. But when it concerns defence against an outward enemy, then those that serve with the arm are very important. Therefore the prayer that the LORD Himself might be the arm of those who have devoted their arm to the country. Comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 9; lxxxix. 11, 22, etc. לבקרים comp. Ps. lxxiii. 14; ci. 8. אַף comp. xxvi. 9; Ps. xvi. 6; xviii. 49, etc. Also ישועה is very frequent in the Pss.: lxviii. 20; xxxv. 3; lxii. 2, etc. בעת צרה, see Ps. xxxvii. 39; comp. Ps. xx. 2; l. 15.

In vers. 3, 4 is announced the hearing of the prayer. In very drastic form, but, with all its brevity, still vivid, the flight of the Assyrian and the plundering of their camp are depicted. The enemy hear a loud tumult like the onset of an army. But it is no human army: for, as appears from מרממתך and from xxix. 6; xxx. 30 sq., the LORD effects that noise. He brings about a panic among them by letting them hear a tumult that has no actual existence (comp. Ps. liii. 6; Exod. xiv. 24 sq.; xv. 16; Judg. iv. 15; vii. 22; 1 Sam. vii. 10). The fleeing nations are of course those of Assyria. The LORD arises (comp. ver. 10; xxx. 18; Ps. xxi. 14; xlvi. 11, etc.), to smite the enemy. The expression is anthropomorphic, he, so to speak, raises himself high aloft. In ver. 4 the Prophet addresses the Assyrian. He sees the Israelites plundering his camp, gathering the spoil with a celerity like locusts clearing off a field. Seeing in this coming victory a type of the final, crowning triumph of Jehovah over the world-power, he contemplates this glory in ver. 5, chiefly from its inner side. He would intimate that the treasures of salvation, that Israel will then acquire, will, because of a spiritual sort, be more glorious than the goods found in the Assyrian camp (comp. ver. 23; xxxvii. 36, comp. 2 Kings vii. 16). On account of this typical relation, the two periods are treated as a connected whole, without regard to their temporal disconnection. In this the Prophet does not contradict what he had said xxxii. 15 of the continuance of the desolation till the initiation of the great regeneration of the last time. For that period of the desolation falls precisely in the period that the Prophet over-leaps from the stand-point of his manner of regarding the matter. He thus sees the LORD elevated on high and withdrawn from every hostile attack because enthroned on high. From this height the LORD fills Zion with right and righteousness, which plainly recalls xxxii. 15, 16. Likewise ver. 6 recalls xxxii. 17; the very beginning with והיה coincides. But "the stability of thy times" corresponds to what in xxxii. 17 sq., is called "peace, assurance, sure dwelling, quiet resting place." Thus we must give אמונה here the meaning "security," a condition that guarantees peace, tranquility, confidence (ver. 16). When the times are such that there is no disturbance of the public welfare apprehended, then they have the quality of אמונה, then one may speak of an אמונת עתים. But of course אמונה occurs only here in this sense (comp. נֶאֱמָנִים ver. 16). As in xxxii. 16 the security appears as the fruit of moral inworkings, so here also. Fulness of salvations, wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability, etc. As in the familiar declaration l'empire c'est la paix the copula has a tropical sense, so here there is the trope of the metonymy, since two things that actually stand related as cause and effect are, apparently, identified in expression. Thus the security of those times is the effect of the treasure, the wealth in treasures of salvation. It will not rest on subjective human possessions, as the women at ease (xxxii. 9) suppose, but upon objective, God-given treasures of salvation. The kind is declared in what follows, viz.: inward, spiritual goods: wisdom and knowledge (on these notions comp. xi. 2). "The fear of the LORD" is named last, although it is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. i. 7). But it seems to me the Prophet would distinguish between אוֹצָר and חֹסֶן. The fear of the LORD is the treasure-house (אוצר as e. g. Joel i. 17; 2 Chr. xi. 11, etc., = בֵּית הָאוֹצָר Jer. l. 25, etc.), that hides that treasure in itself. Our passage recalls xi. 2 in many ways: also in this that, rightly counted, seven spiritual goods are named: 1) judgment, 2) righteousness, 3) security, 4) riches of salvations, 5) wisdom, 6) knowledge, 7) the fear of the LORD.

3. WHERE NEED IS GREATEST HELP IS NEAREST.

Chapter XXXIII. 7-12.

7 Behold, their [1]valiant ones shall cry without:
The ambassadors of peace shall weep bitterly.
8 The highways lie waste,
The wayfaring man ceaseth:
He hath broken the covenant, he hath despised the cities,
He regardeth no man.
9 The earth mourneth and languisheth:
Lebanon is ashamed and [2]hewn down:
Sharon is like a wilderness;
And Bashan and Carmel shake off their fruits.
10 Now will I rise, saith the Lord;
Now will I be exalted;
Now will I lift up myself.
11 Ye shall conceive chaff, ye shall bring forth stubble:
Your breath, as fire, shall devour you.
12 And the people shall be as the burnings of lime:
As thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire.

[1] Or, messengers. [2] Or, withered away.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 7. The LXX. have somehow derived אראלם from יָרֵא "to be afraid," for they translate: "ἐν τῷ φόβῳ ὑμῶν αὐτοὶ φοβηθήσονται." The other ancient versions refer the word to ראה. Thus the Vulg. ecce videntes clamabunt foris. Symm. and Theod. "ὀφθήσομαι αὐτοῖς." Aquila: ὀραθήσομαι. It appears that they read אֶרְאֶלָּם as if it were אֶרְאֶלָּם (syncopated from אֶרְאֶה לָהֶם, like כֻּלְּכֶם from מַה לָּכֶם). Similarly the Chald. and Syr. (comp. Gesen. in loc.). But these derivations and explanations are ungrammatical and do not suit the context. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 30 אֲרִיאֵל seems to serve as designation for heroes, and in fact as nom. propr. though still retaining its fundamental appellative meaning, since it reads there שְׁנֵי אֲרִיאֵל and not אֲרִיאֵלִים or אֲרִיֵי אֵל. But from אֲרִיאֵל may be derived either אַרְאֵל (like אַבְנֵר from אֲבִינֵר 1 Sam. xiv. 50), and this form underlies the patronymic אַרְאֵלִי (Gen. xlvi. 16; Num. xxvi. 17); or אֶרְאֵל like e. g., אֶבְיָסָף (1 Chr. vi. 8, 22) from אֲבִיאָסָף (Exod. vi. 24), אֶבְיָתָר from אֲבִי יָתָר (1 Sam. xxii. 20 sq., etc.). From אֶרְאֵל comes our present word. אֲרִיאֵל = "God's lion," i. e., hero, a designation that occurs also in the Arabic and Persian (comp. asadallah and schir-choda. Bochart Hieroz. II., p. 7, ed. Rosenmueller, and Gesen. Thes., p. 147). But this does not explain the daghesh forte in the ל. I would side with those that read אַרְאֵלָם or אֶרְאֵלָם or אֲרָאֶלָּם, as eight codices actually have אֲרִאֵלִים. Taking אֶרְאֶלָּם as the mean between the Masoretic reading and what is otherwise demanded, we must in addition construe it as collective (ihre Heldenschaft).——מַר (comp. v. 20; xxxviii. 15, 17) is as accusative to be regarded as dependent on יִבְכָּיוּן: "they weep bitterness," i. e., bitter tears (comp. Zeph. i. 14).——The form יִבְכָּיוּן occurs again only Job xxxi. 38; comp. Isa. xxi. 12; xxxi. 3.

Ver. 8. מָאַס with following accusative Job ix. 21; with בְּ, Judg. ix. 38; Job xix. 18. Comp. Ps. lxxxix. 39, where מָאַס is used in the same sense as זָנַח.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The second wave-circle. It is broader as to extent than the foregoing, but as regards intensity it is narrower. For it issues from the same point as the first, but extends only to the eve of the saving act. The distress occasioned by the hostile Assyrian is portrayed concretely and visibly, and just as visibly then do we see the Lord, as it were provoked by the intolerable distress, come to the rescue. A respectable embassy that Hezekiah had sent with a ransom had returned without accomplishing anything (ver. 7). They could only say that the Assyrian had indeed accepted the ransom, but spite of that ravaged the land (vers. 8–9). This is the overweening בֹּגֵד spoken of in ver. 1. Then Jehovah declares that now He will arise against the enemy (ver. 10). He threatens them that their plan shall come to naught, yea that it shall turn to their own destruction (ver. 11), and that they shall burn up like limestone, yea like dry brushwood (ver. 12).

2. Behold their valiant ones——burned with fire.—Vers. 7–12. By צעקו and יבכיון the Prophet intends to express contrasts. Heroes raise a loud cry of lament; messengers of peace, that should bring and feel joy, weep. Almost all commentators agree that the Prophet means by these heroes and messengers of peace the ambassadors that Hezekiah sent to the Assyrian king to Lacish (2 Kings xviii. 14). They were to purchase the withdrawal of the Assyrians at the cost of subjection and a heavy ransom. Both were accepted. But after the prodigious sum of 300 talents in silver and 30 talents in gold was paid, the Assyrians still would not retire, but demanded beside the surrender of the capital. The ambassadors came back with this sad news, that was afterwards confirmed by the message of Rabshakeh, and with news of all the ruin that the Assyrians had wrought in the land. In verses 8, 9 they give information of the condition of the land as they had found it in consequence of these desolations. The roads lay desolate (comp. Judg. v. 20;) passengers along them had ceased (Ps. viii. 9; Isa. xxiii. 2; Lam. i. 12; ii. 15); there was no commerce over them. He, i. e., the king of Assyria had broken covenant, in that, spite of the ransom he had accepted, he still did not retire, but made further demands. He treated the cities lightly, that is, not he despised them, but he captured them by his superior force that enabled him to make little account of their resistance. The words contain an intimation of the capture of the cities of Judah of which xxxvi. 1; 1 Kings xviii. 13; 2 Chr. xxxii. 1, speak. Moreover he does not regard man; i. e., he sacrifices human life unsparingly (comp. ii. 22; xiii. 17).

To this point the discourse is prose. Now it becomes poetry. For ver. 9 the Prophet personifies things of nature. The general notion earth is specified by naming the particular parts distinguished by their vegetation. First Lebanon, to the north of the Holy Land, is named. It is ashamed, withered. Sharon, rich in flowers, the plain between Cæsarea and Joppa, has become like a steppe (lxv. 10). The two fruitful elevations east and west, Bashan and Carmel, especially noted for their forests (ii. 13) autumnlike shake off their leaves (lii. 2, comp. Exod. xiv. 27; Ps. cxxxvi. 15). The sad news of the embassy is at an end. It bows the hearts of the Israelites down deep, but for the LORD it is the signal that now has come the moment to interfere. But with Him the interference is bitter earnest. This appears in the three-membered sentence with its thrice repeated self-summons, ver. 10. The LORD announces to the Assyrians the vanity of their purpose, yea its ruin to themselves. "Ye shall conceive hay," i. e., your plans shall be like hay; not fresh, full of life, but utterly dry, without strength or sap; and hence when they come to the light they shall prove to be dry, dead stubble. That they shall prove their own destruction the Prophet expresses by saying: your puffing (comp. xlv. 4; xxx. 28) shall be a fire to devour you (i. 31; ix. 17). This is characterized by a two-fold image (ver. 12). The first is burning lime. Water poured on lime causes it to sink away without flame (comp. Jer. xxxiv. 5; Deut. xxvii. 2, 4; Amos ii. 1). But thorns burn with a bright flame, a loud crackling and much smoke. It seems to me the Prophet would say that, in the overthrow of the Assyrians, many nations would disappear in the great conflagration unnoticed and leaving no trace, whereas the fall of others (he means, doubtless, the greater and better known) will make the world wonder at the grand spectacle they present.

4. THE ALARM OF SINNERS; THE COMFORT OF THE PIOUS.

CHAPTER XXXIII. 13–22.

13 Hear, ye that are far off, what I have done;
And, ye that are near, acknowledge my might.
14 The sinners in Zion are afraid;
Fearfulness hath surprised the [a]hypocrites.
Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire?
Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?
15 He that walketh [1]righteously, and speaketh [2]uprightly
He that despiseth the gain of [3]oppressions,
That shaketh his hands from holding of bribes,
That stoppeth his ears from hearing of [4]blood,
And shutteth his eyes from seeing evil;
16 He shall dwell on [5]high:
His place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks:
[b]Bread shall be given him;
His waters shall be sure.

17 Thine eyes shall see the king in his beauty:
They shall behold [c]the land [6]that is very far off.
18 Thine heart shall meditate terror.
Where is the scribe? where is the [7]receiver?
Where is [d]he that counted the towers?
19 Thou shalt not see [e]a fierce people,
A people of deeper speech than thou canst perceive:
Of a [8]stammering tongue, that thou canst not understand.
20 Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities:
Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation,
A tabernacle that [f]shall not be taken down;
Not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed,
Neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.
21 But there the glorious LORD will be unto us
[g]A place [9]of broad rivers and streams;
Wherein shall go no galley with oars,
Neither shall gallant ship pass thereby.
22 For the LORD is our judge, the LORD is our [10]lawgiver,
The LORD is our king; he will save us.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 14. רעדה only here in Isaiah. Comp. Ps. ii. 11; xlviii. 7; Job iv. 14.—גּוּר with accus. loc. comp. Judg. v. 17; Ps. v. 5; cxx. 5. Elsewhere Isaiah construes גּוּר with prepositions; xi. 6; xvi. 4; liv. 15.——לָנוּ is the so-called dativus ethicus. Though elsewhere this dative refers to the actual subject (comp. Gen. xxi. 16; xxxi. 41; Isa. ii. 22; xxxi. 8; xxxvi. 9, etc.), according to which it would need to read here מִי יָגוּר לוֹ, it is in this place related to the ideal subject, i. e., to the speakers, who properly affirm of themselves this inability to dwell with Jehovah. This dative everywhere represents a phrase that affirms an intensive relation to the interests of the speaker: in this place say: who will dwell (we say this in relation to ourselves, in our own interest) with devouring fire, etc.?——מוקד again only Ps. cii. 4.——מִי יָגוּר is the beginning of Ps. xv. Moreover the words הולך צ׳ וד׳ מ׳ש׳ ver. 15 recall Ps. xv. 2.

Ver. 15. The plural צדקות, juste facta occurs again in Isa. xlv. 24; lxiv. 5.——דבר מישרים comp. Prov. xxiii. 16; the latter word again in Isa. xxvi. 7; xlv. 19.——בצע (comp. Exod. xviii. 21) again in Isa. lvi. 11; lvii. 17. What sort of בצע is meant is explained by the addition מעשקות (oppressiones, again only Prov. xxviii. 16).——נער see ver. 9.——The construction with מן is constr. prægnans. For the preposition depends on the notion of refraining ideally present in נער, "to shake."——שׁחד comp. Ps. xv. 5; Isa. i. 23; v. 23; xlv. 13.——אֹטֵם אָזְנוֹ with following מן occurs Prov. xxi. 13, comp. Prov. xvii. 28.——דָּמִים is "bloodshed, murder," (comp. Exod. xxii. 1; Isa. iv. 4).——עצם rhyming with אטם, we find here in Kal. with the same meaning that it has in the Piel xxix. 10.——ראה ברע "to look on evil with pleasure."

Ver. 16. מְרוֹמִים, plural, in Isaiah only here; comp. Judg. v. 18; Prov. viii. 2, etc.——מְצָדוֹת as st. constr. comp. 1 Sam. xxiv. 1.——משׂגב, "asylum," "refuge," again only xxv. 12.

Ver. 17. The 2 pers. masc. suffix, as in vers. 6 and 20, refers to the nation regarded as a unit.

Ver. 18. הָגָה, "to think, consider, meditari" (Josh. i. 8; Ps. i. 2; ii. 1, etc.; Isa. lix. 13) may relate also to what is past.——אֵימָה, "terror," only here in Isaiah.——סֹפֵר again xxxvi. 3; xxxvii. 2.——שֹׁקֵל as substantive only here in Isaiah; the verb "to weigh out" money xlvi. 6; lv. 2.

Ver. 19. The two halves of this verse contain the antithesis of seeing and hearing. This proves that the explanation of נוֹעָז = לוֹעֵז barbare loquens (Ps. cxiv. 1), does not agree with the context. That נועז means "mute beckoning" according to the Arab. wa'asa (HITZIG) is disproved by GESEN. Thes. p. 607 sq. There remains thus the explanation that takes נוֹעָז as part. Niph. from עָזַז = יָעַז (comp. יָחַם and חָמַם, יָמַשׁ and מָשַׁשׁ, יָרַק and רָקַק) and that with the meaning "hard, audacious, overweening conduct" (SYMM. ἀναιδής, VULG. impudens). The word, moreover, is ἅπ. λεγ., and for this reason it may be possible that Isaiah hints at some Assyrian word at present unknown to us.

Ver. 20. צָעַן ἅπ. λεγ., Arab. ta'ana of the roaming of the nomads.

Ver. 21. כי ים corresponds to the negations of ver. 21.——אדיר in Isaiah again only x. 34.——DELITZSCH after Luzzatto has proved that מקום is not to be taken = loco, "instead." The suffixes in בו and יעברנו are manifestly to be referred to מקום.——שַׁיִט "oar" (comp. מָשׁוֹט Ezek. xxvii. 29 and מִשּׁוֹט Ezek. xxvii. 6) is ἅπ. λεγ.——צִי contracted from צִיִּי, cavum, rotundum aliquid, is a great bellied-out ship (Num. xxiv. 24; Ezek. xxx. 9; Ps. cv. 41).

Ver. 22. Since it does not read כִּי יוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ (xliii. 3; xlvii. 15, etc.), I would accord with Hitzig, who takes מַלְכֵּנוּ, מְחֹקְקֵנוּ, שֹׁפְטֵנוּ, not as predicates but as apposition with יהוה, so that יוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ is the sole predicate of the foregoing three subjects which are comprehended emphatically in the הוּא.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Here we have the final and broadest circuit of waves before us. According to ver. 10, Jehovah was about to arise and come to the rescue. He has done so. The rescue is accomplished in an astounding fashion. The present passage belongs to time after the rescue. It presupposes it. For it contains glances into the future, that rest upon that deed as their foundation. First the Lord summons those far and near to give proper attention to what He does (ver. 13). Then the Prophet describes the effect of what has been done on the sinners in Jerusalem. They are terrified: they would flee the neighborhood of this mighty God, for they are ill-at-ease in it. Hence they ask: who can abide by this devouring fire? (ver. 14). To this is replied: this fire is harmless for the pious, the lovers of truth, the righteous (ver. 15), for such will dwell in Jerusalem in security and abundance (ver. 16); and will see the king of Israel sitting in might and glory at the head of a wide empire (ver. 17). As one thinks of something that has disappeared from memory, so shall men reflect on the time of war's distress (ver. 18), and of the terrific presence of the barbaric nation in the land (ver. 19). Zion will be a secure fortress, a quiet, abiding place of worship, and no more a shifting tabernacle as in the time of the journey through the wilderness (ver. 20). For Jehovah is there Himself in His majesty; protecting waters surround the place (ver. 21), and the Lord Himself as judge, lawgiver and king is the deliverer of His people (ver. 22).

2. Hear——my might—Ver. 13. The piece begins with the cry of a herald that makes known to the whole world the accomplished mighty act. For the perfect עָשִׂיתִי without doubt designates the act of rescue as accomplished, which verses 1, 3, 10 held in prospect; and we must regard גְּבוּרָה (as often in the Books of Kings, where גבורה and עשה continually stand parallel: 1 Kings xv. 23; xvi. 27; xxii. 46, etc.), in the concrete sense as a display of power, and, because of עָשִׂיתִי, as already come to pass. But the herald's cry would intimate that an event of vast and wide effect has happened, of concern to all men, even to those far remote. For they may know from this who is the true, and therefore also who is their God. For He that did what happened to the Assyrian host in the neighborhood of Jerusalem in Hezekiah's time must be God over all gods (comp. xxxvi. 18–20; xxxvii. 10–13) and Lord over all lords. Those near are plainly the Israelites, who had in great part been witnesses of the deed. These should acknowledge the demonstration of the Lord's power. According to their inward condition they should draw from it comfort or warning.

3. The sinners——seeing evil.—Vers. 14–15. The Prophet first presents that mighty deed as a warning to the wicked. Such were the idolaters who had no joy in a proof so irrefragable of the sole power and divinity of Jehovah. Therefore these sinners (i. 28; xiii. 9) and the unclean (ix. 16; x. 6; xxxii. 6—there lies in the word a hint at idolatry) in Zion are terrified. Devoid of the right knowledge of God, because they would not, not because they could not have it, the nearness of this almighty, and above all of this holy God is in the highest degree burdensome to these people. Living in Jerusalem where this God has His fire and His furnace (xxxi. 9) is painful to them. Hence they cry: who among us, etc. It is manifest that by the devouring fire they mean Jehovah. By the strages Assyriorum He had proved Himself to be such. And shall they ever remain near this power that is as irresistibly present as it is terrible? The expression is taken from Deut. iv. 24; ix. 3, comp. Isa. xxix. 6; xxx. 27, 30. מוֹקֵד designates here the place where the fire burns, "the hearth." By calling this everlasting they judge themselves: for they show by that a knowledge, that it is a veritable divine fire, that burns there, not an imaginary one. But just with this they will have nothing to do.

The Prophet (ver. 15) replies to their inquiry, that one may dwell very well by this burning fire. But with the Holy One, one must live holy. The image He proceeds to draw of a holy life is an Old Testament one. The traits of it are chiefly taken from passages in the Psalms (see Text. and Gram.). Shaking the hands, (thus refraining them) from taking a bribe, is a strong expression for striving to keep and prove the integrity of the hands.

4. He shall dwell——will save us.—Vers. 16–22. This is the confirmation that one may dwell happily with the devouring fire. For these verses show what blessings they shall have who live agreeably to the holy being of God. And since there shall never be wanting such in Zion, the salvation and glory of Zion is assured for all time. Thus these verses contain the same thought uttered by the Prophet already xxviii. 16 sqq.; xxix. 22 sqq.; xxx. 15, 19 sqq.; xxxi. 6 sq.; xxxii. 1 sqq., 15 sqq., that Israel's deliverance depends on an upright and thorough conversion to the Lord; that on this condition, however, it is secure forever. נֶאֱמָן "what is certain, never deceives expectation, never fails" (comp. ver. 6; Jer. xv. 18; Isa. xxii. 23, 25). As happened vers. 5, 6, so here, for the Prophet the salvation of the near present merges into one with the great, final Messianic period. And so, influenced perhaps by the then oppressed look of the king of Judah, he contemplates the latter beaming with the joy of victory, and at the same time as the type of the Messiah, resplendent in the supremest beauty and glory, whose beauty the author of Ps. xlv. (ver. 3) had also seen prefigured in the appearance of the bridegroom-king whom he celebrated. That the Prophet's glance penetrates into the Messianic future appears from the expression the land that is very far off (viii. 9; Jer. viii. 19). The expression is too strong to be understood merely of free motion in the land in contrast with the confining siege, or of the normal extending of Israelitish territory according to Deut. i. 7; xi. 24. As royal pomp and beauty adorns the person of the king, so immeasurable extent does his land. אֶרֶץ מ׳ is thus not a far distant, but a wide extended land. It is the same thought that meets us ii. 2 sqq.; ix. 7; xi. 10; xxv. 6 sqq.

The Prophet in vers. 18, 19 connects his glorious image of the future with the mournful condition of the present. For he describes it as a chief blessing of that future, that the bad things of the present will be present to thoughtful contemplation as things that one rejoices to have overcome. Et hoc meminisse juvabit. In his graphic way the Prophet gives prominence to particular terrors that must have left a peculiarly deep impression. The סֹפֵר, "writer," and the שֹׁקֵל, "weigher," before whom one had to appear and pay tribute, and who then weighed the valuables received, and made a list of them, were certainly persons of terror from whose mouths they had often had experience of the Vae victis (Livy, 5, 48). ["The Apostle Paul in 1 Cor. i. 20, has a sentence so much like this, in the threefold repetition of the question where, and in the use of the word scribe, that it cannot be regarded as a mere fortuitous coincidence." "It may be regarded as a mere imitation, as to form and diction, of the one before us."—J. A. ALEXANDER, in loc.]. Again it must have made a terrible impression, when from the walls they saw the enemy taking the first steps toward attacking the city by one of the leaders riding around the walls, regarding the towers, counting them and taking notes of his observations (comp. Ps. xlviii. 13). What happiness to be able to call out: "where are they now those fearful men? They have disappeared forever!" What felicity to be quit of the foreign, repulsive appearance of this enemy; no more to be compelled to see the overweening nation; no more to hear its barbarous sounds! The Israelites will no more hear "the nation too deep of lip to be understood" and "stammering and jabbering with the tongue (comp. on xxviii. 11; xxxvii. 22) without meaning."

The Prophet having enumerated the bad things, now directs attention to the good that is to be seen in and about Jerusalem. He first describes Zion as the religious centre of the nation. There is the temple; there Jehovah dwells (comp. on ver. 14); thither the people assemble to worship the LORD and keep His feasts. Thus He calls the city קרית מועדנו (comp. הַר מוֹעֵד xiv. 13, comp. i. 14). That he intends an antithesis to אהל מועד appears from ver. 15. Israel then has no more a tabernacle, a city for festival gathering (of the people with one another, and with Jehovah). As such Zion must be especially looked to. And if one looks more narrowly, then the meaning of this designation appears to be that Jerusalem will be a secure, quiet abode (xxxii. 18), of course still a tabernacle, but no longer so in the original, nomadic sense; not like the travelling tent of the wilderness, but one that does not move about. The Prophet signifies that there shall happen to it neither a voluntary nor a violent breaking up of the tabernacle (נתק means a violent rending, comp. v. 27, not the usual striking of a tent). This permanent tabernacle shall be attended with a glorious rest for the people of God in the future that is described, that shall be founded on the presence in the midst of them of Jehovah, the highest Majesty. The LORD is called a place of rivers, of course in a figure. In all this figurative description lies the notion of defence, refuge. Hence "a place of rivers" may as appropriately be used of Jehovah, as "rock, tower, shield, horn of salvation," (Ps. xviii. 3). But commentators are right in saying that the Prophet has in mind cities like Babylon, Nineveh, No-Ammon (Nah. iii. 8), that were defended by great rivers and river canals. The present Jerusalem lacked such defences, but, such is the meaning, Jehovah Himself will be river-defences. נהרים may allude to the cities of Mesopotamia, and יארים to the similarly located cities of Egypt; for הַנָּהָר is κατ' 'εξοχὴν the Euphrates (viii. 7; xi. 15) and יְאֹר the Nile (xix. 7, 8; xxiii. 10). Those streams and canals that recede right and left, and thus are very broad, are called רחבי ידים (comp. Ps. civ. 25; Isa. xxii. 18; Gen. xxxiv. 21; Judg. xviii. 10; 1 Chr. iv. 10; Neh. vii. 4). Neither oared-ship, nor sail-ship shall be able to pass these mighty waters. The Prophet ends with rhymes that make the conclusion sound like a hymn. Jehovah, Israel's judge (ii. 4; xi. 3, 4), lawgiver (comp. Deut. xxxiii. 21), and king, is also its deliverer.

Recapitulation and Conclusion.

CHAP. XXXIII. 23, 24.

23 [1]Thy tacklings are loosed;
[a]They could not well strengthen their mast,
They could not spread the [b]sail:
Then is the prey of a great spoil divided;
The lame take the prey.
24 And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick:
The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity.

[1] Or, They have forsaken thy tacklings.
[a] They hold not erect their mast.
[b] flag.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 23. We must take נִטְּשׁוּ Niph. as the passive of the notion missum facere, "to slacken" (comp. Exod. xxiii. 11; Prov. xvii. 14). Expositors take כֵּן to mean the socket in which the mast sets in the bottom of the ship. But that (the ἱστοπέδη) is not held by the cables. And when Vitringa says that the cables malum sustinentis thecas succurrunt, that is even not חִזֵּק. For this word denotes adstringere, firmum reddere, and can only relate directly to the mast, as occurs in the text. Hence Drechsler would not take cables but the seamen as subject of יְחַזְּקוּן; in which case the negative expression appears strange. Hence I think that כֵּן here is not the substantive, but the adjective derived from כּוּן, erectus stetit, which means rectus, and would here be taken in its original physical sense, though everywhere else, indeed, it is used in a spiritual or moral sense (unless, perhaps, 1 Kings vii. 29, 31 form exceptions).——The suffix in תָּרְנָם (comp. xxx. 17) is also proof that the cables are subject. For it is their chief aim to hold the mast (comp. Göll, Kulturbilder aus Hellas und Rom. II., p. 197). This may, therefore, be called their mast. The tangled cables hinder the unfurling of the flag (the ἐπίσημον or παράσημον, (comp. Ezek. xxvii. 7).——עַד denoting "booty" occurs again only Gen. xlix. 27; Zeph. iii. 8.

Ver. 24. Ver. 23 and שָׁכֵן make it clear that בָּהּ refers to Jerusalem.——נְשֻׂא עָוֹן occurs only here; but comp. Ps. xxxii. 1 and Isa. iii. 3; ix. 14.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. We regarded ver. 22, in form and contents, as a conclusion of the prophetic perspective that joins on to the act of deliverance spoken of before ver. 13, and presupposes it. With ver. 23 the Prophet returns into the immediate present distress from which proceeds the entire prophetic cycle of chaps. xxviii.—xxxiii. At ver. 23 we stand again in the period before the overthrow of the Assyrians. With few, yet vigorous and clear lines the Prophet portrays, in the first three clauses of ver. 23, the present distress, using an image suggested by ver. 21. He compares the kingdom of Judah to a ship whose cables hang loose and hold neither flag nor mast [but see comment below]. For then (i. e., in the great moment referred to, vers. 1 and 3, whose approach he had announced as immediate ver. 10, and presupposes ver. 13 sqq.), in this great moment great booty is distributed, and in fact plunder is so easy that the lame themselves can share in it (ver. 23 end). Now Israel is reinvigorated to a healthy, strong life. It has in that deliverance the pledge that God has forgiven its sin, and that is the pledge of all salvation (ver. 24). Thus the prophecy concludes with a brief word as it began. And the pith of it is the same fact to which ver. 1 refers from another side.

2. Thy tacklings——iniquity.—Vers. 23, 24. Expositors down to Ewald, whom Drechsler and Delitzsch join [so also Barnes, J. A. Alexander, Birks], understand the image of the ship to refer to Assyria, and to form a continuation of the allegory of ver. 21: did the enemy succeed in crossing those trenches, they would be wrecked, and Israel would divide the spoil. The following considerations conflict with this view: 1) ver. 22 concludes the preceding discourse; 2) according to ver. 21 the hostile ships will not cross over those water trenches; the mention of them is in respect only of plundering and destruction; 3) the description of ver. 23 does not suit a vessel disabled in conflict, but only one badly equipped for battles; 4) what is said of the lame plundering implies a locality that such can reach, they cannot be supposed to take part in a sea-fight; 5) the feminine suffix in חֲבָלָיִךְ refers to Zion, because Assyria is nowhere else made feminine. For in the sole passage quoted in proof that it is (xxx. 32) the reading is doubtful, and if the reading בָּהּ be correct, still the suffix must refer to the land of Assyria, which is impossible in our text. [The Author hardly does justice to the view he controverts, which, as put by J. A. Alexander, in loc., seems more natural than his own. "There is, at the beginning of this verse, a sudden apostrophe to the enemy considered as a ship. It was said (ver. 21) that no vessel should approach the holy city. But now the Prophet seems to remember that one had done so, the proud ship Assyria. But what was its fate? He sees it dismantled and abandoned to its enemies."—Tr.]

The ship of the Jewish state presents a desolate spectacle. But patience! Then (i. e., in the moment, that is partly predicted, partly presupposed in what precedes), spoil will be divided, which implies complete victory. The accumulation of words meaning booty (עַד, שָׁלָל, בַּז) denotes the rich abundance of it. What is said of the lame intimates plainly enough that the field of plunder must have been near Jerusalem, and that the enemy had fled. For only then could such reach the camp or venture into it. Manifestly the Prophet has in mind the same fact to which he refers ver. 4 (2 Kings xix. 35 sqq.; Isa. xxxvii. 36 sqq.). As in vers. 5, 6 the spoiling of the Assyrian is made the pledge of all other displays of divine grace, so, too, here. The nation that has experienced such salvation from God may comfort itself with the assurance of all support both for the body (24 a) [comp. Jer. xiv. 18] and for the soul (24 b). Both hang closely together (comp. Luke v. 20 sqq.). But forgiving sin is the chief matter: for sin separates God and man; and as soon as it is taken away, both are closely united, and the way is opened for blessing men (comp. vers. 5, 6).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxxiii. 1. Per quod quis peccat, per idem punitur et ipse. Jer. xxx. 16; comp. Adonibezek, Judg. i. 5 sqq.; Matth. vii. 2.

2. On xxxiii. 10. God alone knows when the proper moment has come for Him to interpose. Till then He waits—but not a moment longer. Till then it is our part to wait with patience.

But let the right moment come, and let the LORD once say: "Now will I rise," then what is not of God falls to pieces, then the nations must despair and kingdoms fall; the earth must pass away when He lets Himself be heard (Ps. xlvi. 7). Then the hidden truth of things becomes manifest: what appeared strong then appears weak, and the weak strong, that the LORD alone may be high at that time (ii. 11; v. 15).

3. Ver. 14. Here we get a deep insight into the obstinate and despairing heart of man, and recognize why it will not endure a living and personal God. As Peter said: "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord" (Luke v. 8), so they would turn the living God out of the world, because they feel themselves to be sinful men, who cannot renounce their sins, because they will not; for did they but earnestly will to do so, then they could also. The inmost reason of all practical and theoretical heathenism is the feeling of the natural man that he and the holy God cannot exist side by side in the world. One or other must yield. Instead of adopting the way and means which God reveals, by which from natural and sinful men we may become holy children of God, we rather deny the living God and substitute either demons (1 Cor. x. 20) or abstractions for Him. But the Prophet here awakens the presentiment that we may become holy children of God (ver. 15); the Son of God, however, in the new covenant teaches us this with perfect clearness (1 Pet. ii. 9 sqq.).

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. Vers. 2-6. Help in great distress. 1) On what condition (believing prayer, ver. 2); 2) Its ground a. the grace of God (ver. 2 a); b. the power of God (ver. 3 b, v. 5 a); 3) Its two sides, in that it is a. corporal (vers. 3, 4); b. spiritual (vers. 5, 6).

2. [Ver. 5. When God's enemies and ours are overthrown, both He and we are glorified. "1. God will have the praise of it (ver. 5 a); 2. His people will have the blessing of it (ver. 5 b)." M. HENRY].

3. Vers. 10-13. The Lord's acts of deliverance. 1. They come at the right moment (ver. 10). 2. They are thorough in their effects (vers. 11, 12). 3. They teach us to know and praise God.

4. [Ver. 14. "1. The hypocrites will be greatly alarmed when they see punishment come upon the open and avowed enemies of God. 2. In such times they will have none of the peace and quiet confidence which His true friends have. 3. Such alarm is evidence of conscious guilt and hypocrisy. 4. The persons here spoken of had a belief in the doctrine of eternal punishment—a belief which hypocrites and sinners always have, else why should they be alarmed? 5. The punishment of hypocrites in the church will be dreadful." A. BARNES].

5. [The character of a righteous man (ver. 15). The reward of the righteous (ver. 16 sqq.). See M. HENRY and BARNES in loc.—TR.]

6. Vers. 20-22. Comfort for the church in adversity. The church of the Lord stands fast. For 1. It is the last and highest institution of God (ver. 20). 2. The Lord Himself is mighty in it, a. as Judge, b. as a Master (Teacher), c. as King (vers. 21, 22).

FOURTH SUBDIVISION.

THE CONCLUSION OF PART FIRST.

CHAP. XXXIV.—XXXV.

Chapters xxxiv., xxxv. are the proper conclusion of the first part of Isaiah's prophecies. For chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. are only an historical supplement, though a very important one. Hence I do not think that chaps. xxxiv., xxxv. are only the finale of chaps. xxviii.—xxxiii.; for that we have already found in chap. xxxiii. Rather chaps. xxxiv., xxxv. form a conclusion of the first half of the book that sums up and finishes the announcements of judgment and salvation of the first part, and prepares for and introduces those of part second. For we notice already in these chapters the language of xl.—lxvi. First of all the Prophet carries us in chap. xxxiv. to the end of days. As if to make an end corresponding to the beginning, i. 2, he summons the earth and all its inhabitants to notice the announcement of the final judgment that is to comprehend heaven and earth (xxxiv. 1-4). But he is not in condition to represent the how of the world's destruction. As remarked in the introduction to xxiv.—xxvii., he can only paint that remote judgment in colors of the present. He gives at once a vivid and an agreeable picture of it by representing it as a judgment against Edom. For the negative base of Israel's hope of salvation is that its enemies shall be destroyed. That the Prophet means here to conclude all announcement of judgment against their enemies appears from the demand of ver. 16 that they shall search "the book of the LORD," and compare the prediction there with the fulfilment. We shall try to show that this appeal to "the book of the LORD" implies the entire foregoing book.

In chap. xxxv. the Prophet presents the other side of the judgment of the world, viz., the final redemption of Israel. It appears as a return home to Zion out of exile. Not a word intimates that the Prophet has in mind only the return from Babylon. He names no land; he speaks only of return (שׁוּב, ver. 10) in general. Already in Deut. xxx. 3 sqq. it is promised that the LORD will gather the Israelites and bring them back out of all lands, even though driven out to the end of heaven, thence too the LORD will fetch them. On the ground of this passage Isaiah had already held out a similar prospect (xi. 11 sqq.; xix. 23 sq.; xxvii. 12 sq.), and after him Jeremiah especially deals much in this particular of the glorious last time (xvi. 14 sqq.; xxiii. 3; xxix. 14; xxxii. 37; xl. 12; xlvi. 27). Therefore the Prophet promises here glorious and joyful return home—that to the Israelite must be dearest of all—and the object of his greatest longing (Ps. cxxxvii. 5, 6), and in that home eternal joy (ver. 10). One may say that he draws here the outline of the picture that he afterwards carries out in chaps. xl.–lxvi. in all the varieties of its forms.

Their contents show that the two chapters belong together. Chap. xxxv. is the necessary obverse of xxxiv. The expressions נוה תנים חציר ל׳ xxxv. 7, which manifestly contrasts with xxxiv. 13, form a close bond between the two chapters; and it is to be noted that חָצִיר in the sense of חָצֵר occurs only in these two places. Also the metonymic use of בקע (xxxiv. 15; xxxv. 6) which occurs beside only lviii. 8; lix. 5, is a peculiarity of language that points to the correlation of the two chapters.

EICHHORN, GESEN., ROSENMUELLER, DE W., MAUR., HITZIG, EW., UMBR., KNOBEL and others ascribe these chapters to a later author that lived in the time of the captivity. They only differ in that some (GESENIUS, ROSENMUELLER, HITZIG, EWALD) put this unknown author at the end of the exile, the others at an earlier period. We will show in the exposition, by exact investigation of the language, that both the contents and the form of language of these chapters connect them intimately with xl.—lxvi., yet that in both these respects there is also a common character with part first. This view is confirmed by the undeniable fact that these chapters are variously quoted by prophets before the exile. This will be proved in respect to Jer. xlvi. 10 in the comment on xxxiv. 5 sqq. I have shown the connection between these chapters and Jer. l. 27, 39; li. 40, 60 sqq. by an extended examination in my work: "Der Prophet Jer. und Babylon, Erlangen, 1850." Comp. KUEPER, Jerem. libr. sacr. interpr. atque vindex, Berolini, 1837, p. 79 sqq. CASPARI, Jerem., ein Zeuge für d. Echtheit von Jes. xxxiv., etc., Zeitschr. von Rudelbach und Guericke, 1843, Heft. 2, p. 1 sqq. The proof that Jer. has drawn on our chapters carries with it the proof that the resemblances noticed between Zeph. i. 7, 8 and Isa. xxxiv. 6, and between Zeph. ii. 14 and Isa. xxxiv. 11, are to be regarded as a use of these chapters by Zephaniah, the older contemporary of Jeremiah, and not a quotation of Zephaniah by these chapters.

The reasons adduced against Isaiah's authorship of these chapters will not stand examination. KNOBEL thinks the hatred of Edom in the degree shown in xxxiv. 5 sqq. is to be found only in passages that belong to the time after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. But not to mention Obadiah (especially vers. 10–14), there are found in Joel (iv. 19) and Amos (especially i. 11 sqq.) proofs enough that there could be in Isaiah's time a hatred like that expressed in our chapter xxxiv. We will show in the exposition of xxxv. that it does not presuppose the Babylonish exile, but the second, great and last exile in general. It is incomprehensible how the announcement of a great judgment on the heathen generally (xxxiv. 2, 3, 5 sqq.; xxxv. 8) can denote a later authorship, seeing the same is announced in the acknowledged prophecies of Isa. ii. 4, 11 sqq., and even in xxx. 25 sqq. (see comm. in loc.). But we may refer in this matter to the entire liber apocalypticus (xxiv.—xxvii.), by assaulting which the critics of course becloud for themselves the conspectus of Isaiah's field of vision. What KNOBEL further urges of the extravagant expectations (xxxiv. 3, 4, 9; xxxv. 1, 2, 5 sqq.), affects only the bold and grand images in which the Prophet utters these expectations. And these images are too bold, too hyperbolical for Isaiah! If the genuineness of chs. xiii., xiv., xxiv.–xxvii. is denied, then the analogies for the dissolution of the heavens (xxxiv. 4) and for the goblins of night and wild beasts (xxxiv. 11–17) are surrendered. On this subject we can only refer back to our defence of the genuineness of chap. xiii., xiv. Finally KNOBEL mentions a number of expressions in these chapters which in general, or at least, in their present meaning, occur only in later writers, putting in the latter class some expressions that are peculiar to this author. One may admit that many expressions occur in Isaiah that only later writers employ, or that are analogous to expressions of later use. But is this any proof of the later origin of these chapters? Isaiah is so opulent a spirit, he reigns with such creative power even in the sphere of language, and his authority is so great with his successors, that we may confidently affirm, that very many later words and expressions are to be referred to him as the source or exemplar. Moreover that argument loses weight when we consider that in our chapters much ancient linguistic treasure occurs, e. g., בְּאֹשׁ, xxxiv. 3; רְאֵם, xxxiv. 7; נָקָם and שִׁלּוּם, xxxiv. 8.

Isaiah, then, is doubtless the author of our chapters. But he wrote them in his later period, when Assyria was for him a stand-point long since surmounted, and when, withdrawn from the present, he lived, with all his prophetic seeing and knowing, in the future. I agree with DELITZSCH in assuming that Isaiah, in preparing the book as a whole (if he actually himself attended to this matter), put these chapters here as a conclusion of the first part of his prophetic discourses. I only add that on this occasion Isaiah must have added vers. 16, 17 with their reference to the now completed "book of the LORD."

The division of the chapters is simple:—

1. The judgment on all nations, xxxiv. 1–4.
2. The judgment on Edom as representation of the whole in one particular example, of especial interest to Israel, xxxiv. 5–15.
3. Concluding remark: summons to compare the prophecy with the fulfilment, xxxiv. 16, 17.
4. The obverse of the judgment: Israel's redemption and return home, xxxv.

1. THE JUDGMENT ON ALL NATIONS.

Chapter XXXIV. 1–4.

1 Come near, ye nations, to hear;
And hearken, ye people:
Let the earth hear, and [1]all that is therein;
The world, and all things that come forth of it.
2 For [a]the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations,
And his fury upon all their armies:
He [b]hath utterly destroyed them,
He hath delivered them to the slaughter.
3 Their slain also shall be cast out,
And their stink shall come up out of their carcases,
And the mountains shall be melted with their blood.
4 And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved,
And the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll:
And all their host shall [c]fall down,
As the leaf falleth off from the vine,
And as a [d]falling fig from the fig tree.

[1] Heb. the fulness thereof.

[a] the LORD has wrath on. [b] hath cursed. [c] wilt. [d] or, wilted leaf-fall.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

☞ [For the sake of economy in labor and space we will omit in this and subsequent chapters the Author's abundant and laborious citations of texts illustrative of Isaiah's style, and involving proof of the common authorship of parts first and second. The Author has prepared a comprehensive list of the words and texts concerned in these chapters, which appears at the close of the volume and, except where the commentary furnishes additional matter, we shall refer to that list by the sign see list.—Tr.].

Ver. 1. קרבו, לאמים, הקשיב see list.——גוים occurs often in both parts, e. g., i. 4; ii. 4; x. 7; xi. 10; xl. 15; xli. 2. The expression ארץ ומלאה occurs Deut. xxxiii. 16; Ps. xxiv. 1; Mic. i. 2, and often; in Isaiah only here. Comp. הים ומלאו xlii. 10; vi. 8; viii. 8; xxxi. 4.—תבל (comp. on xiii. 11) occurs only in part first.——צאצאים (plur tant.) are τα ἔκγονα, "the products." The expression is based on Gen. i. 12, 24 (תּוֹצֵא הָאָרֶץ). The Prophet thus does not mean only men, as many, influenced by the LXX. and Chald., have supposed. The word, being made parallel with מלאה, denotes everything that as production of the earth fills it.

Vers. 2, 3. קצף, צבא, טבח, חללים see list.—פגריהם casus absolutus, comp. Ewald, § 309 b. בְּאשׁ only here in Isaiah. Comp. Joel ii. 20; Amos iv. 10.

Ver. 4. מקק (as verb only here in Isaiah), is used Ps. xxxviii. 6 of a festering wound, in Zech. xiv. 12 of rotting flesh, i. e., eyes and tongues rotting in their natural place. In Lev. xxvi. 39; Ezek. xxiv. 23; xxxiii. 10 it is used in the more general sense of passing away, disappearing; Isa. iii. 24; v. 24. מַק is "that which has rotted, mouldered." Add to this that מָכַךְ Ps. cvi. 43; Job xxiv. 24; Eccles. x. 18, denotes corruere, collabi; מוּךְ Lev. xxv. 25, 35, 39, 47 means "to collapse, decline, wax poor," but מוּג (Amos ix. 5, 13; Ps. lxv. 11, etc.), diffluere, dissolvi. Thus we must recognize as the fundamental meaning of this family of words "decomposition, dissolution, rotting, mouldering, turning to dust" occasioned by the departure of the spirit of life. But this effect may be variously brought about. Fire, e. g., can produce it in a tree by scorching it. Such appears the sense here. Thus 2 Pet. iii. 12 οὐρανοὶ πυρούμενοι λυθήσονται seems to me to correspond to our נָמַקּוּ.——נָגֹל for נָגַל see Green's Gram., § 140, 2. Niph. only here in Isaiah; Polal. ix. 4.——נבל comp. i. 30; xxiv. 4; xxviii. 1, 4; xl. 7, 8; lxiv. 5, especially as regards נבלת see on xxviii. 1, 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. It is a mighty matter, the concern of all nations that the Prophet has to announce: hence he summons all to hear his address (ver. 1). For the wrath of the Lord is kindled against all nations and all that belongs to them. They are all to be given up to the slaughter (ver. 2), and shall be cast out so that the stench shall mount up, and whole mountains shall run with blood (ver. 3). Yea, the heavens shall roll up as by strong heat, and the heavenly bodies shall fall like dry leaves (ver. 4).

2. Come——fig tree.—Vers. 1–4. The expression צאצאים occurs only in Job and Isaiah (see on xxii. 24). The use nearest like the present is xlii. 5. In ver. 2 only the nations are mentioned as the object of the judgment. Though impersonal nature shares in it, still this is only the means to an end. כל־צבאם, having a similar relation to that of כל־צאצאיה (see Text. and Gram.), denotes not the host merely, but the host of mankind in general. Already, by virtue of the decree of wrath determined against them, the LORD has laid on them His curse or ban (החרים xi. 15; xxxvii. 11), and devoted them to slaughter.

On the description ver. 3 comp. xiv. 19; xxxvii. 36; lxvi. 24; x. 18; xiii. 7; xix. 1. The passages Matt. xxiv. 29; 2 Pet. iii. 7, 10, 12; Rev. vi. 13, 14 are founded on the present text. For that the Prophet has in mind the destruction of the world, is manifest from this description comprehending the earth and heavens.

2. THE JUDGMENT ON EDOM, AS REPRESENTATION OF THE WHOLE IN ONE PARTICULAR EXAMPLE OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO ISRAEL.

CHAPTER XXXIV. 5–15.

5 [a]For my sword shall be bathed in heaven:
Behold, it shall come down upon Idumea,
And upon the people of my curse, to judgment.
6 The sword of the LORD is filled with blood,
It is made fat with fatness,
And with the blood of lambs and goats,
With the fat of the kidneys of rams:
For the LORD hath a sacrifice in Bozrah,
And a great slaughter in the land of Idumea.
7 And the [1b]unicorns shall come down with them,
And the bullocks with the bulls;
And their land shall be [2]soaked with blood,
And their dust made fat with fatness.
8 [a]For it is the day of the LORD's vengeance,
And the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion.
9 And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch,
And the dust thereof into brimstone,
And the land thereof shall become burning pitch.
10 It shall not be quenched night nor day;
The smoke thereof shall go up for ever:
From generation to generation it shall lie waste;
None shall pass through it for ever and ever.
11 But the [c]cormorant and the [d]bittern shall possess it;
The owl also and the raven shall dwell in it:
And he shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion,
And the stones of emptiness.
12 [e]They shall call the nobles thereof to the kingdom,
But none shall be there,
And all her princes shall be [f]nothing.
13 [g]And thorns shall come up in her palaces,
Nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof.
And it shall be an habitation of [h]dragons,
And a court for [4][5]owls.
14 [i]The wild beasts of the desert shall also meet with [7]the wild beasts of the island,
And the [k]satyr shall cry to his fellow;
The [8]screech owl also shall rest there,
And find for herself a place of rest.
15 There shall the [j]great owl make her nest, and lay,
And hatch, and gather under her shadow:
There shall the vultures also be gathered,
Every one with her mate.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 5. Only by great ingenuity can כִּי be explained to mean "for." Hence Knobel construes it as pleonastic, connecting the discourse, and appeals, e. g., to viii. 23. But there exists a plain causal connection between vers. 4 and 5, only the res causans is in verse 4 and not in ver. 5. Hence כִּי here = "because" and not "for." Because the sword of God has become drunken in heaven it comes down to earth (comp. Gen. iii. 14; xxxiii. 11; Exod. i. 19, etc.).——רִוְּתָה (comp. xvi. 9) is direct causative Piel = ebrietatem facere, "to produce drunkenness." As, e. g., הִשְׁמִין not only means "fatten," i. e., others, but also "make, produce, grow fat," i. e., grow fat one's-self, so this verb means not only "make others drunk" (Jer. xxxi. 14; Ps. lxv. 11), but also "make one's-self drunk."——לְמִשְׁפָּט—in behoof of accomplishing judgment; comp. Hab. i. 12; Ezek. xliv. 24 K'ri; comp. Isa. xli. 1; liv. 17, in another sense Isa. v. 7; xxxii. 1; xxviii. 26.
